> Then they took me to Farol [Senopati 1] at night. They put a Fretilin flag and a Portuguese flag on the ground and I was made to lie on top of them and step on them…I was there for around 2 to 3 hours.
>
> Then I was moved to another house in Farol. In the house they detained me in the kitchen and sat me down for interrogation. It was already 2.00am. Because I couldn't understand Indonesian, they had to find an interpreter for me.
>
> That night they moved me again to another house in Farol [RT Pan]. They detained me in the bathroom…They moved me again to Dili harbour at around 4:00 in the morning. There I met VM and WM. They detained the three of us together. ABRI members insulted us and said vile things to us.
>
> I was tortured all day, Even though I was pregnant, I was still tortured all day. I was forced to be naked, then they grabbed and burned me. While we are naked, they forced us to stand facing each other and we looked at each other and we cried. Then they touched my abdomen and said that my child was a communist child. And, using a ruler, they poked VM's and WM's genitals. Then I was moved to the Tropical to be interrogated for a few hours.[348]

335. Maria Olandina Isabel Caiero Alves was taken to Kupang (West Timor, Indonesia) on 19 December 1975 where she was detained until 3 March 1979 in a military-owned house under the control of an Indonesian colonel, T225. Although she was not restricted to a cell, she was not allowed to leave the area around the house.

336. Martinho da Costa Jesus was also held in a variety of other detention centres, before finding himself in the Comarca. He had decided to stay in his house in Aitarak Laran (Kampung Alor, Dili) during the invasion instead of fleeing with his neighbours. A week after the invasion, an ABRI soldier arrested Martinho da Costa Jesus and three friends, Sico Brito, Sung Hai and Francisco dos Santos, all civilians, and took them to a military post in Marconi (Kampung Alor, Dili). Martinho da Costa Jesus told the Commission:

> When we got there, our thumbs were tied and we were told to stand against the wall. They frightened us by shooting warning shots [in the air]. They took us to Farol, where we were detained separately. A commander, I don't know his name, kicked me while saying that I was a communist. On 16 December 1975, we were taken to Dili harbour, where we were stripped naked and ordered to lie down on the ground. Then motorcycles ran over us a number of times; I can still feel the pain. At the harbour I saw T226, a senior member of Apodeti. We were detained in the harbour for one day and one night, and then we were taken to the Tropical. The next day, on 17 December 1975, I was hit by an Indonesian

ABRI colonel, T227. He hit my forehead with a piece of wood causing it to bleed. We were detained in the Tropical for four months and then we were taken to Balide Prison. I was detained for three years and released in August 1978.[349]

Victims targeted for detention

337. The Commission's research suggests that in these early years, the military had a clear strategy of identifying and capturing party members of Fretilin and members of the armed Resistance, Falintil. It also detained anyone it suspected could provide information about the Resistance. This included:

- Suspected members or supporters of Fretilin or related organisations
- Family members of Fretilin members
- Individuals connected to the former Portuguese administration
- UDT members who had been detained by Fretilin and were treated with suspicion because of such contact.

338. Even young children were interrogated. Maria José Conceição Franco Pereira described at a Commission public hearing how, when she was four years old, she was arrested with her mother by two members of ABRI and detained between 1976 and 1979. She told the Commission of their treatment at Sang Tai Hoo:

My mother was arrested with several other women and their children in Becora [Dili] because my older brother was a member of Fretilin and my whole family had fled to the forest except my mother, who was a nurse. My mother and I were taken to Sang Tai Hoo…That same night my mother was interrogated. She was slapped, whipped, spat on, given electric shocks, burned with cigarettes and threatened with a pistol. All I could do was watch…

The next day, ABRI arrested a man who was very old and his son who was maybe two or three years older than I was. ABRI began to interrogate them but the old man was just silent. Then his son answered because he knew about Fretilin using weapons in Marabia [Lahane, Dili]…After that ABRI said that children don't lie and they began to torture me. Each time they tortured me my mother would scream and ask that they just torture her…Once a soldier lifted me by the tops of my ears and held me outside the [first floor] window above the street below.[350]

339. In some cases the reason for arrest was unclear, even to the victim. Daniel da Costa Oliveira told the Commission that he was arrested on 26 February 1976 by an Indonesian interpreter T228 and two members of Koramil. He was arrested at home but was not told the reason. The soldiers took him to the beach at Kampung Alor, then the harbour, then to the Sota building and finally to the Tropical where he was interrogated and beaten.[351]

Allegiance to Indonesia

Many former detainees describe having to perform symbolic actions demonstrating allegiance to Indonesia, the invader and soon to be occupier of the territory, as well as the rejection of Portugal and Fretilin. Testimonies to this effect were given to the Commission for the entire period of occupation.

One common method of demanding allegiance was through rituals involving the Indonesian national flag. Maria de Fatima describes having to drink water in which the Indonesian flag had been soaked.[352] Others were tied to flagpoles in front of government offices or military installations.[353] Filomeno Soares who was late arriving to work as a Ratih (rakyat terlatih, trained civilian) in Liquidoe, Aileu, was forced to stand to attention before the flag for one hour, while standing on one leg.[354]

Ownership of a Fretilin flag was a cause for severe punishment.[355] António Alves was arrested with a Fretilin flag on 20 November 1990 at his home in Luculai (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) and was heavily punched, kicked and beaten unconscious at the Liquiçá Koramil.[356] Valenti Martins was beaten for his Fretilin membership with a wooden baton wrapped in a Fretilin flag in 1991 in Manetu (Maubisse, Ainaro).[357] Other detainees were forced to disrespect the flags of Portugal and or Timor-Leste. Maria Olandina Isabel Caeiro Alves, as mentioned earlier in this chapter, was forced to sit on the Portuguese flag and put her feet on the Fretilin flag for several hours in December 1975.[358] In another case, Almeida Seguera told the Commission how his brother Dasbere, a member of Fretilin, was captured in May 1976 by ABRI Battalion 403 in Ermera District. He was photographed with a Portuguese flag before he was taken away and killed.[359]

As well as the flag, the Fretilin anthem Foho Ramelau (Mount Ramelau) was used during interrogation. Detainees report being forced to sing the anthem to their captors.[360] Other detainees report being forced to read out the text of Pancasila (the Indonesian code of five nationalist principles). Francisco da Conceição told the Commission that if he refused to read out the text he would be submerged into a tank of water for 30 minutes, in Maubisse (Ainaro) in 1991.[361]

Interrogation, torture and other cruel and inhuman treatment

340. Interrogations, often using torture, were carried out to ascertain the strength and weaknesses of the Resistance. Julio Alfaro, a former East Timorese sergeant in the Portuguese military, was interrogated about Fretilin after military police and intelligence arrested him on 12 December 1975. He told the Commission that after spending two months in a building behind the Tropical, he was moved to the solitary confinement cell in the Comarca and from then on was taken out only for interrogation. He said that he was questioned not only about his connection with Fretilin and whether he was a military commander, but also about Fretilin's military capacities:

> Their other objective was to obtain as much information as possible on Timor-Leste's military strength both its weapons and personnel and its logistical strength. They also asked me how long Fretilin could last in the bush and I replied at least for two years. I was not tortured but they put me back in the 'Maubutar Cell'. After being interrogated I was not given anything and just slept on the concrete floor.[362]

341. Torture and other cruel treatment was used on members of Fretilin from the beginning of the occupation although, as Julio Alfaro stated, it was not used uniformly. The forms of torture recorded in the testimonies of victims from this early period were repeated throughout the occupation. These methods included:

- Beatings using fists, weapons, pieces of wood, metal bars or other heavy items
- Kicking, often with heavy military boots
- Electric shocks
- Burning a victim's flesh with a cigarette
- Placing a victim's toes underneath the legs of a chair or table and then one or more people sitting on the chair or table to crush the toes
- Threatening the victim with a knife or a gun
- Using water in various ways such as pouring hot or very cold water over the victim, or submerging the victim in a tank of water for a period of time.

342. Prisoners were also kept in inhuman conditions. Many reported being stripped of their clothes and held naked for weeks at a time. Others reported being denied food and drink.

Interrogation in Dili

FN was a member of the Fretilin student group Unetim (União Nacional dos Estudantes de Timor), which had activities in Baucau and Aileu, and later a member of the Fretilin women's group OPMT (Organização Popular da Mulher Timor) in Dili. In January 1976, when she was around 16 years old, her friend Filomena Aniceto came to her house and said that the military had called the two of them to Sang Tai Hoo for interrogation. FN told the Commission:

Filomena and I sat together and listened to the questions asked by the translator, T229, an East Timorese woman. The soldier asked: "Are you Unetim students? Tell us what the activities or mission of Unetim have been up until now, because we have heard that the two of you were in Aileu (Aissirimou) [where the Fretilin base was located during the internal conflict]. You lived like animals there – is that true or not?" Both of us answered that it was not true but they kept interrogating us and twisting our words…until evening.

After [the interrogation] they made my friend Filomena Aniceto stay at Sang Tai Hoo, but they told me to go home. The next day I was called back for interrogation…They told me that my friends, who had been interrogated before me, had said that my friends [the Unetim students in Aileu] had all done the same things in Aileu. That we lived there like animals. They came up to me and started groping me from head to toe. My body felt cold like a corpse, but in my heart I kept praying for Mother Mary to protect me from everything they did. I was screaming and crying, but they just got angry and called me a female dog. They pulled on my hair and said: "Now try to persuade the leaders of Unetim and Fretilin to come and save you." They questioned me, twisting my words around, until evening.

On the fifth [day of] interrogation, soldiers came to my house on a Monday in a big truck...Everyone saw the military truck parked in front of my house. I wasn't surprised…but my parents were upset that I was being taken for interrogation repeatedly. This time my mother came with me. They took me to the Tropical but when we got there they wouldn't let my mother come in…As I walked up the stairs, soldiers swarmed all over me and pushed me with a rifle to my back. They yelled so that I would move quickly. There were many other prisoners there. My interrogation was conducted by an Indonesian soldier, T230, and an Indonesian interpreter, T231. He asked me: "When are the international forces coming to Timor-Leste to fight the Indonesian troops?" With words like that and accusations they tried to start arguments with people they were interrogating. So they accused me of having been forced to join Unetim and Fretilin. Then they washed the red and white [Indonesian] flag and ordered me to drink the water. They covered my face with black cloth, put a helmet on my head and hit me with a piece of wood, the kind usually used by the police. They hit me until I passed out…They took off the helmet and black cloth, then they hit me in the head with the end of the wood until I was bruised and bleeding.

After their interrogations ended, FN and Filomena were ordered to work at the commander-in-chief's house every day, to tend his flowers. They were picked up each morning by a military truck until, according to FN, they were simply forgotten about. FN describes the impact her contact with the military had on her life:

*Rumours started going around about us. Other friends suspected us of having had sexual relationships with the ABRI soldiers, and they told us that our lives were like rotten potatoes [fehuk ropa dodok]. That rumour surfaced because we were always moved to different places for interrogation. It was all because we were ordered to go to the commander-in-chief's house [Brigadier Dading Kalbuadi's house] in Farol to plant flowers in pots. Every day we would be picked up by a military car to go to his house to look after the flowers.*[363]

Takeover of other areas

343. Following the capture of the towns of Dili on 7 December and Baucau two days later, Indonesian forces moved through the central, western and eastern regions almost simultaneously. Indonesia had gained control of most major towns and routes by June 1976 (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict, section on Operation Seroja, 1976–1979).

344. As in the invasion of Dili, combatants were detained when they were caught or surrendered to the invading forces. Salvador Martins told the Commission:

*In 1975, I was captured with two friends [José Guterres and Francisco, both Fretilin/Falintil members] by ABRI in Fatubessi [Hatolia, Ermera]. We were punished by being made to dig holes and cut down and carry wood to build the ABRI post. When we were captured we had weapons like G-3s, metralhadora [machine gun] and Mausers with us. ABRI took these and gave them to the military headquarters in Ermera. We were detained in Fatubessi for one month and then taken to the military headquarters in Ermera for one month…then we went home to our families.*[364]

345. Also like Dili, most of the population fled as they heard of Indonesian forces approaching. In the few places where the population was unable to flee in time, it was reported to the Commission that mass arrests took place. João Freitas da Silva described what he saw occur when ABRI entered the neighbourhood of Kaibuti-Maimi (Ossorua, Ossu, Viqueque):

In January 1976, ABRI attacked and entered the town of Ossu. I was living in Kaibuti-Maimi in Ossurua. Because I was afraid, I fled with my family to Ahabu in the village of Uabubu [Ossu, Viqueque]. In February, ABRI attacked us and other civilians and a friend and I, Gilberto, ran to hide and watch what went on.

[We saw] many people arrested, including Francisco da Silva, who the soldiers took along with them to carry their things…ABRI also burned down people's homes and took their animals.[365]

346. For example, José Freitas told the Commission that he and 166 others were detained in Maubisse (Hato Builico, Ainaro) by Battalion 405 for two days after the military entered the town in December 1975.[366] Similarly, an East Timorese man described to the commission how he had been a village security officer who was giving food to Falintil when ABRI attacked Liquidoe (Aileu). Around 190 people including his family were captured and taken to a private house in the town of Aileu where they were tortured by unknown East Timorese.[367]

347. Civilians were also detained. The cases reported to the Commission indicate that many people were detained randomly as the military sought to separate members of Fretilin from the general population. Patterns of arbitrary detention and use of torture and ill-treatment of detainees were similar to those in Dili: detainees were held in various buildings occupied by the military,* and were interrogated and frequently tortured. Two examples of detention of individuals include:

348. An East Timorese man was arrested with his family when the military, including Partisans, entered his village in Viqueque in 1976. They were put in a cell in the town and interrogated. He told the Commission that he was not beaten but others in the cell were beaten heavily.[368]

349. GN described how the military stormed the OPMT headquarters in Aileu, Fretilin's base during the internal armed conflict, when they invaded the town in 1975, and arrested the women working there. The women were kicked and beaten with weapons at the time of arrest and were then held in the Caserna (Portuguese military barracks) Aileu for three months. She and other women were raped under threat of death.[369]

Community divisions

350. UDT and Apodeti members were instrumental in identifying members of Fretilin to the military. In the district of Ainaro, for example, José da Costa told the Commission that members of ABRI and four members of UDT arrested his uncle Mau-Kei in 1976 together with Abak, Manuel Araújo, Bento and José Mau-Kiak, in Akadiroto, in the

* Domingos dos Reis told the Commission that he and his family were held in a building on the main road of their village, Caicasa Hoo (Bucoli, Baucau), for four days after his arrest by Indonesian paratroopers when they landed in his village on 10 December 1975. Abrão da Costa Freitas reported that after marines invaded Baucau Town, he was arrested on 18 December 1975 and placed in the marines' post in Uma Lima (Baucau Town, Baucau) for eight hours, where he was interrogated, beaten and kicked. [HRVD Statements 8040 and 7680] village of Suro-Kraik (Ainaro, Ainaro) because all were identified as members of Fretilin.[370] Albino do Carmo Pereira reported that in July 1976 he, Alfredo Bianco and Domingos Maumera were forced by T232, who was both a liurai in Cassa (Ainaro) and an Apodeti commander, along with his son T233, to become kitchen assistants for Battalion 327 at their post in Mau Mali Lau, Soru Lau Village (Ainaro, Ainaro). In order to save themselves, they did this work for six months.[371]

351. Bemvinda Belo told the Commission:

> In January 1976 after we surrendered, my husband, Cipriano Magno Ximenes, was arrested by three [people] from Apodeti on the orders of T234. After the arrest he was handed over to the Indonesian Marines and detained for several days. After two days, my daughter Ana and I joined him in detention, along with a Chinese person. In detention, we were beaten with a piece of wood by T235 and T236 [the wives of leaders of the UDT party]. Five days later, [my husband] Cipriano was tortured until he died.[372]

352. Luis Pereira from the sub-district of Laclubar (Manatuto) explained that in 1976 he was a member of UDT. He left Laclubar to meet the Indonesian forces entering Manatuto from Baucau and surrendered to them in September 1976. He asked ABRI if they would go to Laclubar to protect members of UDT from Fretilin, because he was sure that Fretilin would come from their base in Aileu to kill supporters of UDT and Apodeti. Luis Pereira said that when the military entered Laclubar it only arrested people who were armed and that the soldiers were friendly towards the community.[373] Soon, however, they started targeting ordinary civilians.

Detention outside Dili

353. Some of those detained in other areas were sent to Dili for further interrogation because, at this time, most of the intelligence apparatus was based in the capital.[374] Marcus Ais, for example, was taken from Oecussi to the Comarca in Dili. Kopassandha* troops arrested Marcus and other Fretilin supporters, including Fretilin leader Alfredo Ramos, when they entered Oecussi. The prisoners were held first in the Companhia Oecussi (later to become the Oecussi Kodim) before they were moved to Dili. In both places, Marcus reported that he was tortured, in Oecussi by the Red Berets and in Balide by four Partisans.[375]

354. Others were held in the numerous informal detention centres established when the military moved into an area, or in military commands. The following box provides a case study of detention centres established in the sub-district of Baucau (Baucau), the centre for the eastern region.

* Kopassandha (an acronym of Komando Pasukan Sandi Yudha) were the Indonesian Special Forces. They had both an intelligence and a combat arm. They were also known by the nickname "Red Berets" because of the red berets that they wore.

Case study: detention centres in the city of Baucau[376]

From the moment the Indonesian military entered Baucau on 9 December 1975 it appropriated a wide range of buildings that became notorious as centres of detention and torture. Detainees were moved frequently from one centre to another. For example, when interrogators in one centre got frustrated by detainees' answers, they often sent them to other centres. Based on interviews carried out by the Commission, the most brutal period of interrogation and torture in Baucau occurred between 1975 and 1980. The detention and torture centres used in this period, and sometimes into later years, included:

Flamboyan Hotel

The hotel in Bahu, Baucau Old Town is a compound comprising three buildings. Built on sacred land during the Portuguese occupation, it was purchased in 1959 from the landowner, Venancio Boavida, by a Portuguese businessman, José Ricardo, for about US$100,000. In 1960, José Ricardo built a soap factory and the Baucau Hotel on the land. Ownership of the hotel changed several times prior to the Indonesian occupation. On the day ABRI invaded Baucau, it appropriated and then used the hotel as an army barracks, renaming it Flamboyan Hotel after its recently completed Flamboyan Military Campaign. ABRI transformed the soap factory into an ammunition depot and a prison that held about 80 prisoners, including pregnant women and children, from 1975 to 1979. Many prisoners disappeared from the Flamboyan, especially between 1975 and 1976. ABRI used the swimming pool near the soap factory to submerge prisoners. Different forms of torture using water were used. The prison was relocated to Rumah Merah (Red House) in 1989, but ABRI continued to use the hotel until 1999 as a barracks, to accommodate army families and guests who visited Baucau, and as a venue for official functions.[377]

Military District Command (Kodim) 1628/Military Sub-district Command (Koramil) 1628-01

ABRI took over the Portuguese military headquarters after the invasion for both Military District Command 1628 (Kodim) and Sub-district Military Command 1628-01 (Koramil) and used the buildings until Indonesia's departure from Timor-Leste. Throughout the occupation the two command structures had separate interrogation and torture chambers and used separate buildings to hold detainees.

Uma Lima (Tetum: Five Houses)

In 1976, ABRI extended detention sites to include Uma Lima. ABRI used these five houses as soldiers' dormitories and for the detention, interrogation, and torture (including rape) of prisoners. In 1989, the Indonesian National Family Planning Board temporarily occupied the middle house. ABRI kept the remaining four houses as dormitory and interrogation chambers until it abandoned Uma Lima in 1999.

Rumah Merah (Indonesian: Red House)

Rumah Merah was likely named after the red berets worn by members of the Special Forces Unit (Kopassandha) who built the house on vacant land in 1977 without permission from or compensation to the owner, Joaquim Belo. From 1979 until 1999, Battalion 330, Bukit Barisan, from Sumatra occupied Rumah Merah as a dormitory and detention centre. Of all detention centres, Rumah Merah was one of the most feared for rape, torture and disappearances, second only to the RTP barracks (see below). To be sent to Rumah Merah meant detention at the hands of the notoriously cruel Special Forces Unit.

Clubo Municipal (Portuguese: Town Club)

The Portuguese colonial administration built the Clubo Municipal as a sporting venue and a place to hold big events like New Year's Eve celebrations. The Indonesian army used the Clubo Municipal as a detention centre for East Timorese who had surrendered. ABRI, who occupied this venue from the moment it entered Baucau until the 1980s, assigned to it not only members of the Special Forces Unit, but also of the District and Sub-district Military Commands, and Civil Defence.

RTP-12, -15 and –18 (Resimen Tim Pertempuran, Regimental Combat Team)

RTP-12, -15 and -18 were Portuguese barracks that ABRI soldiers took over for its combat units when they entered Baucau. RTP-12 was in Buruma, RTP-15 in Teulale and RTP-18 in Baucau New Town. ABRI used the buildings for barracks as well as for detention, interrogation and torture. These three detention centres were reputed to be the worst interrogation and detention centres in Baucau until Indonesia left in 1999, despite turnovers in ABRI personnel. They were feared because of the sheer brutality suffered by detainees held there, particularly from 1975 to 1979. Detainees believed that once they were transferred to an RTP site they were at the final stage of interrogation, soon to die. Infantry Battalion 745 (Lospalos, Lautém) and Field Artillery 13 were both assigned to RTP-12. RTP-15 and RTP-18 were guarded solely by members of Field Artillery 13. Armed 13 was from Sukabumi, West Java and served in the Quelicai area under the command of RTP-18. One of the officers in Armed 13 was an Indonesian First Lieutenant T237 who was a feared interrogator. In 1979 he sent 16 detainees from RTP-18 to Lacudala Cave in Quelicai (Baucau), where they joined detainees from Lautém and Viqueque, before he ordered their massacre.

355. As mentioned above, much of the population fled to the interior as the military approached, and so avoided immediate arrest. In the days and weeks following the military invasion, people began to come back to their homes to find food and if they were caught they were arrested. For example, Sahe-Dara reported to the Commission:

> In 1976, the Indonesian troops entered Uatolari [Viqueque]. Falintil troops took me and some of my friends including Veronica, Maria Lopes, Ereleto, Palmira, Pedro, Acaçio, Ventura and Bobu to the forest around Mau Boru-Babulu [Uatolari, Viqueque]. We stayed there for three weeks…Then we ran out of food, so we went to find food around Boru-Lalu. Two Falintil soldiers, my older brother Manuel and his friend Luis, guarded us and we spent the night there. But around midnight we were captured by ABRI and three members of Hansip, [the commander] T238 and [his men] T239 and T240. Manuel and Luis were immediately tied up and [we were all] taken to Uatolari.[378]

356. Sahe-Dara explained that Manuel and Luis were taken away by Hansip members and never returned. The rest of the group was held in Uatolari (Viqueque) for one week. One day the Hansip commander, Hermenegildo, ordered Sahe-Dara to take a letter to Xanana Gusmão in the forest but he turned back before delivering the letter and was then held in Uatolari for nine months. The people arrested with him were taken to Beaço where four died and the others were detained for nine months.

Securing the territory: 1976–1979

357. In July 1976, Timor-Leste was purportedly formally incorporated into Indonesia (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict), which changed the security structures and the patterns of detention and interrogation. Changes included:

- The deployment of military police in Dili and the major towns; they began to play a role in establishing detention centres*
- The establishment of territorial military commands at the levels of district (Komando Distrik Militer, referred to in this report as Kodim) and Sub-district (Komando Rayon Militer, referred to in this report as Koramil)†
- The establishment of provincial, district and sub-district police stations.

358. From this time, detainees from regional areas were moved to Dili less frequently, and instead were held in local Kodims and Koramils. The territorial units directed their attention to capturing Resistance fighters and identifying members of clandestine networks within their areas of control.

359. The clandestine movement had developed as soon as Fretilin moved into the interior following the Indonesian invasion on 7 December 1975. Organised in small groups, supporters of the Resistance helped the guerrillas in the mountains by providing food, medicines, clothing and information on the situation in Dili. These small groups developed spontaneously without a common strategy, worked independently and made their own contacts with the Falintil commanders in the mountains.[379] These networks strengthened after the fall of the "liberated zones" (zonas libertadas) in 1978-79.

* For example, military police were in charge of the Comarca in Balide (Dili).

† These military commands were under the command of the East Timor Sub-Regional Military Command (Korem, Komando Resort Militer) 164 Wira Dharma, which was based in Dili.

360. Combat operations were continuing at the same time as the military kept up its advances into Fretilin areas. Combatants and civilians captured in these operations were often detained and interrogated. Intelligence networks established in all communities down to the neighbourhood level assisted the Indonesian military. This led to the capture of members of the armed Resistance who had not surrendered and of civilians already living under Indonesian control who were connected to the Resistance in any way.

Development of intelligence networks

361. From mid-1976, after the initial period of chaos and mass displacement subsided, arrests reported to the Commission appeared to be more targeted. This is likely to be a result of the complex web of intelligence informants that the Indonesian military established down to the local community level (often referred to as Intel). Intelligence sections in Kodims and Koramils gathered information from members of political parties opposed to Fretilin. East Timorese recruited en masse into Hansip, the military or as TBOs, civilians who had surrendered and were detained and interrogated about their time in the forest with Fretilin, and community intelligence networks, whereby neighbours could inform on neighbours if they suspected them of doing clandestine work, all contributed to the process of information gathering. These methods led to an atmosphere of suspicion and heightened division at the community level. For example, Palmira da Costa de Ornai of Dili told the Commission:

> In August 1976, my Apodeti neighbours named T241 and T242 reported to ABRI that my son-in law, Horacio Faria, had assisted Falintil in the forest. So my son-in-law was arrested and taken to the Balide Prison. When they arrived, Horacio was tortured, including beatings and electrocution. Horacio was detained in Balide for a few months. When he was released he was sick and he eventually died from the injuries he received during his detention in Balide Prison.[380]

362. Luis Vasconcelos Babo testified that, on 5 May 1976, an East Timorese military informant T243 and an East Timorese civilian T244 gave Infantry Battalion (Batalyon Infantri, Yonif) 512 false information about his father. The military arrested Luis and his family on 6 May 1976 and held them at the Infantry Battalion 512 post in Ermera Town:

> [ABRI] captured most of my family, my father and a number of my relatives, José Ricardo, José Ximenes, Mário Babo, Abel Babo, Rogério Babo, Rosalina Babo and Rosa Madeira. We were all detained and interrogated about the party we had joined. After the interrogation we were ordered to return home, except for my father José Babo and Rosalina Babo, who were taken to the Ermera Kodim. They were both detained for one night. [In the morning] my mother was ordered to return home, while my father, José Babo, remained at the Ermera Kodim. He was stripped of his clothes down to his underwear and tortured in that condition, until he was black and blue.[381]

363. The day after he was released, a member of Hansip T799 re-arrested Luis Vasconselos Babo and took him to the Ermera Kodim to face T245, the Indonesian head of intelligence, and the Indonesian Kodim commander, T246. He told the Commission that he was beaten, stepped on and choked and then held in the Kodim for three years. His father, José Babo, was taken out to Titlala in Poetete Village (Ermera) and killed by an East Timorese member of Intel, T247, with Hansip members T248, T249, T250, T251, T252, T253, T254 and T255 in attendance.[382]

Detention of Resistance fighters

364. The military's prime targets were obviously Falintil fighters.[383] It was not uncommon for a whole range of different institutions to work together to arrest such people. Daniel da Silva was a member of Falintil under the command of Americo Ximenes (Sabica) and Jacob Reis (Daya). He told the Commission that he and two other members of Falintil, Alberto Naha Loi and Rodolfo Riba Naha, were arrested in 1977 through the combined efforts of:

- Infantry Battalion 408
- Members of Viqueque Kodim 1630 and an East Timorese commander T255
- T256, an East Timorese military commander from Uatolari
- T257, a Hansip
- T258 and T259, both civilians.

365. The detainees were taken to the Viqueque Kodim 1630 with their hands tied behind their backs, while Commander T255, Commander T256 and T260 confiscated Daniel da Silva's livestock and horses. Daniel da Silva told the Commission how the prisoners were interrogated:

After one night in Viqueque Kodim 1630, at around 8.00am, the three of us were interrogated by ABRI members T261, T255, T256. During the investigation T256 said: "You, as Falintil troops, are creating communism in East Timor." Because I was emotional I answered that as Falintil, we didn't follow communism. So T256 stripped my clothes then T261 electrocuted me. I was put in a room and detained with another prisoner named Anibal, who was a former Sub-district administrator in Uatolari [during Portuguese times].[384]

366. Both Daniel da Silva and Anibal were detained for five days, after which Infantry Battalion 408 took Anibal away by helicopter to an unknown place. Daniel da Silva was detained in the Infantry Battalion 408 headquarters for six months.[385]

367. Raul, a Falintil commander in the Remexio (Aileu) region, told the Commission that on 15 January 1979 he was captured by one Indonesian and four East Timorese members of the Koramil – T284, T262, T264 and T265 – on the orders of the Indonesian Koramil commander, Captain T266. Raul was detained in the Timor Klaran building in Aileu Town. When he arrived at the building, a member of Combat Engineers (Zeni Tempur, Zipur) Battalion 14 ill-treated and tortured him by tying his hands and legs, pressing a large iron bar against his chest, and then beating and electrocuting him.

368. Raul said he was interrogated about the names of Fretilin/Falintil commanders in the forest for two hours. Because he did not answer, the Zipur member put ashes mixed with bird's faeces and petroleum in his mouth. A member of Zipur stripped Raul, then hit, kicked and punched him until one of his teeth fell out. Then the Zipur member took Raul and put him in a tank full of water. Not long after that, another Zipur member brought urine and ordered Raul to drink it. He refused at first, but soon drank it because he could no longer stand the beating. After Raul had been detained for nine days his condition was so bad that the District Administrator of Aileu, Abel dos Santos Fatima, met with the Kodim commander to request Raul's release. Raul said that he was released soon after this meeting.[386]

Detention for being part of a Falintil attack

369. The Commission received information on some cases of people detained for involvement in Falintil attacks on military targets. In 1977 the Sub-district administrator of Fatululik (Covalima), T267, called Pedro de Jesus to come to his office. When he arrived in T267's office he was immediately beaten and interrogated for supposedly trying to surround the Koramil and capture weapons. Pedro de Jesus told the Commission:

> [He] said that I was a fool and put me in a room, where he beat me with a rifle, and stamped on my foot with his military boots until all of the skin of my foot was torn. [They said] "Just admit it, is it true or not that you were going to attack the Koramil?" But I answered, "I am a dato [a member of the traditional elite], but I am just an ordinary person. How could I attack the Koramil and confiscate weapons?" I told them that it was true that I was a fool.
>
> After that I was sent home, but the next morning I returned to the Sub-district office, because of a message from the Sub-district administrator. I was treated the same as the first day. I was beaten and kicked until my face was swollen…When the Sub-district administrator T267 beat me, the captain of the Sub-district police and the Koramil commander just sat there watching without saying a word.[387]

370. Similarly, members of ABRI arrested SN and her family in July 1977 on suspicion of having information about a Fretilin attack on an army tank in the village of Guruça (Quelicai, Baucau). She described the incident:

> Around 7.00pm, eight members of ABRI came to my house and captured my husband Bale-Coo and my father Naito. They were taken to the Marines [Pasukan Marinir, Pasmar] 9 post in Abafala [Quelicai, Baucau]. There, my husband's and my father's hands were tied behind their backs. They were beaten, kicked with military boots and hit with a rifle butt until morning. The next day, my husband and father were taken to the ABRI base in Laga [Baucau].
>
> Two days later three soldiers and one TBO came to arrest me, my sister Nacorica, my two children Co`o Kita and Dara Co`o, and my nephew Evaristo. We were also taken to the Pasmar 9 post in Abafala. We were all tied up and…they took off our clothes. After the interrogation, in the afternoon, we were taken to the Pasmar 9 headquarters set up in SDN I [the primary school] in Soba [Laga, Baucau]. As soon as we arrived we were interrogated.
>
> I was electrocuted and stripped naked, and my genitals were burned with a gas lighter. I was dealt that treatment on the orders of the Pasmar 9 Commander T268. I was detained in the Pasmar 9 headquarters for one week. When I was released I was required to report for six months.[388]

Released but not free

Even when the Indonesian military released political detainees from its detention centres, it had a number of strategies for monitoring their movements after their release. Among these strategies were the following:

"Outside detention"

Some detainees were released from formal detention but only into what was known as "outside detention" (tahanan luar). These detainees were allowed to live at home but were still considered under the control of their captors. Some had to do forced labour, while others were required to report regularly. Some examples include:

- In 1979 a group of men named Apolinario, Antero, João Brito, Filomeno, Januario Mendonça, Januario Corte Real, Orlando, Pedro, João da Silva, Marcos Lisboa, and Mário Uca Bere surrendered to Airborne Infantry Battalion (Yonif Linud) 700 in the area of Bubulau (Same, Manufahi). Airborne Infantry Battalion 700 handed the ten men to a group of Hansip. The members of Hansip beat them heavily and then made them "outside detainees". Apolinario, José da Silva and Marcos Lisboa were required to plant a vegetable garden and build a house for one of the members of Hansip, T269.[389]

- In 1980, according to Alcino dos Santos Vinhos, the military detained 14 people around Lospalos (Lautém) and held them in the Lospalos Kodim for nine months. After release they were given "outside detainee" status and were required to report to the Kodim three times each week for three months.[390]
- In 1994, militias detained 16 people around Babulu Village (Same, Manufahi). They were interrogated and tortured by Kopassandha at the Kopassandha headquarters in Same for three days before being released as "outside detainees" for three months. During this time they had to carry building materials and tidy the grass outside the traditional house.

Reporting requirements

Reporting requirements (wajib lapor) did not apply only to "outside detainees". Many political detainees were required to report to their local Koramil or Kodim on a regular basis. The Commission found no consistency or clear pattern in how this system was applied. Some former detainees were required to report only weekly for several months, some every day for several years.

Forced labour

Another way of monitoring a former detainee was to use them as forced labour. Thousands of young men were forced to work as TBOs particularly during the late 1970s and early 1980s. Others were recruited into Hansip or as Ratih. Many others were used to build roads, village buildings or to maintain gardens.*

Forced recruitment

The military also forcefully recruited many detainees instead of releasing them. The Commission received statements describing how detainees were used as TBOs to carry out tasks for the Indonesian military,[391] forced to accompany the military and members of Hansip into the mountains to find people who had not surrendered[392] or were turned into informers.

* For example, Bernardino dos Reis was detained for one year after surrendering in Manufahi in 1979 and was then forced to help build a road from the Turiscai border to Turiscai with 200 other forced workers [HRVD Statement 6626].

Detention of clandestine members

371. Besides targeting individuals in the armed Resistance, the Commission received many reports of the military arresting and detaining members of clandestine networks or individuals in areas already controlled by Indonesia who were supporting the armed Resistance with food, medical supplies or a place to hide.[393]

372. Gervaio Yosep was arrested in 1977 for this reason:

> I was captured by the head of the neighbourhood association [rukun tetangga, RT] T271 and six members of Battalion 511, for the reason that I had hidden Falintil in my house in Foholulik (Tilomar, Covalima). After being captured, I was taken to the Battalion 511 Tilomar headquarters. I was immediately detained. I was interrogated and beaten and hit with a piece of wood and kicked until I was bruised and bleeding. I was tortured for 12 hours, from 2.00am until 2.00pm. I was forced to eat and drink medicine but I refused, and they told me to go home.[394]

The breaking of a clandestine network

António Junior Caleres told the Commission about his role in a Dili-based clandestine network that gave support, in the form of food, medicine, letters and other assistance, to the armed Resistance. António did this mainly through his work in a community health centre, but he was also able to send larger amounts of medicines through his work with the Red Cross.* In March 1977, the Red Cross employed him to go to Mount Kablaki, near Same, to provide medicine to thousands of people surrendering to the Indonesian military. António attended to those surrendering and needing medical assistance but he also managed to send two boxes of medicine to Falintil. During similar work in Suai a month later, he was able to send a further five boxes to the Resistance.

The network was eventually exposed after the military captured a Resistance fighter who was carrying clandestine documents including lists of names. Those named in the lists were arrested and tortured and then they named others, who were also arrested.

According to António, about 200 people were eventually arrested and taken to Sang Tai Hoo and Tropical. Not all of these people, however, were part of the network:

* The International Committee of the Red Cross was not in Timor-Leste in 1977, so the Commission assumes that the informant was working with the Indonesian Red Cross.

"[T]here were names that were not [on the list] but because people were beaten and heavily tortured, they just started to name people randomly. That was why there were many people who were not clandestine, who were innocent, that were captured."

On 16 July 1977, António was arrested and taken to Sang Tai Hoo:

I was told to go in and strip down to my underwear. Then I sat for a few minutes before six people came in and beat me until I was unconscious. When I woke up I was in a room and I saw a Chinese person called Francisco Li, and two East Timorese who I didn't know. I saw that their faces were swollen.

After three days I was called for interrogation and they just read out from a document what they already knew. They said I had delivered medicine. "Yes", I confessed, "I delivered medicine so that those in the forest are healthy and can come, because you soldiers were supposed to come here to lead us but you are useless, you come here only for war." Then they flipped my chair so I was lying upside down and they put two lit Gudang Garam cigarettes in my nostrils. They threatened me with a knife and said: "You have to be honest, and now you must sing Foho Ramelau." So I was forced to sing Foho Ramelau, but if I inhaled the cigarette smoke I coughed. When they were tired of the interrogation they took a helmet and covered my head, then hit my body with their hands. When I couldn't stand it anymore I collapsed.

António Caleres explained that sometimes the military took prisoners from the place where they were detained to scare them. Because political prisoners were aware that many detainees had been taken out at night and never returned, the experience was especially traumatic:

One night I was taken to Tacitolu. When we arrived I got out of the car and walked. The four soldiers who brought me there said, "Sit here, we are going to rest first." But a few minutes later one came and covered my eyes with black cloth and said: "Pray!" I prayed and just waited for them to shoot me. But they didn't. I waited like that for two hours and then I became sleepy. Mosquitoes were everywhere. They came back and said, "Walk, we are good to you." We drove back to Sang Tai Hoo, and arrived at 4.00am. Something like this also took place when I was taken to the Areia Branca and I was told to sit on the beach. Then my eyes were covered and my clothes were taken off and I sat there for about two hours before I was ordered to get back into the car. They just left me alone, maybe to test me. If I ran they would have shot me dead.[395]

373. Faustino Amaral reported to the Commission that in September 1977 he began to do clandestine work, even though he was a member of ABRI at the time.

> One day the Koramil commander in Tutuala [Lautém], Deni Rohani, found secret documents in a cave called Oi [Mehara, Tutuala, Lautém]. With that, Deni Rohani discovered my involvement in clandestine organisations. A few days later I was called to face Lieutenant Colonel Fransiskus Sumaryono at the Lautém Kodim. After I met him, I was ordered to go to the Korem [in Dili] to face [Colonel] Sahala Radjagukguk. I was immediately picked up in a jeep and taken to the Balide Prison. Two Korem members stripped off my clothes down to my underwear and put me in a dark cell for one week. In the dark cell I was interrogated and tortured by having my toes pinned under a table leg for an hour and threatened by two members of ABRI, one Indonesian T272 and another (name unknown), while they held a bayonet to me.[396]

374. One day a prisoner named Alexandre escaped from detention in the Comarca, Balide in Dili. Because of this, Faustino Amaral and 300 other prisoners received beatings by an Indonesian army member T273. They were ordered to gather at the volleyball field inside the prison and run laps around the court.[397]

375. António Vieira told the Commission that he was arrested on 3 July 1977 by an East Timorese member of Intel, T274, because of information that he had been assisting Fretilin in the forest. He was taken to Sang Tai Hoo in a taxi:

> The reason for my capture was because there was information from someone, I don't know his name, that I often helped Fretilin in the forest. After I arrived in Sang Tai Hoo I was interrogated by a [Kopassandha] commander while being tortured. The torture included: my toes were pinned under a chair and then two members of [Kopassandha] sat on the chair, my head was kicked with their military boots, my ear was punched and I was made to stand against the wall while they hit me with an iron pipe. I was detained in Sang Tai Hoo for six days. Then I was moved back to Balide Prison and detained there for four months and two days. I was released in December 1977. Even though I was free, I still had the status of an "outside prisoner" and was obliged to report for one year.[398]

376. Members of Hansip were also sometimes part of clandestine networks and were punished if discovered. Eduardo da Silva told the Commission that he was ordered to become a member of Hansip in 1976 but kept up his clandestine work, distributing goods to Falintil, through a person called Guilherme. When military intelligence caught and interrogated Guilherme in 1977, he gave them information about his network. Eduardo da Silva continued:

> Because of that I was arrested by the Koramil commander and taken to Sang Tai Hoo where I was beaten with a cane and the deputy head of intelligence kicked me in the chest. I was there for three days and then they moved me to the Comarca. But I was taken straight back to Sang Tai Hoo for interrogation by two members of the Joint Intelligence Unit [Satuan Gabungan Intelijen, SGI], and in the evenings I was taken back to the Comarca. Each week for three weeks I went to Sang Tai Hoo for interrogation. My case was processed through a court and I was sentenced to one year in prison. While serving my time, I had to cut grass twice a week.[399]

Interrogation of a clandestine member

JN was part of a clandestine network, made up of mainly women that used estafetas (couriers) to send food and other materials from the villages to Fretilin in the forest. The village head of Akadiruhun (Dili), one of the villages that the network operated from, started to suspect JN and her friends and informed military intelligence. On 29 January 1977, the military and an Indonesian member of Intelligence, T800, arrested her and took her to the Koramil in Culuhun (Dili) and to Sang Tai Hoo, where she was interrogated by an Indonesian ABRI Commander T275 and a sergeant. Francisco Benevides, a prisoner who could speak Indonesian, translated. She described the interrogation:

I was interrogated about a list of names, whether I knew them. I answered yes! I knew [the estafetas*]. I couldn't lie because I had given them their orders. So my friends were released, and I remained in detention. [The* estafetas*] had told them that I was in charge and I accepted responsibility…In Sang Tai Hoo they told me to draw the organisation's structure with the names of the people who occupied each position. I mentioned all of their names, like KN and others. I was hit with an iron belt buckle. I was beaten so that I would tell them everything…[The interrogators] took turns. After one person was finished, another one came…They took a picture of me during the interrogation, wearing only my underwear.*

After about a week in Sang Tai Hoo, JN was moved to the Comarca:

On 9 February 1977, I was moved to the Comarca...I was in the "Maubutar cell" and at night I slept on the floor with no mats. They pulled my hair and kicked me until my face was all bruised. They also poured water on me…The next morning, I was taken back to Sang Tai Hoo and…interrogated again and in the afternoon they returned me to the Comarca. For three nights I slept in the "Maubutar cell." If you spent one week in the "Maubutar cell" they would surely kill you. Then I was taken to an iron cell room…

Every day I was interrogated. They came from Sang Tai Hoo to pick me up and take me back with them to interrogate me. In the Comarca I was interrogated and beaten by military police, Red Berets [Kopassandha]. In the iron cell I was beaten at night. I was detained in the iron cell for three months…and never went out in that time [except for interrogation]. LN and KN were detained with me in the iron cell…[The three of us] were ordered to strip naked and bathe like little children so [the soldiers] could watch…T276, an East Timorese man, came and put nails in our underwear. After that we were raped until morning. He and the army were close, so the army didn't do anything…After that I was separated from KN and LN...In May I was moved to a normal room…[After] 16 months in the Comarca I was released on 6 July 1978, but I was still required to report. *

Detention due to family members in the forest

377. Relatives of people still in the forest, whether as part of the armed Resistance or simply hiding from the military, were also targeted for detention. The military hoped that these family members could provide information about where their relatives were hiding and what they were doing. Also, members of Fretilin/Falintil received food and other supplies from their families and the military sought to break these connections. It was also a form of proxy violence. The family members became a substitute for punishment when the prime target of violence could not be captured.

378. Luis de Jesus told the Commission that on 30 August 1977 two soldiers captured him in Camea (Dili) and took him to Sang Tai Hoo, because he was suspected of giving things to his family members in the forest:

> [We were] interrogated by a member of ABRI from Nanggala (Kopassandha). Besides being interrogated, we were also beaten and kicked. Then in the morning we were taken to Balide Prison. All of our clothes were removed and we were left naked. Then the prison guards and military police beat us using wooden bars, iron rods and chains. After that we were put in a dark cell, still naked. The cell was cramped and smelly. For three days we were in that cell without any food. We were given only hot water in the morning, afternoon and evening. After three days we were taken out of the dark cell. They returned our clothes to us and ordered us to put them back on. Then we were put back in a cell for six months. We were released on 15 March 1978.[400]

* CAVR Interview with JN Dili, 4 October 2004. See also CAVR Interview with Bernarda dos Martires Carvalho Correia, Dili, 22 January 2003. Bernarda dos Martires Carvalho Correia worked as an estafeta in the same network and was also captured around the same time as JN. She was interrogated in Sang Tai Hoo and detained in the Comarca in Balide for three months. She was not tortured: "According to ABRI I didn't have to be tortured because I only gave things to my children in the forest, so my punishment was lighter compared to my friends and some young men who were captured at that time. They were tortured heavily by ABRI because, according to the information ABRI received, they were planning to flee to the forest."

379. HN told the Commission that in 1979, when her husband was still in the forest as a Falintil commander, she was arrested and taken to the Uatolari Koramil (Viqueque). There, a member of Hansip, T277, pulled off her clothes and another Hansip member, T278, interrogated her. She was ordered to sit holding a branch from a cassava plant that was covered in thorns, slapped, beaten and burned with lit cigarettes. The Koramil then released her but re-arrested her two weeks later with her one-year old child. They were taken back to the Koramil and she was raped in front of her crying child.[401]

380. IN was arrested in Ossu (Viqueque) in 1979 because some of his family members were active in the Resistance and still remained in the forest. ABRI soldiers T279, T280, T281 and Hansip member T282 and intelligence T283 and T255 took him to a house and interrogated him:

> In the interrogation T255 asked me the names of my family members who were still in the forest and how we contacted them. I answered by telling them: "I don't know them! How could we have met when I live in the city and they live in the forest?" That answer made them angry and they demanded that I tell them the truth. Then T285 took a wooden bar and knife, pointed it at me and said: "If you don't confess, you will die today." Not long after that, six Hansip members took turns torturing me. They used their rifles to strike, beat and kick me...I was also struck on the forehead and my body was cut with a knife by T285. Then I was moved to the Koramil and detained there for three months.[402]

381. After his interrogation, IN's wife was taken from their house and detained in the same place as him. While he was being interrogated, his wife was raped in the room next door by an East Timorese platoon commander, T286. IN told the Commission how he could hear his wife scream out for help but he could do nothing to help her.[403]

382. The Commission received information about a man who decided to remain in the forest when the rest of the family surrendered in August 1977. After the rest of the family arrived in the village of Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém) a member of the Sub-district level parliament (DPR), T287, came and told his parents to go to the military post in central Mehara for interrogation about his whereabouts. The interrogation lasted all night and only at 4.00am were they released on the condition that they report for two weeks and that they bring information about their son.[404]

383. Even family members of people already detained lived in fear of violence from the military. António Vieira told the Commission:

> [While I was in detention in Dili] my wife named Elsa Soares Gomes, who was at home, also received threats from Kopassandha members, saying that I had been killed and they were going to take her and kill her as well. As a result of that threat, my wife was shocked and fell ill and finally died on 7 December 1977. When my wife died, Leandro Isaac asked ABRI for permission for me to attend my wife's funeral.[405]

Detentions after surrender or capture*

384. The people of Timor-Leste began surrendering to the Indonesian military from the time of the invasion. Those who did not feel capable of fleeing to the mountains, such as nursing mothers or the elderly stayed in their homes and were among the first to surrender. Many others who did flee to the mountains returned and surrendered because they could not sustain the difficult lifestyle in the forest. The Commission received statements of people surrendering after fleeing in 1976 and 1977. The overwhelming majority of people surrendered, however, during the years 1978 to 1979, when surrenders took place en masse with the support of the Fretilin leadership.

385. A large peak in detentions can be discerned in 1978 when the mass surrenders to the Indonesian military took place. The military was faced with waves of thousands of people, many of whom arrived in places that were not their home and who were suffering from illness and malnourishment.† Most people were placed in large transit camps where they could be processed and registered. The military forces also screened those who surrendered to identify any members of Fretilin/Falintil. Those who were known were immediately arrested and detained separately from the group. Many others were interrogated about what they did in the forest. They were then further detained, kept in the transit camp, recruited as TBOs or Hansip, or released to return home to their villages (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

Early surrenders

386. An East Timorese woman reported that she and her family surrendered in 1977 after two years hiding in the mountains, because the lack of food and medicine had led to the deaths of five of her younger brothers and sisters. Soon after they surrendered the whole family was arrested.[406] During the arrest her father was killed and his ears cut off and adorned as trophies. The rest of the family was taken to the town of Soibada (Manatuto), where they were detained for some days.[407]

387. In 1977, José da Conçeição Carvalho, a Falintil member, surrendered to two intelligence agents named T292 and T293 in Dili. He was immediately handed over to a soldier nick-named T294 to be interrogated in Palapaço (Dili) and was detained for 12 days. He told the Commission:

* The term "surrender" is usually used to refer to combatants rather than civilians. But in this Report it is used to describe an act of a civilian, because "surrender" is the word civilians themselves use to describe the act, and because what took place was essentially a political act of moving out of Fretilin/Falintil control and into the control of the Indonesian military. In a practical sense, surrendering involved reporting to the local military command and being registered. Often people were held in a temporary holding camp to be processed before being released to go home [see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine].

† For instance, in Uato Carbau (Viqueque) many people from Ossu (Viqueque), Uatolari (Viqueque) and Baguia (Baucau) surrendered to the Indonesian military and were held in places such as the Uato Carbau Koramil. [CAVR Interview with Xisto Fernandes (alias Helio Espiritu Santo), Uato Carbau, Viqueque, November 2003]

In the investigation I was forced to tell them the hiding place for the weapons. So an ABRI member, T294, ordered two of his men (T292 and T293) to go and find the weapons. Then they released me, but not straight to my house, rather I had to live with T294 until 1979. * Only then was I allowed to go back to my own house.[408]

388. As well as voluntary surrenders, civilians also surrendered or were sometimes arrested when the military captured them during an operation. José Rosa de Araújo, a member of Fretilin, told the Commission that he fought as a guerrilla in the Mount Kablaki region of Ainaro after the Indonesian invasion. In 1977, Infantry Battalion 125 attacked the Mount Kablaki region, resulting in the arrest of about 80 Fretilin members, including José Rosa de Araújo. He recalled:

At the location of our capture, a member of Hansip named T295 abused me by punching and kicking me and hitting me with a rifle butt. Then 20 members of Hansip joined in, abusing me and also the other Fretilin troops. At that time Hansip and Infantry Battalion 125 troops had built [five] posts on Mount Kablaki. They detained me and the other Fretilin troops there for one year. We were forced to become TBOs, responsible for picking up rice or corn in Dare [Ainaro]. Every two people had to carry 100 kg from Dare to Kablaki. During my time in detention and as a TBO, my friends and I were given only vegetables to eat, while the members of Hansip and Infantry Battalion 125 ate good food.[409]

389. Both civilians and members of Falintil were arrested during such operations. But after capture the Falintil members would be picked out of the group for further detention. On 22 February 1977, three members of Falintil ran out of ammunition, and were captured together with the people of Casohan in Barique (Manatuto) by members from Infantry Battalion 631. They were interrogated by Infantry Battalion 631 and their weapons were confiscated. The civilians were given permission to go home but the members of Falintil were detained in Casohan for one month, and further interrogated and tortured.[410]

Story of an East Timorese translator during interrogations

António Peloy was a member of Hansip, and an interpreter for the Indonesian military during their interrogation of detainees in the district of Baucau. He told the Commission about interrogation methods including his efforts to protect those being interrogated:

* The reason for this is unclear but it is likely to have been in the capacity of a TBO.

I became a Hansip around 1976 in Laga, Baucau. First I was a regular Hansip and helped do night watch duty at posts. I only began to handle detainees in 1978. The Marines commander asked which Hansip understood the Indonesian language. It didn't matter if you were fluent, as long as you could understand the words. I had learnt Indonesian before the Indonesians came to Timor…because I lived near the beach and I became acquainted with the Indonesian traders that came by boat.

I became an interpreter for Pasmar 9 (Marines). [During an interrogation] only one military person and I were present. The Marines wrote the questions and I interpreted them, and I also interpreted [the detainee's] answers for the Marines. Everyone that the Indonesian army captured was handed over to me. I was responsible for a room of 110 detainees. The prisoners were from Ossu [Viqueque], Baucau, Venilale, Quelicai [all in Baucau] and from Maina II Village [Lautém]. Among them were Fretilin members and also ordinary people who had surrendered. They were surrendering but still they were interrogated and beaten!

The Marines treated female and male prisoners differently. They interrogated men from 8.00am until noon, and women from 7.00pm until 2.00am. [Women] were asked: "Do you have a husband?", [they replied] "I have a husband", "Where is your husband now?", "Now he still lives in the forest", "What does he do there?" Then they would say that the person lied: "You have a Fretilin/GPK husband in the forest!" or "We heard that you had a picture of the Fretilin flag on your breast!" Then they made them take their clothes off or lift their shirts so they could be examined from bottom to top. They examined for a while, then they said it was on the stomach: "Lower your sarong, lower it here, if it's not on the breast, it's probably on the stomach." After examining the stomach, they said it was below the belly button.

Men were asked: "Are you GPK? Are you armed? Since what date? When was the last time you held a weapon? What date?" They were again asked about the events on Matebian. They defecated and urinated. They were beaten and electrocuted on the ear and fingers. One man was a teacher in Lospalos named José Lima. He received harsh [treatment] because he was suspected of being involved in the bombing of the Marines' tank in Quelicai. He was put in a barrel with his head in the bottom and his legs up, which made him defecate while his legs were tied to a big rock and pulled up. But he didn't die.

Even though I was in the Indonesian army, I saved my friends from the forest…During the interrogation they were asked what they did in the forest, did they hold weapons or kill Indonesian soldiers? Because they were being electrocuted, they sometimes admitted that they held weapons or killed soldiers in the forest, but I helped to cover it up for them. Before 8.00am I opened the door a little and I gave them instructions: "They will interrogate you one by one but if you say something wrong…I will step on your foot and you must stop talking. I will speak to the soldier first, but if you do something wrong I will stand up and hit you."

For instance, if they admitted killing a soldier, I would change the words so they would not be killed and immediately tell the victim in Tetum or Makasai [languages]: "Don't say that, or they will kill you." I immediately hit my friends, so they would not be suspected and I also would not be suspected as an enemy in disguise. The army/marines asked why I hit them, and I said because they didn't admit to the killings. After I hit them and put them back in detention, I apologised for hitting them, I said: "Don't take it personally, but I helped you from getting killed by the Indonesian army."[411]

Mass surrenders: 1978–1979

390. Following the destruction of the last zona libertada on Mount Matebian, mass surrenders occurred across the eastern region of Timor-Leste (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). Other groups also began to surrender in the central and western regions. Again, a selection process separated individuals known to be Fretilin leaders, who were arrested immediately. Others were subjected to intense interrogation to ascertain what their role had been or whether they could provide useful information.

391. In addition to members of the military, members of the civilian government, civilian defence and, sometimes, ordinary citizens assisted in carrying out the arrests and in identifying those to be interrogated further. For instance, after surrendering in the town of Uato Carbau (Viqueque) in 1978, an East Timorese civilian, T297, reported Xisto Fernandes to a Hansip, T298, after which Xisto was arrested and detained in the Uato Carbau Koramil.[412] Celestino Manuel Pinto told the Commission that he was arrested on 23 November 1978 in a joint effort between local government officers, Hansip, police and military after he came down from Mount Matebian near Uato Carbau (Viqueque) and surrendered in the village of Bahatata (Uato Carbau, Viqueque):

At that time, the Sub-district administrator [of Uato Carbau] T299 and his deputy T300 coordinated with Hansip Commander T301 [deceased] and his staff T302, and the Police and Koramil Commanders, to capture me and two of my friends named Alfredo Pires and Caetano Quintão. They put the three of us in detention because I was a member of Falintil when I was in the forest. I was detained on 1 January 1979 in Afaloicai [Uato Carbau]. There were 130 other people who had also been detained by ABRI from six villages, Irabin de Baixo, Irabin de Cima, Uani-Uma, Lo-Ulu, Afaloicai and Bahatata, in the sub-district of Uato Carbau. While in detention we were forced to work, such as taking a Jeep car from Uatolari to the village of Afaloicai…carrying bamboo and building a road from Ringgit Baru to Afaloicai and searching for rocks and wood to build T299's house. We were detained until 1980. When we were released we had to report for one and a half years. After that we were totally free.*[413]

392. The Commission conducted meetings in villages all over Timor-Leste and documented the experience of communities. The following Community Profiles tell the stories of some of the mass surrenders and arrests in 1978 and 1979 and the different experiences of communities who surrendered:

Table 6: Different experiences of communities mass surrenders and arrests, 1978–1979

Community	Date	Surrender	Detained	Interrogation/Torture
Remexio (Aileu)[414]	1979	Community surrendered	All men arrested by members of ABRI, Hansip and Partisans. 20 more people (men and women) were later arrested. A total of about 100 people detained.	Detained and interrogated for two weeks, then sent home.
Uma-Kiik (Viqueque)[415]	1978	Some people surrendered to Battalion 202, others to Infantry Battalion 745.	Battalion 202 arrested everyone on suspicion of being Falintil. Infantry Battalion 745 took everyone to the town.	Battalion 202 tortured people, used the women as sexual slaves and made the men TBOs. Infantry Battalion 745 used people to cut the grass every day.
Caisido (Baucau)[416]	1978	Caisido community and people from other villages surrendered in Baucau Town and in the villages of Trilolo, Triloka, Bucoli, Vemasse (Baucau).	Eight Fretilin leaders detained in Flamboyan Hotel in Baucau for six months.	Tortured but not interrogated.
Molop (Bobonaro)[417]	17 Apr. 1978	370 people surrendered to Battalion 612.	20 people arrested on suspicion of being a Falintil.	Detained for 3 months in military police building without food. Burned with cigarettes, hit with a hammer and a weapon, fingernails pulled out with pliers, stripped naked and put in water for 24 hours.

* The name of a village that was founded or re-named during the Indonesian occupation.

Marobo (Bobonaro) [418]	1978	Community surrendered to Battalion 612 troops.	All detained, including Fretilin commander of Bobonaro Company, João de Jesus.	Submerged in a pool during a period of two months. Some of the prisoners then released and around 90 civilians made TBOs.
Bahatata (Uato Carbau, Viqueque)[419]	22-23 Nov. 1978	Many people surrendered to Battalion 328 near Samalari (Uato Carbau, Viqueque), Later, 1 Falintil platoon and 19 others surrendered to Battalion 328 and Hansip near Samalari.	Battalion 328 examined people's belongings and took a man suspected of being the leader to the Koramil. Falintil platoon and 19 others all detained.	Suspected leader interrogated and then released. Falintil members and 19 others beaten, kicked and burned with cigarettes by a Hansip member T329. All made TBOs.
Desa Dato (Liquiçá) [420]	1979	Most people from Dato surrendered to Kodim 1638 in Liquiçá.	18 platoon commanders arrested.	Detained by T284 in Koni, Liquiçá. Tortured by beating and forced to build an "entertainment house".
Hatura, Nasolan, Isolada (Aileu)[421]	1979	280 people surrendered in Damata to Battalion 712, Air force 100, Air force 700, and Air force 721.	Nobody detained. People's belongings searched then all taken to Malere, (Aileu) fed and sent home.	-
Uato-Haco (Venilale, Baucau)[422]	Sept. 1979	Uatu-Haco and Uahilalha communities surrendered to ABRI in Venilale.	Leaders and suspected leaders in the forest were arrested.	Two people detained and interrogated in the Flamboyan Hotel, Baucau. 11 people held in Venilale military post and forced to build houses.

393. Francisco da Costa was picked out from the group when he and his family surrendered in Uatolari (Viqueque) in 1978, after living for two years on Mount Matebian. He told the Commission of his experience:

> When I surrendered, I was immediately arrested by an East Timorese man, T305, and members of Kopassandha intelligence. I was punched, kicked and hit on the head with a piece of wood until I became unconscious and couldn't stand. They dragged me into the prison. I was arrested because I cooperated with a Fretilin delegate named Lequimau and I had forbidden people to surrender to ABRI.
>
> The next day a Hansip named T306 came with three East Timorese female soldiers: T307, T308 and T309. Hansip T306 ordered them to hit me with a piece of wood until I bled. Then they [T306 and the three soldiers] submerged us in water for 24 hours. The next day we were handed over to the Koramil and the Afaloicai village head

Agustinho Ribeiro, who had to take responsibility for and care for the four of us.[423]

394. The conditions in which detainees were held in this period were often appalling. One example of this is provided in the testimony of Mário Maubuti. He told the Commission that he and two of his brothers-in-law, Maubuti and Beremau, came down from the mountains and surrendered to the army in Leimea Kraik (Hatolia, Ermera) in 1978. They were immediately brought to the town of Atsabe (Atsabe, Ermera) and arrested there along with several other people:

> After we arrived in Atsabe, we were all put in a hole in the ground and were only fed once a day. We also had to fight each other for the food. There were some who didn't get any food because we were starving and the food given wasn't enough for the number of prisoners. In the hole we crowded each other and during the rainy season we slept on mud and in pools of water for eight days. Then we were released.[424]

395. Conditions in transit camps were also extremely difficult and many died (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

Detention in Uma Metan Camp, Alas, Manufahi

Uma Metan (Tetum: Black House) was an Indonesian military camp set up just before August 1978 near Alas (Manufahi) as a base for conducting operations against the Resistance in the mountains around the district of Manufahi. Airborne Infantry Battalion 700, Infantry Battalions 744 and 745, 310, Nanggala (Kopassandha) and the Alas Koramil were stationed at Uma Metan. The camp was also used as a transit camp for holding people who surrendered from nearby areas and for holding suspected members of the Resistance.

The Commission interviewed several former inmates of the Uma Metan Camp. Tomé da Costa Magalhães, detained there in 1978, described Uma Metan as a hill about 300 metres high. Mateus da Conceição, arrested on 8 May 1979 and detained in Uma Metan for three months, estimated that there were about 8,000 people in the camp from various places including Aileu, Maubisse, Same, Ainaro, Manatuto, Dili, Liquiçá and Viqueque. Both Tomé and Mateus described life in Uma Metan as extremely difficult. Many people died every day from hunger and illnesses such as diarrhoea, tuberculosis and beriberi. They also told of a school built in Uma Metan, supposedly for the people to learn the Indonesian language, but also used at night by members of Nanggala, Airborne Infantry Battalion 700 and the Koramil to rape women.[425] The camp was closed around January 1982.

Unlike some other transit camps, Uma Metan was also used as a prison for people found to be working for the Resistance. These people were sometimes found among those who surrendered, and sometimes caught in the forest and brought to the camp for interrogation.[426] Many members of the Resistance were killed and executed (see Vol. II, Part 7.2 on Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). Others were used as forced labour or to find other members of the Resistance. Some residents of the camp, after spending several months in Uma Metan, were moved to another place, such as the Same Koramil (Manufahi), for further interrogation.[427] Others were forced to work for the military or become TBOs.[428]

Saturnino Tilman, arrested by Infantry Battalion 745 on 28 February 1979 in Fatukuak, Betano (Same, Manufahi), was taken with his friend Ijidoro to Uma Metan by helicopter. The soldiers then handed him over to Airborne Infantry Battalion 700. He was interrogated, with the assistance of a Hansip acting as a translator. Airborne Infantry Battalion 700 members questioned him about Falintil's strength and the types of weapons Falintil used. He was not beaten during the interrogation but afterwards was ordered to take off his clothes and sleep in the field facing the sun for several hours. Saturnino was then held in a house for ten days and received only one meal a day. His friend Ijidoro was tied to a tree outside. Saturnino also told the Commission how the military lined up individuals before him and asked him to identify them, but he always said that he did not know them. After his interrogation, he was handed over to the Alas Koramil from Uma Metan and then sent to the Same Koramil at Betano, where he was ordered him to build a road with 200 other prisoners.[429]

Tomé da Costa Magalhães told of 77 civilians (none of whom were Falintil) who surrendered after a military operation in Fahinehan (Fatuberliu, Manufahi), who were then arrested by Infantry Battalion 745 and Airborne Infantry Battalion 100. The detainees were taken to Uma Metan where they were forced to build houses, a school building and a general meeting room.

Mateus Pereira reported to the Commission that he was sent to Uma Metan two months after surrendering in Betano (Same, Manufahi). He and 12 others were ordered to walk to the camp guarded by Hansip members on 5 March 1979. When they arrived, a

> Kopassandha commander told them that their purpose in the camp was to attend school and to help in the search for Fretilin/Falintil leaders in the forest, including José Maria (Mausiri) and Eduardo dos Anjos (Kakuk). They were interrogated individually about what they did in the forest and were then given a map and travel papers and told to look for the fighters in certain areas. As it happened, they came across Mausiri, Kakuk and Ermelita Coelho (Sirilau) in Kolokou in Dotik Village (Alas, Manufahi). The fighters told Mateus and his group that they were ready to surrender and handed over two of their weapons to take back as evidence. When Mateus reported this at Uma Metan, a Nanggala company went to pick up the surrendering Resistance fighters and Mateus and his friends were given travel papers to return to their village.[430]

Capture of communities: 1978–1979

396. Communities that were captured by the military before they surrendered told the Commission about being treated even more harshly than those who surrendered. The community of Uamoritula, Uaimori (Viqueque, Viqueque) told the Commission that in 1979 Battalion 745 captured around 20 people from Uamoritula and detained them in Laleia (Manatuto) on suspicion of collaborating with the Resistance. Some of those captured were killed and some were raped on the journey to Laleia.[431] Another community, that of Manetu (Maubisse, Ainaro), described how in 1979 people wanted to surrender in their village but were afraid of the military there. Before they could decide, soldiers captured them in Turiscai (Manufahi), immediately proceeded to beat them and then raped two girls in the group. They were then taken to Maubisse where they were beaten ruthlessly and then interrogated for three months about the whereabouts of Falintil in the forest.[432]

397. Jacinto Alves told the Commission about his capture with 40,000 civilians in the region of Ilimano (Laclo, Manatuto). Of this group, only about 26 were taken away for interrogation:

> Movimento Torneante was a circling movement. For almost three months we circled around the area at Fatubutik, Aikurus, then Hatukonan [all in Laclo, Manatuto] and then we returned to the place where we began. We were attacked from the air, and from the ground with mortars…There were really no logistics, no aid whatsoever…On 27 July 1978 we, around 40,000 people, were captured in the area of Ilimano. The whole population was told to go down to Metinaro [Dili], but they came and arrested me, as they had the company commander, Vicente Alin, and took me to the post of Company B, Battalion 315.[433]
>
> Twenty-six others and I, among them my parents, my uncle and others, were put together but only I was taken for interrogation. After that, 26 of us were taken to Metinaro to stay in a camp with the local population, I myself was taken to the command post for Battalion 315. I was struck with a rifle...Other people were released and I was imprisoned alone in a temporary house made from melaleuca (a type of eucalyptus) branches.

Two or three days later they brought Micato (my wife) and an older sibling, along with my mother-in-law and my mother for interrogation to the place where I was imprisoned. We looked at each other but we were not allowed to exchange words.[434]

398. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, the first President of Fretilin and the RDTL, was arrested on the south coast in the district of Viqueque in October 1978. He had been a Fretilin prisoner for the previous 13 months. As Fretilin fled from the Indonesian forces, its prisoners had to flee with them. By the time Infantry Battalion 744 had surrounded the Fretilin camp, Xavier do Amaral was too weak to run and fell down in the grass. He was captured and flown to Dili to meet Colonel Dading Kalbuadi.[435]

Detentions after returning home

399. Not everybody was arrested immediately after surrendering. Some were arrested after they had settled back into their homes. Sometimes this was because the military and its auxiliaries discovered some information about the person through the intelligence systems of community control. Americo da Costa told the Commission that in 1979 he and his family came down from Mount Matebian and surrendered in the sub-district of Moro (Lautém). Because of the difficulties he experienced in finding food, Americo da Costa started a vegetable garden at Soru-Uaku in the village of Maina I (Moro, Lautém). One day while working in his garden he met a relative who had not yet surrendered:

While I was gardening, my in-law (Sere) and his friend Lourenço suddenly came to Serelau [Moro, Lautém]. They were still members of Falintil who lived in the forest and hadn't surrendered. When we met we swapped stories about my life in the town and vice-versa.

But our meeting was discovered by the Moro Sub-district Administrator T310, who ordered someone to call me and my sister Jacinta Marques to meet him at his house. We were interrogated and during the interrogation I was hit over the head, slapped across the face six times and kicked in the stomach until I fell. Then he slapped my sister. We were told that if someday we met Falintil again, we must bring them to surrender in the town. Then we were sent home.[436]

400. Luis Maria da Silva (Maukiak) was arrested a month after he surrendered to Pasmar 9 because his work with Fretilin while in the forest had been discovered:

[O]ne month [after I surrendered] ABRI began an operation in Quelicai [Baucau] searching for people who had just come down from the forest, who had cooperated with Fretilin. Pasmar 9 managed to capture Raimundo and he was interrogated…about the names of people who joined Fretilin…[and] admitted that I had been involved in Resistance activities against the Indonesian military.

On 2 January 1979, I was arrested by members of Pasmar 9. They took me to the Quelicai post [Baucau] and brought me to meet the Pasmar 9 commander for interrogation about what we did. After two days I was released.[437]

Framing of a former Fretilin leader

José da Silva Amaral's testimony reveals the atmosphere of suspicion and division within local communities in Timor-Leste at this time. Any person with a grudge could report his or her enemy to the local military command for supporting the Resistance and that person would then be vulnerable to long-term detention, ill-treatment and torture. The Commission heard many cases in which individuals were punished before any investigation was carried out, in violation of their rights to a fair trial, including the presumption of innocence.

José Amaral was a Fretilin leader in Viqueque in 1975. After the invasion, he became the assistant political commissar and a Fretilin delegate in Ossu (Viqueque). At the end of October 1978, José Amaral and a number of people fled to Mount Matebian, but they surrendered when the bases de apoio were destroyed and many civilians were killed.

Around January 1979, José Amaral was working as a farmer in his rice field in the village of Ossuroa (Ossu, Viqueque) but he was known by the community as having been a Fretilin delegate. A Hansip commander, Joaquim Monteiro, worked in a rice field close to José Amaral's. One night someone stole all of Joaquim Monteiro's cows and the next day Joaquim Monteiro accused José Amaral of committing the crime and sending the cows to Falintil. José Amaral proclaimed his innocence and believed that the crime had been committed by a local traditional leader on the orders of a Quelicai Koramil member.

A few days later, three members of Hansip, T311, T312 and T313, arrested José Amaral. They took him first to the Viqueque Koramil and then to a Portuguese house that at the time was used as the Tactical Command (Komando Taktis, Kotis). Battalion 202 used the house as a dormitory and a place for interrogating and torturing detainees. A member of Battalion 202 interrogated José Amaral about the shootings of some soldiers from Battalion 202, which the Indonesian military assumed Fretilin had committed. The Battalion 202 member showed his wounds to José Amaral, saying: "This, this! Who did it?"

José Amaral answered "Bapak, I don't know.* It wasn't me that shot you!" Then the soldier ordered Hansip member T311 to slap José Amaral across the face until he fell to the floor. But the interrogation continued. After 15 minutes three more soldiers started hitting him with their belts and kicking him in the face.

Amaral was then moved back to Battalion 202 headquarters, where around 50 other people were already being detained. He was held for six months between January and July 1979. During this time the interrogations continued and, if he didn't say what his interrogators wanted, he was heavily beaten by Battalion 202 soldiers. In July 1979, Amaral was released.[438]

401. Some Falintil members who remained in the mountains and did not surrender were sent by their commanders to observe the situation in the towns. Some were arrested on arrival in the towns. João Amaral, a member of Falintil at the time, told the Commission about his arrest when he and a friend were sent to monitor the situation in the town of Suai in 1979 :

> When we arrived in Suai, we were captured by soldiers from Battalion 507, in the area of Ahinarae in the village of Debos (Suai, Covalima). Around 100 soldiers captured us. We were immediately detained in a building, a former Chinese store called Cina Odamatan Tolu [Three Chinese Doors], used as ABRI Headquarters. We were both detained there for two weeks…[Then] ABRI ordered my friend Mali Raket to return to the forest to try to persuade our friends to come down and surrender to ABRI in Suai. But after a few days Mali Raket didn't return, and so ABRI took me from Suai to Dili. I was taken to Balide Prison and I was detained there for two years. During my detention I was hit with a piece of wood and an iron bar from head to toe until I was black and blue. As a result of the torture, I still feel pain in my intestines.[439]

Conclusion

402. By the end of 1979, the Indonesian military had established systems of control over the East Timorese population that included arbitrary detention, torture and other forms of cruel and inhuman treatment. The patterns that emerged in this early period were repeated throughout the occupation period. They included:

* Bapak is an Indonesian term of respect used when addressing senior males, meaning both "father" and "mister".

- Using detention to stifle political dissent
- Interrogating anyone suspected of association with Fretilin/Falintil, including by family relationship, to discover information about the Resistance
- Using torture and ill-treatment as a regular part of the interrogation process, with particular forms of torture and ill-treatment adopted by authority figures throughout the territory
- Ignoring rights of due process, including presenting an arrest warrant and explaining the reasons for arrest, allowing access to a lawyer or to appear before a court of law
- Using the military to conduct arrests, contrary to human rights law and Indonesia's own domestic law
- Using East Timorese, including military, paramilitary, civilian defence and civil servants, to perpetrate, or to be involved in perpetrating, violations against fellow East Timorese
- Establishing systems of community control in which neighbours reported on each other.

Detentions by the Indonesian occupation authorities, 1980–1984

Introduction

403. Although Indonesia had gained control of most of the territory and the population by the end of the 1970s, Falintil continued to conduct raids and attacks on military posts. The clandestine networks strengthened and became better organised. The Indonesian military responded to this resistance with massive numbers of detentions and the torture and ill-treatment of civilians.* It sought to isolate Resistance members from the civilian population and treated political detainees very harshly so that civilians would realise that association with the Resistance would bring great suffering.[440] After a five-month ceasefire broke down in 1983, ABRI conducted a large-scale military offensive.

404. The pattern of detentions and torture in the early 1980s largely reflects specific events and phenomena, namely:

* See Military Instruction Manual No. JUKNIS/05/I/1982, which identifies attacks by the GPK (Resistance) as "threats and disturbances" and lays out preventive measures to counter them. [Instruction Manual No. JUKNIS/05/I/1982, System of Security in Towns and Resettlement Areas, translation in Carmel Budiardjo and Liem Soei Liong, The War against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, p. 184].

- The Marabia attack, 1980
- Operation Security (Operasi Keamanan), June 1981
- The Mount Kablaki uprisings, 1982
- Detentions during the ceasefire, March to August 1983
- The breakdown of the ceasefire, August 1983
- Operation Unity (Operasi Persatuan), August 1983 to June 1984
- Detention, torture and ill-treatment in 1984.

Profile of violations

405. Detention, torture and ill-treatment occurred throughout this four-year period, although there was a slight decrease from the figures seen during the invasion and occupation of the territory. The incidence of detention and torture increased over the period, however, and peaked around 1983. This can be seen in figures below. The pattern of detentions, torture and ill-treatment between 1980 and 1984 is positively correlated.*

Number of reported acts of detention, 1980–1989

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

* The correlation coefficient between documented detentions and torture is 0.65 and the correlation coefficient between documented detentions and ill-treatment is 1.0.

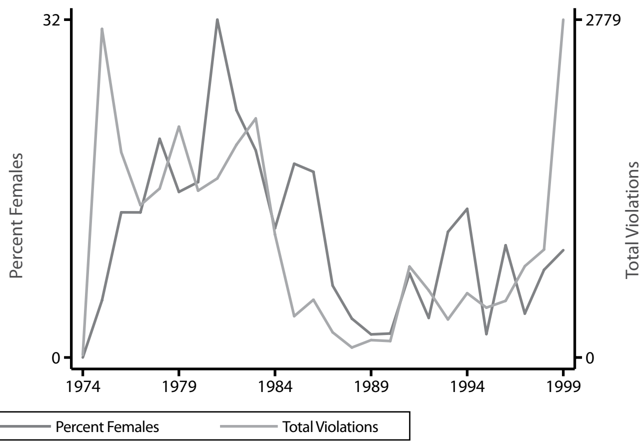
Number of reported acts of torture, 1980–1989

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

Number of reported acts of ill-treatment, 1980–1989

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

406. The peak in violations that occurred in 1983 is likely related to the breakdown of the ceasefire, which was followed by Operation Unity (Operasi Persatuan), a conscious effort by the Indonesian military to target individuals allegedly involved with Falintil forces.* Persatuan was led by Special Forces (Kopassandha) backed up by air power,

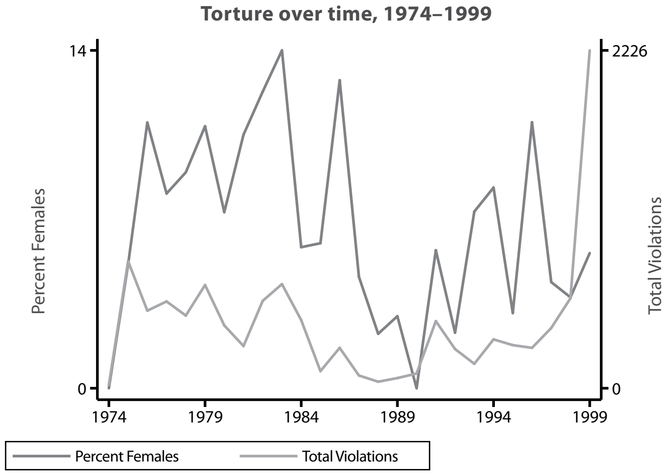


* Operasi Persatuan was launched by Major-General Benny Moerdani to finally crush the Resistance. In a letter to Commander Xanana Gusmão in June 1983 Moerdani said: "Our own army is prepared to destroy you if you are not willing to be cooperative with our republic. We are preparing an operation – Operasi Persatuan – which will come into force in August." Cited in Budiardjo and Liem, The War against East Timor, pp. 139 and 47.

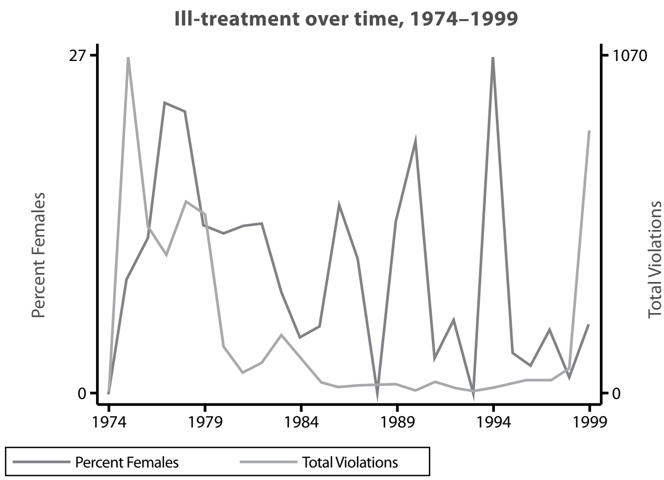
perhaps because of Hansip's role in the uprising, which would have caused deep mistrust of East Timorese soldiers (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict).

407. The areas in which the violence was most concentrated also shifted from the West, where it had been during the invasion years, to the eastern and central regions: 94.7% (7,173/7,574) of documented detentions, 92.8% (2,229/2,403) of documented tortures and 93.3% of instances of ill-treatment (1,455/1,560) in this period occurred in the central and eastern regions. These regions covered Dili and Ataúro, where the major detention centres were located, and the eastern districts, where the Resistance was based at that time. Around half of all detentions and ill-treatments occurred in the districts of Dili and Lautém.*

408. This period is also notable because females suffered higher than the average share of detentions, tortures and ill-treatments compared to other years. Between 1980 and 1984, 21.4% (1,601/7,574) of documented detentions, 10.8% (259/2,403) of documented tortures and 18.7% (292/1,560) of documented ill-treatments were suffered by women.† The relative increase in the share of detentions, tortures and ill treatments for females can be seen below:



Detentions over time, 1974–1999



Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

* Lautém District reported 23.7% (1,797/7,574) of detentions, 23.3% (559/2,403) of tortures and of 22.0% (343/1,560) ill-treaments. Dili District reported 27.3% (2,066/7,574) of detentions, 13.4% (322/2,403) of tortures and 23.5% (366/1,560) of ill-treatments.

† Over the course of the Commission's mandate period, 13.9% (3,512/25,383) of documented detentions, 7.7% (857/11,135) of documented tortures and 12.3% (1,041/8,443) of documented ill-treatments were suffered by females.

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

409. This may partly be explained by the mass arrest and transfer of families, including women, to Ataúro, which many victims described to the Commission as detention rather than displacement. However, women also appear to have suffered higher than their average share of these violations during large-scale military operations than at other times. Clearly during its major offensives, the Indonesian military and their auxiliaries did not take adequate measures to ensure that non-combatants (and in particular, females) were protected from detention, torture and ill-treatment.

410. Analysis of perpetrators shows that members of civilian defence organisations were responsible for many of the detentions and torture cases from this period. During the peak year for detentions in 1983, Hansip were named in 32.8% (644/1,966) cases of detention. Kopassandha was also highly active in this period. Its involvement in arbitrarily detaining civilians, throughout the whole occupation period, peaked in 1983 with 20.2% (398/1,966) cases of detention attributed to it. This was a result of Operasi Persatuan and the reaction to the uprisings by civil defence organisations.

The Marabia uprising (levantamento), Dili, 10 June 1980

411. The first wave of large-scale arrests and arbitrary detention in the period 1980-84 occurred after members of Falintil and clandestine groups attacked the Marabia broadcasting station in Dare (in the hills south of Dili) and the Infantry Battalion 744 barracks in Becora (eastern Dili) on 10 June 1980.

412. The military was reportedly surprised by the attack and responded by detaining hundreds of known and suspected independence supporters in Dili and in the surrounding districts to find the attackers.* It arrested individuals that it had reason to suspect had direct involvement in the attack,[441] members of the clandestine movement it was hoped could provide information,[442] and the "usual suspects", individuals who were regularly arrested because of their previous connection with Resistance activity.[443]

413. The crackdown was a joint effort between numerous agencies within the Indonesian military, including members of the Kodim and Koramils, Infantry Battalion 744 and the Quick Reaction Force Command (Komando Pasukan Gerak Cepat, Kopasgat).[444] Lieutenant T314 (Indonesian), the section head of intelligence from the East Timor Provincial Military Command (Komando Resort Militer, Korem) both ordered and personally carried out many of the arrests. Members of the military were sometimes accompanied or helped by a member of military intelligence, Hansip, the mobile police brigade (Brigade Mobil, Brimob), a Babinsa or a village head.[445] For example, Maria Immaculada, a member of an organisation that gave logistical support to the armed resistance, was called to the house of East Timorese village head T315, who then identified her to Lieutenant T314. The lieutenant arrested her and took her to the Korem in Dili.[446] Members of the Aileu Kodim also arrested suspects and handed them over to authorities in Dili.[447]

Arbitrary detention

414. The joint nature of the effort is also indicated by the variety of places in which detainees were held. Formal detention centres included the Provincial Military Command (Korem) in Dili, the Dili District Military Command 1627 (Kodim), Koramils and the Balide Prison.[448] Continuing the pattern of detention from the

* Amnesty estimated 400 civilians were detained after the attack [Amnesty International, Annual Report 1981].

1970s, detainees were moved around frequently and were taken to informal detention centres specifically for interrogation and torture. These included the Sub-regional military command soldiers' compound (Mes Korem), the maternity clinic run by the Military Wives Unit (Persatuan Istri Tentara, Persit) called Kartika Candra Kirana (Kartika Sari)* in Colmera (Dili) and the Joint Intelligence Unit (Satuan Gabungan Intelijen, SGI) headquarters, also in Colmera.[449] Periods of detention in these centres ranged from between one day and two or three weeks, after which detainees were either released or moved to the Comarca or to the island of Ataúro.

Torture and ill-treatment

415. The treatment of detainees was extremely harsh. David Dias Ximenes, who was arrested after several detainees named him as masterminding the attack, was taken to the Mes Korem. He received electric shocks, was submerged in a tank filled with water and saw a fellow detainee stabbed to death in front of him. His interrogators threatened that he would suffer the same fate if he did not talk.[450] José Gomes Guterres, also held in the Mes Korem, described his experience:

> There were five people present during my interrogation: one to ask questions, and four to beat me when the replies were not clear enough. Whether the answer was true or not didn't make any difference – it had to be the answer they wanted. I was beaten with rifle butts and kicked all over. My feet and hands were bound and they pushed me into a water-tank and held me under for two minutes. Then they'd question me again. If I did not confess the process was repeated. They put two lizards (lafaek rai maran) with sharp teeth on my body, and would pull their tails to make them bite and scratch me. After a month in the Mes Korem, they put me in the Comarca Prison, in the isolation cell, and in September they sent me to Ataúro.[451]

416. Maria de Fatima Pinto, who was part of the Resistance Organisation Base together with David Dias Ximenes and Pedro Manek, fled to the forest after the attack. She told the Commission that she was arrested after a former clandestine member told the authorities of her whereabouts. After three days of interrogation in the Mes Korem, she was moved to the Korem Headquarters for one month. She was stripped naked, beaten, given electric shocks, burned, her feet were crushed with a chair and she was submerged under water.[452]

417. Several statements mention the use of a sharp-toothed lizards during torture and in various places of detention.[453] Agapito da Conceição Rocha reported that police, Hansip and ABRI arrested him in Aileu one week after the Marabia attack. He was detained in the Aileu Kodim and interrogated before being sent to Dili. He told the Commission:

* Sometimes referred to as Mandarin, the neighbourhood in which it is located.

I was brought by helicopter to the Dili airfield then taken immediately to the Tactical Command [Komando Taktis, Kotis] in Mandarin, where all of my clothes were removed and I was put into a water tank for three days and three nights. The perpetrators then released a sharp-toothed lizard into the tank and it bit my ears, face, lips and genitals. Then they took me out of the tank and I was beaten, kicked and taken to a room to sing the song Foho Ramelau. They recorded me. I was detained in Mandarin for more than two weeks.[454]

418. Amadeo da Silva Carvalho described to the Commission how soldiers at the Becora Koramil forced his father, Luis Fatima Carvalho, to sit up in a tree like a monkey for a full day.[455]

419. Those detained after the Marabia attack were held in deplorable conditions. In the Dili Kodim both women and men were forced to strip naked. If a detainee needed to use the toilet, he or she was ordered to go to the toilet naked in front of all other prisoners.[456] Agapito da Conceição Rocha described day-to-day conditions in the Comarca:

I was detained in the Comarca Balide with 14 other prisoners in a small and narrow cell. In the cell you couldn't sleep, you could only stand. Each day we received one meal and drank dirty water. As a result I suffered from diarrhoea that smelt [so bad] that other prisoners couldn't stand it.[457]

420. Some detainees were imprisoned in the Comarca for more than a year without any information about how long they would be detained or if they could have family visits.[458]

The detention and torture of Bernardino Ximenes Villanova

Bernadino Ximenes Villanova was arrested, detained and tortured after the Resistance attack on the broadcasting station in Marabia near Dili in 1980. The Commission interviewed Bernadino, and he also testified at the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment:

On 10 June 1980, we went to Marabia. Our aim was to meet a delegation that [we heard was] coming to Timor and to prove to the world that Fretilin still existed. We also decided to attack the broadcasting station in Marabia. At 2.00am we launched the attack. Some people were killed during the fighting, which lasted until 10.00am. Then some people, including me, surrendered and the Indonesian military took us away.

We were taken to the Koramil in Becora, then transferred and held in the Kodim. The same night we were taken to the Comarca and the next day they released us saying: "Those who are close to the fire will feel the heat. Those who are far, will not." I was living with Father Alberto [Ricardo] in Becora then, working as his driver. When I arrived at the house two Hansip who I didn't know came to arrest me just as I was about to drive a nun and a doctor to Farol. Before they could take me away I told them that I wouldn't run away and that after driving to Farol I would walk to the Becora Koramil. But Father Ricardo followed me in a taxi and took me to Bishop Dom Martinho's residence in Lecidere.

At 6.00am on 12 June 1980 Lieutenant T314, the Korem intelligence officer, his driver and someone else came to the Bishop's house and arrested me. They took me to the Mes Korem. When I got to the stairs an East Timorese member of the military called T316 greeted me by punching, kicking and beating me. Inside, ABRI interrogated me about the events and about my work with the Church. They wanted to know who exactly was involved in the attack at Marabia and what the relation was between my work with the Church and the attack. Because I refused to give any information, the soldiers covered their faces with black cloth like ninjas so that I didn't know who beat me. They punched and kicked me and burned me with cigarettes and matches. Then they hit me with a rifle until they knocked me out.

When I came to, they sat me on the chair again and ordered me to put the big toe of each foot under the legs of the chair. At first I just sat on the chair but soon Lieutenant T314 sat on the chair, crushing my toes. Then a soldier I didn't know kicked me from behind until I fell. Both of my toenails were split but they continued to beat me until I couldn't take it anymore and I told them the name of the second commander, Luis Silva, the ex-village chief of Hera [Dili]. ABRI went straight away and captured Luis Silva and at 12.00 midday brought us together. We sat together at a table and they interrogated us and also beat us with a metal rod until we were bleeding. I was wearing a crucifix around my neck and they snapped it off and threw it away. The interrogation and beating started at midday and continued until midnight.

On 13 June they tried to get me to tell them about the Church's involvement. I refused to tell them anything. They began to give me electric shocks and burn me with cigarettes and kept asking about Father Ricardo's involvement. I just told them that I didn't know anything else. They put me back in the room at 9.00pm. At 9.00 the next morning, they put me in a tank and then put a sharp-toothed lizard in with me. They poked the lizard until it bit my face and broke the skin. Then they placed a bucket over my head and asked me "Was the Church also involved?" When I didn't answer, they beat me around the head with metal pipe. After this I was taken back to the room where I stayed for a week.

During this time, ABRI had arrested another man, José Soares, a community leader from Bidau (Dili). He was beaten and during the beating he did not keep quiet. He told them that I was a leader of the attack. I was placed face to face with José Soares. The soldier told him to punch me three times and I fell to the ground. Then the military told me to punch José Soares three times. He didn't fall. I was sent back inside and José Soares was set free. One day later I was placed in a cell where I stayed until 28 July.

On 29 July, the military took me outside again. They took off my clothes and put me back in the tank, this time with another East Timorese man. I didn't know him and I didn't know why he had been put in the tank with me. We were tied up and then they tied our genitals together. Then they began beating the other man. This made the rope attaching our genitals pull, which hurt me. I had to sit next to the other man waiting for him to wake up, because we were still tied together. After this, in the hot part of the day, we were tied together again and put on a rock in the sunny part of the Korem and left for almost an hour before they took us back inside.

On 30 July, they took me to the Comarca in Balide and put me in one of the dark steel cells, notorious for the all the people who had died in them. We were kept there for ten days and I wasn't sure when it was day or night.[459]

Transfer of political detainees to the island of Ataúro

421. Many people detained after the Marabia attack were sent to Ataúro. This was the first group of political prisoners to be sent to the island; some arrived in July and more followed in September 1980. Others were sent over the next four years. This form of detention not only punished those involved in the attack, it also broke up the clandestine networks by separating active members from their support networks and families.[*]

422. After the Marabia attack, Amnesty International estimated that 120 people had been sent to the island,[460] while the Commission's own figures put the number of people interned on Ataúro at around 500 in mid-1980. Some detainees were sent by helicopter but most were sent by ship in large groups.* Both Bernardino Villanova and Agapito da Conceicão Rocha were sent by boat on 3 September 1980. Bernardino related:

* The Korem military manual on how to break up GPK support networks suggests transferring to Ataúro all members of the GPK support network and relatives of GPK who have not yet been sent away: "In this way we can cut ties between the support networks in the settlement and the Nureps [Resistance Nuclei]." [Military Resort Command (Korem) 164, Intelligence Section, Instruction Manual: The way for Babinsa or Team Pembina Desa to expose/break up GPK support networks, 30 August 1982, translation set out in Budiardjo and Liem, The War against East Timor, p. 180.]

> We were taken from the Comarca on 3 September to the beach to wait for a small boat. At 3.00 that morning I was transported on that boat to the island of Ataúro. When we arrived people were preparing a place in a house on Ataúro. We were given two cans of maize. A lot of it had already spoiled but we had to eat it. On Ataúro we lived freely but we couldn't make contact with our families in Dili. We endured this until we were freed in 1984.[461]

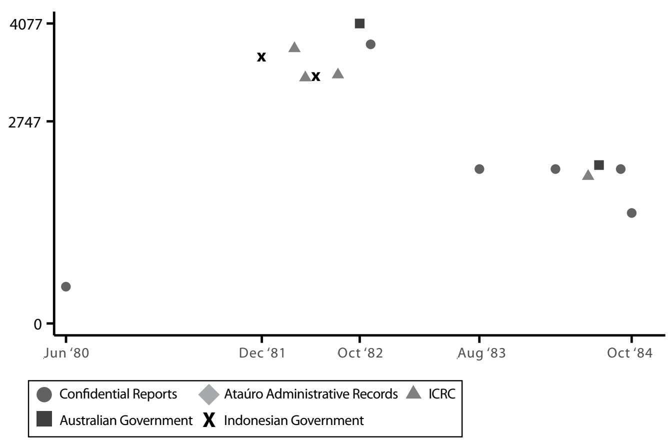
423. Guilherme da Costa (Bie Ki Ruby), a commander of Fretilin, was also sent to Ataúro after the Marabia attack. He was detained on 2 December 1980, some six months after the attack, in Ostico (Vemasse, Baucau), because he had been named by a Fretilin/Falintil colleague under interrogation. Guilherme was held for three weeks in the RTP 12 in Baucau, two weeks in the Flamboyan Hotel in Baucau, one week in the Tactical Command (Kotis) Venilale (Baucau), two weeks in the SGI headquarters in Colmera (Dili) and more than one month in the Balide Comarca Prison. While in the Comarca, Guilherme was interrogated and tortured. Finally, he was sent to Ataúro. Guilherme's wife and child had also been arrested in Ostico soon after Guilherme's arrest and were transported directly to Ataúro by boat from Baucau. Once on Ataúro, they found Guilherme, and the family spent two and a half years on the island.

424. Guilherme explained that in 1983 some detainees were sent home but the authorities decided that Guilherme and about 700 hundred others, most from Bucoli, Vemasse, Venilale, Uatolari, Uato Carbau and Manatuto (in the east), would still pose a threat if they were released. These people were resettled in Cailaco, Bobonaro (in the west). In Cailaco the family lived in a small makeshift shelter with a roof of zinc and walls of canvas. Every morning and evening they had to stand in line and be counted. During the day they were allowed to look for food but they could not go out at night. They were also forced to work, doing such things as building a road, constructing a school building and a football field and cleaning. Members of Hansip, Babinsa and Bimpolda guarded them.

425. Guilherme da Costa and his family spent four and a half years in Cailaco before they could go home. In a public ceremony, the detainees were told that Timor-Leste had become a safe place, as there were only 50 members of the Resistance left in the whole country. Most went home after this but Guilherme da Costa stayed until 1994 to continue clandestine activities that he had become involved in around Cailaco.[462]

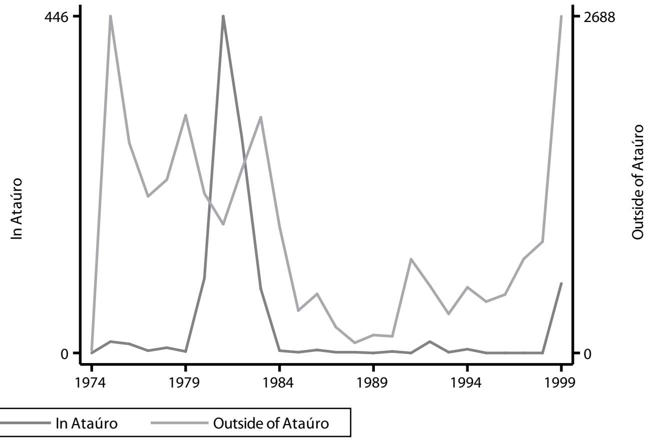


* For example, José Carvalho described how his father-in-law, Abilio de Sousa, and another man, Felisberto da Conceição, were arrested and flown immediately to Ataúro following the Marabia Attack. HRVD Statement 2165.

Ataúro

Ataúro, the arid island off the north coast of Dili, was first used in 1937 by the Portuguese for exiled political prisoners from Portugal and the Portuguese colonies. According to Vasco Lopes da Silva, the former village head of Vila (Ataúro, Dili), notable prisoners included the father of Manuel Carrascalão and Mário Lopes, the father of Maria do Ceu Lopes da Silva Federer, who were exiled from San Tomé. In one year, 1959, the Portuguese Government sent more than 3,000 people to Ataúro. During the internal armed conflict in 1975, the governor of Portuguese Timor and other members of the Portuguese administration fled from Dili to Ataúro and then to Darwin. They were eventually picked up by a ship that took them to Macau and Lisbon (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict).[463]

Indonesia used Ataúro as a place for arbitrary detention of East Timorese people between 1980 and 1986, but numbers peaked in 1982 at around 4,000. This is consistent with information collected by the Commission directly through its statement-taking process and in the secondary source reports from Amnesty International; both data confirm that large groups of people were detained on the island of Ataúro in the early 1980s. These figures are shown below.*



Reported number of detainees on Ataúro, June 1980–October 1984

Reference: Amnesty International, East Timor: Violations of Human Rights (1985)

* The Commission received evidence from a wide variety of sources on the number of people held on Ataúro at different times. Various sources have put the figure much higher than 4,000 and cumulatively the number of people transported to Ataúro between 1980 and 1984 may well have exceeded 6,000. Ceu Lopes Federer told the Commission that she kept a list of detainees' names during her period as a volunteer with the ICRC, which contained over 6,000 names [Testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003].

Count of reported detentions, in and out of Ataúro, 1974–1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

The island was used to hold political prisoners as well as ordinary civilians, including children and the elderly, who had relatives in the Resistance. Detainees were sent to the island in large groups, the first in July 1980 after the Marabia attack. Most people sent to Ataúro went by boat, although some were taken by helicopter. Few were told where they were headed until they had embarked on the journey. On arrival detainees were lined up, counted and registered.[464] The authorities then appointed a person (heads of neighbourhood associations) to represent a group of internees, often from the same village, who was responsible for the behaviour of the people in that group.[465]

Although people sent to Ataúro were prisoners in the sense that they could not leave the island, they were not held in a prison building. The first group of detainees were housed in the primary school building in the main town of Vila.[466] Subsequently, makeshift homes, housing 20 to 40 families, were built near Vila by either the authorities on Ataúro or the detainees themselves. The homes had corrugated metal roofs and sheets of black plastic or tarpaulin as walls. They did not have beds or running water.[467]

In the beginning living conditions were extremely hard. The military distributed inadequate amounts of rotten maize.[468] Ceu Lopes Federer, a former International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) volunteer on Ataúro, said that when people asked for more food the military sent a helicopter load but there was never enough. Many suffered from malnourishment and starvation. People ate leaves from trees,[469] seaweed from the sea and sometimes stole from the gardens of the local population to stay alive.[470] Clean water was scarce.[471] Some, including children and older people, were forced to work under the guard of police or Hansip in exchange for food or a small amount of pay.[472] Some detainees arrived with only the clothes they were wearing because they had been forced to leave their belongings behind.[473] The local population gave food and clothes but many still died due to starvation, especially children and the elderly.[474] Assistance from the ICRC from February 1982 greatly improved the daily living conditions, including providing them with medicines, rice, milk, sardines, mung beans, tea and sugar, tinned food and other foodstuffs.[475] A doctor also made visits to the island to attend to the sick.

Members of the Koramil, the police and local Hansip were in charge of guarding the internees on Ataúro. Detainees were sometimes permitted to leave Vila to find food, but they had to first seek a travel permit from the Koramil to go outside the camp, and had to report back to the Koramil on their return.[476] Breaches of the rules were severely punished.[477] Ceu Lopes Federer explained, however, that the travel permit rule was more strictly enforced during an internee's first three months on the island, and was then applied more leniently so that people could go further from the main town without permission. Similarly, the evening curfew implemented by the Koramil was set first at 6.00pm, then extended to 8.00pm and then extended again to 10.00pm.[478] Internees were able to organise entertainment, such as dancing tebe licurai and tebe dahur (forms of traditional dance) later in the period.[479]

Family members were not allowed to visit detainees and most detainees had no way of informing their loved ones of their whereabouts. From 1982[*] the ICRC began recording detainees' names and home villages and then informing their families.[480] For example, Maria Fatima da Costa of Same (Manufahi) told the Commission that six months after her husband disappeared, the ICRC came to tell her that her husband was on Ataúro. She was able to write a letter to him and send it through the ICRC.[481]

Although most detainees on Ataúro were not interrogated once they reached the island, some interrogations were still conducted. Guilherme da Costa described how, usually within the first three months of their arrival, certain individuals were called to the Koramil or the police station, and interrogated. The interrogations were conducted by, among others, First Lieutenant T317 and T318, (both Indonesian) a Pasmar (Pasukan Maritim, Marine Troops) and a second lieutenant (marine unit).[482]

* Witnesses reported to the Commission that the ICRC began visits in 1981. However the ICRC's Annual Reports suggest that the first visits were in early 1982.

From 1983 onwards the authorities began sending people home or to other places in Timor-Leste. The people arrested and sent to Ataúro in connection with Mau Chiga were first sent to Bonuk (Hato Udo, Ainaro) for a few weeks before being allowed to go home. A large group of people believed to still be a threat were sent to Cailaco (Bobonaro).

According to Ceu Lopes Federer, compared with the conditions of prisons in Dili they were better off because they were not beaten every day. However, they lived in appalling conditions, away from home and many died of hunger and disease. Adelina Soares said it was like a prison. It was isolated. A few people did try to escape, but they were unsuccessful. She described their life in Ataúro as consisting of a lack of food, hunger, illness, loss of contact with family, mental depression and trauma.[483] (For more detail on conditions on Ataúro see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine.)

Operation Security (Operasi Keamanan), 1981

426. Operation Security (Operasi Keamanan) was a response to the resurgence and revival of Fretilin/Falintil in early 1981.[*] The operation was launched in June 1981 to clear the Resistance out of rural areas and to break the clandestine networks that ensured Falintil's survival in the forest.[†] Although the operation is best known for its staging, on a massive scale, of "fence-of-legs" operations (operasi pagar betis, also known as operasi kikis) around the territory to flush out Falintil fighters, it also involved the detention and transportation to Ataúro of large numbers of civilians connected to the Resistance.[‡] The Commission's quantitative analysis shows a clear increase in numbers of detentions on Ataúro from June 1981, with a peak in August at the height of Operation Security.

427. Mário (Marito) Nicolau dos Reis described this aspect of the operation as follows:

> The military was beginning to realise that the guerrilla fighters were continuing to win the support of the people. This was apparent through the

* At the Fretilin/Falintil national conference in March 1981, Xanana Gusmão was elected as both the head of the newly formed Revolutionary Council of National Resistance (Concelho Revolucionário da Resistência Nacional, CRRN) and the commander-in-chief of Falintil. Under his leadership, Fretilin/Falintil began to rely more heavily on clandestine networks, particularly because the bases de apoio were no longer in operation. Falintil also became more localised, using smaller units to attack Indonesian targets [see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and strategy].

† Pasmar 11 operated in Timor between 1 April and 24 November 1981 to assist ABRI in carrying out Operation Security. Their anti-guerilla activities included: detection of civilian areas suspected of being sympathetic to the Resistance.; destruction of the spy networks through interrogation of detainees and from documents recovered; breaking connections between Resistance forces and their families by sending their families to Ataúro.

‡ See Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine, par. 293 ff; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; Vol. III, Part 7.7: Violations of the Laws of War and Part 7.8: Violations of the Rights of the Child, for further details about this Operation Security aspect.

continuing flow of logistical support, clothing, ammunition, and other… equipment to the guerrilla fighters. They [the Indonesian Military] decided on a plan that anyone who still had family in the forest would be exiled to Ataúro. This included us, who ran the clandestine organisation.[484]

428. The Commission considers some cases of the mass transfer of civilians to Ataúro to be forced displacements; and they are discussed in Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine. These are cases where the individual had not done anything "wrong", but was moved to the island because they were related to a person still in the forest (and so assumed to be Fretilin/Falintil) or they were from an area where Fretilin/Falintil was active. Statements received by the Commission suggest that such detainees were usually not interrogated or detained in other places before being sent to the island, and so did not report ill-treatment or torture. Civilians in the eastern region of Timor-Leste, where Fretilin/Falintil was most active, were particularly vulnerable to suffering forced displacement to Ataúro.[*] In one case in July 1981, a group of 300 relatives of members of Fretilin/Falintil from the district of Baucau were called together by their village heads. The military then shipped them to Ataúro.[†]

429. In other cases however, the Commission considers the transfer to Ataúro of political detainees during Operation Security to be a form of arbitrary detention. Victims were moved because they had engaged in some act of resistance, anything from giving food to a family member still in hiding, to involvement in one of the emerging structures for support of the armed Resistance known as a Popular Resistance Nucleus (Nucleos Resistência Popular, Nurep).[485] The Commission also received reports of men arrested because they refused to join an Operation Kikis, or on their return from such an operation.[486] These cases include:

- Celestino Verdial told about his arrest in Ainaro in mid-September 1981 following his return from an Operasi Kikis. The operation had found neither Xanana Gusmão nor Venancio Ferraz and the local military command began to suspect him of hiding the Falintil leaders. A member of the military arrested him and took him to the Hato Udo (Ainaro) Koramil, then to the Ainaro Kodim where he was interrogated, beaten and threatened with death until he admitted giving food to Venancio Ferraz. He then spent one week in the Koramil. Next he was sent to the army barracks in Taibessi (Dili). Celestino said that he was sent by helicopter to Ataúro with 11 others in 1981.[487]

* HRVD Statements which indicate arbitrary arrests in the eastern districts of Timor-Leste: 7786; 7096; 3959; 7608; 4367; 5383; 0206; 4383; 5346; 8759; 8795; 3052; 6081; 6145 and 8744. According to Ernest Chamberlain, 24 families from Iliomar (Lautém) were exiled to Ataúro in 1981, all of which had Falintil relatives in the forest. Most were exiled for 15 months after which some were moved to Maliana (Bobonaro) for another four years before returning to Iliomar in 1986 [Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar, Resistance in Rural East Timor, Point Lonsdale, Australia, 2003, p. 25].

† For example, Ricardina Ximenes told the Commission that on 12 June 1981 the village head of Tequinomata (Laga, Baucau), T319, told her that she should gather her things to go to Ataúro, because a family member, Teotónio, was still in the forest. He ordered Ricardina, her two children, her husband, her mother and another family member to assemble in the office of a Babinsa along with many other Tequinomata citizens. The group was then taken by trucks to the harbour in Laga to leave for Ataúro [HRVD 7786].

- Aquiles da Costa was arrested with his five uncles (Armando Soares, Jacinto Soares, Cipriano Soares, Pedro Soares and Izidio Soares) in Vemasse (Vemasse, Baucau) on 1 October 1981 on suspicion of giving eight bags of rice and one buffalo to Falintil. Two ABRI intelligence officers made the arrest and took the detainees to the Laga ABRI Post. Aquiles da Costa's uncles were beaten with metal batons and then all six detainees were tied up and submerged in water. They were detained for two days in Laga before being sent by boat to Dili and then to Ataúro for five years.[488]
- Fernando da Costa Lopes of Haurobo (Baucau) described how his father, José Lopes, was picked up and sent to Ataúro in late 1981. He had earlier been arrested twice for giving goods to Falintil. Somebody called T320 [an East Timorese town official] held José Lopes for one day and beat him.[489]
- Domingos Madeira was suspected of being a Falintil spy and of involvement in Falintil's attack in Hariana (Uato Haco, Baucau). On 15 June 1981, he was arrested by Hansip Commander T321, two members of Hansip called T322 and T323 and an ABRI soldier. His captors took him to the Venilale Koramil where he was interrogated by East Timorese member of the regional parliament, T324, Hansip Commander T325 and Commander T326. While they interrogated Domingos Madeira they beat him with a rifle butt, kicked him and punched him. He says he was beaten regularly until August 1981 when he was sent to the Balide Prison for several days before being shipped to Ataúro for two years.[490]

430. Most of those arrested through Operation Security came from the eastern region.[491] This corresponds with information in secondary sources, which suggest that this "scouring operation" concentrated on the eastern districts and that "the Hotel Flamboyan in Baucau was the central military command in 1981 for the 'fence of legs' operation [operasi pagar betis]".[*]

431. Some arrests were also made in central and western regions during Operation Security but the strategy of detaining large groups of family members and displacing them to Ataúro was not used as extensively. Where it was used, family members were often detained and interrogated before being sent to the island. For example, an East Timorese women told the Commission that in 1981 the East Timorese village head of Rotuto (Hato Builico, Ainaro), T327, and an East Timorese person called T328, both acting on the orders of ABRI, forced her to be part of a scheme to make her husband return from the forest:

> Village Head T327 brought me some letters persuading my husband and other Falintil members to surrender. At that time I had a young child but

* Cristiano da Costa in Michele Turner, Telling East Timor: Personal Testimonies 1942–1992, Sydney, New South Wales University Press, 1992, p. 185; See also Constâncio Pinto and Matthew Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle, Inside the Timorese Resistance, Boston, South End Press, pp. 84-86; A military instruction manual also states that "It is in the eastern sector that people's support is the most militant and most difficult to expose. This is because of the very strong, close family ties and also because it has been possible for the GPK to consolidate its political leadership in this region for several years." [Military Regional Command (Kodam) XVI, Established Procedure (PROTAP) on Intelligence No. 01/IV/1982: Instructions for Territorial Intelligence Activities in East Timor, translation in Budiardjo and Liem, The War against East Timor, pp. 193-210].

I [still] had to take the letters to the forest and stick them to trees on every path so that my husband…and other Falintil members would see them. Then ABRI imprisoned me in the Manufahi Kodim 1634 for seven months because at the time they were carrying out a cleansing operation in Aitana. The commander of the Manufahi Kodim [then] ordered me and my child (6 years) and my younger brother (4 years) to Ataúro. We were imprisoned on Ataúro for four years, seven months and seven days.[492]

432. Marçal Lourenço Ribeiro described his arrest in August 1981 on suspicion of providing food to Falintil:

*I was arrested by ABRI in a garden in Ormahei, Letefoho [Manufahi] because I was suspected of making my garden close to the forest so that I could give food to Falintil. I was taken to the Manufahi Kodim 1634 where I was beaten by the Section Head of Intelligence [Kepala Seksi Intelligence, Kasi I] using a sandal four times on the head. Then the Head of Intelligence told a Hansip to put me into a water tank for one hour, after which I was taken out and kept in a secret cell for around three days before I was taken out again to the general detention room. During my detention I was told by the Head of Intelligence to work in his rice field and also to tidy the grass around Same for three months.*[493]

433. The incidence of torture also varied between the regions at this time for similar reasons. In the eastern region, there was a lower correlation between detention or ill-treatment and torture compared with the central and western regions. A likely reason for this difference is the higher proportion of targeted arrests of clandestine members in the western and central regions.[494] Statements suggest that the military detained members of clandestine networks for periods of time on the mainland, where they were interrogated and often tortured, before sending them to Ataúro. Most families arrested, however, were shipped directly to Ataúro without interrogation. Because the eastern regions saw a higher proportion of family members arrested and sent directly to Ataúro, the proportion of detainees who also experienced torture or ill-treatment in these areas is less compared with the western and central regions. In the years mentioned, people from the 12 districts were sent to Ataúro.

After Operation Security

434. Operation Security ended at the end of 1981 without having captured a single senior Resistance figure.* In 1982 the military continued to detain members of the armed Resistance and clandestine networks and to move them to Ataúro. The military made many targeted arrests based on information about the civilian population given by Hansip, Ratihs and other civil defence groups.

* Some witnesses who had been part of Operasi Keamanan told the Commission that the group they were with did not engage in armed conflict with Falintil, did not make any arrests and did not kill anyone during the entire operation. Nevertheless, the Commission received information about several fatal violations during the operation, culminating in a confrontation between ABRI and Falintil on Mount Aitana which reportedly led to the deaths of a number of Falintil members and a mass arrest [see Vol. II, Part 7.2 on Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances for more information on this incident].

435. Adelino Soares told the Commission of his arrest for clandestine membership in Uatolari (Viqueque) because of information a Ratih had given to the local military. Ratih T277 found documents belonging to the clandestine network, which named Adelino, on the body of an estafeta whom T277 had shot and killed. He immediately informed the Uatolari Koramil of Adelino's involvement in the clandestine network. The Koramil commander ordered T330, T91 (an East Timorese translator) and a Koramil member to arrest Adelino at his home on 26 March 1982. On his arrest, Adelino described how he was threatened with a weapon and taken to the Uatolari Koramil. The Koramil commander interrogated and beat him and the Koramil deputy commander beat him with a gun and kicked him wearing his military boots. After spending a month at the Koramil, Adelino and nine other detainees were taken to Ataúro by helicopter. He did not return home until 7 February 1986.[495]

436. The military also continued the practice of keeping suspected members of the clandestine movement close at hand so that it could monitor their activities. This may also have been a way for military intelligence to discover more about the clandestine networks. Marito Reis, a senior clandestine member, stated that he was called back from detention on Ataúro to become the driver of the Head of the Intelligence Section at the Korem, Willem da Costa. Marito Reis believes that this was a tactic "so that…I would give pieces of information about the organisations, or the problems there were in Timor-Leste". While working for Willem da Costa, Marito Reis led the clandestine network in Dili. He was arrested again in 1982 after the military discovered clandestine news clippings.[496]

437. Alexandrina Amaral described how she was detained in 1982 by members of the Ainaro Koramil after the Koramil Head of Intelligence accused her of being the wife of Falintil commander Venancio Ferraz. She was held in a special cell in the Ainaro Koramil where she was not given any food and, except for using the toilet, was not allowed to wash during the two days she was held there. She was then taken to Dili and held in the Comarca for nine days before she was transported by boat to Ataúro. In 1986, Alexandrina Amaral was released but decided to stay on Ataúro as she had already married and built a house.[497]

Late 1982 – Falintil levantamento around Mount Kablaki

438. The Kablaki uprisings occurred on 20 August 1982 around Mount Kablaki in the villages of Mau Chiga, Dare and Mulo (Hato Builico, Ainaro), Aitutu (Maubisse, Ainaro) and Rotuto (Same, Manufahi). The Commission conducted extensive research in the Mau Chiga region about the events in August 1982 and much of the following is drawn from this research.[498] For cases of the arbitrary detention of civilians from Rotuto and Aitutu, the Commission has relied on narrative statements and the Commission's Community Profiles.

Early arrests

439. On 6 July 1982, three Falintil members held a meeting with 36 men from Mau Chiga in Nailemali (Mau Chiga) to plan an attack on the Hato Builico Koramil. The Indonesian military received information about the meeting and on 10 July 1982 the military and members of Hansip from Hato Builico began a house-to-house operation in the villages of Gulora, Mau Chiga and Hatuquero.[499] They arrested around 30 people, 16 of whom had attended the meeting. All detainees were taken directly to the Ainaro Kodim.[500] Abilio dos Santos Belo, one of the detainees, described to the Commission:

> When we arrived at the Kodim they put us into a special detention place. The head of intelligence from the Koramil conducted the investigation and tortured us one-by-one. It wasn't just me who was beaten by members of the Koramil and the head of intelligence; other friends were beaten until they bled heavily and some died in detention.[501]

440. The military held the prisoners in Ainaro for more than one month before transferring them to the Comarca. They became the first people from the Mount Kablaki area to be sent to Ataúro.[502]

Following the levantamento

441. Despite these arrests in July of civilians from Mau Chiga, the Falintil attacks went ahead on 20 August 1982.* Falintil soldiers under the command of Venancio Ferraz and Mau Hunu attacked several military and police posts including the Dare Koramil, the police station in Hato Builico and the Hansip posts in Aitutu, Raimerhei and Rotuto.[503] Immediately after the attacks, military forces from Ainaro, Same, Aileu, Dili and Lospalos converged on the region, including Infantry Battalions 744 and 745. These battalions were reinforced by members of Kodim 1633, the police and Hansip.[504] Military forces burned down houses in Dare, shut down the schools and forced women and children to act as guards at military posts.[505] After burning down the houses, the army put up posts in every aldeia in the area and added about eight "community posts" around Dare.[506] Falintil fighters and much of the population fled the area, some up Mount Kablaki. A group of about 30 from Mau Chiga who hid in the Nonai Cave were captured and taken to Dare. Another group from Mau Chiga hid in Tisimai, close to Same, but eventually surrendered to the Same Koramil.[507]

Arrest

442. Those who did not have an opportunity to flee the villages of Mau Chiga, Dare or Mulo were caught by the military. In Mau Chiga, the entire village population was arbitrarily detained and taken to Dare. In other villages, the evidence suggests that the military targeted individuals suspected of involvement in the attack or of having useful information. The evidence on which the military based its arrests was often scant. Mariano de Araújo from Mulo for example, told the Commission that he was arrested because Hansip ordered him to do security work at the Hato Builico Koramil. When he didn't go they arrested him on suspicion of involvement in the uprisings.[508]

* Word spread in Mau Chiga that on 20 August, the anniversary of the founding of Falintil, there would be a general uprising throughout the entire territory. [See CAVR and Fokupers, Women's Research Team Report, Appendix I.0. Abuse of Women's Human Rights from a Community Perspective: Mau Chiga 1982–1987, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 2003, p. 2].

443. In Rotuto, some members of Hansip were arrested.[509] Luis da Costa Soares told the Commission that he was arrested with 18 others who were suspected of being part of the uprising in Rotuto. They were taken first to the Manufahi Kodim, then to the Nanggala post in Aissirimou (Aileu), the Dili Korem and finally to the Balide Prison (Comarca). They were held in the Comarca until October 1982 when they were sent to Ataúro.

444. Family members of known Falintil or of people who fled from their villages were also targeted. Luis Nunes told the Commission that he fled to the forest after the attacks but the military arrested his family on suspicion of being Fretilin, including his wife Beatris da Costa and five other family members: Alzira da Silva, Olandina da Costa, Talvina Freitas, Rosantina Seizas and Luisa Xavier. They were taken to the Rotuto military post for one night then to Same Command Post at the Koramil for nine days. They were then sent to Ataúro for three years.[510]

445. Most arrests in the area around Mau Chiga were made by Hansip, often accompanied by an ABRI officer, such as the Kodim Head of Intelligence, or a government official, such as East Timorese Sub-district Secretary T331.[511] Members of Hansip mentioned most frequently to the Commission were T332, T333, T334 and T335.* In Rotuto, the commander of the Manufahi Kodim, the commander of the Same Koramil and the district administrator conducted arrests.[512]

446. Some people were arrested at different times by different agencies. Mário Amaral was arrested by the Koramil before the Mau Chiga attack and then again a few months later by the Kodim. According to his relative, Domingos Amaral, the two institutions did not share information with each other:

> Whether the Koramil or the Kodim, the police or other military institutions, [all] had their own lists of names for arrests of civilians. Because people imprisoned in the Kodim were unknown to the Koramil or other military institutions, and vice-versa. People detained in the Koramil were unknown to the Kodim and other military institutions in charge of Ainaro at the time. [ABRI] sometimes didn't work together in detaining civilians. It seemed as if the people had become objects in [ABRI's] contest to rise up the ranks.[513]

* Other Hansips named were: T336, T337, T338, T339, T340, T341, T342, T343, T344, T345, T346, T347, T348, T349, T350, T351, T352, T353, T354, T355, T356 and T357.

Detention and interrogation

447. Civilians detained immediately after the attacks were interrogated for several hours. Those captured in the towns of Mau Chiga, Dare or Mulo were taken to the Koramil in Hato Builico, the Ainaro Koramil or the Dare Koramil. Those from Aitutu were taken to the Ainaro Kodim and military posts in Same.* In Rotuto most detainees were taken to the Manufahi Kodim and held for between one day and three months.

448. Some detainees were released after interrogation while others were kept for further investigation. Detainees from Mau Chiga and Mulo who were not released were taken to the Ainaro Kodim.[514] People from Mulo describe how ten detainees were held in the Ainaro Kodim in a room so small that they were not able to sit.[515] Others were taken to the ABRI post in Lesu Hati and held there for periods ranging from a few days to a few weeks.[516] After a week, 12 Hino trucks stopped in Lesu Hati to drive detainees to Dili so that they could be sent to Ataúro. The trucks were already so full of detainees from Same and Ainaro that only a few could fit onto the trucks. The village head of Aitutu, T358, took it on himself to take those who were left in Lesu Hati to the Dare Koramil by foot.[517]

Torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment

449. Treatment of detainees was extremely harsh and many were tortured. In Ainaro interrogations and torture were carried out by Indonesian Ainaro Kodim members such as Commander T359,[518] the Koramil Commander T360,[519] Koramil Commander Sergeant T361,[520] Sergeant T362[521] as well as members of Infantry Battalion 744 in the Mantuto post[522] and Combat Engineer Battalion (Yon Zipur) 5 troops who were located in Dare from 5 September until December.[523] The sub-district administrator of Hato Builico, T363, was also mentioned in one statement.[524] In the Manufahi Kodim, Indonesian Head of Intelligence T364, the Kodim Commander and Babinsa T365 [East Timorese] interrogated and beat people. Details from these cases include those of:

- Domingos Melo, who told the Commission that he was knocked out when he was hit on the head with a piece of wood. When he regained consciousness, he found that a stab wound had pierced his knee and he was in a detention cell.[525]
- An East Timorese woman from Mau Chiga described how on the day of the military attack, soldiers were firing at civilians. She tried to run but was caught and the soldiers kicked her and stabbed her with a weapon. One of those she was with at the time of the attack, João Tilman, was killed in the shooting. The soldiers cut off his head and forced her to carry it all the way to Dare. When they reached the village of Dare, the head was buried and she was taken to the Ainaro Kodim where she was held for three months. During this time she was given electric shocks to the face. She was also forced to become a Muslim. When she refused, she was beaten unconscious. She was forced with another detainee to search out Falintil in the forest for one and a half months. When they returned empty handed, she was forced to "marry" a soldier for more than one year.[526]

* HRVD Statement 2050; Domingas Pacheco was arrested by Infantry Battalion 745 in Aitutu and taken to the Ainaro Kodim for interrogation [HRVD Statement 4910].

- Rui Soares de Araújo was a member of Hansip who was detained and tortured in the Ainaro Koramil for giving vital information to Falintil before the attack. He had told Falintil Commander Venancio Ferraz about the number of soldiers and weapons in the Dare Koramil as well as the soldiers' patrol schedule and the times that the Koramil office would be empty. He told the Commission:

> After the Mau Chiga incident, the Hato Builico Koramil Commander suspected me of cooperating with Falintil in the attack on the Dare Koramil…A week later, on 26 August 1982, I was arrested in the market by police officer T366 and taken to the Ainaro Koramil. I was interrogated there by the Head of the Intelligence Section and T366. Then T366 hit me with an electric cable, slapped and kicked my whole body over and over again, until I fell to the floor unconscious. After that I was taken to the Ainaro Kodim and a month later I was moved…to Balide Prison. Then on 11 October 1982, I was taken to Dili harbour, and boarded the Seiçal ferry to be exiled to Ataúro with 11 other people from Ainaro.[527]

450. Sexual violence against detainees was perpetrated on many women detainees following the uprisings (see Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence.) For example, six women who were taken to the ABRI post in Manatuto were tortured and raped. Some were raped in Lesuhati itself. An East Timorese woman told the Commission:

> Every night I was always followed by ABRI and Hansip because at the time I was about 14 years old. Before I was raped, I was tortured in many different ways. I was beaten with a weapon, burned, water was poured over me, and I was stripped naked. They took me out [to the middle of the long grass] until something happened that I'd never imagined. On the first night, I was raped by T367 [East Timorese] from Infantry Battalion 744, a corporal. On the second night I was raped by T368 [East Timorese], a soldier from 744, also ranked Corporal. On the third night by I was raped by T369 [East Timorese] from Infantry Battalion 744, a Corporal. After that…my body was soaked with blood.[528]

Village detention

451. As well as holding victims in military commands, the military also used a tactic of "village detention". This involved concentrating civilians from around the region within the boundaries of certain villages and keeping them in public and private buildings or areas.

452. For example, the Commission heard of many people from Mau Chiga taken to Dare after arrest. First they were registered with the Hato Builico Koramil (Sub-district military command) and then they were divided into groups. Some were taken to the market and some to the primary school behind the Koramil. When the market and school were full, detainees were taken to private houses in Dare. Detention in this manner continued for several months.

453. Detainees held in the market built homes for themselves from wood and long grass. They were carefully guarded and could search for food or firewood only in groups and after seeking permission from the Koramil. A Koramil member would then accompany the group and it had to report back to the Koramil on its return. If someone wandered off alone or returned late, he or she was put into one of three fish tanks in front of the Koramil Dare. Detainees held in the school were held in three of the school's four large rooms and detainees in one room were prohibited from talking to those in the other rooms.

454. Apart from the poor conditions in which these detainees were held, their experience was made all the worse by the ruthlessness of their captors and the impunity with which the military and its auxiliaries acted. The Commission has recorded numerous serious human rights violations perpetrated against civilians while their freedom of movement in their village was restricted in this way, including sadistic killings, sometimes committed publicly in order to terrorise the population.[*] Widespread rape and other forms of sexual violence by members of both the military and Hansip were also reported.[†]

455. Torture and ill-treatment were committed not only to punish the individual but also to instill fear in the community. Victims were tortured before a crowd or were told to inform others of their maltreatment. For example, Leonel Cardoso Pereira from Aitutu told about how his older brother Fernão was tortured from the house all the way along the road until he reached the house of Hau Teo, used as a Hansip post. Fernão was tied to a pole for a day and a night without food and each time a member of Hansip entered or left the post he would hit or kick Fernão.[529] Adelino de Araújo, who was 14 years old and a TBO at the time, was detained along with his father and older brother on Kablaki and experienced similar humiliation:

* In just one example, Bernardino dos Reis Tilman witnessed Zipur 5 Commander T370 decapitate a man called Tomás with his axe before the local population. He then ordered the head of Tomás cooked at the Koramil headquarters in Dare. He forced two members of his battalion to eat the head while he took pictures. He also bit off the dead man's penis and ordered some members to take photographs of it, which he later showed to the local population, announcing "all of you, later I will eat you like this. Your head I will cut off, I will eat [it] like this". [CAVR Interview with Ana Britos who received information about her husband's fate from Bernardino dos Reis Tilman, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 29 May 2003].

† The Commission has also received reports that members of the military and Hansip raped five women behind the market, two of whom were pregnant at the time of the rape. CAVR and Fokupers, Women's Research Team Report, Appendix I.0. Abuse of Women's Human Rights from a Community Perspective: Mau Chiga 1982–1987, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 2003, pp. 8-9].

After about two days with them [soldiers at the Zipur post] I started seeing genitals and ears hanging from one of the pine trees at their Post. After a week or more, they took me to the Koramil Post again. I was tied to the flagpole at around 8.00 in the morning. My clothes were removed until I was naked and they gave me their underpants to wear while I was tied up. After that, I was let off of the flagpole and told to carry an empty box on my shoulders, walking towards the Zipur post. Along the way I was told to scream out to the people nearby and say: "Don't follow Falintil's ass! If you follow Falintil, you'll be the same as me!" When I arrived at the Zipur post, they took my picture. I asked for my clothes before they took the photo but they didn't give them to me. It wasn't until late in the afternoon that they gave me my clothes back.[530]

Forced displacement after the attacks

456. After the uprisings, large groups from the affected areas were moved from their mountain homes to areas by the coast. Although, technically, this was forced displacement of civilians, in the minds of many of those moved it was "imprisonment". For example, when Dare had no more capacity to take detainees from Mau Chiga, the Koramil commander asked the village head of Nunu Mogue (Hato Builico, Ainaro) for assistance. The village head agreed to take some detainees in Nunu Mogue and a simple shelter was constructed to house them. They were restricted to the area of Nunu Mogue but were given no food at all and had to depend on the generosity of the people of Nunu Mogue, who gave them land to start a garden. After two years living in these conditions, the Dare Koramil commander called the detainees back to Dare.[531]

457. Another group of 431 people, 202 men and 229 women, from Mau Chiga and Dare were sent to Ataúro.* A further group of more than 100 people from the area was sent to Dotik (Manufahi) on the southern coast on 7 January 1983. They were joined by 50 people who had been held in the Same Kodim, including some members of Fretilin.[532] Luis Sarmenti Lin told the Commission that he was involved in the attack in Rotuto and was part of the group sent to Dotik after his arrest. He describes how detainees in Dotik were ordered by a platoon of ABRI soldiers to stand, with hands bound, looking into the sun from 7.00am to 12.00 midday.[533] He received only one meal a day. After three years in Dotik, Luis spent the next two years guarding the Hato Builico Koramil on the orders of the Koramil commander. Only then was he permitted to return home to Rotuto.[534] Others who had been detained in the Same Kodim were forced to relocate to Raifusa (Manufahi) or to the island of Ataúro.

* CAVR Interview with Abilio dos Santos Belo, Secretary of Mau Chiga Village from 1991, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 4 June 2003. Abilio dos Santos took the initiative to gather quantitative data about the fate of each person in the Mau Chiga community including a list of all names of detainees after the Mau Chiga uprising [see also Abilio dos Santos Belo, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, Dili, 28–29 July 2003; see also Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations].

Detention during the ceasefire: March to August 1983

458. On 23 March 1983, a ceasefire agreement was signed between ABRI and Falintil following several months of village level meetings (known as "peaceful contacts") and local level peace agreements with communities in the eastern districts. The ceasefire held until early August 1983. Despite the formal cessation of hostilities for this five-month period, however, the Commission has received evidence that the military continued arbitrarily to detain and to torture suspected clandestine members. The transfer of civilians to Ataúro also continued during the ceasefire.

459. Cases of arbitrary detention and/or torture reported to have occurred during the ceasefire indicate that the military's programme of identifying clandestine members or members of Fretilin/Falintil continued during this period and that these arrests were conducted jointly between Hansip and Ratih and military units, particularly Special Forces. Some of these cases include those of:

- Abilio Soares, who told the Commission that on 15 April 1983 a Ratih named T371 and Hansip T372 arrested 20 men from Caicua Village (Vemasse, Baucau).* They were separated into groups and Abilio's group was taken to the river, blindfolded and then beaten. Two weeks later, on 1 May 1983, Infantry Battalion 745 and Hansip arrested the same men and took them to Tacitolu (Dom Aleixo, Dili) and then to the Infantry Battalion 745 unit in Dili. Two of the detainees, Domingos and Nahe Dasi were reportedly slapped and their feet stomped on. On 18 May 1983, the military released 11 of the detainees and sent nine to Ataúro.[535]
- Daniel "Bernabe" Pereira, who described his arrest in May 1983 in Laga (Baucau) by Infantry Battalion 144 Company Commander T373. He was suspected of being a member of Falintil. He was held for three days and three nights, beaten and burned with cigarettes.[536]
- Two deponents from Vessoru (Uatolari, Viqueque) testified to being detained on 4 June 1983 on suspicion of working with Falintil. Gilbeiro Pinto Fernandes was taken to the Kopassandha post by Kopassandha Deputy Commander T374, on the orders of Kopassandha Commander T375. There he was held with Manuel Lopes, Lourenço Lopes, Valenti and Baltazar Mascareinhas. T374 then called him into the interrogation room where Gilbeiro Fernandes says that he was beaten, kicked and hit with a weapon causing two teeth to be knocked out. He was then hung from the roof for 15 minutes before the interrogation continued.[537]
- The Commission received a statement from an East Timorese man who stated that he was arrested in July 1983 in Urahou (Ponilala, Ermera) by ABRI soldiers. He was held in the Ermera Kodim for 15 days where he was interrogated while being beaten, kicked and burned with cigarettes. He was then moved to the Comarca in Dili until September 1983.[538]

* The names of the men detained and their reported ages at the time were: Abilio Soares (48), Biana (20), Jaime (33), Alfredo (22), Delfin (42), Arnaldo (28), Feliciano (45), Cai Dasi (41), Aquilis (30), Jeremias (40), Mário Correia (20), Naha Dasi (34), Rubi Dasi (32), Domingos Guterres (50), Naha Hare (46), Bosi Hari (38), Sina Ono (37), Domingos Pinto (44), José Sina Du (28) and Julião (39).

The breakdown of the ceasefire and Operation Unity, August 1983

460. The ceasefire completely broke down in early August 1983 with a series of uprisings (levantamentos) in the districts of Viqueque and Lautém, almost exactly one year after the levantamento around Mount Kablaki. Again, the military responded with widespread detention of civilians, ill-treatment and torture, together with other serious human rights violations. The ceasefire had given Fretilin an opportunity to approach communities and explain the importance of the struggle.[539] Consequently, the clandestine network had expanded, particularly in the eastern districts where Fretilin/Falintil was most active and where it had strengthened.* The Commission heard of the following incidents on or around 8 August 1983:

- A Falintil attack on a military base in Buicaren in the Kraras region resulting in the death of 14 members of Battalion Zipur (engineers).[540]
- A group of Hansip deserted to join Falintil in the forest. Several subsequent attacks in other parts of Viqueque including in Uato Carbau on 19 August 1983† and Uatolari were also reported to have occurred at this time.
- Hundreds of members of civil defence organisations Wanra and Hansip as well as other able-bodied men fled the villages of Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém) Lore and Luro (Lospalos, Lautém) and Serelau (Moro, Lautém) to join Falintil.[542]
- In Mehara, a group of Hansip under the command of Raja Miguel dos Santos (Kuba) seized weapons from the police and the Koramil, including a Metrahadora automatic weapon,[543] and then joined Falintil.[544] This is sometimes referred to as the armed uprising (levantamento armada).[545]
- In the sub-district of Iliomar (Lautém), four East Timorese Hansip, T338, T339, T440 and T394, reported to the Koramil that two Falintil members had asked them to participate in an attack on the military in Iliomar the following evening. The Hansip, afraid of the repercussions of such an attack, killed the two Falintil fighters.[546]

461. In response to these attacks or foiled attacks, Operation Unity (Operasi Persatuan) was launched on 17 August 1983. On 9 September, the Indonesian government declared a state of emergency and five days later President Soeharto ordered a "clean sweep" of the armed Resistance.[547]

* According to Father Domingos Soares (Father Maubere) the peace had been a tactic by Xanana Gusmão to buy time for the restructuring of the Resistance. Father Maubere arrived from Portugal in May 1980, and was sent as a new priest to Ossu in June 1980. His parish also covered Viqueque and Lacluta. [CAVR Interview with Father Maubere (Domingos Soares), Dili, 22 September 2003.]

† Attacks in Uato Carbau were reported in a number of villages including Dara Gata on 19 August 1983. [HRVD Statement 7340.]

462. Accordingly, the military conducted a massive crackdown in the districts of Viqueque and Lautém which also reached into other areas of the territory including Baucau, Aileu and Dili. Bombing raids were conducted between August 1983 and June 1984. The intensity of the operations is reflected in the Commission's quantitative research. This indicates an increase in human rights violations in late 1983, especially in the eastern districts of Lautém, Viqueque and Baucau. Major violations of human rights included the massacre of civilians, the forced displacement of the civilian population to other areas, and the rape and use for sexual slavery of women from the region (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances and Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine; also Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence). In addition, the Commission recorded a sharp increase in incidences of arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment.

463. As in other operations, suspected members of the clandestine networks, particularly members of Hansip and Ratih which had been heavily represented in the attacks, were targeted for arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment. Because so many members of the Resistance had fled their homes to join Falintil, however, the brunt of the ABRI attack was borne by ordinary civilians, particularly the families of those who had fled.

Kraras

464. The population of Kraras (Viqueque, Viqueque) had largely fled up Mount Bibileo after the attacks. An operation was launched to find the villagers and was led by Infantry Battalion 745 and Chandraca 7 (Kopassandha), under the command of Major (Lieutenant Colonel) T364, Captain T377 and the Viqueque Kodim Commander T378.* They carried out an intense attack on the mountain, bombing it from airplanes and encircling the mountain.[548] Much of the population was forced to surrender.[549]

465. José Andrade dos Santos told the Commission that in the aftermath of the killings in Kraras the entire region was plunged into fear. He explains that many from the area were arbitrarily arrested, held and tortured for around one to two weeks.[550] Thomás Guterres from Uatolari described how, in the months after Kraras, three or four military personnel would arrive at a house in the middle of the day or night and call from outside. When the door was opened they would storm in and take the suspect. If they did not get who they were looking for, often they would arrest members of the person's family, including women.[551]

466. Arrests were widespread and victims were arrested in the forest and in neighbouring villages.[552] Mariano Soares, speaking at the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment in relation to Kraras, explained:

> After the massacre of August 1983, many people suspected of supporting the attack were arrested. [Viqueque] Kodim 1630 looked for people involved in the clandestine movement, and…also…started to arrest ordinary Viqueque people to transport them to Ataúro.[553]

* Chandraca 7 (Kopassandha), comprising 120 members of Special Forces, landed in Viqueque on 28 August 1983.

467. The Commission heard of a mass arrest following the levantamentos. In Uma-Uain (Viqueque, Viqueque) João Ximenes de Araújo described how Battalions 744 and 745 worked together to detain 100 civilians from the area and then held them in the Viqueque Kodim. They were then taken to Laga (Baucau, Baucau) and from there sent to Ataúro.[554]

468. In all other cases of arbitrary detention, however, the victims were targeted and arrested individually or in groups fewer than 15. As in other similar actions, the military targeted suspected perpetrators of the uprising, suspected members of the clandestine movement and civilians who may have had relevant information.

469. Matias Miguel was arrested by the village secretary T379, sent to the Viqueque Kodim for three days and then sent to the Comarca in Dili for three years.[555] In Viqueque District, the statements received by the Commission suggest that clandestine members were targeted. Mário de Jesus Sarmento, a Fretilin member from Carau-Balu (Viqueque, Viqueque) was arrested by his uncle, East Timorese ABRI member T380. Civilians Pedro Soares, Inácio Pinto and Paul Gomes were also arrested. East Timorese Sub-district administrator T256 and the Sub-district head of intelligence then interrogated the four clandestine members for three nights in Carau-Balu before they were taken to the Viqueque Kodim.

470. Ernesto Freitas, also from Carau-Balu, described how T256 and Head of Intelligence T382 approached him at his local government office and accused him of meeting with Falintil member Roque. That night, when he returned home from work, he was ordered to go to the Viqueque Kodim. At the Kodim he was interrogated, then sent to a house owned by the head of intelligence in Monumento Village (Viqueque Town, Viqueque). Finally he was held for three months at the house of T383, the Sub-district secretary, where soldiers from Infantry Battalion 745 beat him.[556]

471. These arrests also occurred outside of the area. António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak) was arrested in Dili by SGI when they found out he was holding money to give to the Resistance. He was held in the Korem, the Military Police Headquarters in Balide and then sent to Kupang with another 68 detainees.[557]

472. Carlos Alfredo da Costa Soares told the Commission of an entire division detained and interrogated. He recounted how he and 159 other members of Hansip were arrested after the Kraras uprising and taken to the Viqueque Kodim. After several weeks they were moved to the Baucau Kodim by truck, where the Kodim Commander interrogated them one by one. He was hit with the barrel of a rifle three times by a member of the Kodim. The same night they were put onto a boat and taken to Ataúro where they stayed until 1986, when the Koramil let them return home.[*]

473. The military crackdown in Viqueque lasted for around three months but arbitrary arrests and torture continued into 1984.[558] Reports received by the Commission mention that in February 1984, members of Chandraca (Kopassandha) were still calling people to the Kodim in connection with the events in Kraras.[559]

* CAVR Interview with Carlos Alfredo da Costa Soares, Ataúro, Dili, 26 October 2003. See also HRVD 9014, which states that 99 Hansip were forcibly moved by ABRI, because of their suspected involvement in the Kraras uprising.

Others, such as José Gomes, had fled to the forest with Falintil after the uprising and were arrested on their return. José Gomes was detained for about six months after the Kraras uprising by Chandraca 7, group 2, and subsequently was interrogated and tortured for two weeks in the Viqueque Kodim.

474. Territorial military commands were the main place used for holding detainees. In the sub-district of Viqueque, most detainees were taken to the Viqueque Kodim 1630.[560] There, the Sub-district administrator, Martinho Fernandes, and Head of Intelligence, Amo Sani, conducted interrogations.[561] People from regions that neighboured Kraras such as Beaço and Ossu were also brought to the Viqueque Kodim by members of Kopassandha or the local Koramils.[562] The Infantry Battalion 745 base in Olo Bai was also used to hold detainees. According to Father Domingos Soares (Father Maubere), it became notorious for the extra-judicial killings and for the torture of detainees that occurred there. Detention at the 745 base usually lasted between one week and six months.[563]

475. Public buildings were also taken over and used to hold detainees. In Kraras the local parliament building, also known as the PIDE Portuguese* building, was taken over.[564] Mariano Soares told the Commission that he was held in a toilet in the "PIDE Portuguese" for ten days after he had been interrogated at the Kodim. Detention in the "PIDE Portuguese" building usually lasted between a week and six months.

Uato Carbau

476. In the the sub-district of Uato Carbau (Viqueque), local village officials and Kopassandha were named as responsible for most arbitrary detentions.[565] The Commission heard from Aderito de Carvalho that 12 men were arrested on 15 August on suspicion of involvement in the Kraras uprising. They were held in an empty house.[566] Following the attack in Uato Carbau on 19 August, another eight men were reportedly detained and held in the Uato Carbau Koramil. Lindolfo de Jesus Fernandes, a clandestine member, told the Commission that he was arrested after returning from working in his fields on suspicion of helping Falintil. He was ordered to see the Uato Carbau Sub-district administrator, T299, an East Timorese, and was then detained in the Koramil with seven others.†

477. Detainees from Uato Carbau were almost all taken to the Uato Carbau Koramil. Some remained at the Koramil for the duration of their detention, while others were moved to the Infantry Battalion 511 headquarters in Viqueque.

Iliomar

478. In the district of Lautém Infantry Battalion 641, Infantry Battalion 520 and Airborne Infantry Battalion 100, worked together with the Kodim and Nanggala

* A Portuguese government building used as the district headquarters for the secret police (PIDE).

† He was joined by Chiquito, Manuel de Conceição and his brother Hermenegildo de Conceição (Fretilin members), Armando Guterres da Silva Freitas, Jeremias Xavier, Afonso da Silva and Gaspar de Carvalho (a clandestine member). [HRVD Statements 7344; 7340; 7522 and 7523.]

units 2 and 4.[567] In Iliomar, according to Ernest Chamberlain, Hansip who were also members of the clandestine network were the main target of the military, which used other "pro-integration" Hansip to detain, torture or kill them.[568] Most detainees were taken to the Iliomar Koramil, where interrogations and torture took place.[569] Members of Hansip would assist in translating for Danramil T385.[570] Marcos Fernandes testified that the Ratih members arrested in October were all taken to the Lautém Kodim.[571]

479. The Commission's research suggests that the main targets of arrests in Iliomar were local Hansip and Ratihs with clandestine connections.[572] Indonesian Koramil Commander T385, T386, (Chandraca Kopassandha), the Sub-district administrator of Iliomar T387 (East Timorese) and District Assembly member T255 were named in reports of arrests.* Most of the arrests in this area were conducted by pro-integration Hansip members, however, including the four who had refused to take part in the Koramil attack. T389, an East Timorese, was named in 15 cases of arbitrary arrest reported to the Commission, and also ordered other Hansip members to participate.[573]

480. Erminio Pinto described how Kopassandha senior officer T386 and Koramil Commander T385 found out about the Hansip clandestine network in the area through Filomeno da Gama, who was then killed. Soon after, they arrested four Hansip members: Erminio Pinto, Ernesto Madeira, Carlos da Costa and Luis Lopes. On 30 September, T386 and T387, along with Hansip Commander T389 and member T390, arrested five more men from Iliomar: Carlos da Costa, Luis Lopes, Carlos Correia (civilian), António Geronimo (civilian) and Belmonte Geronimo.

481. Hansip arrests in Iliomar continued into October as more clandestine members became known. Marcos Fernandes, a member of Ratih, told the Commission that a Ratih/Hansip member called Lourenço Marques who had run to the forest immediately after the incident in Iliomar surrendered on 3 October. He was arrested by ABRI Commander of Group 3, Major T391 from Indonesia and tortured for a week before he admitted the names of other members of Ratih who helped Falintil. Between 10 and 13 October 1983, ABRI arrested 15 members of Ratih from the Iliomar area.† All were taken to the Lautém Kodim.

Mehara

482. In the village of Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém), the military ordered combat battalions Infantry Battalion Territoral Units. 515, 641, Airborne Infantry Battalion

* Commander T385 [Koramil] was mentioned in HRVD Statements: 2113; 3930; 3938; 4399; 4407; 3925; 3949; 4384; 4393; 4397; 4436 and 4445. T386 [Senior Kopassandha], the senior member of the Chandraca (Kopassandha) team in Iliomar was mentioned in HRVD Statements: 4371; 3951; 4436; 3947; 4376 and 3952. T387 [sub-district administrator, Iliomar] was mentioned in HRVD Statements: 4408; 3949; 4002; 2113; 3947 and 3927. T255 was mentioned in HRVD Statements: 2113; 3918; 3930; 3972; 4399; 4408 and 3951.

† On 10 October ABRI arrested nine members of Ratih: Marcos Fernandes, Manuel Victor, Joaquim Fernandes, Joaquim Manuel, José da Costa, Domingos Cunha, Telu-Lara, Januario Monteiro and Leopoldo Fernandes. On 13 October it arrested António de Oliveira, Pedro dos Santos, Mário Pinto, Orlando Mendes, José Eurico and António da Silva.

100 and Commando groups 1, 2 and 4, under the command of Second Lieutenant T392, to conduct widespread arrests of the residents.[574] Battalions 541 and 641 arrested civilians in Mehara and from the aldeias of Loikere and Porlamanu, Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém).

483. Most statements received were from women from the village of Mehara. Wives of the Hansip members who had fled were arrested and interrogated about their husbands' whereabouts or ordered to go and search for their husbands in the forest. Domingas Alves Fernandes told the Commission:

> That day [8 August 1983] every mother whose husband or family had run off, including my husband, were told to go to the ABRI post where we were interrogated. We were told to look for [our] husbands or families in the forest and to shout using a megaphone. Some of us ten or more people, went to the forest behind [Mount] Paicão to find those who had run off…After we came back, we reported to them that we hadn't found anything. Every day after that, for several weeks, we had to report to the village office.[575]

484. Women were also left in a vulnerable position when men in the village went on forced searches looking for members of the Resistance in the forest. An East Timorese man was forced by the Task Force (Satuan Tugas, Satgas) commander of Tutuala to participate in a month-long search for the members of Hansip who had fled. His wife was ordered to go to the Infantry Battalion 641 post in Laluna Lopo, Poros, Mehara, (Tutuala, Lautém) where she was interrogated about her husband's clandestine work and whether she had ever met any members of Fretilin. She was held for three nights. On one night, she was kissed and touched but she was not raped. Her husband was taken to the Kodim 1629 in Lospalos (Lautém) and was never seen again.[576]

485. The community of Porlamano in the village of Mehara told the Commission that some family members of fugitive Hansip members were brought to the Infantry Battalion 641 military post and tortured, while members of Battalion 641 and Airborne Infantry Battalion 100 destroyed their possessions.[577] Detainees were also held in public buildings in the town including the primary school building and the Church.[578] Members of Airborne Infantry Battalion 100 arrested many wives of the members of Hansip and held them in an empty traditional house (uma lulik).[579] They then moved them to the Porlameno village square where the East Timorese Sub-district administrator of Tutuala, T393, and commander T392 conducted interrogations.[580]

486. The intensive arrests around Mehara continued until the end of 1983.[581] The community of Herana in Mehara, for example, told the Commission that in November Infantry Battalion 641 arrested ten people in the aldeia and handed them over to Airborne Infantry Battalion 100 and Infantry Battalion 745, to be killed.[582]

Maria's* story

Maria's story illustrates the devastating impact of the crackdown following the levantamento on the lives of family members of those involved. Maria's husband joined Hansip and civilians in the village of Mehara in the flight into the forest on 8 August. ABRI arrested Maria on 10 August 1983 in Mehara, two days after the levantamento. She was taken directly to the Lospalos Kodim 1629 (Lautém).

While at the Kodim, she was interrogated by the Indonesian military on the whereabouts of her husband, again and again. She was kept in a dark cell. Her parents were also imprisoned and interrogated for 15 days in the Tutuala Koramil. Her youngest child, just seven months old, was brought to the Lospalos Kodim, and hung upside down by the feet for several hours. This child was targeted because it was the child of her current husband. (Maria's other three children were from her first husband.) During the three years she was imprisoned at the Kodim, she said she was raped repeatedly and miscarried three times. She did not want the children to be born because each baby in her womb was the result of ABRI rape and she did not know who the fathers were. In 1986 they released her from the Kodim, but she was still not completely free. She had to report once a week to the military. The Commission heard that in 1988 she was forced to search for her husband in the forest with members of Infantry Battalion 745 behind her. When she found her husband, he was shot dead by the soldiers. Her reporting conditions then ended. Maria died before the writing of this report.[583]

Torture and ill-treatment

487. The mistreatment of detainees in the districts of Viqueque and Lautém was particularly harsh.[584] Many were killed or disappeared, as set out in Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances. As in the aftermath of the Marabia attack and the Kablaki levantamentos, the increased reports of torture and of ill-treatment after Kraras appears closely to match the increased number of detentions, suggesting that a high proportion of individuals arbitrarily detained were also tortured.

488. Almost all detainees from both Viqueque and Lautém reported being badly beaten.[585] Several also reported being burned with cigarettes and electrocuted, forms of torture in use since the beginning of the Indonesian occupation.

* "Maria" is a pseudonym subsituted in order to protect the identity of the victim.

489. Isabel da Silva from Beaço, Maluru (Viqueque, Viqueque) described how her husband Jeremias, head of the primary school, and his brother, Caetano, were taken by a member of the Special forces (Nanggala) to the Viqueque Kodim where they were tortured before they disappeared. The Sub-district administrator, T256, had found out that Jeremias had given books, a ball and net to an old school friend, Rosito, who at that time was a member of Falintil. Isabela told to the Commission:

> My husband was interrogated and tortured by being burned with cigarettes. His foot was crushed under a chair leg when someone sat on it. My husband was accused over and over again of being "a spy, and two-faced". Then he said, "It is better that I am just killed rather than suffer like this."
>
> On 28 March, Jeremias was told to get into a tank and that he was going on an operation. My husband, Jeremias, and I already knew that he would be killed…[He] was taken by an Ambonese Nanggala and the Viqueque head of intelligence...in the direction of Kraras.
>
> After a week, I went back again to the Viqueque Kodim to ask where he was. They just laughed and said, "that prisoner is still on an operation."[586]

490. Others described particular forms of ill-treatment. Mário de Jesus Sarmento told the Commission that he was interrogated in Carau-Balu by Sub-district administrator, T256, and the head of intelligence, T382 [East Timorese]. If he did not answer their questions, he was punched, kicked and burned with cigarettes. After three days he was taken to the Viqueque Kodim by four Kodim members and, while on the road, they cut off his ear and forced him to eat it.[587] This was witnessed by Pedro da Costa Amaral who had been arrested on 19 August by eight Kodim members. Pedro himself was taken to the Flamboyan Hotel in Baucau where he was tortured by members of Kopassandha.[588] Villanova Caetano, after being badly beaten with victims Domingos Rodrigues and Alberto da Incarnação, was forced by members of Airborne Infantry Battalion 100 to eat an entire packet of tobacco and a pair of socks.[589]

Aftermath of the levantamento

Transfer of detainees out of the area

491. Many of those detained after the Kraras uprising were sent to Ataúro.[590] Others were sent to prisons in Indonesia, including to Cipinang in Jakarta and to Bali.* The Commission heard that about 69 people were sent to a prison in Kupang (West Timor, Indonesia).[591] [For more information on the use of prisons in Indonesia, see the box below after paragraph 503.]

* Marito Reis, a clandestine leader in Dili in 1983, told the Commission that this policy was intended to break up the Resistance. [CAVR Interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 27 May 2004.]

Village detention in Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque

492. The detention and persecution of the local populations in 1983 did not end with the immediate crackdowns following the uprisings in August. The remaining civilian population of Kraras was moved to the village of Lalerek Mutin (Viqueque, Viqueque) and placed under tight surveillance so that their physical freedom was highly restricted. José Gomes* described how in the mornings the military would carry out a roll call and at night men and women were separated. Posts were constructed around the village in three rings, ostensibly to prevent the villagers from having contact with Resistance fighters. Residents of the village were deployed to guard all three levels. Nanggala manned the innermost layer. A giant human shield, therefore, surrounded the village. José Gomes said that "Lalerek Mutin was like a military barracks."[592]

Mass detentions in Lautém

493. In Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém) and the sub-district of Iliomar (Lautém), the Commission heard of the communities being detained en masse in December 1983, four months after the uprisings.

494. In Iliomar, four deponents described how on 5 December 1983 residents of Iliomar were forced to attend a flag-raising ceremony, where they received a "lecture" and were then arrested.[593] Gabriel da Costa described:

> On Monday 5 December 1983, I participated in a flag-raising ceremony. After it ended, T255, the District Assembly member for Iliomar, T387 and T213, Hansip members, told six friends and me to go to a meeting in the Sub-district administration office. We went in and an hour passed before Hansip members closed the door and said to us: "It was God who created us to live in this world and God is the one who gave you up. You are arrested because you are two-faced, and you have opposed the Indonesian Government." Three hours later the Hansip members brought six of us to our place of detention, which at that time was the school building. The building next to it was made into a prison.[594]

495. On 12 December 1983, one week after the arrest of the civilians at the flag-raising ceremony, José da Costa told the Commission that all village and aldeia heads in Iliomar were asked to come to the primary school building to attend a meeting. After they arrived, the doors were closed and they were asked: "Are you the ones who want Timor-Leste to be independent?" José named 20 people who were detained at this time. They were beaten, kicked, and interrogated one by one. After ten days Commander T385 and T255 took nine of the detainees out of the building and they were killed.† The remaining detainees were moved to a small building next to the school for a further three months where they endured daily interrogations. After their release they were required to report

* At the time of writing, José Gomes was the village head of Lalerek-Mutin.

† They were António, Jerónimo, José Anunciacão, Pelomonte, Joaquim, Martinho Monteiro, Carlos Coreia, Venáncio, Americo and Cipriano.

daily at the Koramil.* Many other civilians, who had been arrested individually after the two Falintil members were killed in Iliomar, were held in the building adjacent to the school.[595] Americo de Sousa Jeronimo described how some detainees had to sleep in the toilet, which was full of faeces and urine.†

496. Another mass arrest took place in Mehara around 16–17 December 1983. The Sub-district administrator of Tutuala (Lautém), T393, together with Infantry Battalion 641 and Airborne Infantry Battalion 100, ordered the whole population of Mehara and the surrounding villages, such as Loikere, to gather in front of the Mehara village office.[596] A list of names was read out and those on the list were first put into the Mehara clinic. Then they were transported by truck or helicopter to the Kodim 1629 in Lospalos. At the Kodim, many were interrogated about the levantamento in Mehara, detained in harsh conditions and tortured. One witness described how he and others were tied together and taken to Lautém Kodim 1629 where they were interrogated and tortured. The methods of torture included beatings and electrocution.[597]

497. On 22 December 1983, four of Gabriel da Costa's friends were taken out of the school and killed in the Trilolo area (Iliomar, Lautém) under orders of Koramil commander T385, Kopassandha senior member T386 [both Indonesian], T255 and the Sub-district administrator of Iliomar, T387 [both East Timorese]. He and two friends were detained there for another year. They were released on an Indonesian national holiday on 28 October, "Youth Oath Day" (Hari Sumpah Pemuda) in 1984.[598]

498. Most of those detained after the mass arrest in Mehara in December were reportedly held for between four and seven months, after which they were returned to their villages. Some were still required to report to the local military command. The Commission received a statement indicating that the Lautém Kodim Commander issued a "an order" (surat perintah) to release prisoners.[599]

Operation Security (Operasi Keamanan) in other districts of Timor-Leste

499. The Commission's research suggests that Operation Keamanan, which followed the uprisings in Viqueque and Lautém, concentrated on the eastern districts of Timor-Leste but also reached into other districts.‡ Among such cases were the following:

* HRVD Statement 9171 says that the detainees were held at the Toko Cina (a shop).

† Americo da Sousa Jerónimo was a Fretilin member who had been detained on 17 October 1983 [see HRVD Statement 3985].

‡ The Commission received no statements from the period August to December 1983 from the districts of Oecussi, Ermera, Bobonaro or Covalima. One statement without a month attributed to it was received from Liquiçá which, like Aileu and Ainaro, involved Nanggala 55 [HRVD Statement 0205]. Nine statements were received from the district of Manufahi from the year 1983 but the deponents did not specify the month that the violation occurred. Two cases described the arbitrary detention and torture of clandestine members [HRVD Statements 5442 and 5467]. Two referred to families detained for harbouring Falintil Commander Mau-Hunu [HRVD Statements 5483 and 5484].

- In the only statement from the district of Ainaro from late 1983, Manuel Agostinho Freitas told the Commission that he was arrested in Ainaro Town on 10 October by the Zumalai Koramil Commander and the East Timorese Sub-district administrator. He was taken to the Ainaro Kodim where he was beaten, kicked and given electric shocks by Commander T377, the commander named in the torture of victims following the Mau Chiga uprising. He was held in the Kodim for one month and then handed over to the Nanggala Kopassandha 55 unit, which held him for three days. He said that his arrest was in response to the killing of an ABRI soldier by Falintil in Nagidal (Zumalai, Covalima).[600]
- The Commission received 11 statements concerning cases of detention in the district of Baucau during August and September 1983.[601] Four statements described a group's detention and disappearance in Uma Ana-Iku, Osso-Ala (Vemasse, Baucau). Six Team Lorico members led by T397 called ten men from the village to the house of the village head of Osso-Ala.[602] There, the Team Lorico members beat and kicked them and tied their hands behind their backs.[603] Alice Andre Gusmão, the wife of one of the detainees, Alexandre Gusmão, said that the ten were detained because they had met Xanana Gusmão in Diuk, a place in Osso-Ala. She was told they were to be taken to the Ostico Post but they never returned (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).[604]
- Five incidents of arbitrary detention were reported from Laleia (Manatuto), though only one statement gave the month in which the violation occurred. Agapito Viegas from Laleia, Manatuto, told the Commission:

  > On 11 November 1983, I was watching my child while my wife was at the market, when suddenly a member of Milsas called T398 turned up. He arrested me and took me to the Laleia Koramil where I met my friend Pascoal who had also been arrested. We were told to wait for a public bus to Manatuto. On arriving there, we were then to report to the Manatuto Kodim. Two Milsas came with us whom I didn't know.
  >
  > When we got there two members of ABRI interrogated me. They asked me what I had done wrong to get arrested. I said that I didn't know so they hit me twice in the back with a stingray and then hit me with a piece of sandalwood, a pretty big piece…Then another member of ABRI called T399 came and said: "Are you strong enough to handle the torture?" I said: "Whether I'm strong enough or not, I have to take it." He didn't like this answer so he hit and kicked me until I fell.[605]

500. Agapito Viegas told the Commission that he was subsequently sent to the Korem in Dili and then to the Kopassandha command where he was so afraid he lied. He said he had given food to Falintil. The torture then ended but he was detained for five months in Dili and made to tidy the grass at public buildings and schools.[606]

Aileu, 1983

501. The ceasefire provided an opportunity for Fretilin/Falintil to approach communities for support, but it also exposed members of the clandestine networks during the "peace contacts" (Kontak Damai) between Fretilin/Falintil and ABRI. The community of Fatisi (Laulara, Aileu) told the Commission that a "peace contact" was held in the village. After the ceasefire broke down, ABRI, Special Forces and various village officers cracked down on the clandestine members in Fatisi.[607] Narrative statements indicated that 19 people were arbitrarily detained in Fatisi in August–September 1983.[*] The victims were suspected of clandestine work,[608] particularly of having helped Falintil commander Sakudi and two others who had been recently captured by Marine Battalion 303 and Nanggala-55.[609]

502. Most arrests were made in an early morning raid on 2 September 1983, although some occurred in late August. The group detained was taken first to a military post in an aldeia in Fatisi, where Luis Mouzinho was beaten and then killed. They were then taken to the clinic in Besilau and handed over to the village head who tied them up with wire. Francisco Pinto de Deus described walking there escorted by Hansip and the Indonesian Babinsa T400, still bloody from being beaten when he was arrested. On 3 September, two soldiers from the Aileu Kodim came and collected the detainees. They were tied up by their hands and feet and driven to the Kodim, then thrown off the trucks like bags of rice. East Timorese soldier T401 and other Kodim members ripped off their clothes with a knife, leaving them naked. From 10.00pm the detainees were taken out one by one for interrogation, during which time they were beaten with a block of wood.

503. The experiences of the detainees from this point were highly varied and attest to a lack of coordination, oversight and discipline within the military. The experiences of the victims included the following:

- According to the statement of Graciano Pinto, his brother, Moises Sarmento, was taken away on 30 August 1983 by Babinsa T400 of Besilau [from Sumatra], an East Timorese ABRI intelligence officer T402, the Laulara Koramil commander and the Sub-district administrator of Laulara. He was not seen again. Graciano Pinto himself reported that he was detained for three years and was released only after the ICRC intervened.[610]
- Alfredo Carvalho was also taken separately to Besilau and then, after several days, was taken to a cemetery by a Kopassandha member to be killed. He said that instead he was taken to Dili by helicopter. That night he was again taken out and told that he would be killed but instead he was taken to the military police and detained. He did not tell the Commission how long he was detained for.[611]

* The victims named to the Commission, compiled from various victims' statements were: Alfredo Carvalho, Romaldo Pereira, Joaquim Henrique, Luis Mouzinho, Mariano de Deus, Agustinho Pereira (also known as Agustinho Martins), Caetano Soares (also known as Caetano José Alves), Crispin dos Santos, Paul Soares, Moises Sarmento, Graciano Pinto, António de Deus, Bernardino Santos, Victor Araújo de Deus, Afonso, Ananias, Serafin and Francisco Pinto de Deus.

- An East Timorese man was beaten heavily then interrogated in Besilau for two days before being taken to the Laulara Koramil (Laulara, Aileu) and interrogated by the commander. The Koramil released him after finding nothing.[612]
- At least five of the prisoners – Crispin Maria dos Santos, João Soares Pereira, Caetano Soares, António de Deus and Afonso – were taken from the Aileu Kodim to Aissirimou where they were kept under close watch by Hansip and not allowed to look for food.[613] António de Deus and Afonso died of hunger.
- The Commission received a statement from an East Timorese man that T801, a Babinsa, forced him to work for a company in Aileu for two months and took his earnings. He was then sent to work with Infantry Battalion 412.[614]

Prisons in Indonesia, 1983 to the late 1990s

From late 1983, the Indonesian administration began to send groups of political detainees to official prisons in Indonesia, often after trials and sentencing. These prisons included:

Cipinang Prison in Jakarta, Java

Two waves of detainees were sent to Cipinang. The first was sent in 1984 in two groups. It included David Dias Ximenes, Mariano Bonaparte Soares, Aquilino Fraga Guterres, Cosme Cabral, Albino de Lourdes, Domingos Seixas, António Mesquita, José Simões, Roberto Seixas, Agapito Rocha, Miguel da Costa, João da Costa, Martinho Pereira, Caetano Guterres and Marito Reis.[615] Domingas da Costa was sent to Tangerang women's prison in West Java.[616] This first group was sent in March–April 1984, and the second, comprising 42 prisoners, in November–December 1984. By 1991, only four prisoners remained. In 1992, they were joined by Domingos Barreto, Virgílio Guterres, João Freitas da Camara, Fernando Araújo (La Sama) and then Xanana Gusmão.[617]

Kedung Pane Semarang Prison in Semarang, Central Java

On 10 June 1994, the six people sentenced in Dili following the Santa Cruz demonstration were moved from Becora Prison to Semarang. They were Filomeno da Silva Ferreira, Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves, Francisco Miranda Branco, Saturnino Belo da Costa, Juvencio de Jesus Martins and Gregório da Cunha Saldanha.

Lowok Waru Prison in Malang, East Java

The only prisoner known by the Commission to have been detained in Malang was José Neves. He was studying in Malang at the time that he was arrested for clandestine activities in 1994.[618]

Kalisosok Prison in Surabaya, East Java

On 27 March 1997, 16 prisoners were transferred from the Buruma Prison outside the town of Baucau (Lembaga Pemasyarakatan) to Kalisosok Prison. They were: João Bosco, Mário Filipe, Marcus Ximenes Belo, Domingos Sarmento, Fortuna Ximenes, Filomeno Freitas, Justino Graciano Freitas, Virgilio Martins, Domingos de Jesus, Domingos de Jesus Freitas, João Freitas, Alexandre Freitas, Muhammad Amin Dagal, Ventura Belo, Marcus Ximenes and Albino Freitas.

Conditions in Indonesia

Penfui Prison, near Kupang, West Timor

António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak) told the Commission that 69 detainees, including himself, were the first group of prisoners to be sent to a prison outside of the territory of Timor-Leste. They were sent to Penfui Prison in Kupang in August 1983, flown there in a Hercules plane in the aftermath of the Kraras uprising. They were held there, without trial, until August 1984 when the ICRC visited the prison and complained about their situation to the authorities. The prisoners were held in appalling conditions. He recalled:

For 14 months we ate only leaves and rice; they gave us one spoonful a day. The grains of rice that fell to the ground we picked up and ate. There were leaves outside. We tore our trousers and made a rope and threw it out to people and said to them in Indonesian, "Please, wherever there are leaves like goats eat, we need them all. Any leftovers that you want to throw away, give to us." They brought us their leftovers in a drum and threw them to us. We used the rope we had made from our trousers to haul papaya leaves inside.[619]

According to António Tomás Amaral da Costa, only 14 of the 69 East Timorese prisoners detained in Kupang survived the ordeal. He names one victim, Duarte Ximenes, who starved to death but he says that the remaining 54 were handcuffed and taken away by military vehicle and they never returned.[620] The 14 who survived were returned to Timor-Leste in 1985.* They were then tried at Benfica[621] and served their sentences in the Comarca and then Becora until they were released in 1987.[622]

Prisons in Java

Later, groups of prisoners who had been tried and sentenced were sent to Indonesia. Former detainees of the Javanese prisons generally reported that conditions were much better there than in the prisons in Timor-Leste. One former detainee was astonished to be given a bed and mattress after he was moved to a prison in Java. That was when he realised that despite the rhetoric he had heard in Timor-Leste about being "one nation", Indonesians "considered [us] second-class citizens… [and] treated us like animals".[623] At Semarang Prison in 1994 there were reportedly no interrogations and the prisoners' sentences were reduced, sometimes by several months each year.

* According to António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), the 14 who survived were: himself, Fernando da Costa, Rogério Pinto, Paul Amaral, Paul Buikarin, José Gularte, Francisco Ximenes, João Bosco, Ernesto Pinto, Henrique Belmeiro, Mariano Soares, Alfredo da Costa, Agusto da Silva and Arthur Kaibada-Waimua. [CAVR Interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004].

Reason for sending prisoners to Indonesia

It is not known why prisoners were transferred out of Timor-Leste but one former inmate mentions that it was because Indonesia needed more space to hold East Timorese detainees.[624] It is also likely that it was a deliberate strategy to separate clandestine leaders from their networks. If this was the case, then the policy was unsuccessful.

Resistance activities in Indonesian prisons

Many East Timorese political prisoners detained in Indonesia were able to continue their activities of resistance to the Indonesian occupation. In some cases imprisonment may even have helped the Resistance to broaden its communication networks. In Cipinang Prison, prisoners were able to rebuild the structures of their clandestine network.[625] Xanana Gusmão explained:

I used João Camara's network, which was already established. Because I had knowledge of the forest and the city networks, I wrote to those inside Timor-Leste that I was still in control of…the struggle…[I was able] to maintain contact with the outside. At the time Ramos-Horta and his special deputy who worked at an NGO and who is now my wife [Kirsty Sword Gusmão] helped…[T]here was internet and e-mail which enabled us to build relations outside through all the existing networks.[626]

According to João Freitas da Camara, it was not difficult for the East Timorese in Cipinang to continue their resistance activities since they had support for their cause from some of the guards. Many of the guards took a liking to Xanana Gusmão and respected him. The prisoners also received help from outside in the form of a typewriter, a laptop computer, a mobile telephone and a video recorder. They paid the guards who would pick up the items and secretly hand them over. In this way they were able to continue producing documents.[627]

Arrests of members of the urban clandestine movement

504. During Operation Clean Sweep there were many arrests in the capital, especially of clandestine leaders. The Commission received at least 35 statements relating to arbitrary detention in Dili between 9 August and the end of December 1983. A further 15 reports did not specify the month of detention. Some leading figures in the clandestine movement were taking considerable risks during this time by approaching foreign visitors and delegations and by trying to inform them about the East Timorese people's predicament. Others were arrested while trying to send information abroad. Some of the cases the Commission identified included:

- Câncio Gama and 17 other members of Falintil were arrested and sent to Kupang (West Timor, Indonesia) after they tried to speak to an Australian parliamentary delegation led by Bill Morrison. Most died from starvation in Kupang.[628]
- Justo dos Santos was arrested in Dili on 25 July 1983, before the end of the ceasefire. He was taken to the Korem commander's house in Farol (Dili). He was kept in a hole, with only his neck outside. He was given a pack of candles that he "lit to shine a light in the hole day and night". After three months in the hole he was taken to the Korem, where he was accused of leading the clandestine movement in Baucau. For several Saturday nights in a row, from October to December 1983, the military took Justo dos Santos to Tacitolu on the outskirts of Dili. He was buried up to his neck in Tacitolu three times over the course of these visits.[629]
- Caetano Guterres was a clandestine member arrested in Dili in September 1983 by Kopassandha, after another detained clandestine member gave the military his name. He was kept incommunicado at the SGI Colmera (Dili) headquarters for three months. He told the Commission that he was interrogated every night, specifically about the plans and activities of the Fretilin Central Committee. The interrogations lasted between four and eight hours a day, closer to ten hours between 7.00pm and 5.00am for the first month.[630] He was then taken to the Comarca and tried. Sentenced to eight years imprisonment, Caetano Guterres was moved to Cipinang where he was held until 1989.[631]
- Marito Reis, a clandestine leader, described how in August 1983 Kopassandha sent him and ten other members of the Dili clandestine network to Bali for interrogation. They were not tortured but received only one meal a day. When they returned in November 1983 they were held in the Comarca where they were given electric shocks during interrogation. Marito Reis was then detained in the SGI headquarters for four months and then in the Kodim for one month before being returned to the Comarca. He was not tortured in either the SGI headquarters or the Kodim. Indeed in the SGI headquarters a captain stopped his men from hitting him saying: "This is a person; this is not an animal." In 1984, Marito Reis was tried and convicted. He was part of a group of political prisoners sent to Cipinang Prison in Jakarta to serve their sentences.
- On another occasion Marito Reis and five other clandestine members were called to the Korem where they were forced to sign a document which stated: "If you continue to do clandestine activities all of you will be shot where you stand."[632]

505. Clearly, the Indonesian military was beginning to recognise the importance of the urban clandestine movement, which was becoming increasingly organised, to the Resistance struggle. Detaining suspected clandestine leaders for long periods of time

(and in some cases killing them) was the main strategy used by the military in response to this development. Apart from those people detained after the Marabia attack in 1980, very few members of the urban clandestine network were sent to the island of Ataúro. Instead, they were tried and sentenced to long periods of imprisonment, often in parts of Indonesia. Their experiences suggest the military had more detailed intelligence and a coordinated and graduated system for dealing with political detainees in Timor-Leste during this period.

506. Caetano Guterres, whom Xanana Gusmão made responsible for smuggling information about Timor-Leste overseas, told the Commission about documents that he had managed to send from Timor-Leste with a journalist who was covering the visit of the Australian parliamentary delegation in July 1983.[633] Among the documents was a counter-insurgency manual prepared by the Indonesian army for its soldiers marked "Secret". Falintil had captured the manual from an Indonesian barracks. The Commission has obtained a document signed by Col. A. Sahala Radjagukguk, then the commanding military officer in East Timor, stating:

> Hopefully, interrogation accompanied by the use of violence will not take place except in certain circumstances when the person being interrogated is having difficulty telling the truth [is evasive]…If it proves necessary to use violence, make sure that there are no people around [TBO, Hansip, Ratih, people]...Avoid taking photographs showing torture in progress [while being given electric shocks, stripped naked, etc].[634]

Arrest and interrogation in Dili late 1983

Aquilino Fraga Guterres (Etu Uko) was a clandestine member involved in sending information about the situation in Timor-Leste abroad. In October 1983, the Dili Kodim found out about his activities and ordered two intelligence officers, Domingos and Carlos, to investigate him. At the time, Aquilino was working as a driver at the Regional Development Bank (Bank Pembangunan Daerah, BPD).

I had no idea that the members of SGI and the director of BPD were about to trap me…[One day] the director told me to bring the car to a service station near the Social Affairs office. After I arrived at the service station it wasn't long before several unidentified members of SGI appeared and said…to me: "The director wants you and us [SGI] to pick up a guest at the airport...." [W]hen I was in their car I was taken around Balide, [to the] Korem until we reached the SGI [headquarters in] Colmera.

At the SGI headquarters Kopassus members interrogated Aquilino. He was detained for one year and during his time in detention suffered beatings and electrocution:

First they destroyed me physically. For example in the matter of food, it wasn't a usual [amount] but was small portions for one year. I underwent a difficult time. I was also interrogated: "How many times did you meet with Falintil? What kind of support did you give to Falintil?" During the interrogation I was beaten with weapons, my feet were pinned under a chair, I was electrocuted. I felt like I was dying. They tied my body with ropes and my eyes were blindfolded with a cloth. Then I was thrown into a car and I didn't know where I was taken. I could only feel [where I was] and listen. For four hours I was taken around the city of Dili. After they were satisfied and tired, I was brought back to SGI Colmera.

After this, he was moved to the Comarca in Balide, where he was left without clothes. He was detained along with about 20 to 30 people in one cell. When they wanted to interrogate him, he was taken back to the SGI Colmera headquarters and then returned to the Comarca after the interrogation. Aquilino explains that during interrogation, officers simply wanted a confession:

During interrogation they didn't want to know about what I had done wrong. Instead Kopassus invented mistakes and forced us to admit to them. For example, that we sent ammunition, supermi [instant noodles], batteries [to the Resistance fighters]. They said: "If you admit it then you will be tried and then soon you will get out." That was against my conscience so I didn't do what they wanted. They were using the system: whoever succeeded in killing or torturing people would get a promotion in rank or a bonus.[635]

Arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment in 1984

507. The Commission's research suggests that 1984 was the beginning of a decline in arbitrary detentions, torture and ill-treatment, marking the beginning of the period of relative "normalisation" or "consolidation" (1985–1998).

508. Nevertheless, the year started with a military operation in the sub-district of Zumalai (Covalima). A number of people were arrested and some died in detention. After a deadly attack by Falintil on Indonesian military personnel in the sub-district of Zumalai in late 1983,* Indonesian military personnel from the district of Bobonaro

* Olandino Guterres told the Commission that the attack occurred on 7 December 1983 (the anniversary of the Indonesian invasion of Dili) and that Falintil killed seven members of Infantry Battalion 407 in Pelet, Lour (Bobonaro, Bobonaro). Infantry Battalion 407 was on patrol, when it was ambushed by Falintil. The Commission has not been able to confirm this account but notes that the three statements received from victims of arbitrary detention around Pelet give dates of their arrests between March and July 1984. Two of these statements were from the wives of victims who had been killed at the Koramil Zumalai. The reason they gave for the arrests was that their husbands had hidden a Fretilin flag.

arrested people in both Bobonaro Sub-district and the neighbouring sub-district of Zumalai (Covalima) and possibly as far as the district of Ainaro. Some detainees were held at the Bobonaro Koramil,[636] some at the Zumalai Koramil.[637] Both men and women were arrested arbitrarily, sometimes merely because their names were similar to the names of people whom the military suspected of aiding the Resistance.[638]

509. Armando dos Santos, one of those detained, estimates that 100 people were held in the Bobonaro Koramil with him. The Commission identified at least 15 people detained from around Zumalai and Bobonaro Sub-districts through its statement-taking process.* Another witness provided the Commission with a list of 45 people who were detained and then killed in the operation.[639] Six victims were arrested in the village of Carabau (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) in February 1984 in relation to the attack. Information provided to the military by other members of the community that they were members of Fretilin or had contact with Fretilin/Falintil resulted in the arrests.† Clearly, the military had conducted an investigation following the attack in late 1983 to identify all Fretilin and clandestine members in the area, before making arrests. Arrest of actual or suspected Fretilin members in the sub-districts of Bobonaro and Zumalai continued until August 1984.[640] Dinis de Araújo told the Commission:

> One day my child was sick and I was looking after her. All of a sudden, ABRI brought four people to the front of my house, all tied up. I saw that most of them had been burnt. Like barbecued sweet potato, they were covered with black and dark [marks] on their bodies and faces. My hair stood on end and I was filled with fear. But they didn't do anything to me. They just walked in front of my house. They probably already had my name. After one month, a Hansip from Bobonaro came to my house and arrested me.[641]

510. All detainees identified by the Commission reported torture and ill-treatment. Miguel dos Santos was arrested in Hauba (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) on 7 February 1984 by Infantry Battalion 407 and brought to the Carabau village office before being taken to the Bobonaro Koramil:

> Battalion 407 started the interrogation. They said to me: "You were with GPK/Falintil, shooting soldiers in Fatuleto/Zumalai." An East Timorese man, T403, the former village head of Oeleu, along with TNI, started beating, punching, kicking and burning me with cigarette butts. My body was hurt all over and my face was swollen. Blood ran from my nose, mouth and eyes.[642]

* They are: Armindo Franquelin, Alarico Sena, Francisco Talo Mau, António Gomes, Afonso da Cruz, Manuel Freitas, Matias, Miguel dos Santos, José Noronha, Rozito dos Santos, Carlos Magno, José Cardoso, Agapito Moniz and Belarmino dos Santos.

† For example, Antonio Gomes told the Commission that he was arrested by Infantry Battalion 407, Nanggala members and members of the Bobonaro Koramil based on "information" from five people from the village. [T404, T405, T406, T407, T408. HRVD Statement 5156.]

511. Prisoners were sometimes forced to strip naked while being interrogated about the killing of the Indonesian soldiers. The Commission also received reports that prisoners were threatened with being doused with oil and burned alive. They were deprived of food for up to a week. Kopassandha officers, most likely from Chandraca 11, were involved in many of these beatings, although Hansip sometimes participated under the orders of Kopassandha officers. The Commission has determined that at least three prisoners were killed while in detention, although it is likely that there were many more (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). Those prisoners who survived were moved from their homes in the mountains of Bobonaro to a newly constructed area called Halecou in the village of Ritabou (Maliana, Bobonaro) in May 1984.[643]

512. In other cases of arbitrary detention in 1984, the victims were arrested on suspicion of giving material assistance to Falintil, being in contact with Falintil leaders, having knowledge of preparations for a Falintil attack, or having family members in the forest.[644] One deponent, Sama Leto, said that he was arrested by Infantry Battalion 412 and Kopassandha 55 both because they found a photograph of his younger brother who was still in the forest, and because he was the village head but refused to supply women to the military. He told the Commission:

> I was arrested and taken to Tokoluli to dig a hole and then I was to be killed. But it didn't happen and I was taken back home. Two days later I was called back again. I was beaten until all of my teeth were broken. I was bleeding and my face was swollen. I was taken to Liquiçá where I was detained with my friend Domingos [for two weeks]. I was detained then taken to Bazartete [Liquiçá] for one day and then released because I donated a goat for the leaving party of Infantry Battalion 412 and Kopassandha 55.[645]

513. Some people were unfortunate enough to be caught in a Falintil attack, after which the Indonesian army suspected them of having cooperated with the attackers. Adriana Soares described how Falintil robbed a kiosk owned by her older brother, Manuel Gaspar, in Uaitame (Uatolari, Viqueque) in April 1984. She said that someone in her village reported her and Manuel to the commander of Chandraca 7 (Kopassandha) and they were arrested. Adriana was interrogated and tortured with another young woman, Angelina. She told the Commission:

> Angelina and I were put into a room and then our clothes were torn off until we were naked and then we were told to sit on chairs and were interrogated: "Say you were both in contact with Falintil, ok! You met Xanana and Commander Rosito!" Then that Nanggala member stood and hit me until I fell and…said again: "Xanana and Commander Rosito screwed the two of you!" We stayed silent. Then they burned Angelina and I with a cigarette on our bodies and thighs, but they didn't rape us. In May, ABRI came at 5.00am and took 18 men detained there in a Hino truck. Their families still do not know where they are.[646]

Detentions and torture by the Indonesian occupation authorities, 1985–1998

Introduction

514. During the 14-year period 1985 to 1998, known as the period of "normalisation and consolidation", Timor-Leste purportedly became just another province of Indonesia and was opened up to the outside world.[647] The Commission's research indicates that arbitrary detention, ill-treatment and torture of civilians was at lower levels than in the period 1975 to 1983, nevertheless they occurred in every year of this period.

515. Significant political shifts and changes in both the nature of the occupation and the nature of the resistance took place from 1985 to 1998. In 1987 Falintil split from the Fretilin party to become a non-partisan armed resistance (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict, and Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy). Isolated from the outside world, they became increasingly reliant on the clandestine front for survival and for most resistance activity. While regional armed clashes by the Resistance with the support of clandestine networks characterised the earlier periods, by the late 1980s the resistance occurred mainly in towns and cities, through demonstrations and other forms of political activism. A new generation of youth activists became the leaders of the urban clandestine movements. They continued to be directed by Falintil leaders in the forest (see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy).

516. Although Resistance figures were still detained and the use of torture in detention actually increased, the Indonesian military became less visible as the perpetrators of these violations. Police took over increasing responsibility for security in the territory. Members of Falintil and clandestine network members who were arrested were eventually charged and put on trial (see Vol. III, Part 7.6 Political Trials). In the early 1990s, the military established local paramilitaries and youth militias who were responsible for many violations. The politicisation of Resistance and pro-Indonesian youth led to outbreaks of civil unrest around religious and ethnic issues. These tensions resulted on a number of occasions in violent skirmishes between East Timorese youth and members of Indonesian security apparatus (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict).

517. Earlier established patterns persisted. The hunt for members of the armed Resistance and the clandestine movement continued. Those caught were arrested and arbitrarily detained, and suffered torture and other forms of cruel and inhuman treatment. Armed Resistance attacks on military or civilian targets also continued, although on a smaller scale than the early 1980s. As in the early 1980s, however, the civilian population suffered widespread violations in the aftermath of the attacks. Torture remained a common experience during interrogation, and conditions of imprisonment were also often harsh. The numbers of detentions and incidence of torture and ill-treatment remained quite stable in this long and complex period. This section has been structured according to the broad reasons for detention rather than chronologically. The criteria included:

- Involvement in, or contact with, the clandestine movement or the armed Resistance

- Involvement in public demonstrations against the occupying power
- Religious matters and other conflicts
- Detentions in the course of searching for Falintil members
- Resistance attacks on Indonesian military or civilian targets.

Profile of violations

518. The period of "normalisation and consolidation" of the Indonesian occupation between 1985 and 1998 is hallmarked by substantially different patterns of arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment compared with the other periods (namely the periods 1974-79, 1980-84 and the later period around the time of the UN Popular Consultation in 1999). In particular, the overall level of violence was lower between 1985 and 1998 than during the other periods. This hypothesis is supported by the Commission's quantitative findings. Consideration of the overall magnitude of documented violations reveals that although the period spans 53.8% (14/26) of the years under the Commission's mandate, only 23.8% (6,039/25,383) of the detentions, 30.5% (3,393/11,135) of tortures and 27.1% (2,292/8,443) of ill treatments reported to the Commission occurred during the period.

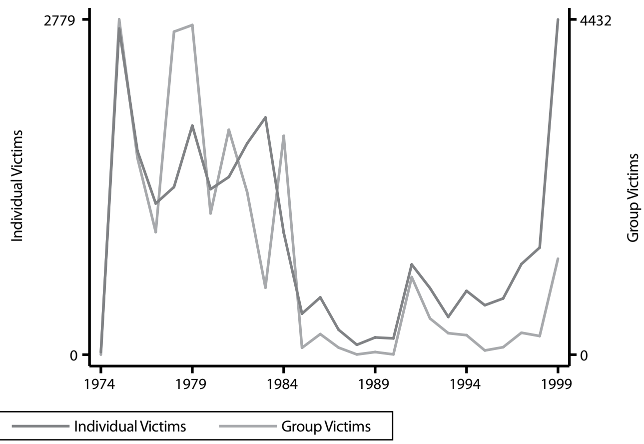
519. Further evidence of this can be seen by looking at the daily violation rate. For detention, torture and ill-treatment, the violation rates on a daily basis were substantially lower during this period than in other periods, as can be seen in the table below. For example, the documented daily detention rate by the Commission for 1999 was more than 7.9 times higher in 1999 and 3.8 times higher in the initial invasion years than during the "normalisation and consolidation phase".

Table 7: Daily violation rates for reported detentions, torture and ill-treatment by phase, 1974–1999

Period	Detentions	Tortures	Ill-Treatments	Total
1974	0.1	0.1	0	0.2
1975–1984	4.5	1.5	1.1	7.1
1985–1998	1.2	0.7	0.5	2.3
1999	9.3	7.5	7	23.8
Mandate Years	2.7	1.2	0.9	4.8

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR (HRVD)

Violations over space



520. Apart from the Santa Cruz Massacre and its aftermath in 1991 in Dili and surrounding regions, reported violence during the "consolidation years" from 1985 through to 1998 took the form of sporadic low-level violence in all three regions. The Commission documented relatively similar levels of detentions, tortures and ill-treatments during the "normalisation and consolidation" phase in the western and eastern regions and a slightly higher level in the central region during this period. This appears consistent with the fact that the major detention centres of the Indonesian military were in Dili.

Detention and torture

521. During the period 1985-98, individual victims were detained consistently more often than group victims, as can be seen in the table below. This is consistent with the hypothesis that the detention practices of the Indonesian authorities shifted from a focus on both individuals and groups in the early occupation years of 1977–1984 to a more targeted strategy aimed at individuals from 1985 to 1999. It also reflects the end of the mass displacements of civilians to internment camps such as Ataúro early in this period.

Violations over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

522. The more targeted nature of violence by the Indonesian military is supported by the Commission's statistical evidence: the correlation coefficient between documented detentions and tortures attributed to the Indonesian military during the "normalisation and consolidation phase" was 0.97. In particular, as shown in the table below, the relative rate of tortures per detention increases substantially over the three phases of the conflict: from 0.29 in the early invasion years, to 0.52 in the "normalisation and consolidation" years to 0.69 during 1999.

Table 8: Ratio of reported tortures per detention attributed to the Indonesian military and police by phase, 1974–1999
Period	Detentions	Tortures	Ratio of Detentions to Tortures
1975–1984	10,867	3,237	3.4
1985–1998	5,465	2,921	1.9
1999	1,417	972	1.5
Total	17,749	7,130	2.5

Perpetrator affiliation

523. The institutions attributed with responsibility for detention and torture by victims also changed in this phase. The involvement of civilian defence (Hansip) drops markedly in 1984 following the Hansip-led uprisings in 1983, and falls further in 1985. The number of cases of detention involving police also falls from earlier levels between 1985 and 1990, but from 1991 police involvement increases until they are one of the main institutions making arrests. The Indonesian military remained the most frequently named perpetrator in documented cases throughout the period.

Detention of clandestine members

524. By 1985, the Indonesian authorities were convinced that Operation Unity (Operasi Persatuan) had largely destroyed the clandestine networks that sustained the Falintil armed Resistance, and that Falintil numbers were dwindling. The armed Resistance was also taking a more cautious approach to the struggle. The strategy of the Resistance shifted during the 1980s to the point where armed conflict was secondary to the international diplomatic struggle, and generally did not seek large scale direct confrontation with the Indonesian military (see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy). Nevertheless, the clandestine networks were becoming more organised and many were placed under the control of a central structure in 1986, the Inter-regional Coordination Organisation (Organização Coordinadora Inter-Regional, or OCR).* They also began targeting schools and youth groups for membership. This process of organisation and centralisation continued in the 1990s. The leaders of these networks were a prime target for the Indonesian military.

525. One hallmark of the phase was that the clandestine movement was increasingly led by youth and youth organisations. They carried out open political protests against the occupying power which are considered below. Detention and interrogation of actual or suspected clandestine members not involved in demonstrations continued throughout the period in all districts of Timor-Leste, including Dili. The Commission received over 500 reports of detention, ill-treatment or torture of clandestine members in this period. Clandestine detainees often experienced torture and ill-treatment at the time of arrest or while in detention.

* According to Vasco da Gama, António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak) and Paulo Assis Belo were active in this body. It was operative until 1988. [CAVR Interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May2004.]

1985 to 1998

526. In this period, Timor-Leste was still closed to the outside world. Communities were tightly controlled through extensive community intelligence networks and the pervasive presence of the occupying forces down to the neighbourhood level. Neighbours informed on neighbours. The military and police acted with impunity and with a free rein to treat suspected clandestine members as they chose (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict).

527. In one case, the Commission heard of Special Forces (Kopassandha) in the district of Lautém detaining minors on 23 May 1985 and subjecting them to torture and ill-treatment. Armindo Nunes (17) described how he and two friends, Agusto da Silva (18) and Amelio Nunes (17), all clandestine members, were arrested at their high school in Lospalos (Lautém). They were taken to the Kopassandha headquarters where they were detained, beaten, slapped and kicked. All three were then taken to the Lospalos Kodim where they were held with a Fretilin member, Domingos Savio, who had been shot and wounded. After two days and nights in the Kodim, Airborne Infantry Battalion 700 forces came and tortured the three youths. Armindo Nunes told the Commission:

> That night they [Airborne Infantry Battalion 700] came and beat us by punching us in the head and kicking us in the knees. This happened every night for seven days. They just beat us; they didn't say a single word. Then in the morning we had water poured on us and were just left there saturated. After seven days I was called by a member of Kopassandha and he placed a table leg on my toes and then he sat on the table. A member of Team Alfa came in and said we would be killed if we didn't give up on achieving independence. I was interrogated four times during my time in detention and every time I was beaten in the same way, by being punched in the head. My head began to feel heavy and I couldn't answer their questions.[648]

528. For seven days the detainees weren't given any food and, unable to stand the hunger, they ate banana skins that had been thrown away. Amelio Nunes was released but new detainees arrived at the Kodim including Victor, José, Angelo, Martino and Manuel Xisto. They were all beaten regularly. In August, Armindo Nunes was moved to the District police headquarters for one month. On 14 September 1985, he was taken by helicopter with five others to the Balide Prison in Dili for investigation where he was kept naked in a dark cell for around 15 days and where he slept on the floor. He was finally tried five months later and sentenced to one year and ten months imprisonment.[649]

529. Other examples of arbitrary detention from the early part of the period include:

Table 9: Examples of arbitrary detention, 1985–1998

Name	District	Arrest	Reason for Arrest	Detention	Torture/Ill-treatment
Moises de Jesus dan Domingos[650]	Ainaro	25 January 1985 by Hansip T409 and T410, a member of Kopassus.	Suspected of seizing rifles from Koramil and of giving them to Falintil.	Held in Ainaro Koramil for two days.	Continuously beaten.
Ildefonso Piedade Belo[651]	Baucau	17 September 1985 by Infantry Battalion 724 Commander T411.	Suspected of knowing where Falintil rifles were stored.	Detained in the Flamboyan Hotel in Baucau, interrogated by Indonesian ABRI Commander T412 for two days and two nights.	Beaten, electrocuted, burned with cigarette butts, submerged naked into a water tank several times by Indonesian ABRI Commander T413.
António de Araújo Soares[652]	Makadade, Dili	1985 by Rukun Warga.	Community ordered to pull a boat along the coast. Victim did not join in, so was accused of supporting Fretilin.	Taken to the home of the village head.	No torture reported
Raimundo da Cruz[653]	Viqueque	1985 by an Indonesian Kopassus commander named T414.	A neighbour lost a cow and accused deponent of stealing it to give to Falintil.	Held for three months.	Beaten, punched and kicked.
Herculano dos Santos[654]	Hatolia, Ermera	April 1986 by the section head of village society development (Kasi PMD) T415.	Went to bank to take out money to pay staff but suspected of giving money to Falintil.	Held for one day in the Hatolia police station.	Choked, strangled and stepped on by T415 and then kicked by T416. At station, handcuffed and submerged in water for three hours.
Eugenio de Jesus[655]	Hera-Lebos, Dili	By troops from Infantry Battalion 723	Identity card found to be torn during check.	Held for one week in the Dili Kodim.	No torture reported

530. During this period, political detainees who had been sent to the island of Ataúro in the early 1980s began to return.[656] While some were completely free after their release, others continued to be monitored in their villages, or held in temporary detention or resettlement camps, such as those in Cailaco or Bonuk (Hato Udo, Ainaro) (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

Prisons in Timor-Leste

By the early 1980s the Comarca in Dili, the only official prison in Timor-Leste, was severely overcrowded. Military operations had resulted in large numbers of people being detained. From 1983 more prisoners were being put on trial and sentenced to long periods of imprisonment, for which they needed accommodation.[657] Some political prisoners were being sent to prisons in Indonesia, but there was still a need for more prison space in Timor-Leste. Accordingly, in 1985, Becora Prison in eastern Dili opened. It was followed by Buruma Prison in the district of Baucau in 1986-87 and then prisons in Maliana (Bobonaro) and Gleno (Ermera).*

These prisons were run by civilian officals under the Department of Justice. They held both prisoners awaiting trial, and those who had been convicted and sentenced. In general, conditions in state-run prisons were better than in the numerous informal detention centres, military commands and other police and military institutions where political prisoners were held.

Torture and ill-treatment

Torture and ill-treatment in these institutions were less frequent than in other detention centres. No reports of torture were received from detainees in the Maliana and Gleno prisons, although several former detainees of Becora Prison reported serious ill-treatment by prison guards.† Torture was reported to have occurred at Buruma. Januari Freitas Ximenes, who worked as a guard at Buruma Prison from 1990 to 1999, told the Commission that he saw people being tortured during interrogation by the police. One man was tortured "for 40 days in a cell until he was battered and powerless." The police forced prison officials to participate in beating detainees. He said: "I was forced and threatened at gunpoint [to slap a prisoner], and if I didn't do it they would kill me."[658] Mário Filipe reported that he was tortured constantly at Buruma by Brimob.[659]

* Due to the destruction of Indonesian government records in Timor-Leste, the Commission has not been able to determine when the Maliana and Gleno prisons were first opened. However, statements received by the Commission describe detention in these institutions suggesting a date around 1990.

† For example, Manuel Pereira told the Commission that he was detained in Becora Prison for six months in 1987, during which time he was left in the sun for extended periods and on one occasion was forced to drag a car tyre which was tied around his neck, along with other prisoners. [HRVD Statement 0928. See also HRVD Statements 0185, 3729 and 5079. Cases of torture and ill-treatment in LP Baucau include HRVD Statement 7817.]

Dark cells

All prisons had "dark cells" (sometimes described as "special cells") in which detainees were deprived of light and fresh air. They were used for newly arrived prisoners, for punishment or for solitary confinement.[660] Some dark cells in Buruma Prison had a toilet and bath facilities and a mat to sleep on. Dark cells in Gleno Prison had a wash-basin and toilet. The Commission heard that several detainees were held in dark cells for excessive periods, amounting to cruel and degrading treatment. Octavio da Conceição spoke of his psychological suffering after being held for three months in a dark cell in Becora Prison.[661] Eduardo Lopes (Lorico Lopes), arrested in 1995, spent four years in Maliana Prison without seeing daylight.[662]

Sanitation and hygiene in state-run prisons were below the standard required for the humane treatment of detainees in accordance with the Geneva Conventions, and conditions did not appear to improve over time. Mário Filipe said about conditions in Buruma in 1997: "There was a toilet in the cell, but no water so there was a constant strong smell of faeces and urine."* Conditions at Maliana Prison were no better. In the late 1990s, hygiene in the smelly, dirty cells was poor, especially since prisoners had to eat, wash, use the toilet and sleep without a mattress all in the same room.[663] Former prisoners held in Timor-Leste consistently report they had to sleep on cement floors, often without mats and sometimes the floors were damp.

Sanitation was often mentioned to the Commission in conjunction with other human rights abuses. José da Costa Ximenes, detained in 1994 at the Buruma Prison in Baucau, was separated from others arrested at the same time. When he protested, the Indonesian prison governor, T419, called him a bastard and had him thrown naked into a dark cell for ten days:

I was fed only porridge and dry rice. The dark cell had a toilet on the floor not far from where I slept, so I had to be careful not to spill any water when I washed myself, otherwise the floor would be wet. The cell was very small and I could not move.[664]

Once prisoners were sentenced and convicted they were generally treated better than those on remand. They were usually moved from dark cells to the common room. They were no longer interrogated and they could move more freely around the prison. However, prison guards often treated political prisoners and ordinary prisoners differently. Felismina da Conceição said of the Becora Prison in 1992:

* Mário Filipe was held for two months at Buruma Prison, Baucau in 1997, then moved to Kalisosok Prison, Surabaya, East Java. During the last three months before the Popular Consultation in 1999 he was held at the Semarang Prison, Central Java. [CAVR Interview with Mário Filipe, Baucau, 3 September 2004.]

They paid more attention to the criminal prisoners than to us [political prisoners]. When the regular prisoners became ill they could be taken to a hospital, but when we became ill we were only treated in our cells.[665]

Julio Araújo Martins, detained in Gleno Prison, said the movement of political prisoners within the prison was restricted:

I was not free to [talk to] other prisoners…Because I was a political prisoner they suspected I would influence [them], so I was kept alone in a cell."[666]

This sort of isolation was experienced by the six imprisoned in Becora following their conviction for involvement in the demonstration at Santa Cruz in 1991:

Those of us [they called] hard-headed were separated. So the six of us stayed alone in one block. The door was locked and we were not allowed any contact with the others for more than two years. We did some gardening and played ping-pong there.[667]

Sometimes prisoners could leave prison grounds but this does not seem to have been the norm for political prisoners. Felismina de Conceição said that guards at Becora Prison would escort a regular (criminal) prisoner to a family gathering such as a funeral or party, but not political prisoners.[668] David da Conceição Thon, one of those detained in Becora after the Santa Cruz Massacre, explained that after two to three months of detention he was allowed outside the building to get fresh air as well as to go to church. Eventually he was also able to pay some guards to let him go home for the night and return to prison the next morning.[669]

1989 to 1998

531. Even after Timor-Leste was "normalised" and opened to the outside world in 1989, the detention of clandestine members continued.

532. Sometimes a captured clandestine member provided the military or police with information that led to numerous other arrests. For example in Liquiçá in November 1990, after the capture of CNRM leaders including Amadeo Dias dos Santos and Agustinho dos Santos,* a major part of the clandestine network was exposed.[670] Arrests were made in villages such as Loidahar, Luculai and Darulete (all in Liquiçá, Liquiçá).[671] In Loidahar the village head, T420, arrested several people, sometimes accompanied by a Babinsa, T421.† He then handed detainees to the SGI or the Liquiçá Koramil, where they were interrogated and tortured.[672] Most were held for between ten days and two weeks. One man, António Hatoli, had distributed Fretilin flags, while António Alves was found in possession of a flag.[673]

* The village head of Darulete (Liquiçá, Liquiçá), who was subsequently fired.

† See HRVD Statement 2989. Other village heads in the district of Liquiçá involved in arresting people or threatening them at the end of 1990 were T426 (Leorem Village) [HRVD Statement 2177] and T427 (Bazartete Town, Bazartete) [HRVD Statement 0956].

533. The following statement, describing an arrest in November 1990 in Liquiçá, illustrates the practice of handing a prisoner from one arm of the security apparatus to another for ongoing interrogations:

> At 10.00am on 10 November 1990, an East Timorese soldier from the Liquiçá Kodim, T422, and [members of] the SGI arrested me at the residence of the Liquiçá parish priest. They took me to the Liquiçá Kodim for interrogation. During interrogation, they kicked me until I fell to the floor. Then they stepped on me and hit my back with a rock until I was flat on my back and lost consciousness. Then the head of the intelligence section at the Liquiçá Kodim, an Indonesian called T423, crushed my toes under a leg of a table leg while another soldier sat on [the table]. As the interrogation went on they hit me with a rock until, for the second time, I lost consciousness.
>
> When I woke up, a police officer hand-cuffed me and took me to the Liquiçá Sub-district police headquarters. They treated my wounds there with a compress, betadine and herbs. Then they stripped me and put me in a cell. At 5.00pm Gadapaksi[674] and SGI from Dili came and took me to SGI headquarters in Colmera Dili. There, an [East Timorese member of] SGI, T424, punched my face until I fell to the floor. I got up slowly and the SGI interrogated me. They beat, kicked and slapped me until my body was swollen.
>
> Then they transferred me to Kolakops Farol [SGI Investigation Office]. There, a member of SGI, T425, stripped my clothes off piece by piece, tied me to a chair and electrocuted me, at both the tips of my feet and in my ears.[675]

Detention of a clandestine leader

The clandestine network in Ossu (Ossu, Viqueque) was particularly strong in the late 1980s and 1990s. It was led by José da Silva Amaral (Asuloko). He and his colleagues gave food, clothes, medicine and intelligence on military activities to the Resistance. José described how the network gradually extended its operations from the town of Ossu to the entire sub-district so that eventually the whole community, including women and children, were involved in clandestine activities.

José da Silva Amaral told the Commission that on 17 July 1991 he was arrested by an Indonesian member of Kopassus, T428. T428 took José Amaral to a house owned by a member of the local assembly, T429, which was used at the time to detain and torture people, and interrogated him.

When José Amaral refused to answer questions he was ordered to take off his clothes and T428 and his East Timorese colleague, T430, put him into a tank filled with water and ice cubes and left him for three hours. Then T430 took a scoop and poured the ice water over José Amaral's head. José Amaral could no longer stand the cold. He shouted that they should just kill him and said to T428 that if he was taken out he would tell the truth. T428 continued the interrogation and José Amaral gave the names of some friends whom he knew had already been arrested, such as Mário Miranda and Fernando Nahabia. T428 was not satisfied with this information and he pulled out a gun and hit José Amaral across the hands until they bled. José Amaral wiped the blood on his trousers, intending to show it to the ICRC later, but T428 saw the blood and ordered somebody to clean and wash the trousers. After this, his moustache hairs were plucked out and he was beaten and kicked until he lost consciousness. He was held in T429's house for one month and then in the Kotis for two months.

After José Amaral was released members of the Viqueque Koramil came and arrested him at his home. T428 reappeared and took him to the base camp in Manatuto. While tied up, he was put into a box that was loaded onto a helicopter and taken to Manehat (Barique, Natarbora, Viqueque). After two months José Amaral was moved again to the Rumah Merah in Baucau, where he was held with Alberto Espirito Santo, José Manuel, Filomeno, and the nurse Victor Viegas. T431 interrogated him. He was stripped of his clothes and beaten by T428 with a 1-metre long iron rod. This interrogation continued from 9.00am to 3.00pm. José Amaral was detained in the Rumah Merah in Baucau for one year, and eventually released without trial.[676]

534. Sometimes whole villages suspected of being part of the clandestine network were arrested by the military:

- In the villages of Soro and Suro-Kraic (Ainaro, Ainaro), 40 people were reportedly arrested in October 1990 after clandestine documents were found implicating the villages in clandestine activities. Most of the detainees were released after interrogation but some were held for several weeks.[677]
- In the villages of Tutuluro and Babulu (Same, Manufahi) in November 1992, at least 40 clandestine members were arrested by police.[678] T432, under orders of police village guidance officer (Binpolda) T433, called them into the village meeting hall. They were questioned about sending goods to the forest. The police then handed the group to the Indonesian head of intelligence, T434, at the Manufahi Kodim. He took the group to the base camp in Same. At the base camp the detainees were made to sit against the wall and were then beaten and kicked. After the beating, they were ordered to cut grass until evening. All but six of them were then released. The six, Raul da Costa, Anteiro, Paulo da Costa, Marito da Costa, Benigno and Hilario became "outside detainees" for 18 months.[679]

- On 15 January 1995, Liquiçá Kodim 1638 launched an operation in Gariana Village (Vatuvuo, Maubara, Liquiçá) because the villagers were suspected of hiding members of Falintil.[680] They arrested residents of Gariana, including the village head, José Nunes, Abel Nunes, Victor, Agusto Pinto, Joanico Sampanho, Fernando Pinto Nunes and Filomeno.[681] All six men were eventually shot and killed (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). Before their deaths, they were taken to the Karbaudabas Post and interrogated overnight. Four of the men were tortured by being hung from the neck until they fell unconscious, by an East Timorese officer T435 and a TNI private T436.[*] Another victim, Mário da Silva, was not killed but was interrogated by First Lieutenant T437.[†] During interrogation, another East Timorese soldier, T438, cut off his toe with the leg of a table, stomped on him with military boots and beat him with a rifle.[682] According to the community of Vatuboro (Maubara, Liquiçá), following the incident in Gariana ABRI and its auxiliaries began to suspect youths from around the district of Liquiçá of working with Falintil.[683]
- In Uatolari (Viqueque) in 1998, the Indonesian commander of the Uatolari Koramil, T439, and his men arrested 100 residents for belonging to the pro-independence group 55 (read Cinco Cinco or Five Five). After their arrest they were tied up, kicked, stabbed with a rifle and taken to the Uatolari Koramil. They were then taken to the Viqueque Kodim where they were held for three months. They were interrogated while tied up with cable. They were also forced to stand to attention facing the Indonesian flag every day. After their release they had to report twice a week.[684] As well as arrests in rural areas, members of the clandestine movement in Dili were also arrested. In one case the Commission heard of three youths, Alexandre dos Santos, his brother[‡] João Xavier and Mariano da Costa, who were arrested in October 1990 because the authorities believed that they were planning to burn the house of Jaime Oliveira, a Sub-district administrator. Members of the police, military and intelligence chased the youths from the Dili suburb of Fatuhada to Hudi Laran in Dili, shooting at them. When they were caught, they were beaten with motorcycle chains and metal pipes. They were taken to local police stations and interrogated, after which they were taken to a clinic to attend to their wounds. After three days in the Sub-district police headquarters, they were taken to Becora Prison for 17 days.[685]

* They were eventually shot by the same perpetrators. [HRVD Statement 3004.]

† T436 and T437 were convicted by a military tribunal for disobeying the orders of a superior, ordering another person to commit murder and making a false report to their superiors [Amnesty International Indonesia and East Timor: Twenty years of violations. Statement before the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonisation, 11 July 1995 Amnesty International Index: ASA 21/33/95].

‡ In East Timorese society, someone described as "brother" could mean a cousin, nephew, a member of the extended family, or a good friend or colleague.

Clandestine arrests in Dili

Chiquito da Costa Guterres started working as an estafeta from 1994, bringing important documents for the Resistance from Dili to Manatuto. He was arrested on 21 February 1996 by police intelligence at the Juwita photoshop in Colmera where he was developing pictures for Falintil. He was put into a taxi and taken to the traffic police station where he was questioned for a few hours about who his leaders were and who had ordered him to develop the photographs. He was beaten and given electric shocks by the police. The police moved him to the Sub-district police station at the Old Market, where he was interrogated. His eyes were covered with cloth and his clothes were stripped. He was beaten by police intelligence officers. He was forced to sign a letter which falsely recorded his answers under interrogation. After two days he was moved to the District police station where members of the SGI and intelligence police interrogated him. His toes were crushed under a chair with someone seated on it. He lost consciousness, and was later put in a "dark cell".

At night the intelligence police took him out of his cell to Tacitolu, on the outskirts of Dili:

They [police intelligence] kept me standing in the water while waves wet my legs and they fired their guns. I did not know what they were aiming at. Then, they dragged me to a tree full of thorns and I stepped on these thorns. They tied me to the tree and fired their guns. It was a psychological threat to force me to tell the truth.

After a month in the Regional police headquarters, Chiquito was moved again to SGI Colmera, where he was held for one week. He was not physically harmed there, but was still threatened with torture. When asked why he was constantly moved around to different detention places, Chiquito explained:

They transferred me from the traffic police to Sub-district police headquarters because it was not a place of detention and there is no guarantee that detainees would not escape. Then they moved me from Sub-district police headquarters to Regional police headquarters because Sub-district police headquarters could not accommodate long-term detainees and there was also no guarantee that the detainees would not escape. Then they handed me over to SGI in Colmera because, first of all, they had no concrete evidence to take me to court. Second, they thought SGI in Colmera would be tougher. They tortured me to get concrete evidence. Third, they could prolong the torture so that I would reveal my clandestine friends' identities as well as my friends in the Resistance in the mountains. In fact the SGI did not physically torture me. Instead, they used psychological torture.[686]

The arrest of clandestine members in Indonesia

535. In the 1980s, many East Timorese people started living, working and studying in Indonesia and by the late 1980s active clandestine groups had been established in Indonesian cities. Those involved in clandestine activity in Indonesia were at risk of arrest and detention by the Indonesian authorities. The Commission received reports of the arrest and ill-treatment of East Timorese people suspected of clandestine activity in the Javanese cities of Bandung,[687] Semarang, Solo, Surabaya, Jakarta,[688] Malang, Yogyakarta[689] and Denpasar, Bali.[690]

536. In one case, José Neves was arrested at the Malang Central Post Office on 18 May 1994 while trying to send documents detailing human rights abuses in Timor-Leste abroad to a solidarity group in Germany. The customs officers opened the documents and, seeing Xanana Gusmão's name, realised that they related to the resistance in Timor-Leste. Within 30 minutes two people from the Prosecutor's Office and plain-clothes intelligence officers arrived and arrested José Neves. He was taken to the police station in Malang and interrogated:

> While I was in detention, intelligence officers and detectives interrogated me every afternoon and also at night. The intelligence officers were interested in the clandestine networks, their activities and the people who were involved. The detectives wanted [information that would help them] to prepare indictments for the trials. During interrogation I was verbally abused, including swearing and threats of beating or shooting me. But this never happened. They said things like "stupid students", "trouble-makers" and "disturbers of public order". They also insulted East Timorese, saying that they were stupid, ungrateful and backward.[691]

537. After five months in detention José Neves was tried and sentenced to four years imprisonment. He served two-and-a-half years in Malang's Lowok Waru Prison from February 1995 to September 1997.

Demonstrations

538. Public demonstrations were a context for detention, ill-treatment and torture that was unique to the period of "normalisation". These public acts of resistance were led by the city-based clandestine networks which emerged in the late 1980s. These acts become a significant strategy of the Resistance. This strategy, however, made members of the Resistance visible to the authorities and many hundreds were arrested over the years (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict; Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy).

539. The phenomena of public demonstrations began after President Soeharto opened eight of Timor-Leste's 13 districts to Indonesian and overseas visitors and delegations in 1989. They were a way to convey the message of resistance to the outside world. The first major demonstration was held after the Mass in Tacitolu during the visit of Pope John Paul II in October 1989. Over the following two years organised demonstrations were a regular occurrence until the military crackdown at the Santa Cruz cemetery in 1991, which resulted in the capture and detention of many leading Resistance figures. Reports of arbitrary detention and torture in connection with the demonstrations therefore declined in 1993, but still occurred as new generations of student activists emerged, particularly from the University of Timor Timur (Untim). Figures for detention and torture related to the large demonstrations coinciding with the fall of President Soeharto in 1998 are low (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict).

540. The victims of detention and torture related to demonstrations were predominantly urban youths in the population centres of Dili and Baucau. Many were students from high school or university.

541. The following section examines the nature and extent of arbitrary arrest of would-be demonstrators in anticipation of a demonstration, arbitrary arrest and detention at or after a demonstration, and patterns of interrogation and torture.

Arrests in anticipation of a demonstration

542. The Indonesian authorities put considerable time, effort and funds into suppressing demonstrations and other forms of public expression of political opinion. Many cases of arbitrary arrest and detention in connection with organised demonstrations occurred before the demonstration took place. Because demonstrations were usually held to coincide with international visits or to mark particular days, they could be anticipated. People were arrested on the basis of specific intelligence or general knowledge of clandestine networks. Certain schools known for their resistance activity were regularly raided by police and military searching for pro-independence literature or to arrest clandestine members.*

The visit of Pope John Paul II

543. At least three months before the visit of Pope John Paul II on 12 October 1989, an intense military operation began across the territory to arrest potential troublemakers and prevent guerrilla fighters from entering villages and towns.† Thousands of soldiers guarded Dili, as well as the towns of Aileu and Ermera.[692] Gregório Saldanha, a clandestine member, was one of those arrested during this operation.‡ He explained:

* Schools targeted by the authorities included St Paul VI Catholic Junior High School (SMP Paulus) and the Externato de São José Secondary School, both in Dili; and Fatumeta Junior High School IV (SMP 4) and Technical Senior High School (STM) Fatumaca (also known as João Bosco school) both in Baucau district. [CAVR Interview with José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, Dili, 31 October 2002.]

† Document "35 Tahun Darma Bakti Kostrad, Perpus Lemhanas, seluruh sector, khususnya Kodim 1627/Dili, mengadakan Pam dalam rangka kunjungan Paus Johannes Paulus II ke Dili." ["...all sectors, especially District Military Command 1627/Dili, exercised extra security in relation to the visit of Pope John Paul II to Dili."], Document "35 Tahun Dharma Bakti Kostrad, Perpustakaan Lemhanas, [no date] ["35 Years of Kostrad Services, Library of Lemhanas"[no date]: p. 97].

‡ Amnesty International reported that Filomeno Paixão de Jesus and Hermegildo de Conceição were detained in June 1990 and taken to a military arsenal in Dili, the Gudang Municipal [Amnesty International, Amnesty International Statement to the United Nation Special Committee on Decolonization, AI Index: ASA 29/09/90, August 1990. p.2].

The Indonesian military thought that by arresting us, the demonstration for the Pope's visit wouldn't take place. They arrested us to anticipate any unwanted incidents. The other reason we were arrested was that they had discovered the network we had formed. But it turned out that they were wrong. Other people staged a demonstration during the Pope's visit on 12 October 1989, because they were already well organised.[693]

544. In total, 34 people were detained, first in Battalion 744 headquarters and then in the SGI Colmera headquarters. All spent between five and six months in detention without visits from family members or international monitoring agencies (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict).

The Portuguese parliamentary delegation

545. In 1991, there was increased political activity in anticipation of the scheduled visit of a Portuguese parliamentary delegation on 4 November 1991.* The Resistance saw the visit as an opportunity to convey its message to the outside world and in April 1991 it organised a meeting with all youth groups to plan for the occasion. At the end of the meeting the establishment of the CRNJT (Conselho Resistência Nacional Juventude Timor, Timorese National Youth Resistance Council) was declared and José Manuel da Silva Fernandes was elected president. The main purpose of the CRNJT was to plan a welcome for the Portuguese parliamentary delegation.[694] Banners were made and peaceful demonstrations were planned throughout Timor-Leste by various youth groups from Dili to Baucau to Oecussi.[695]

546. The Indonesian military was determined to prevent further Resistance actions and demonstrations following embarrassment at the Mass held by the Pope in Tacitolu. The Regional Military Command in Bali (Kodam), Operations Implementation Command (Komando Pelaksana Operasi, Kolakops) prepared a 150-page document outlining a detailed operations' plan starting three months before the scheduled visit.[696] As part of this plan, troop numbers were increased significantly† and paramilitary groups were told to organise demonstrations in favour of integration.‡ The military visited villages throughout Timor-Leste to warn communities that anyone found to be involved in clandestine activities in relation to the visit of the parliamentary delegation would be killed.§ In addition the military arrested everyone they suspected might join an action or demonstration.

* Initially scheduled for an earlier date, but rescheduled a number of times.

† Three additional Strike Force units (1,629 soldiers) were employed, [Samuel Moore, "The Indonesian Military's Last Years in East Timor: An Analysis of Its Secret Documents", Indonesia 72, October 2001, p. 25; East Timor's Unfinished Struggle: Inside the Timorese Struggle, Constâncio Pinto and Matthew Jardine, 1997, South End Press, Boston, MA, p. 176].

‡ The Volunteers Team, for example, was established by Special Forces in Ainaro in 1991 with the purpose of demonstrating in favour of integration.

§ Pinto also mentions that mass graves were dug in Tacitolu, Gleno and Aileu to intimidate people. [East Timor's Unfinished Struggle: Inside the Timorese Struggle, Constâncio Pinto and Matthew Jardine, 1997, South End Press, Boston, MA, p. 178].

547. In Dili, many of the "usual suspects" were targeted for detention. Afonso Maria, who had been arrested previously in 1987, 1988, 1989 and 1990, reported that he was arrested again in 1991 because the military in Jakarta had received information that he was making plans for the parliamentary visit. Afonso was taken to Nusra Bhakti in Dili but he said that many others who were arrested at this time and were taken out of Dili and detained in Baucau and Viqueque in an attempt to separate them from the clandestine network.[697]

548. Arrests were also made outside of Dili. Jorgé Flores dos Santos told the Commission that on 14 November 1990 he and two friends, Calistro and Amadeo, were called to the Liquiçá Kodim by the section head of intelligence (Kasi 1), T423, and the East Timorese Kodim member T422, because information had been received that these three youths were preparing something for the Portuguese delegation. They were immediately taken to the Liquiçá Koramil where the Indonesian Sergeant from Kolakops T442, two ABRI members and police officers took turns kicking, punching and beating them and then interrogated them. The same day, the three were handed over to Kopassus and taken to Dili for detention in Nusra Bhakti. No interrogation or ill-treatment occurred there.[698] The next day, 15 November, Jorgé Flores dos Santos was moved to the Balide Prison where he was held for five days without clothes in a dark cell full of faeces. He was fed food "fit for animals". He was sent back to the Nusra Bhakti for three more weeks and ordered to translate documents that had been obtained by members of the SGI.[699]

549. Because known activists were being increasingly targeted for arrest, a group of more than 20 Resistance activists went to hide in the Motael Church in Dili. At 11.00pm on 28 October 1991, the military, members of the police and the SGI surrounded the church and then stormed it. The activists fought back. One member of the Resistance, Sebastião Gomes Rangel, was shot dead and an East Timorese military informant (mauhu) named Afonso was also killed. Boby Xavier Luis Pereira told the Commission that the next morning he and others, including João Domingos Freitas Leite, Alexio da Silva Gama (Alexio Cobra), Bonifacio Barreto and Jacob were arrested. They were brought to the Dili District police station, while being kicked, beaten and punched. Boby Xavier Luis Pereira told the Commission:

> When we were detained at the police station every day we were tortured in various ways, and interrogated. The forms of torture included beating us with their hands and with a baton, kicking us until we were black and blue and fell to the floor and then dousing us with dirty water. The daily interrogation and torture continued for about one week. The people who tortured us, the ones that I knew, were East Timorese police officers T443, now in Indonesia, T444 from Lospalos, also now in Indonesia, and T445, now a police officer with the new PNTL [Policia Nacional de Timor-Leste].[700]

550. David da Conceição Thon was also arrested at Motael on 29 October, but was sent straight to Becora Prison.[701] According to Amnesty International, 20 individuals were arrested at the Motael Church on charges of creating a social disturbance and pro-independence activities.[702] José Manuel da Silva Fernandes told the Commission that the parish priest of Motael and the Vicar-General of Dili Diocese, Father Alberto Ricardo, were also taken in for interrogation.* Boby Xavier was eventually tried and sentenced to three years in Kupang Prison.[703] Alexio Cobra was detained first to provide a witness statement but was soon also charged and tried for his participation. He was also sentenced to three years in Kupang.[704] The Portuguese visit was eventually cancelled and no demonstration took place at this point.

551. Moving suspected clandestine members outside of Dili to prevent them from joining in a demonstration was a form of preventive arrest, as Anibal Ximenes experienced:

> On 27 September 1994, around 8.00 in the morning, I went to the Dili Wira Dharma Korem 164 because a letter delivered by the Babinsa Hary had called me there…On arrival, I joined 50 other people who had been detained. We were broken up into groups and taken to the districts to prevent us from staging a demonstration during a visit by an American congressman to Timor Lorosae. They took me to the Baucau Kodim where I spent two days, and then [I spent] two weeks in Quelicai. Then they took me back to the Dili Kodim and kept me for a day before I was released.[705]

Arrests at or after an event

552. Despite intense preventive arrests before visits from overseas delegations, the clandestine movement often managed to hold demonstrations. The Indonesian authorities responded to these actions with mass arrests of demonstrators and brutality far out of proportion to the threat posed by the demonstrators. Photographs and videotapes of demonstrators taken by plainclothes intelligence were used to catch demonstrators who managed to escape arrest during the demonstration.

The Mass at Tacitolu by Pope John Paul II

553. The Mass conducted at Tacitolu (Dili) on 12 October 1989 by Pope John Paul II was attended by an estimated 100,000 people (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict). As the Mass ended a group of young pro-independence supporters took out banners they had hidden under their clothes and began shouting slogans. The demonstrators were mainly high school students from the Externato de São José, STM Fatumaca, Baucau and Catholic scouts (escuteiros) of the Balide Church. Chaos ensued. Chairs were thrown by Indonesian security agents, the Pope was taken from the stage and police

* Amnesty International also reported that Father Ricardo "has been subjected to repeated, intensive interrogation by the security forces since the 12 November incident. Interrogation appeared to have ceased briefly during the Christmas period but has reportedly now resumed. On 2 January 1992, Father Ricardo is said to have been subjected to continuous interrogation from 9am to 5.30pm, during which time he was threatened and verbally humiliated. As a result of these interrogations, colleagues say, Father Ricardo is in grave danger of a psychological breakdown." Amnesty International Urgent Action 04/92, AI Index: ASA 21/01/92, 3 January 1992. [See also CAVR Interview with José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, Dili, 20 December 2004.]

and Indonesian military captured and arrested the demonstrators.* According to Bishop Belo, cited by Asia Watch, 40 people were arrested at Tacitolu.† The Commission received a statement concerning the demonstration from Celestino Porfira da Silva, who testified that many people were arrested including Donanciano Gomes and José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, both of whom were taken to the SGI Headquarters in Colmera and detained for several days.[706] The military told the STM Fatumaca students, recognisable by their uniforms, to get into trucks that would return them to Baucau. Instead they were taken to the Infantry Battalion 745 base in Comoro.

554. With the aid of photographs taken at the Mass, the military was able to arrest other demonstrators who had managed to flee the demonstration. The Commission heard that several people were arrested at checkpoints as they tried to return to their villages outside Dili.[707] Others were caught in the following days and weeks. For example, Boby Xavier Luis Pereira from the Externato de São José told the Commission that he was captured by the military from Security Operations Command for East Timor (Komando Operasi Keamanan, Koopskam) and taken to the Becora Prison. He was released within a month after intervention by the ICRC.[708] José Manuel, one of the demonstration organisers, went into hiding for three days and then sought refuge in the Bishop's residence, along with about 26 others, including Donanciano Gomes, Francisco Sousa, António Mesquita (Maukoer) and Guilherme. He told the Commission that after ten days the demonstrators were visited by a group of intelligence and military officers including Colonel Bimo, head of intelligence, Brigadier General Mulyadi, the Commander of the Kolakops, and Colonel Nainggolan, who was a Kopassus officer from Jakarta. They tried to convince them to surrender and brought Governor Mario Carrascalão as a negotiator and two prisoners, Victor da Costa, a Fretilin Central Committee member, and Baimetak, a guerrilla fighter, to show the demonstrators that prisoners were not mistreated and that surrendering was their best option.[709] Military representatives promised Bishop Belo that the demonstrators would not be tortured, but they refused to surrender. A week later, on 5 November, members of the military returned and arrested the group and they were taken to the Korem.[710]

Visit of the US Ambassador John Monjo

555. On 17 January 1990, 100 demonstrators[711] gathered in front of the Hotel Turismo and asked the visiting US ambassador to Indonesia, John Monjo, to come outside and hear a petition they had prepared. The ambassador came out and spoke to the demonstrators through a megaphone for about one hour. During the exchange, plainclothes Indonesian military videotaped, photographed and recorded the names of those present.‡ As soon as the ambassador left the hotel, riot police began to beat and arbitrarily arrest the demonstrators.[712] Most were taken to the Dili Kodim and interrogated (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict).

* The Commission obtained film footage of the Mass, the subsequent demonstration and its violent aftermath, which shows Indonesian security agents throwing chairs at demonstrators and violently disbursing them. [Film footage from ABC Television, Australia. CAVR Archive.]

† See Asia Watch, "Remembering History in East-Timor: The Trial of Xanana Gusmão and a Follow-up to the Dili Massacre," April 1993, p. 76.

‡ A Kodim member in military uniform was seen filming openly, whereas only plainclothes intelligence officers were seen taking photographs. [Statutory Declaration of Andrew John MacMillan before the Comissioner of Oaths, Darwin Australia, January 23, 1990. See also CAVR Interview with Simplicio Celestino de Deus, Dili, 8 October 2004].

SMPN IV School, Dili

556. Not all demonstrations were planned. Some occurred spontaneously in response to perceived provocation from the state but were also put down by the authorities. For example, at the SMPN IV School (Dili) on 17 March 1990 a visitor to the school, Bambang Udiyono, from the Prosecutor's Office, said in a speech: "If you can't even make a single match, then Timor-Leste cannot yet be independent."* The students reacted angrily to the speech and began to demonstrate. Brimob arrived and scuffled with the students, arresting some. One of the students arrested, Francisco da Costa, reported that he was held first in the Dili Sub-district police headquarters where he was heavily beaten and then in SGI Colmera where he was accused of being in the Resistance, stripped naked and beaten unconscious.[714]

Santa Cruz demonstration

557. The Santa Cruz demonstration is the most well-known of the public demonstrations to have occurred in Timor-Leste. Videos of the massacre at the Santa Cruz Cemetery on 12 November 1991 profoundly changed the fortunes of the territory by drawing international attention to the situation. As well as those who were killed at the demonstration (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances) many were arrested and detained. Statements given to the Commission about the incident describe the methods of arbitrary arrest as brutal and involving severe beatings by both the police and the military. Most of those arrested were thrown into trucks and taken to various police stations around Dili or to the Korem and Kodim in Dili.[715] Some of the seriously wounded were taken by truck to the military hospital in Lahane. Beatings reportedly occurred during the journey,[716] and even in the hospital itself.[717] After being given basic medical attention, most detainees were sent to the police station where it was decided who should remain in custody.† Bishop Belo was able to secure

* This phrase is similar to a phrase reportedly used by members of the UDT political party in 1974-75 when they claimed Timor-Leste was not sufficiently developed for immediate independence. The Commission heard reference to this in many testimonies. [See, for example, testimonies of Manuel Agustinus Freitas, Manuel Duarte and Francisco Xavier do Amaral to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003].

† According to Laporan Khusus Tentang Pengungkapan Para Perusuh Yang Terlibat Dalam Peristiwa Demonstrasi 12 Nopember 1991 Di Santa Cruz, Dili, Timor Timur, [Special Report Regarding Disclosure of the Rioters of 12 November 1991 Demonstration in Santa Cruz, Dili, East Timor] dated December 1991 (no day entered), signed and sealed by Komando Pelaksana Operasi Timor Timur (Brigadier General Rudolf Warouw), 253 people were released on the same day, seven people released eight days later, 11 people released 12 days later, 10 people released 15 days later. The document mentions that 22 were ditahan (detained), meaning for a longer period. This differs from the Asia Watch account [Asia Watch, "Remembering History in East-Timor: The Trial of Xanana Gusmão and a Follow-up to the Dili Massacre," April 1993, Vol. 5, No. 8] which says that 32 persons were arrested of whom eight were tried in Dili in June 1992 and received sentences ranging from five years and eight months to life in prison [Asia Watch used the ICJ report, "Tragedy in East Timor: Report on the Trials in Dili and Jakarta," Geneva, Switzerland, 1992]. The other 24 became tahanan pembinaan (detainee for guidance); see discussion below.

the release of some,[718] but others were held for longer periods. The Commission heard that some, mostly leaders of the clandestine movement, were moved to other districts to break all connection with the Resistance movement.[719] Amnesty International estimates the number of people detained after the incident as around 300.[720]

558. Several people who had managed to escape arrest at the cemetery were chased by members of Brimob or the military and caught in other parts of Dili. They tracked down others later in the day. Pedro Amaral told the Commission how he ran towards the Old Market area to catch a public minibus, but was caught by two members of Brimob and two members of the police. They beat him with their hands and SKS rifles. He spent two nights in the Sub-district police headquarters before being moved to the District police headquaters (Sub-Regional Police Headquarters) for one week where he did not experience ill-treatment. He then spent three months in Becora Prison, after which he was released. During his first week in Becora he received no food.[721]

559. Simplicio Celestino de Deus, a clandestine member, was arrested at the cemetery after the shooting of demonstrators had ended. He told the Commission:

> At Santa Cruz Cemetery I looked for a place to hide. Soon soldiers entered the cemetery and stepped on victims who were on the ground and hit them with their rifles. Then they arrested me. One soldier from Battalion 303 from Sulawesi cut my left ear [and] it bled. They started to torture and abuse [hit] me. Then a [East Timorese] police corporal, T443 from Hatolia, came and cut off my right ear and hand-cuffed me. Blood streamed from my ear.
>
> As they tortured me, I heard a soldier yell: "Don't torture him, because the commander needs him." Then they dragged me violently out of Santa Cruz Cemetery and threw me into a Hino truck full of dead bodies, around 50 to 60 dead bodies. Blood streamed all over my body and my eyes. Then my friends and I received medical treatment for nine days at Wira Husada Hospital in Lahane.[722]

560. Simplicio de Deus was later detained in the Regional Police Headquarters in Comoro.

561. The Commission received statements indicating that the military arrested people, not only in Dili but also in the districts of Liquiçá, Bobonaro and Baucau after the Santa Cruz demonstration and massacre.[723] For example, the communities of Venilale (Baucau) and Vemasse (Baucau) described how the army increased patrols at night and began to target individuals, usually young men, whom they suspected of attending the demonstration.[724] The Commission heard of two people in the village of Uatu-Haco (Venilale, Baucau) who were tortured.[725] In Quelicai (Baucau), members of the paramilitary group linked to ABRI, Team Saka, helped with arrests of suspects.[726]

Detention for guidance

The military tried many techniques to break up the clandestine movement. In the early 1980s, clandestine members were sent away from their networks to the island of Ataúro or to prisons in Indonesia and held incommunicado. Still others were moved out of their home villages and held in newly-constructed villages, such as Dotik (Alas, Manufahi) or Bonuk (Hato Udo, Ainaro), far from their family and friends. In the 1990s, members of the urban resistance involved in demonstrations were also moved out of their home-towns into rural areas to separate them from the clandestine network.* Some were sent to be "re-educated", which involved forced labour for the military for indefinite periods.

This was the experience of Simplicio Celestino de Deus and five of his colleagues, Filomeno Gomes, Fernando Tilman (Gulit), Renilde Guterres, José Bento and José Belo, all of whom were arrested after the Santa Cruz demonstration in 1991. After first being held in the Dili District police station with other detainees, they were told they would be released after attending a Mass by Fr Brito. However, the truck they thought was taking them to the Mass took them instead to the district of Lautém. They were held in the Lautém Kodim for a day and then the Army Strategic Command (Komando Strategis Angkatan Darat, Kostrad) base in Illiapa, Lore II (Lospalos, Lautém), for two days. Simplicio and Filomeno Gomes were separated from the others and held in the Airborne Infantry Battalion Kostrad base in Alapapulu (Lospalos, Lautém) where they were interrogated about the clandestine network and asked to name members. After about four months all six met again at the base camp in Lospalos.[727]

In the basecamp the detainees were required to work around the clock without pay, growing food for the soldiers during the day and guarding the camp at night. Simplicio explained that they worked on the land for 12 hours a day between 6.00am and 6.00pm with only a short break at breakfast and a 15-minute lunch break. They were beaten if they were late. At 6.00pm they bathed, ate and rested and at 9.00pm they took turns doing the night watch until 6.00am.

* After his arrest on 23 January 1991, José Manuel da Silva Fernandes was moved around different detention places such as Senopati I (Dili), Nusra Bhakti (Dili), Rumah Merah (Baucau), Kotis, Battalion 413 base (Manu-boe, Ossu, Viqueque), Kodim Viqueque and eventually to the base camp in Viqueque, where he was held as a tahanan luar (an outside prisoner) for two years. [CAVR Interview with José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, Dili, 20 December 2004].

This type of imprisonment is sometimes referred to as "persons detained for guidance" (tahanan pembinaan).* Asia Watch reported that such prisoners were put into the custody of territorial units in rural areas where they worked under the supervision of soldiers in rural development projects.[728] General Theo Syafei reportedly told Asia Watch that this form of detention could be indefinite, although supervising soldiers were given "targets" for completing the re-education of detainees in their care. The answer a senior military intelligence officer reportedly gave when asked when these detainees would be charged and brought to trial was: "not determined".[729]

Simplicio Celestino de Deus described how two military officers from Jakarta visited him every three months. They would talk with him to assess his psychological state. They would ask him things such as: "Where do you see yourself in five years? What do you think will happen in the future? Why do you think this happened to you?" Simplicio believes that he was allowed to go home in 1993 because these visitors sent a favourable report to Jakarta.[730]

Cancelled visit of the Portuguese parliamentary delegation

562. Also in November 1991, the military and other Indonesian agents arrested pro-independence supporters who had been preparing for the visit of the Portuguese parliamentary delegation to Dili and other districts.[731] For example on 15 November 1991 in Cailaco (Bobonaro), the Koramil commander, Sergeant Major T451 arrested ten youths who had been preparing for the Portuguese visit to Cailaco. One of those arrested, Adriano João, was taken to the Bobonaro Kodim 1636. Intel Sergeant T452 and the Indonesian head of intelligence, T453, interrogated Adriano João for three days. During the interrogation he was beaten heavily and given electric shocks. Adriano described how, on one night, drunken soldiers woke the detainees and ordered them to take their clothes off and sleep naked on the floor. Food brought to the Kodim by family members was confiscated.[732]

563. Julio Araújo Martins told the Commission that an Indonesian member of Kopassus named T454 arrested him at his home in Ermera at 9.00am on 17 December 1991, because he had been making a banner for the Portuguese delegation visit to Ermera, and also because he had attended the Santa Cruz demonstration the previous month. The Ermera Koramil commander and four others took him to the Kodim where he was held for four months. During this time, T454 and two Babinsas from Bobonaro, T455 and T456, beat and slapped him and tortured him with electric shocks.[733]

* Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, April 1993, Vol. 5, No. 8, p. 22. Family members of Simplicio who visited him were indeed told that he was not a prisoner, but a tahanan pembinaan (detainee for guidance).

The rise of the militias, 1985–1998

As described in the earlier section on Profile of Violations: 1985–1998, this phase of the political conflict was also marked by increased cooperation between the Indonesian military and various new East Timorese militia groups, as well as East Timorese auxiliaries to the Indonesian military (see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation, section on Militarisation of East Timorese Society) in the detention, ill-treatment and torture of civilians.

Most militia groups were established at the district level by Kopassus which recruited young East Timorese men from the district. A common pattern identified by the Commission was an increase in arrests in a particular district in the months after a new militia was formed. They included: Team Alfa (Lospalos) and Team Sera (Baucau) in the 1980s, Team Saka (Baucau) in 1983 and the Team Sukarelawan (Volunteers Team (Ainaro) in 1991.[734]

A large number of arrests reported to the Commission were attributed to the Volunteers Team (Team Sukarelawan), operating in Ainaro (from 1991), Team Saka in Baucau (from 1991) and Halilintar in Bobonaro (from 1994).

Halilintar

According to statements received by the Commission and the Community Profile of Atabae (Bobonaro), in September 1994 the military in Atabae heard from an informant that there was clandestine activity in the village of Atabae Lama. The military then set up a group of youths who later became the Halilintar militia. A large arrest operation was conducted in the area, targeting youth suspected of clandestine activities.* By the end of November at least 50 people had been arrested and taken to the Koramil.[735] They were beaten and tortured in their cell.[736] Both the SGI and members of the Koramil, such as commander T457 and the village head T458, were involved in making the arrests.[737] T457 authorised the arrests and was personally involved in torturing detainees.[738] The Kodim 1636 Maliana also detained people in the village of Fatubessi.[739]

João da Silva of Fatubessi (Hatolia, Ermera) told the Commission that in 1994, he and 62 other people that he did not know were arrested in Atabae because they were suspected of contact with Falintil. He said that he was arrested by Halilintar member T459 and beaten, then taken with the other detainees to Loes (Atabae, Bobonaro). The detainees were held in Loes for three months and had to report every day, before they were allowed to go home.*

* The Commission was told that there was a reactivation of the Halilintar group, used in the kidnapping and the disappearance of pro-independence supporters [CAVR, Community Profile of Atabae Village, Atabae Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 8 October 2002. See also HRVD Statement 1181].

One year later, according to the community of Atabae, T1 and SGI members in Atabae established the militia group Halilintar which continued to detain youth suspected of clandestine association. Many people were arrested and beaten, sometimes so severely that their faces became unrecognisable.[740]

Team Sukarelawan (Volunteers Team)

Several years earlier, in 1991, the Team Sukarelawan was established in a small village in the district of Ainaro.† According to various sources, the team was intended to gather youths to hold a counter demonstration in favour of integration when the Portuguese parliamentary delegation passed through Ainaro,[741] to crack down on the clandestine movement[742] and to prevent youths from Ainaro joining the Santa Cruz demonstration.‡

Statistics

The actions of the Team Sukarelawan were responsible for a large spike in the detentions in Ainaro in 1991 and 1992. From only two cases of detention reported to the Commission from 1990, the Commission received statements describing 390 incidents in 1991. There were also 219 reported incidents of ill-treatment and 201 of torture. In 1992, the number of reported detentions declined again to 19, with just three cases of torture and 13 of ill-treatment.

Detention and torture

At first Team Sukarelawan detained only those who refused to join them,[743] but soon they targeted any civilian or community suspected of links with the Resistance. Communities reported mass arrests of civilians in villages and towns in Ainaro including Maulau (50 people), Cassa (26 people), Manelobas (97 people) and Manetu (55 people).[744] Detainees were held in a variety of detention facilities including military installations such as the Maubisse Koramil, public buildings such as

* See HRVD Statement 1200. This mass arrest was corroborated by Domingos Soares who said that he and other clandestine members were forced to attend a ceremony (probably an Indonesian flag raising ceremony) on the 17th of each month for a year after their arrest by Halilintar [HRVD Statement 1181].

† According to the community of Manutasi (Ainaro, Ainaro), the Volunteers Team was established in Mau-ulo II, Fatuk Maria, Manutasi village, where the team erected its first "big post". The East Timorese human rights organisation Yayasan HAK reported that the Volunteers were recruited among children of former Apodeti leaders and that the group was led by T466.

‡ CAVR, Community Profiles of Maulau Village (26 May 2003), Manelobas Village (23 May 2003), Manetu Village (8 July 2003), Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro. An increase in arrests was reported on 10–11 November 1991, in the days leading up to the Santa Cruz demonstration.

the Integration Building in Cassa, the village offices in Maneto, Aitutu and Manutasi and the office of the Sub-district administrator T461.[745] The private house of village head T462 was also identified as a place for detaining prisoners. This suggests that the Volunteers worked in cooperation with, or at the very least with the knowledge of, both the Indonesian military and the civilian administration.

Most detainees were held for a few days but some were held for up to four months, especially those detainees held in the Maubisse Koramil. Many endured continual interrogation and torture at the hands of Team Sukarelawan and ABRI. In Maulau (Maubisse) a mixture of chilli peppers and water was rubbed into detainees' eyes. In Manelobas (Maubisse) the village head, Cecilia Xavier, was rolled into a flag from head to toe and threatened that she would be burnt alive.[746] In Manetu (Maubisse), Manutasi (Ainaro) and Cassa (Ainaro) women were raped or threatened with rape.[747]

Team Sukarelawan and the military

Further evidence of the relationship between Team Sukarelawan and the military was the clear division of tasks between the two. Certain members of Team Sukarelawan were assigned to arrest people, usually in groups of five or more. They would then hand the victim over to other members of Team Sukarelawan or the military head of intelligence who would interrogate the victim. Interrogation focused on the victim's involvement in clandestine activity and contact with Falintil. Other members of Team Sukarelawan, the Babinsa or even the village head, then tortured the victim. Such an arrest, detention and torture was normally ordered by Team Sukarelawan commanders, such as T463, T464, T465 or "the highest leader" T466 with the consent of the military. Pedro Sarmento recalled:

In 1991, at 3.00pm, the Sukarelawan members T468, T469 and T470 arrested me at my home. They took me to the integration building in Cassa. There, T471 slapped me on orders from T472…I stood and T473 interrogated me, kicked me in my ears until they bled and detained me inside the building for three days and three nights. They interrogated me, beat me and kicked me continually. T474 and T475 tied me with wire. Then they told me to go home.[748]

Moises Mendonça Doutel Sarmento told the Commission:

In 1991 the village head [of Manetu] T462 and Sukarelawan T477 took me…to two Kopassus who interrogated me about the national [Fretilin] flag. I gave them information, but then Sukarelawan members, including T478, T479, T480 and T481, beat and punched me in the face…At 5.00pm, Babinsa T482 and two Kopassus came and immersed Abel Mendonça and myself in water and told us to lie down and stare at the sun. Two Kopassus came with big rocks, placed them on our chest and interrogated us and immersed us in water for one hour. Then they told us to get out of the water and interrogated us. They told Abel Mendonça to go home and kept me for one month at the Koramil. Babinsa T482 ordered my friends and me to build a pigpen for him. Then he told us to go home but we had to report once a week and bring firewood for ABRI.[749]

Forced labour

After release victims were often forced to undertake labour including building a new house for the village head of Manetu, T462, guard a Sukarelawan post, clean the Koramil garden or build a new fence.[750] This work could continue for up to a year after "release" so that from late 1991 until mid-1992, many sectors of the population in Ainaro lived under highly monitored conditions. According to the community of Manetu, the civilian population were only left alone after Xanana Gusmão's arrest in November 1992.[751]

Release

After most detainees had been released, the Koramil Maubisse 02 was ordered by Kodim 1633 Ainaro to round up all those released and escort them to a large blood oath ceremony to be held in the stadium of Ainaro. The communities of Manutasi (Maubisse, Ainaro) and Hohorai (Ainaro, Ainaro) described what happened:

All day we drew our blood and then we drank the blood and vowed that we would not be involved in any political activities, that we would live under the Red and White flag and that we would sacrifice our lives for integration with Indonesia.[752]

Our leader was Manuel Pereira, the head of the Ainaro District Education and Culture Division. We came from four sub-districts, Hato Builico, Maubisse, Hato Udo and Ainaro. There were more than 2,150 of us and the football field was full. Our leaders forced us to kill goats, cook, bring palm wine and to feast. Then they asked us to return to our sub-district to tell the people that we were two-faced.[753]

Interrogation and torture of victims connected to demonstrations

564. The Commission's research indicates that abuse, ill-treatment and torture in detention were used regularly against people detained in connection with demonstrations. A submission to the Commission from former political prisoners stated:

> We were subjected to beatings, immersion in tanks of excrement. Sometimes they would open the doors to soldiers returning from combat duty in the mountains and let them beat us up. They would come in at dawn in full *combat gear, dust on their clothes, and start hitting and punching us. They'd shout: "We're looking for the communists. So, after all, they're here in Dili, not in the mountains."

565. Often victims were tortured during interrogation by the police to force a confession for a possible trial. For example, José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, one of the organisers of the demonstration at the Mass at Tacitolu by Pope John Paul II, who was detained several days afterwards, told the Commission that the group of activists hiding at the Bishop's house were taken to the Sub-Regional Police Headquarters (Polwil) and then were separated from each other. José Manuel was taken to the Korem and detained there for three months, during which he was subjected to continued torture.[754] José Manuel told the Commission that interrogation for the first two weeks was aimed at extracting a basic confession. In this period he was beaten, kicked, attacked with rifle butts, stabbed with the point of a knife, burnt with cigarettes, immersed in a tank of excrement and stepped on and threatened with loaded guns.[755]

566. After the confession was obtained, his interrogators sought to "verify" the forced confession by applying two forms of electric shock. The first was applied with a charger for which a handle was turned, the second administered in a specially-designed metal chair in which the near-naked prisoner was shackled by the wrists and ankles and then had electrodes attached to the body.[756] José Manuel describes that this would sometimes last up to 15 minutes and could be administered three times a day.[757] Five Kopassus soldiers assisted the torture under the direction of the Kopassus Colonel T449.

567. José Manuel reported also that during his time in detention Brigadier-General T485, the commander of Kolakops, beat him with a stick and T449 hit him in the face. During an interrogation he was told not to sit on a chair, but to squat on the floor because he was an animal. He was then beaten across the knees and head, often more than ten times. In the Korem, officers from different institutions interrogated and tortured him.[758]

Table 10: Detainees arrested in connection with the Santa Cruz demonstration and their treatment†

Name	Arrested	Detained	Tortured	Perpetrator
José P. Vicente[759]	At home in Taibessi (Dili) by intelligence officer.	Korem for one day; Kodim; Wira Husada hospital.	At Korem – beaten with rifles, kicked and punched heavily. At Kodim – same but also stabbed in the back. Kicked and beaten on the way to hospital and then interrogated at the hospital and tortured.	Korem and Kodim members.

* The Commission received a detailed analysis of this shift in the pattern of detention from the Ex-Political Prisoners Association (Assepol), in testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, together with a written Submission [CAVR Archive]. The above quote is included in this Submission, taken from a report by the International Commission of Jurists 1992:23 [see also Constâncio Pinto and Mathew Jardine, op cit].

† This list contains some of the names of those arrested after the Santa Cruz demonstration, who were reported to the Commission. These deponents have been selected in order to demonstrate the treatment of people upon arrest and detention.

Francisco Branco, member Executive Committee of Clandestine Front.[760]	Offically summoned to the Sub-Regional police headquarters.	Sub-Regional Police Headquarters for 7-8 months; then taken to the Comarca after trial proceedings.	Not tortured. He believes because of international attention on Indonesia and because the authorities realised that detainees were not going to cooperate.	A group of Intel from Bakin in Jakarta carried out interrogation.
Basilio dos Santos[761]	At the Santa Cruz Cemetery 12 November 1991 by police and ABRI.	Sub-Regional Police Headquarters, then same day to Kodim for six months.	At the Sub-Regional Police Headquarters beaten with a gun and kicked with police boots. At Kodim electrocuted, fingernails pulled out with pliers, lips sliced with a razorblade.	Police and military.
Miguel dos Santos and his friends, Leandro Lobato and Adolfo[762]	At the Santa Cruz Cemetery 12 November 1991 by Rajawali.	Sub-Regional Police Headquarters for two weeks, then taken to Wira Husada hospital for treatment.	Ordered to walk on thorns until his feet bled, put in a cell under bright sunlight. Trampled on with heavy boots at the hospital.	Rajawali and police.
Manuel da Conceição[763]	At the Santa Cruz Cemetery 12 November 1991 by military.	Sub-Regional Police Headquarters Comoro for 15 days along with many others including Aleixo Cobra and Aleon.	At the cemetery beaten and kicked. At the Sub-Regional Police Headquarters Comoro forced to take off clothes then beaten, punched and kicked during lengthy interrogations in turns by many police.	ABRI, then police.
Estaquio Pinto[764]	At the Santa Cruz Cemetery 12 November 1991 by military.	Sub-Regional Police Headquarters, released on request of Bishop Belo.	Electric shocks and beatings, hair shaven.	ABRI
António Fernandes[765]	16 November 1991 by military.	Korem for two days and two nights.	Interrogated about incident. Beaten and burned with cigarette butts on the face.	Three ABRI soldiers.

568. Given the variation in treatment meted out to detainees, it is difficult to say that there was a clear strategy in relation to the torture of prisoners. Mario Carrascalão suggested that the treatment of prisoners after the visit of Pope John Paul II was not condoned at the national level. He told the Commission that he and Brigadier-General Mulyadi took Benny Moerdani to the airport after the Pope's visit:

> Benny said to Mulyadi: "Mulyadi, don't do anything funny okay. Arresting people for no reason, don't do that." But as soon as the plane took off, while we were still at the airport, Mulyadi said: "Benny is in charge nationally but in East Timor I am the one in charge." Starting that day, he began making arrests.[766]

569. Nevertheless, there was clearly coordination at least at the provincial level. As the table shows, detainees were frequently held in a variety of places and interrogated by different units, similar to the pattern of detention in the early 1970s. José Manuel da Silva Fernandes said that different institutions interrogated and tortured him and used the term “bon” (receipt) or “saya bon dulu” (let me use a receipt), meaning one institution would borrow detainees from another so that they could interrogate or torture them.[767]

570. Further, although there may have not been commands about how detainees should be tortured, there was clearly no limit on what police and military officers could do to obtain information. Torture and other cruel and inhuman treatment, in whatever form, were so common as to have been considered a systematic part of the detention and interrogation process.

Interrogation after the Santa Cruz demonstration

Gregório Saldanha, one of the clandestine members in charge of organising the Santa Cruz demonstration, was arrested at the cemetery and then taken to the hospital for four days. He then spent nine months in the police station in Comoro followed by imprisonment in the Comarca for nine months, then in prisons in Becora (Dili), Semarang and Cipinang (Jakarta, Indonesia). He told the Commission:

I was arrested in front of Santa Cruz Cemetery on the morning of 12 November after I sustained a gunshot [wound in] my back. Nearby, soldiers were shooting and stabbed their bayonets towards protesters…I pretended to be dead. Five minutes later a Kodim commander arrived and ordered his men to stop shooting, stabbing or hitting. He also said: “If you are alive, raise your hands!” I stood and raised my hands. There were five dead bodies in the truck.

On arrival at the hospital they kicked the dead bodies out of the truck and then those of us who were injured were bathed and treated. I did not see the people who were on the same truck as me again. I suspect that they may have been killed or taken to the morgue. As far as I know, there were about 90 people who had been injured and whom they registered.

At the police station I immediately met with the senior people in the police and military to tell them: “You have already arrested me. I am the one who takes responsibility for the incident, so I am ready to take punishment as heavy as you like. I ask that the others be released.”

Many of the young detainees were still of school age, and many also had jobs. Eventually they [the military authorities] released some, but the rest were kept in detention. It was their practice to detain people they suspected for interrogation so that they could extract new information from them for use as evidence to make further arrests. I continued to demand [the other demonstrators' release]. I also said this to a Supreme Court delegate visiting from Jakarta. But when I was brought in front of the other detainees at the police station, the authorities asked the detainees whether they knew me. They said that they didn't know me, even though they were my close friends, such as Simplicio, Marcio and others. I was full of admiration for them. They were not only brave in what they did but also in taking responsibility.

Torture was always part of the interrogation process. Because they believed that without pressure it was difficult to get a confession. They knew very well that it wasn't easy to get me to confess, and much of what I confessed wasn't what they wanted. We were lucky because the 12 November incident drew international attention and we were at the centre of this attention. Because of that we were always in the spotlight. At certain times they put pressure on me. They took me at night for interrogation and torture. But at other times they had to be gentle. The police did not only have formal interrogation processes. Each group could conduct an interrogation in whatever way they wanted. Sometimes you had a unit from the SGI, and sometimes other units came and interrogated me. This made my head spin. They never left me alone.

One of the most humiliating experiences was when the deputy area police chief called me in front of the delegate from the Supreme Court, the military police and the prosecutor. All of these officials put questions to me. They put the questions like a marathon-before I answered a question from one official another official would ask another question, so I wasn't given a chance to respond. And their questions were mostly random which caused me to often give the wrong answers. Because I denied the allegations they threw at me, the deputy police chief slapped me across the face, he was so angry. I spoke about this incident during my trial, because a police officer cannot physically abuse prisoners. There were some who hit me while others tried showing a sense of humanity by saying to me "it's best that you give correct information so that you aren't tortured again." I think this was just another of their tactics to get the right answers from me.[768]

Demonstration in Jakarta, 19 November 1991 and the Bali arrests

571. East Timorese clandestine members in Indonesia were also arrested in the 1990s. The treatment they received was generally better, both in terms of the process and of their physical treatment, than the treatment of detainees in Timor-Leste. Nevertheless, the detentions were still a violation of the rights to freedom of expression and association (see Vol. III, Part 7.6: Political Trials).

572. The first major political demonstration by East Timorese students in Jakarta was held one week after the Santa Cruz Massacre, on 19 November 1991.* About 100 students held a peaceful demonstration in the centre of Jakarta to commemorate those who had died and to protest the actions of the Indonesian military. Protestors chanted pro-independence slogans, displayed banners and delivered a petition to UN representatives and to the Australian and Japanese embassies. The posters and the petition referred to the Santa Cruz massacre but also to the invasion and forced integration of Timor-Leste into Indonesia.

573. The police arrested about 70 of the demonstrators and detained them first in the national police headquarters in Jakarta. Police from the headquarters, members of the military based in Timor-Leste and Kopassus interrogated the detainees. After three days the detainees were moved to the headquarters of the regional police for the greater Jakarta area (Kepolisian Daerah Metropolitan Jakarta Raya, Polda Metro Jaya) where they remained for three months.[769]

574. Five days after the demonstration, on 24 November 1991, the police made six more arrests of East Timorese clandestine members in Denpasar, Bali: Fernando de Araújo (Lasama), José Pompeia, Anito Matos, Aniceto Guterres Lopes (arrested 3 days later) José Paulo and Clemente Soares. These arrests may have been made on information obtained in the interrogation of the detainees in Jakarta. They were taken from their boarding house and detained at the Regional Police headquarters (Polda Nusra) in Denpasar, Bali until 30 December 1991. Aniceto Guterres Lopes and José Paulo were then released and Fernando de Araújo was flown, handcuffed, to Jakarta by military plane where he joined colleagues at the Polda Metro Jaya; José Pompeia, Anito Matos and Clemente Soares remained at the Regional Police headquarters.

575. Virgilio Guterres told the Commission that he was not subjected to torture during his detention:

> Maybe one reason was that the Indonesian authorities were under intense pressure at the time of our arrest. Max Stahl's video footage of the 12 November incident was aired internationally and Indonesia was under intense international pressure. Their treatment of us in detention in Jakarta was a tactic designed to show the world that they could treat us well, to rebuff accusations of human rights abuses and to give an impression that they did not commit violence in Timor-Leste as their critics claimed. In Dili, there was hardly any contact with the outside world so torture happened often. While in Jakarta, we only experienced lack of access to the outside world during the early weeks in detention. But after the interrogations, friends and family visited us. Even our friends in

* One prior, although unsuccessful, action in Jakarta was the attempt by several East Timorese students to gain asylum in 1987. Demonstrations had been held in other parts of Indonesia prior to this, such as the demonstration at Udayana University in Bali on 13 March 1991. Amnesty International reported that dozens of students were arrested at this demonstration including six East Timorese students detained overnight: Alexandro Corte-Real, Manuel Sarmento, Boaventura da Silva, José Celestino, Lorenço and Miguel Ximenes. [AI Index: ASA 21/04/91.]

the media came to interview us and the Indonesian officers did not dare to use violence during an interrogation.[770]

576. Many of the detainees were released after three months in the Polda Metro Jaya, though 22 who were to be tried remained. Domingos Barreto described how some were released:

> They separated us because their investigation revealed that the participation of some was incidental…[They] continued the investigation at night…Then they separated us from the other detainees [around 70]. They released [most of] the detainees after the investigation proved that their participation was incidental.[771]

577. Of the 22 prisoners not released, 17 became witnesses in the trials of the other five: João Freitas da Camara, Fernando da Araújo, Virgilio Guterres, Agapito Cardoso and Domingos Barreto. All five were charged with subversion.[772] During their trial, the defendants were held at the Polda Metro Jaya. All were convicted and sentenced to terms of imprisonment. Four were sent to Salemba Prison (Jakarta) while João Freitas da Camara was sent to Cipinang Prison (Jakarta). Fernando de Araújo and Virgilio Guterres later moved from Salemba to Cipinang (see Vol. III, Part 7.6: Political Trials).

Untim demonstrations

578. After the arrests and killings in 1991, the numbers of clandestine leaders active in Timor-Leste greatly diminished. From the mid-1990s onwards, however, students of the University of Timor Timur (Untim) organised many demonstrations at the university campus, sometimes joined by high school students.[773] Some demonstrations were spontaneous but others were carefully planned, such as the annual commemorations of the Santa Cruz Massacre. Some of the demonstrations reported to the Commission include:

- In June 1994, students responded to an incident in Remexio (Aileu) in which Indonesian soldiers had thrown Communion wafers on the floor and stamped on them in a village church. According to a media report, around 300 East Timorese students attempted to hold a protest at the university but it was broken up and many were arrested.[774]
- On 9 January 1995, an Untim demonstration descended into violence as demonstrators, the police and TNI threw stones at each other.[775] Between 26 and 30 people* were arrested on the spot, and taken to the Comoro Sub-Regional Police Headquarters. While they were in detention, Members of Brimob beat the students severely, stripped them naked and gave them electric shocks. Some were released after 11 days, while other were tried, convicted and imprisoned in the Becora Prison.[776]

* Among others: Inácio de Jesus Santos Oliveira, José A. Beto, José Pinto, Paul Amaral, Luis Tavares, João Manuel, Lemos, Carlos, José Henrique, Alfredo Lopes, Crispin, Apolito, Mário Pinto, Bendito Salo, Filomeno, Zito L. Barreto and Alexandrino [HRVD Statements 5674 and 6982-2].

- On 14 November 1997, another Untim demonstration became violent after an argument between students and two plainclothes members of the military. External independent observers found excessive use of force was used by the police, joined by members of Battalions 744 and 511. Five students were hospitalised, some with gunshot wounds.[777] At least 11 were arrested,[778] of whom six were tried under Article 170 (violence against people and property) of the Indonesian Criminal Code (KUHP) for their alleged assault of three members of Battalion 511, Unit C.

SARA and civil unrest

579. Arrests, arbitrary detention and torture were also reported in the 1990s in connection with incidents characterised by the Indonesian security apparatus as cases of SARA (suku, agama, ras, antara golongan, ethnic, religious, racial, inter-group outbursts). Although these spontaneous incidents by East Timorese youth may not always have had a direct connection to the political conflicts, statements provided to the Commission suggest that both sides to the political conflict used the incidents for their own purposes. Pro-independence supporters used them as a platform for demonstrating against the occupation and the Indonesian military and police used them as a pretext for arresting and detaining suspected clandestine members and interrogating them about their clandestine activities. The treatment of detainees arrested in connection with these incidents was often as harsh as that of those detained in other contexts.

580. One reason for the emergence of unrest, particularly conflicts between youth groups, was the growing politicisation of youth in Timor-Leste during this period. In 1994 the military reduced the number of battalions it had stationed in the territory to seven but made up the numbers by forming the Youth Guard Upholders of Integration (Garda Muda Penegak Integrasi, or Gadapaksi). According to Indonesian military documents, 11,000 youths were recruited into Gadapaksi in 1994.[779] Other district militias also formed in the 1990s (see box on the Volunteers Team par. 563, above), while at the same time pro-independence youths were becoming more openly resistant to the regime. These loyalties emerged in various incidents of civil unrest, which began to flare up in the mid-1990s.

581. Many SARA incidents resulted in demonstrations, some of which escalated into riots which were followed by increased arrests and detentions and the ill-treatment and torture of detainees. Some examples reported to the Commission include:

- A religious clash in Uatolari (Viqueque) in September 1995 between Protestant and Muslim youths against Catholic youths. The background to this case is uncertain, but it resulted in Catholic youths burning down Protestant and Muslim places of worship. Most of the Catholic youths ran away but Marcelino Duarte Barros was arrested with ten others by members of Team Saka. He reported their detention and ill-treatment.[780]

- In Maliana (Bobonaro) in early September 1995, a prison officer named Sanusi Abubakar reportedly made insulting remarks about the Catholic faith.[781] Catholic youths and other pro-independence supporters in Maliana responded by demonstrating, threatening to kill Sanusi Abubakar and burning down the Maliana market. The police, ABRI and members of Kodim 1636 arrested the demonstrators. Some managed to flee, such as José Soares Vicente, who escaped to Dili.[782]
- The Commission also heard of the following cases of detention, torture and ill-treatment:

Table 11: The detention and ill-treatment of Marcelino Duarte Barros

Perpetrator	Detention Place	Length of Detention	Torture/Ill-treatment
Team Saka under Commander T486	Team Saka headquarters in Quelicai (Baucau)	Three days	Hit with a metal bar, kicked, stamped on, tied up with wire and eyes covered then forced to lie in the sun for three days.
Brimob	Cell in Baucau New Town	Two days	Ordered to stand in line and run, then beaten. Forced to drink water mixed with urine.
Police	Beloi Polsek	-	Beaten, kicked, punched, sprayed with gas. Interrogated by the police about contact with Falintil and providing food to them in the forest.
Police	Uatolari Polsek (Viqueque), taken there by 12 Brimob members.	One week	Beaten, punched and kicked by an East Timorese intelligence officer, T487.

Table 12: Detention, torture and ill-treatment in Maliana (Bobonaro)

Victim	Perpetrator	Detention Place	Length of Detention	Torture/ill-treatment
Hernani M. de Araújo, a clandestine member of the Sagrada Familia.[783]	ABRI and police.	Kodim 1636 then a police station (unidentified).	One night in the Kodim, then six weeks in a police station. Tried and sentenced to imprisonment in the Maliana Prison.	The military beat the victim, electrocuted him and pulled out his toenails and fingernails with pliers. Police interrogated him and then again beat him, electrocuted him and crushed his toes under the leg of a chair.

Eduardo Lopes, (Lorico Lopes) arrested 18 September 1995.[784]	Police, Corporal T488 led the arresting team.	Police station.	Two months, then sentenced to four years in Maliana Prison.	Victim was beaten and burned with cigarettes. He said police ripped off rosaries around detainees' necks and told them they were "opposing the state".
Laurentina Amaral[785]	-	Kodim 1636.	Three months. She then paid Rp.500.000 for her release.	-
José P. Vicente, of Lebos (Lolotoe, Bobonaro)[*]	Police Officer called T489.	Sub-district police headquarters Maliana.	One day.	Beaten across the head once with a metal baton.

- In Uatolari (Viqueque) in February 1997 a group of pro-integration youths attacked a group of church activists.† The Macadiqui (Uatolari, Viqueque) community told the Commission that people then took to the streets and fought the authorities. Fighting continued for four days, blocking the road in Macadiqui.[786] The number of people arrested during this incident was variously given as 70 (by Colonel Mahidin Simbolon, the Commander of East Timor Sub-Regional Military Command) and 109 (by Deputy Chief of Police for East Timor, Colonel Atok Rismanto).[787] All detainees were taken to the Viqueque Kodim and a military post in Darabai (Uatolari, Viqueque) where they were questioned and released after a few days.

Incidents after the award of Nobel Peace Prize

582. A number of arrests occurred in Dili in December 1996, when Bishop Belo returned to Timor-Leste after receiving the Nobel Peace Prize he shared with José Ramos-Horta. Nationwide celebrations were held on his return,‡ but a number of violent scuffles also occurred, including the beating to death by 26 East Timorese youths of an intelligence officer, Corporal Alfredo de Santo Sigamau. The youths reportedly believed that the corporal was planning to murder the Bishop.§

* José Vicente, a Fretilin member, was arrested by the Kodim again two years later in October 1997 because he was suspected of having mobilised a demonstration which burned down the market. He was detained for three days during which time he was stripped naked, beaten, punched and kicked. In 1999 he was arrested by the KMP militia in Lolotoe and detained for one day [HRVD Statement 7157].

 The community of Macadiqui Village in Uatolari (Viqueque) described the youths as Gadapaksi members. [CAVR, Community Profile Macadiqui Village, Uatolari Sub-district, Viqueque District].

† The Commission does not have clear evidence of the background to this local clash, though the community of Macadiqui Village in Uatolari (Viqueque) told the Commission that the clash continued for four days and involved the local villagers fighting against Indonesian authorities. [CAVR, Community Profile Macadiqui Village, Uatolari, Viqueque District].

‡ CAVR, Community Profile of Bidau Santana Village, Nain Feto/Dili Oriental Sub-district, Dili District. In Baucau a big demonstration was staged on 25 December 1996 [CAVR, Community Profile of Bucoli Village, Baucau Sub-district, Baucau District].

§ According to Hermenegildo Martins, one of those implicated in the killing, a letter was found in Corporal Sigamau's pocket which read: "Whoever successfully kills Bishop Belo will received the amount of Rp1,500,000." [HRVD Statement 3739.]

583. The Indonesian military and police arrested people in response, and took them to the Sub-district police headquarters, the Regional Police Headquarters and the SGI Colmera in Dili. Some were tried and served sentences in the Becora Prison.[788] The police reported that they arrested 13 people in connection with the turmoil in Dili.[789]

584. Hermenegildo Martins, one of the 26 youths implicated in the killing of Corporal Sigamau, was arrested four months after the incident and taken to the Regional Police Headquarters in Dili. Police interrogated him about the killing for three days and during the interrogation they burned him with cigarettes. He was then moved to the Sub-district police headquarters in Dili where 12 police officers ill-treated him, including using a razor to cut his thigh. He was eventually tried for his involvement in the killing and sent to Becora Prison.[790]

Ninja gangs and anti-ninja gangs

During the mid-1990s, as part of the growing politicisation of youth, pro-integration and pro-independence gangs began to form in Dili. The Ninjas were pro-integration youths who dressed in black, covered their heads with a hood and attacked the houses of pro-independence families at night. Although they appear to have been disenchanted youths causing trouble, they seem to have acted in coordination with the military to sow fear in the city.[791]

In response pro-independence activists set up vigilante groups to counter the Ninja attacks, and many were detained by the police. Amnesty International reported that between 18 and 22 February 1995, police and military forces arrested up to 15 individuals in Dili.[792] East Timor's police chief, Andreas Sugianto, stated that 14 people were held, 12 of whom were to be charged for having attempted to set up vigilante groups to counter attacks by the Ninja gangs.[793] On 25 March 1995, an East Timorese SGI agent called T491, arrested two Ojetil[794] members, Carlito and Octavianos in Quintal Bot, Dili. They were taken to the SGI headquarters in Colmera and accused of having taken part in cutting the ear of a Ninja.[795]

The Commission received one statement from a pro-integration youth who was seriously assaulted by pro-independence youths, although it is not clear whether this is the case referred to above. An East Timorese man (who preferred not to be named) told the Commission that on 13 February 1995 he was abducted by four pro-independence youths, T492, T493, T494 and T495. He says they accused him of being a Ninja and of working with the SGI. His house was ransacked, his hands tied and then he was taken to the house of Alves Ribeiro. There, the four youths cut his face with a razor, beat him across the head with a steel baton and then cut off his ear. They then took him to the Santa Cruz village office, tied him to a flag post and beat him until his body was smeared with blood.[796]

The hunt for Falintil leaders in the 1990s

585. Leaders of Falintil controlled the armed, clandestine and diplomatic fronts of the Resistance and therefore remained the prime targets of the Indonesian military throughout the period 1985–1998. The Commission's research suggests that a key strategy in the hunt was the arbitrary detention, interrogation and torture of anyone suspected of having links these leaders. Although such detentions had occurred in earlier years, the statements of victims provided to the Commission suggest that Indonesian efforts to capture Falintil were stepped up in the early 1990s.

586. Sometimes such operations occurred following an incident highlighting the continuing influence of Falintil in Timor-Leste. For example, when the Australian lawyer and journalist Robert Domm managed to meet and interview Xanana Gusmão on 27 September 1990, major intelligence operations were launched to discover who had arranged the meeting.[797]

587. At other times, military operations were launched specifically to root out leaders of the Resistance. During 1991-92, for example, joint military and paramilitary operations were carried out to search for Xanana Gusmão.[798] In 1991 the security forces believed that Xanana Gusmão was in Ainaro, with the result that many people in the district were arrested by Team Sukarelawan (see box following par. 563, above).[799] In 1992 two military operations were carried out in Timor-Leste, Operations I (March–September 1992) and II (October 1992-March 1993) (Operasi Tuntas I and II), which involved the preparation of lists of East Timorese suspected of being in contact with Xanana Gusmão.[800]

588. Detention of suspects tended to be short term and involved interrogation often accompanied by torture or ill-treatment. For example, a woman told the Commission that she was detained in 1991 in Ainaro because she was suspected of giving food to Falintil. She was arrested by the Team Sukarelawan and then interrogated in the Integration Building in Cassa (Ainaro, Ainaro). After the interrogation she was beaten heavily, causing bleeding from her genitals, and then sexually harassed by 38 members of the Team Sukarelawan. She was released after one night.[801]

589. Bendito da Conceição was also arrested in 1991 in Ainaro along with more than 40 other civilians from the village of Suro Kraik (Ainaro, Ainaro) because they had danced at a village party with Xanana Gusmão and other Falintil leaders including Adjunto Maufutu, Konis Santana, Riak Leman and Abia Monaria. Five days after the party, on 25 July 1991, the community was detained by T496, an Indonesian Kopassus member, and two Milsas, T497 and T498. They were interrogated for four hours and then required to dig holes and maintain a lawn at the military post for three years.[802]

590. In Ossu (Viqueque), where several suspects were arrested in late 1992 by Battalions 407 and 503, suspects were taken to the base camp in Viqueque and the post of the non-organic Battalion (BTT) in Ossu. Some detainees were sent to other districts for further investigation. Faustino da Silva was arrested in Ossu along with three others. After a violent interrogation in the Ossu Koramil, in which all the detainees were accused of being part of Xanana Gusmão's network, they were separated. Faustino was taken to the Viqueque Kodim barracks. His friend Rui was detained for three months in the Battalion 503 headquarters, while fellow detainees Alfredo and Tomás were transported to Dili by helicopter for further interrogation.[803] There were also reports of arrests in Dili of people suspected of being in contact with Xanana Gusmão. The arrests were made by Major T499, the Kopassus commander of the SGI Colmera, and by Battalion 745 together with the Koramil Becora.[804]

591. Other arrests connected to the search for Falintil leaders included:

- In the district of Aileu in 1985, 11 people from Liquidoe were arrested by members of the Koramil because they were suspected of hiding senior Fretilin/Falintil members, including Xanana Gusmão. The deponent, Celestino Amaral, did not tell the Commission the length of their detention.[805]
- Jacinto Moniz of Fohorem (Fohorem, Covalima) told the Commission about his arrest on 16 July 1989 on suspicion of hiding Xanana Gusmão. When he did not confess, he was beaten, kicked and punched by Indonesian soldiers in Fohorem.[806]
- In Ossu (Viqueque) in 1992, as well as searching for Xanana Gusmão, Infantry Battalion 407 together with members of Team Makikit and Rajawali targeted individuals suspected of working with the Falintil Commander Falur Rate Laek.[807]
- In the village of Babulu (Same, Manufahi) in 1994, several people were arrested during a joint Kopassus and Milsas search for senior Falintil member Riak Leman (Vidal de Jesus). Some of those arrested had appeared on a list of people accused of involvement in the clandestine network led by Riak Leman, most likely prepared by military intelligence.[808] They were taken to the Manufahi Kodim and Nanggala headquarters and interrogated and tortured for three days. They were then released with the status of "outside detainees" for three months. During this period they were forced to carry poles and cut grass to make a traditional house.[809]
- In the villges of Carau-Balu and Luca (Viqueque, Viqueque) in 1994 and 1997, ABRI soldiers and Rajawali arrested and ill-treated people suspected of having contact with the Falintil commander, Ular.[810]
- Civilians in Baucau, where Falintil commander David Alex operated before his capture and death in 1997, were regularly detained for interrogation about the Falintil leader's whereabouts. Most were held for only a few days of intense interrogation in places such as the Flamboyan Hotel, Rumah Merah and the Ossu Kopassus post in Viqueque.[811] Sometimes whole villages were rounded up. In 1994 ABRI and Team Saka members arrested 24 people in the village of Guruça (Quelicai, Baucau), after rumours that the people of Guruça had been in contact with David Alex. They were taken to the Baucau Kodim where they were held, interrogated and tortured for two days.[812]

592. The Commission also heard of people being made to repudiate the authority of Falintil leaders publicly. In one case, Frederico de Araújo told the Commission how soldiers from Airborne Infantry Battalion 700 arrested him and four others in 1991.

Their hands and feet were tied and they were taken to the Kopassus Post in Mau-Ulo (Ainaro), where they were held for eight months. Frederico says that while in detention he was kicked and punched and on one occasion was left outside in the rain for two days and two nights while tied up. He was also forced to travel around Ainaro telling people that the Falintil leaders Xanana Gusmão, Mauhudu, Mau Hunu and Venancio Ferras were liars. Frederico's wife eventually bribed the Commander of sector B (west), Thamrin, with two woven garments (tais), two chickens and a sword to save Frederico's life.[813]

Xanana Gusmão's arrest

Xanana Gusmão was arrested at 4.00am on 20 November 1992 inside a house in Lahane (Dili) where he had been hiding. The arrest was filmed by the Indonesian authorities and received widespread media coverage throughout Indonesia.[814] He was then kept incommunicado for 17 days, before the ICRC was allowed to see him. During this time he was moved between several locations before being detained at the national police headquarters in Jakarta (Mabes Kepolisian RI), where he was interrogated and suffered ill-treatment.

According to Xanana Gusmão, he was treated with respect during his arrest but was not presented with an arrest warrant. From the house, he was immediately taken to the home of General Theo Syafei, Commander of Operations Implementation Command in East Timor (Kolakops) where he spent one or two hours and was visited by the then commander-in-chief of the Indonesian Armed Forces, Try Sutrisno. He said that both men treated him with respect. Later the same day he was flown to Bali where he was detained at the Regional Military Command (Kodam IX) for three days and three nights.[815] In Bali he was handed over to Kopassus who interrogated him and subjected him to severe sleep deprivation for three days and three nights:

The first method, when I was in Bali, [was that] they did not let me sleep. I was sleepy during the day and they screamed. At night I was sleepy and they also screamed. They talked to me at 2.00am. I remember Yunus Yosfiah, because I knew him from 1983 when he was a major, so he spoke about this and that. He would hit the table and I did the same, we both hit the table.[816]

Xanana Gusmão was then sent to Jakarta to the Strategic Intelligence Body (Badan Intelijen Strategis, Bais) where Hendropriyono visited him and he gave a statement at the State Intelligence Coordination Body (Badan Kordinasi Intelijen Negara Bakin).

Xanana Gusmão was sentenced to life imprisonment in May 1993 and was sent to Cipinang Prison in Jakarta to serve his sentence. In August

1993, President Soeharto reduced the sentence to 20 years. In August 1995, he was held in an isolation cell after he attempted to send an unauthorised letter from the prison to the United Nations Fourth World Conference on Women in Beijing to protect the rights of East Timorese women which, he said, Indonesia had "systematically violated" for 20 years[817] (see Vol. III, Part 7.6: Political Trials.)

593. After Xanana Gusmão's arrest the military and police arrested anyone who was connected to him. In December 1992, only weeks after the arrest, the Secretary-General of the United Nations reported to the Commission on Human Rights that at least 20 of Xanana Gusmão's close associates and relatives had been arrested and detained.[818] Amnesty International alleged that those detained in Dili were subjected to serious maltreatment and torture.[819] The owners of the house in which he was arrested, Aliança Araújo and her husband Augusto Pereira, and their children were taken to the SGI headquarters. They were held there for seven months during which they suffered torture and ill-treatment including Augusto having several toe-nails ripped out with pliers. One of the women later testified that she had been raped.[820]

594. Nine of Xanana Gusmão's family members, according to Asia Watch, were arrested.[821] They included Xanana Gusmão's younger sister Armandina Gusmão, her husband and two of their children. They were arrested soon after his arrest by intelligence police "in the presence of their village headman and were not told why, in violation of the Indonesian Criminal Procedure Code as well as in violation of international standards".[822] The family was taken to the Sub-Regional Police Headquarters and interrogated continuously for three days. Armandina Gusmão told the Commission that police presented evidence to them. The police also took their photos and fingerprints. After three days in the Sub-Regional Police Headquarters, Armandina Gusmão and her husband were blindfolded and taken to the SGI headquarters in separate cars. They spent five months in the SGI headquarters, after which she was taken to Nusra Bhakti for a week.[823]

595. At least one case was reported to the Commission in which a person who had previously been detained for his supposed contact with Xanana Gusmão was rearrested after the capture. In Ainaro, an East Timorese man associated with Xanana Gusmão was called back after being released when Xanana Gusmão was arrested and told to report every morning for a month. Conversely, some people were released from detention as soon as Xanana Gusmão was captured, because they were no longer necessary to obtain his arrest. As Afonso Maria explained:

> Before Xanana Gusmão's arrest they always beat and tortured us. They always asked: "Do you have a network with Xanana?" If you said no, you would be beaten and electrocuted until you said yes. Then they would stop the torture. After Xanana's capture on 20 November they released us.[824]

596. Others were released from reporting obligations or periods of forced labour, but only after they swore allegiance to Indonesia. Vicenti Tavares had been arrested with seven other clandestine members from Carau-Balu in October 1992 by Battalion 407 because they had been in contact with Xanana Gusmão. They had been held for six days but were then required to report to the military post in Ossu (Ossu, Viqueque). After Xanana Gusmão's capture, they were released from their reporting obligations but were made to take an oath (presumably of allegiance to Indonesia) and drink dog's blood before the Muspida, the Tripika and the Korem Commander from Dili.[825]

Olga Corte Real's story

Olga Corte Real became involved with the clandestine movement in 1982, where she and several members of her family met with Falintil members Birak and Kasihan, and discussed the obstacles faced by Falintil. A week later Olga, Petronela and Manuel Corte-Real met with the Falintil commander Mau Hunu in the aldeia of Trilolo, Holarua (Same, Manufahi) to plan clandestine work.

In 1990, Olga worked as a nurse in the community health centre in the village of Datina, Holarua (Same, Manufahi). In August 1990 Olga met with Xanana Gusmão in the aldeia of Kakau Lidin, Bairro Pite (Dom Alexio, Dili) Olga gave an account of her experiences to the CAVR at its National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, 28–29 April 2003.

Maybe ABRI spies reported me for my clandestine activities. On 8 November 1992, an East Timorese police officer named T500 and a number of soldiers from the Manufahi [Kodim] arrested me along with Graciana, Fernando Cardoso and Gabriel C Trindade da Costa. They took us to the Kodim where the East Timorese Kodim Commander T501 and East Timorese battalion Commander 514 were waiting for us. T501 asked me whether my sister Regina and I gave medicine to Xanana in Hoholau. I said that my sister and I had not taken the medicine to Xanana but that we sent it through an estafeta*, António Martins. In fact, my sister and I had delivered the medicine ourselves but I lied [to them].*

Then T501 demanded that we reveal the names of other girls in the [clandestine] network but I told him that the only women in my network were my cousin Graciana, my sister Regina and myself. Actually, there were other women [in the network] such as Angelina da Costa, Fernanda de Jesus, Eleonora Cardoso and Francisca Cardoso. T501 threatened that if he later found out the names of other women he would cut my throat. I said I was prepared to have my throat cut if my information proved to be inaccurate.

As the interrogation went on a member of Nanggala [Kopassus] entered the room. He took me to another house where a police intelligence officer, T490, interrogated me from 9.00am until 3.30pm. A colleague of T490 called T502 entered the room. He swore at me and said that I often had sex with Xanana. T502 then ordered Luis Cardoso and his little brother António Martins to sit on a chair and crush my toes until my nails turned black.

At 10.00am the next morning, 9 November 1992, an ABRI commander arrived from Dili in a helicopter and landed in the base camp. He had a Polaroid camera and took my picture. Then the helicopter took him back to Dili. ABRI escorted us back to Datina at 4.00pm.

They forced me to attend the morning ceremony at the Kodim from 1 January 1993 to April 1994. I attended the ceremony every morning, but my clandestine activities and my ties with Falintil in the mountain continued.[826]

Reprisals for Resistance attacks

597. The pattern of mass arrests of civilians following Falintil attacks on military or government targets continued throughout the period of "normalisation and consolidation", albeit on a smaller scale. The authorities responded to such attacks through the arrests, arbitrary detention, ill-treatment and torture of suspects, usually members of the clandestine movement, but also ordinary civilians.

598. Between 1985 and 1987, the Commission heard of isolated Falintil attacks, mainly in the district of Lautém but also in the district of Manufahi, which brought reprisals from the military.[827] In the 1990s, police and local paramilitary groups became more involved in the crackdowns and in the detention and torture of suspects. The following examples are the main Falintil incidents known to the Commission in the 1990s. Testimony received by the Commission from victims of the military and police crackdowns suggest that the standard response was detention, often involving torture and other cruel and inhuman treatment. These examples are:

- Baucau Town in October 1992 following a Falintil killing
- Ermera, 1996, following a Falintil killing of a civilian
- Brimob attacks in Dili and Baucau, May 1997
- Attacks in Manufahi, 1998.

Baucau, October 1992

599. The Commission received one statement about the killing of an Indonesian civilian from Sulawesi by Falintil on 5 October 1992 at a restaurant in the Old Town of Baucau. Jerónimo Paulo Freitas told the Commission about the event and then explained that five days later members of Infantry Battalion 315 and Team Saka arrested him on suspicion of involvement in the crime. Jerónimo was active in the clandestine network in Baucau. A Team Saka member, T503, struck him in the back with a rifle and then took him to the Baucau Kodim. There, one East Timorese member of the military identified as T504 interrogated Jerónimo about the incident while another East Timorese member of the military, T505, tortured him by beating him with a wooden bar and punching and kicking him. Jerónimo told the Commission that he was then put into a black bag and taken to the village of Gariuai (Baucau, Baucau), where he was thrown into a toilet and left for 13 days with only banana skins and salt to eat.[828]

Ermera, October 1996

600. The Commission heard of another Indonesian civilian killed by Falintil four years later, in Ermera in October 1996, which also led to arrests of civilians. The Commission was told that a Falintil member killed an Indonesian cloth trader in Ermera because he suspected the man of working for the intelligence.[829] This time the police, rather than the military, arrested young pro-independence activists from a number of villages in the area.

601. João Alves Trinidade told the Commission that on 16 October 1996, seven youths from the aldeia Lekesi (Railaco, Ermera) – João Alves Trinidade, Eduardo dos Santos, Gaspar dos Santos, Silvestre Martins, João, Luis Salsinha, Joel Assuncão Neves – were arrested by armed East Timorese police officers T506, T507, T508, T509, T510 and Indonesian police officers T511, T512 dan T513. The police tied the detainees' hands, then dragged them down the slope of a mountain and beat them with wood. The group later suffered further torture and ill-treatment at the Gleno (Ermera) police station. João Alves Trinidade told the Commission:

> At the Gleno Sub-district police headquarters the police ordered us to strip naked and put us in a cell. [They] electrocuted us, squeezed and pulled our genitals. They hit us and kicked us until our bodies were swollen. They hit our heads and forced us to make a statement detailing things that we did not do...They detained us for two months.[830]

602. João Alves Trinidade and his friends were held in the Ermera police station for two months and then tried. They began their ten-year prison sentence in Becora Prison but escaped on 11 September 1999 after the Popular Consultation.[831]

603. The police officer, T506, also reportedly arrested Julito Babo in Darhetu Mate, Ponilala (Ermera, Ermera). T506 took Julito Babo to the Gleno police station where he stripped him of his wallet, crucifix and clothing. He then tied Julito Babo to a cross, in a parody of Jesus, and beat him until late that night. He then grabbed a gecko and forced Julito Babo to eat it, and told him to lick food scraps from the floor.[832]

604. The Commission also received one statement suggesting that the families of youth members of the clandestine network also suffered arbitrary detention and ill-treatment. Amalia Alexio Martins told the Commission that after her sons Eduardo dos Santos and Gaspar dos Santos had been arrested, a police officer called T512 came and arrested her and her husband Pedro Martins on 16 October 1998 in Poetete (Ermera, Ermera). They were arbitrarily detained in the Ermera police station and ill-treated to try to force them to give evidence against their children. Amalia Martins said that T512 interrogated her while beating her, pulling her hair, threatening to strip off her clothes and then shoving her up against the door. After four days they were released but were required to report every day and police officer T506 extorted Rp900,000, two goats, six chickens, a dog and daily money for cigarettes from her and her husband.[833]

Attacks around the time of the 1997 Indonesian national election

605. In 1997, a spate of Falintil attacks occurred around the time of the Indonesian national election on 29 May 1997.* According to Amnesty International 42 people, including police and Falintil fighters, were killed in these attacks.† The two largest attacks were made on mobile police brigade (Brimob) units:

- The first attack was made by pro-independence youths in Dili on 28 May 1997. At around 10.00pm, 15 youths attacked a Brimob guard post in Bairro Pite, a suburb of Dili.‡ They wounded five police officers and one of the youths stole a rifle, although he later threw it in the gutter.[834] Five of the attackers were shot and killed in the attack.
- The second attack was carried out by Falintil on 31 May in the sub-disrict of Quelicai (Baucau). Falintil attacked Hino trucks carrying 26 Brimob police and two soldiers who were delivering a Popular Consultation box for the count in Baucau. They threw a grenade into a truck causing a drum of gasoline to explode. As a result of the explosion 13 of the people in one of the trucks were burned to death. Falintil then shot four more people as they tried to escape.[835] Francisco da Costa, involved in the attack, describes the incident:

> That afternoon, the police were supposed to return the Popular Consultation boxes to Baucau for counting. So the police…loaded several police cars with the Popular Consultation boxes and took them to Baucau with tight security escort. Midway, near the village of Abafala and Quelicai, [Falintil] soldiers stopped the cars and attacked the police, causing a significant number of casualties among the police officers.[836]

* According to HRW, another attack related to the Indonesian national election took place in Seisal (Baucau) on 29 May, where a polling place was attacked by an unidentified group. One election official, Abinau Salay, who was a member of Wanra, was hacked with a machete and wounded. Ten people were arrested. [Human Rights Watch, Deteriorating Human Rights Situation in East Timor, CAVR Archives at HRW East Timor\reports\1997\indtimor\index.html]. According to João Bosco, an election-related attack in Daraqua (Laga, Baucau) took place on 27 May 1997 [CAVR Interview with João Bosco, Quelicai, Baucau, 2 September 2004].

† According to the East Timor Police Colonel Jusuf Mucharam during the month of May 1997, 17 civilians were killed by Falintil (including 10 in Lospalos 10, two in each of Baucau and Liquiçá, and one in each of Viqueque, Ermera and Ainaro). [AI UA 391/97].

‡ According to Romeo da Conceição [HRVD Statement 5074] the youths were acting under orders of Kaixa Koto Morok; according to Reinaldo Marchal, they were acting under orders of Xanana Gusmão and Taur Matan Ruak; and according to Mariano Soares acting under the orders of Taur Matan Ruak and Commander Region II, Sabica.

606. The deputy police chief of Timor-Leste, Police Colonel Jusuf Mucharam, reported that around 120 members of the Resistance were arrested by the authorities in connection with these attacks and ambushes in different parts of the territory.*

Arrests following the Dili attack

607. The ten youths left alive after the attack in Dili were able to flee the scene but at least nine of them (nine names have been identified to the Commission) were later arrested or turned themselves in. They were Francisco da Silva, Reinaldo Marcal, Adalio Barreto, Domingos Barros, Abeto Soares, Frederico Soares, João da Cunha, EIgidio da Cunha, Francisco da Conceição, Romeo da Conceição and Mariano Soares. David Dias Ximenes, considered by the authorities to be the mastermind behind this attack, was also arrested on 31 May at his home.[837] His wife was detained soon after.[838] Other civilians who had not been involved in the attack were also arrested, not only in the Dili area. Francisco Garcia Correia and a man named João were arrested in Manatuto.[839]

608. All detainees known to the Commission (except for João from Manatuto who was kept in Manatuto) were taken to the Dili district police station. There they were interrogated and suffered torture and ill-treatment.[840] Francisco Garcia Correia told the Commission that he was beaten and kicked by five policemen and then put in a bag and hung up.[841] Romeo da Conceição, one of those who turned themselves in to the district police on 31 May 1997, told the Commission:

> They swore at us and then told us to strip off our clothes. Then they hit me in the groin and a police officer, M283, electrocuted me. At meal times they told us to dance before we could eat. They detained and tortured us for six months. In January 1998, they transferred us to Becora Prison and the guards there also tortured us.[842]

609. For the nine suspected perpetrators of the attack, the interrogations were carried out by the district police and intelligence. Mariano da Costa Sarmento Soares, for example, was interrogated by Indonesian police officer T515, Lieutenant T516 and an intelligence officer named T517.[843] David Ximenes, because of his suspected role as organiser, was interrogated by a military team from Jakarta, including the military commander for Timor-Leste, Major General T518. Soon after David Ximenes's arrest, Brimob also arrested his wife and child and took them to the District police station.

610. According to Reinaldo Marcal, after the police had interrogated them they were taken to the SGI headquarters for interrogation by Kopassus. Kopassus members hit them with a rifle and crushed their feet under the leg of a chair while asking them who was behind the attack. The men answered that they organised the attack themselves:

* "26 people, who launched an attack against Company A of Mobile Brigade Police Brimob in Bairro Pite, Dili, (28/5), have been arrested" [Apakabar Online news service, apakabar@clark.net 9 June 1997].

They said: "We don't believe it. There must be someone who ordered it and we don't know him", and then continued with the torture. And they said: "You must tell the truth, otherwise we will take you to Tacitolu tonight."[844]

611. The Kopassus members took them to Tacitolu where they threatened them, before returning them to the district police. There they were again interrogated while being kicked, beaten with a wooden club and threatened that they would be killed because they were traitors. The interrogation, ill-treatment and torture continued for a week until they were forced to sign a letter written by their captors. They signed it because they felt threatened by the armed guards.[845]

612. The detainees were then sent to Becora Prison, where they spent a month in the dark cell. They were ill-treated further by guards at Becora as well as T519, an Indonesian. They were required to strip off their clothes, only wearing underwear. They were beaten, kicked and given electric shocks.[846]

613. Nine of the suspected perpetrators were put on trial and sentenced to ten years imprisonment. They were imprisoned in Becora. David Ximenes was released without trial after a few days.[847]

Arrests following the attack in Quelicai (Baucau)

614. The attack in Quelicai in May 1997 also prompted a military crackdown involving the arbitrary detention and torture of suspected perpetrators of the attacks, suspected organisers, known clandestine members and ordinary civilians in the sub-districts of Quelicai and Vemasse in Baucau.[*] The operation resulted in the arrest (and killing) on 25 June 1997 of the senior Falintil commander David Alex, whom the military believed had masterminded the attack, along with six others.[†‡]

615. In most of the arrests reported to the Commission the military worked together with Team Saka, sometimes accompanied by members of Team Rajawali, Brimob or Hansip. Where the arrest was of a suspected perpetrator of the attack, it was carried out by a large group comprising various institutions. Detainees were taken to either

* Arrests in connection to the attack also took place in Dili: David Dias Ximenes and his wife. Also in Ainaro: Francisco Magno, José Acacio and his wife [Amnesty International Urgent Action 391/97].

† HRVD Statement 7681; Human Rights Watch, Deteriorating Human Rights Situation in East Timor, CAVR Archive at HRW East Timor\reports\1997\indtimor\index.html. According to Amnesty International, also arrested with him were José Antonio Belo, Césario da Costa, Gil da Costa, Guilherme dos Santos. [AI Index: ASA 21/54/97].

‡ In response to the death of David Alex, Falintil also arrested some people whom they suspected of cooperating with the military, leading to his arrest. "On 24 August 1997, at 4.00 three Falintil members went to Mamutu in Samalari Village (Baucau, Baucau) and arrested the child of Joana Martins called Justino Sarmento because he was accused of being involved in the capture of David Alex in Bahu Village, Baucau by ABRI. After they arrested him, the three Falintil tied Justino Sarmento's hands and ordered him to kneel. They started to interrogate him with questions such as 'Do you know of the capture of David Alex in Uaidei?'" [HRVD Statement 7721].

the Quelicai Koramil, the district police in Dili or the Baucau District police station,* and many were moved around between different places for interrogation.[848] The interrogation of the detainees was generally conducted by the Koramil commander or Team Saka commanders such as T520 and T521 and accompanied by ill-treatment and torture carried out by members of Team Saka or the police.

616. The precise number of people arrested in relation to the attack is unclear, although it is known that 19 people were eventually charged and that one died. Many arrests were carried out against ordinary civilians from villages in the sub-district of Quelicai, who had no involvement in the attack and who were detained for only a short period of interrogation.[849] Constâncio Gaio, for example, told the Commission that he was a farmer and cattle-herder, but that he was arrested when ABRI soldiers came from Baucau to pick up the corpses of the Brimob killed in the attack. He was taken to the Baucau District police station where he was beaten, kicked and stabbed with a rifle and then interrogated about the event. He was released after three days.[850]

617. Those suspected of direct or indirect involvement in the attack were held for longer periods.[851] Clandestine member Luis Maria da Silva (Maukiak) was arrested in connection with the attack with several others on 5 June 1997 by members of Brimob, the police, Team Sera, Team Rajawali, Team Saka commander T521 and his deputy, T523. Francisco da Costa, one of those involved in the attack, was arrested on 6 June 1997.[852] João Bosco was arrested at church as he left Mass on 8 June 1997 by Koramil and members of Team Saka.[853]

618. All three were taken first to the Quelicai Koramil where they were beaten and tortured by Team Saka commanders, including T521. João Bosco was also beaten by Koramil soldiers and T524, an East Timorese intelligence officer, at the Koramil. Francisco da Costa described being tortured by members of Team Saka for two days:

> They grabbed a piece of wood and tied it between my legs. Then they beat and kicked me. My bones were broken and I could not move my jaw because it was swollen and weak. I bled but they continued beating me until all of my teeth were broken and scattered on the ground. They tortured me for two days.[854]

619. The detainees were moved from the Koramil to the Baucau police station. Luis Maria da Silva spent only two hours there, being beaten by police, before he was moved to the Rumah Merah for six days where members of the military beat him. Francisco da Costa and João Bosco spent several days at the police station and João Bosco described being tortured there by the Indonesian Sub-district police captain, T525. On 11 June 1997, all three, along with Marcus Ximenes, Mário Filipe and

* According to Human Rights Watch those arrested on June 5 were taken to the Kodim. [Human Rights Watch, Deteriorating Human Rights Situation in East Timor, CAVR Archive at HRW East Timor\reports\1997\indtimor\index.html.]

Januario Martins, were moved to the Regional Police Headquarters in Dili where they were held and interrogated for several months.* Mário Filipe described the interrogation routine at the Dili District police station:

> The interrogation method was that one person asked the questions and four people tortured me. While one person interrogated me, the four others kicked me from behind, from the sides and from the front, so I could not speak calmly. They fed me once a day. The Red Cross visited me. One day before the Red Cross came, they cleaned all the rooms and fed me three meals a day. But once the Red Cross left, they returned to their old practice. They let us sleep on the floor in a dirty room, and sometimes they did not even give us food.[855]

620. The conditions in the District police station were particularly inhuman. Detainees described their treatment:

> They spilled the food onto the floor and asked the prisoners to lick it clean.[856]
>
> Sometimes, they mixed the food with glass fragments and forced people to eat. They also forced prisoners to roll on the floor until it was dry like a human mop.[857]

621. After their time in the District police station, the Baucau clandestine members were sent back to the Baucau police station where they were held until their trial. Francisco da Costa was detained for six months by the police in Baucau.[858]

622. Eventually 19 people were put on trial in Baucau and the Commission was told that one person, Januario Martins, died while in custody.† Of those who survived, 16 received sentences of between nine and 15 years; José Maria and Francisco da Costa received the death penalty. Sixteen were sent to Kalisosok in Surabaya (East Java, Indonesia) after they accepted their sentence. Both Francisco da Costa and Luis da Silva refused to accept their sentences and so remained in Baucau until 1999.[859]

623. An overview of Luis Maria da Silva's experience of detention and torture highlights the familiar pattern of moving detainees between various places of detention, the close relationship between the military, police and local militias in the detention, interrogation, ill-treatment and torture of detainees, and the almost routine use of torture during interrogation.[860]

* Francisco da Costa says that it was more than one month; Luis da Silva was held for two months and João Bosco told the Commission that all were held for three months.

† According to João Bosco:"They beat Januario Martins to death when they got to the Dili Regional Police Headquarters [Polda] on 11 June 1997." [CAVR Interview with João Bosco, Quelicai, Baucau, 2 September 2004].

Table 13: Overview of Luis Maria da Silva's detention, torture and ill-treatment
Detention	Length	Torture/ill-treatment	Perpetrator
Quelicai Koramil	1 day	"They beat, hit and kicked me until my body was swollen and I collapsed."	Team Saka commander T521
Police, Sub-district Baucau	2 hours	Beating and hitting.	Police
Rumah Merah, Baucau	6 days	"They beat, kicked and stepped on me again until I bled from my mouth, nose and ears. I fell into unconsciousness. When I woke up, they beat me again."	Military
Police, District Dili	2 months	"Before I entered my cell they tied my hands and body with a rope and beat me, dragged me and threw me and six other people I did not know into the toilet."	Police
Police, Sub-distrct Baucau	1 month	"They hit and beat me until my body became swollen. They poured hot water on my body. A police officer gave me rice mixed with needle shards and glass fragments."	Police
Baucau Prison	Served sentence

624. In addition to those detained in Baucau, the Commission was told of the arrest of a senior clandestine member in Dili. Vasco da Gama (Mauleki), a clandestine leader, was arrested in June 1997 on suspicion of having ordered the Quelicai attack and for other suspected clandestine activities. Rajawali, Kopassus, police and members of the Koramil under the orders of Captain T527 from Kupang and his East Timorese deputy, T528, carried out the arrest. They covered Vasco da Gama's eyes with black cloth, tied his hands behind his back and beat him on the way from his house to the police station. They also questioned him on the Brimob attack and on who had ordered the election boycott. Vasco da Gama (Mauleki) told the Commission:

> I did not confess. So as soon as I arrived at the entrance to the police station they rolled my body in a drum full of water. Then, with my body all swollen, they put me in a cell for interrogation. Fifteen minutes later they started to beat and kick me and they cuffed my hands. Then someone tied my legs to the chair. I did not know who it was, because they covered my eyes with a black cloth.[861]

625. The next day he was further questioned by Police Sergeant Major T529 from Kupang and Lieutenant Colonel T530, who wanted to obtain information on different clandestine leaders in the interior as well as in Dili. Vasco da Gama was accused of giving Rp9 million to the clandestine movement to fund a demonstration. When he did not confess, T529 started to beat him with an iron stick and a rifle butt, and kicked him. He put a gun into Vasco da Gama's mouth and threatened to shoot if he did not name names. Four days later Indonesian Colonel T531 interrogated him again about the names of other clandestine members.[862]

Police

As the above case studies demonstrate, the police began taking a more active role in the arrest and detention of politically-related suspects in the 1990s. This occurred at both a local level and the national level.

One reason for this was the "normalisation" of the province of Timor-Leste which meant, in part, that the territory was no longer regarded a war zone and therefore the police had greater responsibility for security. As early as 1983, when political detainees began to be tried, they and their files were handed over for processing through the court system (see Vol. III, Part 7.6: Political Trials).

Police treatment of detainees

Arrest by the police did not necessarily mean better treatment. Arrest warrants were rarely used and detainees were kept incommunicado for days or weeks and often did not have access to a lawyer before the day their trial opened. Police were also identified as perpetrators in many cases of ill-treatment and torture reported to the Commission. They were also named in cases where detainees were held in appalling conditions without food or drink.

Police and the military

In many cases, particularly up until the early 1990s, the police and the military worked together in making arrests and obtaining information. Until 1998, the police force was formally part of the military within the Indonesian system, and generally assumed a subservient status within that system. The maintenance of law and order and upholding of the rule of law was often secondary to the achievement of military objectives in the context of conflict (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict).

The statement by Constâncio da Costa dos Santos (Akita) to the Commission illustrates the increasingly important role played by the police. He told the Commission about his arrest for bringing a bomb into Dili from Indonesia. The bomb was intended to be used to blow up a police post in September 1997. Authorities in Timor-Leste had been tipped off about his arrival and when his boat came into the Dili Harbour the police and the SGI commanders as well as the then

Kopassus commander, Major General Prabowo Subianto, the Korem chief of staff, Lieutenant Colonel Tono Suratman and the Korem commander, Colonel Sidabutar were waiting for him.* [863]

Constâncio was arrested by the police and taken to the police station. However, the interrogation was conducted by the SGI commander. He was interrogated from 10.00am until 2.00am the next morning, mainly on whether there was cooperation between Falintil and international terrorist groups. Because he refused to answer their questions, he was beaten, burned with cigarettes and handcuffed from behind and ordered to hold a heavy telephone directory. According to Constâncio, the police at the Sub-district police station did not take part in his ill-treatment.

The following day Zacky Anwar Makarim, head of the armed forces intelligence agency (Badan Inteligensi ABRI, BIA), came from Jakarta to see Constâncio. Constâncio told the Commission that when SGI members took him to see Zacky Anwar, the police captain did not agree to let him out of police custody. He eventually agreed under the condition that some members of the police would accompany the SGI members to the military chief's house.

Constâncio was taken from the Sub-district station to the military commander's house for dinner. They spoke at length, and he recalls:

I was surprised at what Zacky told us, because he talked about the movement's activities in Java as if he were East Timorese. He knew everything. I mean, all about the movement's activities in Java and its ties with Dili, the Resistance groups, the student organisations and other organisations in Java.

After his "interrogation" he was brought back to the Sub-district police headquarters, where he was held for two months.

When members of SGI asked the police captain whether they could take him out at night for questioning, they were refused permission. Police officers told Constâncio that he might have "disappeared" if the SGI had arrested him rather than the police.

Liquiçá, July 1997

626. The Commission received statements about arrests after a Falintil killing of three Rajawali members in the village of Darulete (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) in mid-July 1997. Members of the community of Maumeta (Bazartete, Liquiçá) described how members of the Liquiçá Kodim and the SGI arrested civilians they suspected of involvement in the attack.[864] Those arrested were taken to the Liquiçá Sub-district police station,[865] the

* While on his way from Semarang by boat, another bomb accidentally blew up inside the house of clandestine members in Demak, Semarang (Java, Indonesia). As a result, the police and military in Timor-Leste were informed that Constâncio was on a boat on his way to Dili and they waited for him at the harbour.

Liquiçá Koramil[866] and the Kodim.[867] Jacinto da Costa, one of the detainees, described his arrest, interrogation and torture:

> On Thursday 31 July 1997, at 2.00pm, the Kodim members T532 and T533 led around 20 ABRI soldiers to my house. T533 asked for my identity card, which I showed him. Then he told me to get into a Hino truck, where I saw eight of my friends already sitting, including Francisco, Marcelino, Adelino Vidigal, Silvino dos Santos, António de Jesus, Guilherme, Armindo and António Vidigal. They took us to the village office in Darulete. As we got out of the truck, T534 tore my shirt. Then he ordered us to return to the truck and took us to Kodim 1638 in Liquiçá. There, ten members of SGI questioned us, and separated me from my friends. They took me to the Koramil and put me in a room. T534 forced me to take off all my clothes except my underwear. Soon, between ten and 15 SGI members came and beat me with rifles, and slapped, punched and hit me over the head with bamboo until I was bleeding. They asked me where Falintil was and I said I did not know. They tortured me. They cut my face with a razor, beat me, kicked me, slapped me, punched and kicked me non-stop for three days.[868]

627. After their interrogation and torture, Jacinto da Costa and Silvino dos Santos were taken back to the Darulete village office by four members of SGI and Rajawali. They were held there for two days without food but were then allowed to go home. The next day, however, Rajawali came and took the two men to the Liquiçá Kodim and then the Liquiçá Koramil, where again the military ordered them to strip down to their underwear and soldiers beat, kicked, slapped and punched them. Jacinto da Costa told the Commission that a member of ABRI, T535, kicked him until he lost consciousness. When he woke up an hour later his face was sliced with a razor and pricked with nails. After a few days the two were moved again to the Liquiçá Sub-district police station, where they were detained for four months and 18 days. Finally, they were moved to the Becora Prison where Jacinto's head was shaved and he was interrogated. He remained in Becora Prison for seven months.[869]

Two Falintil incidents in Alas (Manufahi), late 1998

628. In October and November 1998, two attacks on the Indonesian military in Manufahi led to a harsh military response and a large number of cases of detention, torture and ill-treatment of civilians. Much of the violence was perpetrated by the ABLAI militia with the support of the military, foreshadowing the violence to come in 1999.

The first attack

629. The first attack was the spontaneous killing of three people during a meeting between the community in Weberek, Dotik Village (Alas, Manufahi) and Falintil under the Falintil commander T536 on 28 October 1998. According to Alexandro da Costa, two Kopassus soldiers arrived in a car and when they insisted on passing, Falintil took their weapons. Mateus da Costa Amaral told the Commission that four Kopassus soldiers were captured by pro-independence youths at the meeting. Three of the captives were killed; one managed to escape and to report the incident to Dili.[870]

630. On the evening of the day of the attack, a combined force of military, Brimob, the Bimpolda and T537, a member of Koramil, attacked Weberek. The Commission was told that 16 people were detained following this attack, though it has only received the names of five people who were detained: Mateus da Costa Amaral, Alexandre, João Maia, Patricio da Costa and Alexandro da Costa.* It is possible that two young women, Vicentina Fernandes and Etelvina Fernandes Dias, were also arrested. Mateus da Costa said that he and three others were thrown into a Hino truck and beaten before being taken to the Same Sub-district police station. They were thrown into a chicken coop until being taken out for interrogation. Mateus da Costa told the Commission:

> A member of Brimob came in then and pulled out a table to put onto our toes. They interrogated one of us while beating the four others with their rifles. They stripped us naked and told us to scrape our bodies against the walls. Then they ordered us to kneel, and kicked us. An, [Indonesian] soldier, T538…came and asked: "Do you recognise me or not?" (He asked this question three times). I said: "No!" Then he drew his knife and cut my ears. Because they weren't completely cut off, he pulled my ears until they were completely severed. He stabbed my chest, put his gun in my mouth, stripped [my clothes off] me, kicked and beat me…until I fell to the ground. He rested for a while before he grabbed the tail of a stingray and rubbed it on the nape of my neck. He asked me to kneel and forced me to smell human faeces and lick faeces in the toilet. Then a police officer from Bali came with food and hot water and told me: "You pray in your heart."
>
> Nanggala and Milsas† blindfolded me and took me in a jeep to the Bolmeta Bridge in Same. They stopped to kill me, but their commander suddenly spoke on the radio and told them not to kill me. They took me back to Same and treated my wounds. At 4.00am they took me to Same police station and gave me clothes to wear.[871]

631. Alexandro da Costa said that he was arrested the next day, 29 October, when he went to Dotik to deliver some items for the church. ABRI soldiers in Dotik chased him and shot at him but missed. When they caught him he was arrested and beaten with a rifle-butt, and kicked and punched to the ground until he was bleeding. He was then thrown into a hole, boiling water was poured over him, he was dragged by the hair and they burned his skin. The soldiers then took him to join the other detainees at the Same police station.[872]

632. On 20 November 1998 some of the detainees were released and six others were taken to the Dili District police station and detained for nine months until July 1999.[873]

* Other victims named were also named in statements describing the attack on the Alas Koramil, 12 days later.

† Milsas is an abbreviation of "militerisasi" meaning militarisation. Milsas were former Hansip who after three months in Bali and Java, become members of the military [see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation].

The second attack

633. The second attack occurred nearly two weeks later, on 9 November 1998, and was carried out by Falintil and local villagers.* According to Human Rights Watch, the attack was staged to capture Siswanto, the officer who managed to escape from Weberek. The group attacked the Alas Koramil and killed three Indonesian soldiers, took 36 rifles and at least 13 (mostly East Timorese) soldiers with them to the mountains for two nights before they were released.† The attack on the Alas Koramil, like the attacks 16 years earlier on the Koramil in Hato Builico (Ainaro), brought heavy retaliation from the military, involving widespread arbitrary detention, ill-treatment and torture.[874]

634. The Falintil perpetrators were arrested by Marine Battalion 301, Infantry Battalion 744 and Infantry Battalion 745 one week after the attack and were taken to the Manufahi Kodim.[875] The military continued to look for other perpetrators and the whereabouts of the stolen weapons. It began arresting civilians in Alas, as well as anyone suspected of involvement in either the attack or the clandestine movement (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearanceson killings of civilians during this crackdown).

635. Also reminiscent of communities' experiences in the early 1980s, many citizens of Alas fled in fear of the coming military response. Others were ordered to go to the church by the village head and other local leaders.[876] The community did not find safety in the church however. The Alas Koramil commander, an East Timorese officer named T539, went to the church soon after the attack and started interrogating people on the whereabouts of the weapons. ABRI soldiers who accompanied him beat several people.[877]

636. On 14 November, the commander of ABLAI militia in Alas, along with T540,‡ T541,[878] T542,[879] T543[880] and the Alas Sub-district Administrator, T544, came to the church. They allowed some people to leave but took others to the Alas Primary School. There, members of Infantry Battalion 744 and T434, the head of intelligence from the Manufahi Kodim 1634, again tried to find out about the weapons by forcing people to point out the hiding place.[881] They threatened that anyone who had not given information by 4.00pm would be shot dead or buried alive.[882] The village head, T541 (reportedly an ABLAI commander), together with ABLAI members T550 and T551, verbally and physically harassed the detainees, insulting them and pulling their genitals.[883] The civilians were arbitrarily detained in the primary school for about one

* According to HRVD Statement 1531 Falintil under leadership of Commander T545, T546, T547. Human Rights Watch also said that it was an armed group of some 50 to 80 men, including some Falintil but mostly villagers from around the village of Taitudak (Alas, Manufahi). [http::/hrw.org/press98/nov/etimor1123.htm].

† The soldiers reported to have been abducted were Luis Fasalo, Henriques Morato, José Pereira, Manuel Oliveira, José Conceição, António da Costa, Felisberto, Mateus Conceição, José Fernandes, Thomás Martins and Francisco O P Seak [HRVD Statement 9019) and João Baptista and Manuel dos Santos who were held for a longer period; http::/hrw.org/press98/nov/etimor1123.htm; HRVD Statements 1566 and 9019].

‡ According to HRVD Statement 1510, a Babinsa; according to HRVD Statement 1568, a commander of the ABLAI militia – the same person could have held both positions.

month under harsh conditions, food was scarce and visits from the members of the Church or family were not allowed.[884]

637. The Commission heard that, on 17 November, T541 moved a group of detainees to an empty house.[885] There, Koramil commander T539 and the head of intelligence, T434, further tortured and interrogated the prisoners. Flaminia da Costa, a 20-year-old clandestine member who had been taken to the house told the Commission that they were interrogated about their role in the clandestine movement and she was slapped hard ten times until blood came out of her mouth:

> They told us: "If any of the soldiers in Same disappear, you are the ones who will be targeted. Even if you flee to the eastern region, we will hunt you down and catch you."[886]

638. They were then taken to the Alas Koramil and held for one month, where T539 interrogated them and T434 tortured them.[887]

639. In addition to those who fled to the church, many other civilians were also arbitrarily arrested, interrogated and ill-treated. Victims of these violations reported that a variety of perpetrators were involved, including:

- Koramil members including Koramil commander T539, T552 and T553 and intelligence section head T434[888]
- Members of the ABLAI militia including T554, T555 and T556[889]
- Infantry Battalion 744[890]
- Police including an Indonesian named T557 and an East Timorese named T558[891]
- Village heads (also named as ABLAI commanders) T541 and T540[892]
- Milsas T559,[893] T560[894] and T561.[895]

640. Detainees were taken to the primary school, the Alas Koramil, the Alas Nanggala Post, the police station, the ABLAI militia headquarters and private houses, including the house of the village head of Taitudak, T562.[896] Most detainees were held and interrogated for a few days, but some were held for several weeks. Many were beaten, punched and threatened with rifles and knives. Some were ordered by Infantry Battalion 744 to look for the missing weapons.[897]

641. In one case, an East Timorese man told the Commission that he was arrested on 13 November 1998 with eight of his friends. They had no knowledge of the Falintil incident in Alas but were arrested by village head and ABLAI Commander T540 and ABLAI militia member T556 in Taitudak. They were taken to T562's house in the village of Taitudak where they were beaten and tortured. The next morning they were taken to Beroban, Taitudak (Alas, Manufahi) where soliders from Infantry Battalion 744 and Infantry Battalion 745 beat them, and later returned to Alas where the beatings continued. They were then detained at ABLAI militia T554's house for six days and during this time they carried out forced labour.[898]

642. José Tilman also told the Commission of the detention of five young female students from the Alas SMP (junior high school), who were also clandestine members. They were detained for two nights in the old police station because they were suspected of helping Falintil.* They were detained by members of the ABLAI militia and military.[899]

Detention, torture and ill-treatment by the Indonesian occupation authorities, 1999

643. This section looks at the nature and extent of arbitrary detention, ill-treatment and torture committed in 1999. 1999 is considered separately in this Report because of the unique set of circumstances in which detentions took place: the Popular Consultation which divided the community; the coercive and violent campaigning techniques used, including the attempted suppression of the pro-independence movement, the creation and arming of militia groups to implement these techniques; mass recruitment, often forcible, into militia groups; the presence of United Nations staff from June to oversee the Popular Consultation; and finally the extreme violence and devastation that occurred following the Popular Consultation. The unwillingness of the authorities to prevent or punish those committing acts of violence was, as documented in earlier sections of this part and in other sections of this Report, normal. What was unusual, in 1999, was that such conduct should occur in the context of a process under international supervision and under an international treaty which bound Indonesia to ensure that the Popular Consultation took place in secure conditions.

644. Arbitrary arrest, detention and torture reached its highest peak since the late 1970s in 1999. However, the patterns of arbitrary detention, ill-treatment and torture differed from previous years in their purpose, form, targets and perpetrators. These patterns are considered in detail below.

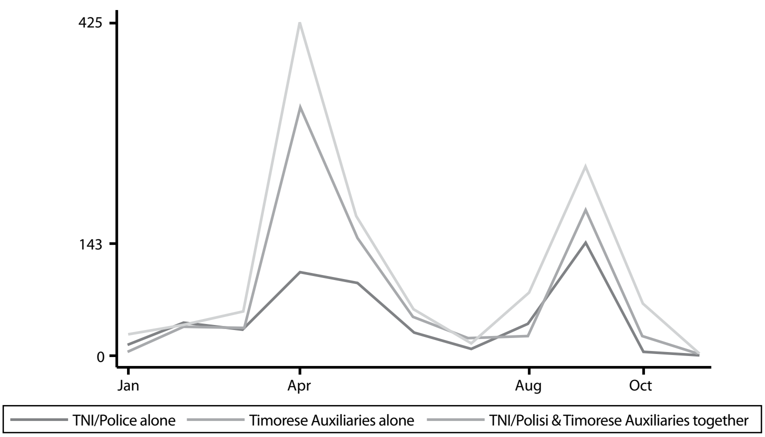
645. The seeds that eventually brought about massive violence and devastation were being germinated from late 1998 (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict, par. 562 ff: the Popular Consultation). It was at this time that plans for the creation of the militias were first drawn up, and the main perpetrators of the violence of 1999 were already making their presence felt by late 1998. Arbitrary detention, ill-treatment and torture began to increase at this time, for example in the mass arrests in Alas (Manufahi).

646. This part considers some broad patterns of detention and torture in 1999, both quantitative and qualitative, including the way in which detainees were held and the reasons for their detention. It then examines the pattern of detentions and torture over time in the following phases:

- November 1998–March 1999, during which plans for a Popular Consultation were drawn up and announced and militias were formed
- April 1999, in which militias began recruiting youths and conducting operations throughout the territory

* They were Joana Alves, Antonina Alves, Artunisa Fernandes, Anunciacão and Filomena.

- May 1999, after the Indonesian police were given responsibility for security
- June–August 1999, during the UNAMET presence and preparation for the Popular Consultation
- September–October 1999, after the announcement of the result of the Popular Consultation.



Statistical profile of detention, torture and ill-treatment in 1999

647. The patterns over time and space for detentions and torture in 1999 are almost identical to other violations in the same year, such as extra-judicial killings and sexual violations.

Patterns over time for both detention and torture

648. The following graphs show the patterns of detentions and torture (see par. 660 below) in 1999 by month.

Reported acts of detention attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

649. Almost all detentions, tortures and ill-treatments were reported to have occurred in the months of April, May and September of 1999, as shown in the graph above. However the number of violations began to increase in January and February. After the arrival of UNAMET, the number of reported incidents was relatively low, but begin to rise again in August in the lead-up to the Popular Consultation.

650. The incidence of torture and detention are closely correlated throughout the year and in some months (July and October) are exactly the same. This suggests that a very high proportion of detainees also suffered torture.

Patterns over space

651. During the final phase of the conflict in 1999, 75.1% (9,494/12,634) of reported non-fatal violations occurred in the western region. The Commission's data are consistent with the claim that communities close to the West Timor border and in Oecussi in 1999 were subjected to higher levels of violence as the pro-autonomy militias and Indonesian military withdrew towards West Timor.

Table 14: Number of cases of detention, torture and ill-treatment in 1999 recorded by the Commission

District	Detention	Torture	Ill-Treatment
Lautém	32	23	19
Viqueque	114	105	22
Baucau	20	10	10
Manatuto	51	33	20
Manufahi	79	72	94
Aileu	104	67	64
Ermera	249	264	266
Liquiçá	257	211	182
Dili	195	119	92
Ainaro	90	74	53
Covalima	569	377	367
Oecussi	419	417	488
Bobonaro	497	412	283

Length of detention

652. In 1999, the length of time that people were held in detention was significantly shorter than in earlier periods. Sometimes detentions were as short as a few hours but during that time those detained suffered torture, beatings or other forms of ill-treatment, as well as threats to induce them to support the autonomy option. The purpose of the detention was often to intimidate pro-independence supporters, not hold them for long periods, and the places used to hold people were improvised detention centres not made for holding many people long-term.

Targeted groups in 1999

653. Both the Commission's quantitative and qualitative research strongly indicates that the perpetrators of most incidents of arbitrary detention specifically targeted members of pro-independence groups including the CNRT, student groups and clandestine networks and Falintil. Others who were not clearly a part of the pro-independence movement but nevertheless demonstrated opposition to the autonomy option were also subject to human rights violations. This included civil servants, UNAMET staff and members of local political parties. Family members of those campaigning for independence also experienced harassment and sometimes detention.

654. One proof of the targeting of particular individuals, besides the evidence in statements, is that nearly twice as many people were detained as individuals than as part of groups in 1999. This suggests that the individual detained was selected for detention, rather than randomly caught as part of a mass arrest.

CNRT members

655. Victor da Cruz made a list with names of pro-independence supporters in the sub-district of Balibó (Bobonaro) to send to the CNRT office in Dili. When members of the Firmi Merah Putih militia group found out about his activities, he was summoned to the Firmi post in Balibó, where he was beaten by members of Firmi, including East Timorese member T565. He was held there for two weeks, and only let go after participating in an oathtaking ceremony in which he promised to join the Firmi militia along with 15 others.[900] In Railaco (Ermera), Daniel Ataidi was ordered to do a hundred push-ups by an Indonesian Babinsa T566, because he was in the CNRT leadership, after which he was taken to a post where he was tortured by T566 and two East Timorese TNI members T567 and T568.[901] Other reports of arrests and ill-treatment include cases of a person wearing a CNRT T-shirt, another attending a CNRT opening ceremony, another who was the wife of a CNRT member, and many who were CNRT members.[902]

Clandestine members

656. Although the Indonesian authorities targeted people with a view to the upcoming Popular Consultation, individuals were still arrested and detained for having contact with Falintil. The Commission received a total of 567 statements reporting the detention of people who were identified as clandestine members in 1999. The months for such arrests were April and May, and then again but slightly lower in September and October.

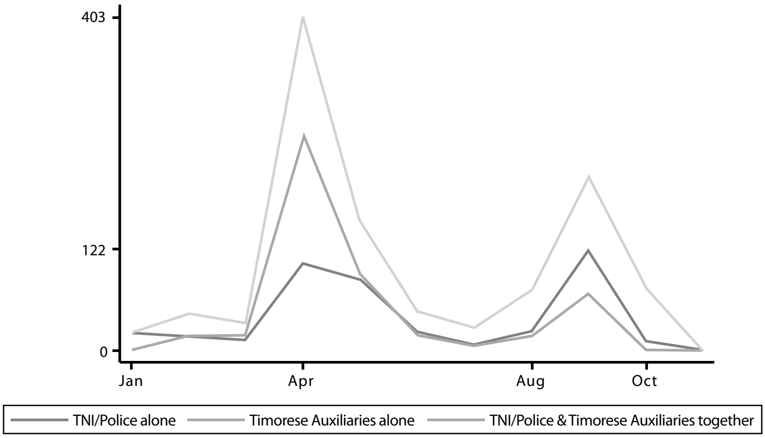
Student activists

657. Members of the East Timorese Student Solidarity Council (Dewan Solidaritas Mahasiswa dan Pelajar Timor Timur, or DSMPTT) had already been openly campaigning for independence from late 1998 by going from village to village explaining the benefits of independence. Justino Ferreira Vicente told the Commission that he was arrested in Fatumean (Covalima) and detained with 26 other people on 23 April 1999 during an investigation into DSMPTT which had recently visited Fatumean to campaign for independence.* After the announcement of the result of the Popular Consultation, DSMPTT members were targeted even

* HRVD Statement 6277. HRVD 8489 describes how two cars from the Suai Town Koramil (Covalima) went to the local DSMPTT post and shot and injured two university students.

in West Timor, where some had fled. Agnes Lese told the Commission that her husband, Edmundus Bere, was captured by Laksaur militia members on 15 October 1999 in Lakmaras, Atambua (West Timor) and taken to the militia post because he had been a member of DSMPTT. He was tortured in Lakmaras and on 17 October he was killed.[903]

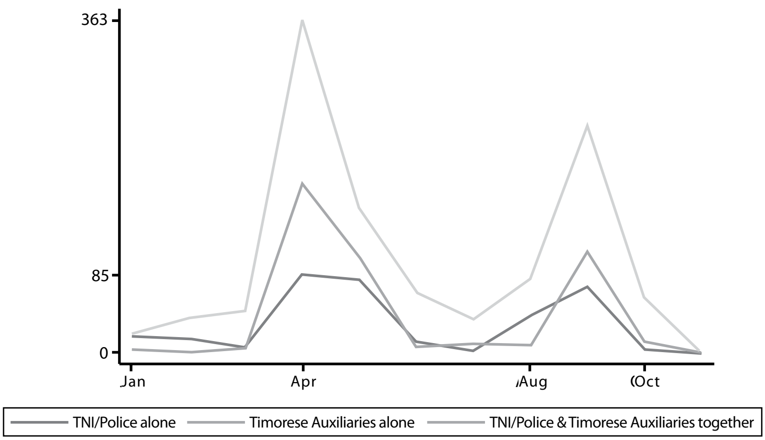
UNAMET staff



658. The Commission received at least five statements reporting cases in which local UNAMET staff working on the Popular Consultation and others suspected of having a connection to UNAMET endured threats, harassment and beatings.[904] These cases intensified close to the Popular Consultation. For example, João da Costa told of being detained in the Hato Udo police station (Ainaro, Ainaro) in the days before the vote with three female staff members of UNAMET.

659. After the result of the Popular Consultation was announced, some people connected to UNAMET were punished. Cristina dos Reis Ataide told the Commission that on 9 September 1999 in Aissirimou (Aileu Town, Aileu) her house was burned down and she was called to the Aileu Kodim and verbally abused because she was suspected of having a connection with UNAMET.[905] Armando do Rêgo was detained on 15 September in Deudet Village (Lolotoe, Bobonaro) after a joint TNI and KMP (Kaer-Metin Merah Putih) militia conducted an operation in the village. He was interrogated about UNAMET.[906]

Perpetrators

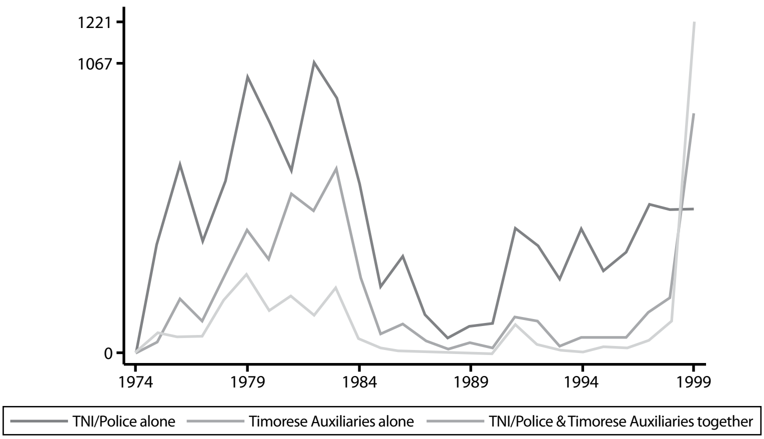


660. The statements given to the Commission describe a number of different permutations of perpetrator responsibility for the arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment of people in 1999. Of the acts of arbitrary detention documented by the Commission, most were attributed to the Indonesian security forces, their East Timorese auxiliaries or both. Most detentions were attributed to East Timorese auxiliaries. Of the acts of arbitrary detention in 1999 documented by the Commission, 75.7% (2,104/2,779) were attributed to either the East Timorese auxiliaries acting alone or in collaboration with the Indonesian military and police, while 19.2% (534/2,779) of documented acts of detention which occurred in 1999 were attributed to the Indonesian military alone. A similar proportion (namely 82.5% (16,135/19,559) of the documented ill-treatments and tortures were attributed to the Indonesian occupation forces and their East Timorese auxiliaries. Also, 75.8% (3,278/4,324) of reported acts of ill-treatment and tortures were attributed to East Timorese auxiliaries (either acting alone or in collaboration with associates of the Indonesian military and police).

Reported acts of torture attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Reported acts of ill-treatment attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1999



Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

661. These statistical patterns suggest prior planning and operational coordination between both forces in their use of arbitrary detention. As the graph below shows, reported acts of arbitrary detention attributed to the Indonesian military and police alone, East Timorese auxiliaries, or both forces acting together, are positively correlated over time, including in 1999. But in 1999 the role of auxiliaries became much more visible. It is clear from this that rather than seeking to control their East Timorese auxiliaries (principally the pro-autonomy militias), the Indonesian military aided and abetted them in the widespread use of arbitrary detention in the lead-up to, and the aftermath of, the UN-sponsored Popular Consultation.

Reported acts of detention attributed to TNI, Police and Timorese Auxiliaries, 1974–1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

662. Within the category "East Timorese collaborators with the Indonesian military", are included civil defence organisations such as members of Wanra (People's Resistance, Perlawanan Rakyat) and members of the 25 militias identified as operating in Timor-Leste. It also includes members of the civilian administration, from district administrators (bupati) to village heads, many of whom worked for the pro-autonomy cause in 1999 either willingly or under pressure of office (see Vol. I, Part 4.3: Civil Administration). The Commission has found that these collaborators were established, armed and very often directly instructed to perpetrate violations by the Indonesian military.

Detention locations

663. The Commission's qualitative research indicates that Koramils, police stations and TNI posts were used widely in 1999 as in other periods, but there was also a return to the pattern of detention in the 1970s of holding individuals in improvised detention centres such as newly-built militia posts, private houses and public buildings such as primary school buildings.* The nature of these detention centres influenced detainees' experience in detention. Because these buildings were often small and not built for holding people, detainees were held in small groups or individually for a short period and then released. Conditions were poor and many people received little or no food. Some detainees managed to escape because of poor security. The Commission received only one statement in which a detainee was held in an official prison (Lembaga Pemasyarakatan, LP) such as LP Becora, LP Balide Comarca, LP Baucau, LP Gleno or LP Maliana in 1999.*

* The Tropical in Dili was first used in the 1970s by TNI to detain people and was notorious for the torture practices conducted on its premises. Aitarak militia and PPI (Pasukan Pejuang Integrasi, Integration Fighter Force), under the command of leader Eurico Guterres, reoccupied it as a detention place in 1999.

Reasons for detention and torture

664. Several clear motives for the arbitrary detention and the torture and ill-treatment of victims are apparent in the statements provided to the Commission and interviews carried out by Commission staff and others. Before the Popular Consultation the main reason for detention and torture cited was to coerce the victim and the population as a whole into rejecting the independence option and choosing to be an autonomous province of Indonesia. As part of this strategy, Indonesian security personnel and their militia proxies arrested individual people at random or at "socialisation" meetings and interrogated them about their political affiliation.

665. At the same time, militia members were asserting their new power over the population through random acts of violence. Militia groups were composed largely of young men who were marginalised and angry, or who had long histories of involvement in Indonesian paramilitary or civil defence groups. Some were also just opportunists and, in this period of lawlessness and heightened tension and violence, were given free rein to do as they pleased with impunity. Indeed, the evidence is clear that the military not only allowed but actively encouraged brutality on the part of the militias.

666. Other reasons included:

Forcible recruitment of militia

667. As well as detention and torture to intimidate people, a commonly reported reason for arrest was to find new recruits for militia groups.[907] While in detention victims were forced to join various militia groups, sometimes after participating in a blood-oath ritual or other kinds of traditional ceremonies† at which they pledged their allegiance to Indonesia and the autonomy option, before being released.[908] In Oecussi the Commission heard of people being offered money to join the militia.[909]

668. Agustino was detained by Mahidi militia in the Mahidi headquarters in Zumalai (Covalima) for his clandestine activities. He was forced to take an oath by drinking water in which the Indonesian flag had been submerged. He was then given a pro-autonomy uniform and became a member of Mahidi.[910] The community of Saboria

* One statement of someone who was detained in the Ermera Prison.

† The long-standing East Timorese ceremonial tradition of drinking goat, dog as well as human blood was used by the pro-autonomy camp as a way to further their campaign. The Commission received statements about the use of blood-oath ceremonies to force people to swear allegiance to integration, going as far back as 1982 [HRVD 7161; 5610; 5592].

Village (Aileu Town, Aileu) described how many of its young men were forced to join the AHI (Aileu Hametin Integrasi, Aileu Strengthen Integration) militia during an autonomy socialisation meeting in the village run by the TNI, police and militia leaders. The youths were forced to join in village meetings to promote integration and to participate in a blood-oath ritual.[911] The TNI captured João Leki, a young man from Saboria and took him to the AHI office, where he was held for 24 hours and beaten into unconsciousness to force him into joining the militia.[912]

Assertion of pro-autonomy forces' authority over the community

669. The Commission received reports of arrests, torture and detentions with the apparent purpose of conveying to the community that pro-autonomy supporters, specifically militia groups, had power over civilian's lives. Many of these arrests occurred immediately after a mass recruitment, an inauguration ceremony or other public event in which the militia members were incited to go on a rampage through the community. The most well-known instance of this was the meeting of all militia groups for the inauguration of the militia umbrella group, the PPI, in Dili on 17 April 1999, after which militias burned and looted houses in Dili, including the house of Manuel Carrascalão.[913]

Retaliation against Resistance attacks

670. As in previous years, in 1999 people were arrested after Resistance attacks or other incidents involving opposition forces in an effort to find the perpetrators, but often also to punish the community of the village in which the event occurred. Several such incidents occurred, for example, in the district of Ermera in April 1999 and are discussed further below par. 696-730.

Punishment of individuals who openly declared support for independence

671. Force was used to punish those who openly declared their support for the independence movement. Many were beaten, ill-treated or tortured before they were released after receiving serious threats to themselves and their families. People identified at public rallies in support of independence were later arrested and interrogated.[914] There were several reports of pro-independence supporters who had their ears cut off, apparently so as to brand them.[915]

672. Others were required to prove their change of heart by signing a statement (surat pernyataan), declaring their commitment to autonomy as well as denouncing any affiliation with the pro-independence movement.[916] Alexandre dos Reis's statement made at the Covalima Kodim on 26 May read as follows:

> When I leave, I will not run away to the forest. If I run away, all of my family in Zumalai, in Galitas and in Akar Laran will be killed. I must support autonomy.[917]

673. This motive gained new force after the results of the Popular Consultation were announced on 4 September 1999. Known supporters of independence were rounded up and tortured, and many were executed.

Obtaining intelligence about pro-independence leaders and structures

674. In 1999, the TNI and the militias continued the pattern that had existed since Indonesian forces first invaded the territory of detaining, interrogating and torturing people to obtain information about the pro-independence movement and members of clandestine networks. Community members suspected of assisting or possessing information on the whereabouts of pro-independence activists were arbitrarily arrested. The authorities also made targeted arrests of members of CNRT, clandestine members, youth activists and students in an attempt to extract information and identify the pro-independence movement leadership. Torture was often used to obtain such information.

Transportation of civilians and capture of those fleeing

675. After the Popular Consultation hundreds of thousands fled their villages. Some went freely to West Timor or the mountains in Timor-Leste, many others were forced over the border. Victims reported being detained both in the context of being forcefully displaced and also as they tried to flee voluntarily.

Detentions and torture, November 1998–March 1999

676. The patterns of detention, ill-treatment and torture described above actually began in late 1998 as political events leading to and following the announcement of the Popular Consultation unfolded.

Before the announcement of the Popular Consultation

677. Arbitrary detentions began to occur, often perpetrated directly by the military acting alone. The Commission heard, for example, of a case in Poemate in Atabae Village (Atabae, Bobonaro) on 9 November 1998. Jacinto Lobato and three of his friends, Ernesto Gaspar, Domingos and Claudino were threatened with M-16 rifles by Luis António, a member of Atabae Koramil and Territorial Combat Battalion (Batalyon Tempur Teritorial, BTT) based in Atabae.[918]

678. Also in late 1998, members of Falintil attending a traditional gathering in the aldeia of Holbese in Leber Village (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) were suddenly surrounded by more than 20 TNI soldiers* and members of Kodim 1636/Maliana. The soldiers arrested people from the community of Holbese, including women and young people. The next day the community as a whole was punished. Agusta told the Commission:

---

* Among whom M284 a member of TNI originally from Tapo, M285 a member of TNI from Holsa and M286 a member of TNI from Oe-lau.

The next day at 8.00am, the whole community was gathered together and given instruction by Januario, a TNI member. He insulted us saying: "You want independence, but you can't even make a matchstick. What do you want independence for?" Friends were arrested and tortured by being punched, kicked, and stomped on by military boots. Five of the victims' faces, including my husband José Vicente's, became swollen and blood poured out of their mouths, noses and heads and they were also stabbed with the end of a weapon over and over again.[919]

679. Paulo Morreira and Vicente do Rosário told of their arrest in January 1999 in Turiscai (Manufahi) by ten Kopassus soldiers and four East Timorese members of the military: T570, T571, T572 and T573. Their captors hit them across the head and back with rifle butts and then handed them over to the Koramil, where the Koramil commander slapped them again. The soldiers then took them to the Infantry Battalion 745 base, whose members beat them so hard that Paulo Morreira's spine was broken, he had serious head injuries and he lost the hearing in one ear.[920]

680. The military also reorganised the paramilitaries in Baucau (Team Saka, Team Makikit and Team Sera) and Lospalos (Team Alfa) and established new militias such as Mahidi in Ainaro District, Halilintar in Maliana Sub-district (Bobonaro), and Besi Merah Putih (BMP) in Liquiçá District. The first members of these new militias were drawn from long-time paramilitary members and other Indonesian military auxiliaries. For example, Cancio Carvalho Lopes, the former head of the Volunteers Team which had carried out widespread arbitrary detention and torture in Ainaro in the early 1990s, now headed the Mahidi militia. After their formation, widespread arbitrary detention, ill-treatment and torture occurred both to recruit further members and to establish their authority in the area.

681. In early January, in one of the founding meetings held by Besi Merah Putih militia[921] in the village of Guguleur (Maubara, Liquiçá) plans for future BMP operations in the sub-district of Maubara were laid out. The community of Guguleur described how, the following day, BMP members arrested five people and beat them. Four were beaten so badly that they were hospitalised in Dili; the fifth was detained in the militia post.[922]

682. Large groups of 30 or more members of the BMP militia, together with civilian staff from Koramil, then arrested many others in the area, mostly members of CNRT. The Commission received one statement about detentions in Guguleur in January 1999 and five from February 1999. In addition five were received from Vatuboro, four from Vatuvuo, and six from Guico (all in Maubara, Liquiçá). Perpetrators named in these statements include East Timorese members T574, T575, T576, T577, T578, T579 and T580.[923] Members of Gadapaksi and Battalion 143 also attacked the people of Guguleur with sticks and sharp weapons, such as spears and machetes.[924] Many villagers fled the sub-district of Maubara.

683. The Commission also heard that 40 members of the Naga Merah militia attacked the house of the village head of Vatuvou, Manuel Almeida. He was not home at the time of the attack but the attacking youths used knives, rocks, iron bars and M-16s to destroy his house and threaten his family. Three members of his family were abducted and taken to the Naga Merah post in the Maubara Koramil where they were tortured.[925] The arrests continued into February.

684. Paulo dos Santos, a former clandestine member, told the Commission that on 2 January he was arrested by four TNI marines in Ainaro. They ordered him to step out of a public minibus and then took him to the marine base in Cassa (Ainaro, Ainaro). He was beaten and kicked until he was bleeding from his ears and he lost consciousness for about an hour. At midnight, with his thumbs and his big toes tied together and blindfolded, he was taken to a building near the Cassa River. He recalled his experience:

> They held me for two days, beginning with interrogation about my participation in independence activities. Because I was afraid, I told them everything I had done. A member of the marines warned me: "Don't be involved again in demonstrations related to the referendum like what happened in the SP II incident, where the youth beat the SGI commander, when Bishop Belo inaugurated the Chapel at SP II." I said that I wouldn't be involved in such activities. After two days, my uncle Agustinho Sarmento, the Sub-district administrator of Hato Udo, came and got me out [of detention] and took me to Hato Udo where I hid for one month.[926]

After announcement of two options

685. On 27 January 1999, the decision to hold a Popular Consultation on the political future of Timor-Leste was announced. More militias were established in districts and sub-districts around Timor-Leste (see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation, for a full list).

686. In the following week, there were a number of arrests carried out in Maubara (Liquiçá) by the BMP militia. In some cases the militia acted alone. For example, Mário da Costa, a former member of CNRT, told the Commission that he was arrested at his home in Vatuboro (Maubara, Liquiçá) on 30 January by two East Timorese members of the BMP militia, T578 and T579. At the time of arrest he was kicked in the neck and beaten with a motorbike chain. Then he was taken to the militia post where he was beaten further and interrogated by T580, a militia commander.

687. The Commission received at least five statements describing cases of the BMP militia in Liquiçá working closely with the TNI, Gadapaksi and police.* In one case on 16 February 1999, João Soares was arrested in his house in Manukabia (Maubara, Liquiçá) by four East Timorese members of TNI, T581, T582, T583 and T584, and two East Timorese members of BMP militia, T585 and T586. They beat him with a rifle butt, punched and slapped him, resulting in head injuries. He was then taken to the Maubara police station and on the way T585 and T586 stabbed him with an arrow causing him to bleed heavily. He was eventually taken to a police station in Liquiçá where he was detained and interrogated for eight days.[927] On 5 February, Ana Maria Mouzinho was arrested in Holbolu (Beco 1, Suai, Covalima) after information from an East Timorese

* HRVD Statements 4630; 1001; 0225; 5908; 2867 (victim Joanico Marcal was arrested by TNI members and then handed over to BMP militia) intelligence informer T587 had reached members of Mahidi militia, including T587 and T589 (wife of a government official in Raimea). Ana Maria was beaten, hit with a rifle and taken to the Mahidi headquarters in Zumalai where she was interrogated, threatened with death and beaten again with a rifle and ordered to mill rice for the militia. She was held there for two days.[928]

688. As well as furthering the autonomy option, newly recruited militia members were often ordered to carry out some type of forced labour, such as cleaning, cutting grass, fixing pipes, looking for firewood or guarding a militia post.[929] On 11 March, Agustinho was captured by four East Timorese members of the Mahidi militia, T590, T591, T592 and T593, in Mape (Zumalai, Covalima). They interrogated him throughout the night after which he was told to carry out different tasks before being released. He told the Commission:

> I was ordered to repair the Loumea Bridge, cut grass and chop wood to build the Mahidi militia post in Kulu Oan, Zumalai. On 16 March 1999, Mahidi took me to Zumalai, where I was ordered to pick up cigarette butts around the Mahidi headquarters and dig holes. I was held in the Mahidi headquarters for one week.[930]

689. The community of Rai Fun (Maliana, Bobonaro) told the Commission that in February 1999, members of the Maliana Kodim looked specifically for young men with long hair. Manuel Laka Suri, Domingos Salvador and João Barreto, all long-haired men, were captured and had their hair cut off by knife. They were arrested and submerged in flooded rice fields. They were then stripped naked and put in a dark room filled with water which prevented them from sitting or sleeping.[931]

Dilor, Viqueque, 20 March

690. Team Makikit militia reportedly began recruiting in March 1999. On 20 March, after a gathering at the TNI post in Dilor (Lacluta, Viqueque) the new recruits started attacking people and their houses in surrounding villages, beating and threatening alleged supporters of independence. Approximately 160 people were detained briefly at the Lacluta Koramil in Dilor and approximately 500 others fled their homes in fear.[932]

691. Artur de Carvalho, a supporter of independence, was one of the victims of this attack. He told the Commission that militia members attacked his house in Laline (Lacluta, Viqueque), destroying the roof, door and windows. They then took him to the Koramil and handed him to East Timorese militia member T594 and the Koramil commander, Sergeant Major T598. He said that at least 64 others were detained in the Koramil at the time. Their houses and kiosks had also been wrecked. The detainees were held for 24 hours without food and were then released on 22 March 1999. He told the Commission that at least one detainee, MN, was ill-treated while in detention. Her dress was pulled off and then her genitals were touched.[933]

692. Seven East Timorese men fled to the forest. When they returned two weeks later they were arrested by local Babinsas, T596 and T597, and taken to the Koramil. The Koramil commander T598 interrogated them and then released them the same evening.

However, the next day, when they reported to the Koramil, T600 and the Koramil commander T598 detained them again, and they were forced to work for the military including hoeing land, cutting wood and bamboo, building a fence, tiling roofs and planting vegetables for two and a half months.[934]

Maliana, Bobonaro, March 1999

693. On 22 March, TNI soldiers beat a prominent CNRT leader, José Andrade da Cruz, in public and dragged him through town to the local TNI headquarters in Maliana (Bobonaro). His public beating served as an example for other pro-independence supporters and instilled widespread fear in the community.[935]

694. To escape the worsening security situation, many members of CNRT in the sub-district of Maliana sought refuge in the Maliana police station and local churches or fled to Dili[936] (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Famine and Forced Displacement).

Zumalai, Covalima, March 1999

695. On 23 March, Celestino Pereira de Araújo and nine of his friends were captured by Mahidi militia in the village of Julo (Zumalai, Covalima) and taken to the house of Mahidi member Vasco da Cruz. The ten men were then handed over to members of BTT Infantry Battalion 144 who took them to the BTT headquarters. They were interrogated, beaten and kicked and at night received a visit by the Sub-district administrator of Zumalai. He told the Commission:

> At night, the Sub-district administrator, T601, came and asked us what our names were. After that he threw dirty oil at my head and verbally abused us saying: "Your faces look like monkeys, and yet you want independence!" Then he ordered the ten of us to drink our saliva, which had been mixed together in a glass, and so we took turns drinking it.[937]

Detentions and torture in April 1999

696. The number of people detained, as well as the number of people who suffered torture and ill-treatment, peaked in April 1999.

697. Most arrests and detentions that involved some kind of interrogation occurred in April and May 1999. As in earlier years members or suspected members of the clandestine movement were interrogated about their own or their friends' activities within the clandestine network,[938] as well as on the whereabouts or the extent of contact they had had with family members in Falintil.[939] Some were questioned about the whereabouts of specific members of Falintil[940] or about weapons caches.[941]

698. New militias were formed, such as the Sakunar militia in Oecussi, and militias that had been formed earlier were formally inaugurated. For example, the Laksaur militia was formed in January but began full-scale operations and started intensively recruiting members in mid-April when it was formally inaugurated.[942]

699. The Mahidi militia, which was mostly active in the district of Ainaro, also had a branch in the sub-district of Zumalai (Covalima) led by Vasco da Cruz and Domingos Alves, both village heads.[943] Members of Mahidi also arrested people and took them to the Zumalai headquarters.[944] M122 was directly involved in the detentions and some of the beatings of detainees.[945] The Commission received seven statements about individuals detained by Mahidi. All these detainees were threatened, beaten, and even tortured, and subsequently forced to join the Mahidi militia.[946]

Liquiçá, April 1999

700. In the first week of April, the BMP militia, police and military carried out a joint operation to find pro-independence people in the sub-districts of Liquiçá and Maubara. Domingos de Jesus da Costa, for example, told how he and nine others from Lailok Lara in Dato Village (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) were detained on 5 April by a joint force consisting of East Timorese Kodim member T612, East Timorese soldiers T613 and T614, East Timorese police officers T615, T616, T617 and T618, East Timorese Koramil member T619 and a civil servant T620. They were held for several hours during which time they were forced to lie out in the middle of the main road. One victim, Fernando da Costa, was beaten with a rifle butt.[947]

701. On the same day, according to Mamo Ana, she and her family were attacked by four BMP militia members in Fukelara in Dato Village. They killed her husband Maubusa, and took her and her family to the Liquiçá Kodim 1638 where they were held for one night and one day. The next day the district administrator of Liquiçá, T621, and members of the Liquiçá Kodim moved the family to Maubara for one month.[948]

702. On 6 April 1999, the population ran to find shelter in the church in Liquiçá. The BMP militia gathered outside the church and proceeded to kill many of those taking refuge, while members of the TNI and the police looked on (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Killings and Disappearances). As well as those who died, many suffered ill-treatment and abuse. Remiro Ximenes dos Santos, aged 71 at the time of the massacre, recalled:

> On 6 April, I fled to the Liquiçá Church because the BMP militia was conducting an operation and carrying out brutal acts in the Liquiçá area to find pro-independence people. When I arrived, I stood in front of the church and saw BMP militia members going towards the church. So I went into the kitchen of the Liquiçá Parish to get a knife to defend myself. But suddenly a BMP militia member was behind me and started beating me with a piece of wood on my back and I fell over unconscious. Then he cut my face with his knife so that my skin was torn and bleeding. He just left me, unconscious and bleeding in the Liquiçá Church. My wife came and took me to the Liquiçá Kodim…where a soldier named Mateus gave me some Timorese cloth for my wound and told me to go home.[949]

703. After the massacre, the BMP militia continued to capture independence supporters around the district. The community of Loidahar (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) said that 50 people were detained from the village and were tortured by members of BMP. Girls were forced to participate regularly in dances with the militia.[950] Many of the detainees were held first in the home of the Sub-district administrator of Liquiçá, T621.[951] They were then transported to the town of Maubara and detained in the BMP headquarters for around two months.[952]

704. A number of youths from other areas joined the Aitarak militia in April 1999 after the massacre to save themselves.[953]

Ermera, April 1999

705. Ermera was the site of serious human rights violations in 1999 including a large number of killings (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). It was also a district which reported one of the highest number of detentions in 1999, with 235 incidents from 220 statements being reported to the Commission.

706. There were five militias operating in Ermera and the pro-independence movement was very active in the district. The Commission heard that members of CNRT detained the entire population of the aldeia of Ilimanu in the village office of Manusae Village (Hatolia, Ermera) on 1 April and held them for a week. They beat the male members of the group because they were suspected of being Naga Merah militia.[954] In the sub-district of Railaco in April 1999, the CNRT members, Dinis dos Santos and 43 others wrote a declaration to the governor of Ermera District to express their rejection of autonomy.

707. Pro-autonomy supporters and the Indonesian authorities responded to these actions. On 14 April, the Naga Merah militia arrested clandestine members and civilians in Manusae Village.[955] On 26 April 1999, the SGI called all of the residents of Kukara, (Manusae Village, Hatolia to gather for instructions. Two clandestine members called Marito and António were then arrested and beaten.[956] In Railaco the Koramil commander, T668, arrested Armindo Soares, one of the 44 individuals who had written the letter. He was beaten severely in the Koramil. The Koramil commander then ordered Koramil members to hunt down and arrest the other 43 signatories of the letter.[957] The statement of Dinis dos Santos described their treatment by members of TNI:

> When we arrived, we were ordered to line up and then they beat, punched and kicked us. Then they beat Estevão on the head with a pistol, seriously injured his leg and hit him with a chair until the chair broke. The Koramil commander, T668, ordered East Timorese TNI members T669, T670, T671, T672, T673 and T674, to beat us. T670 took a knife to stab Estevão but luckily T668 yelled [at T670], otherwise Estevão might have died. After we were released [and allowed to go] home to Tocoluli, Commander T668 ordered the 44 of us to pay a fine of Rp2,500,000 and cut five cubic metres of wood which consisted of 5 X 7 blocks and sheets.[958]

708. They were then forced to join the militia group Darah Merah, and had to attend the group meetings in Ermera.[959]

709. It is clear that the military had identified pro-independence individuals for detention and torture. Cudinho Manegas told the Commission that in April the Railaco

Koramil commander and a Babinsa, T677, came to Hermenegildo's house, accused him of being a clandestine member and were looking for another clandestine member named Martinho. When they found that Martinho had fled, they started beating Hermenegildo. Martinho returned soon after and surrendered, and the Babinsa, T677, released Hermenegildo and began instead to beat Martinho with a rifle butt.[960]

710. The SGI commander in Hatolia, T678, was named in several accounts of arrests in the sub-district.[961] Anselmo Soares described his arrest with Armando dos Reis, Alcino and Abilio by T678 and two members of SGI in Ailelo Village (Hatolia, Ermera), after which they were taken to Hatolia for interrogation. Armando dos Reis was beaten heavily during the interrogation.[962] José Lemos told how he and Bonifacio dos Reis were arrested on 10 April by T678 and detained in the Hatolia Koramil. There, José Lemos's head was shaved and his scalp was cut with razor blades. Both victims were clandestine members.[963]

711. Other incidents of violence also raised tensions in the district. On 10 April in Gleno, the capital of the sub-district of Ermera, the military burned down the CNRT headquarters and killed a well-known member of CNRT and local parliamentarian, António Lima.[964] Many people fled Ermera after the killing on 19 April and took refuge with Falintil. In their effort to capture other clandestine members, the SGI and members of the Territorial Combat Battalion (BTT) carried out widespread arrests beyond Ermera.[965] There appears to have been no militia involvement in these arrests. For example, André Madeira told of six clandestine members from Ermera including himself, who were arrested at the home of the district administrator of Ermera on 10 April by two members of SGI and a police officer.* They were taken to the Ermera Kodim where they were beaten, kicked and punched by a number of perpetrators including members of the police, the SGI and the local BTT.[966] João de Jesus Soares Valeres told the Commission that he was arrested by the SGI members T682 and T683, and then under threat of death was ordered to find the Falintil commander Ernesto Fernandes (Dudu). He forged a letter from the commander and was released.[967]

Covalima, April 1999

712. Several militia groups operated in the district of Covalima, which borders West Timor. In the sub-district of Zumalai the Ainaro-based Mahidi militia had a branch. The Serious Crimes Unit of the Office of the Prosecutor General of Timor-Leste indicted seven former commanders of the Mahidi militia for crimes against humanity committed in Zumalai, including the detention and torture of pro-independence supporters at three detention centres in the sub-district. The indictments allege that:

> Detention and imprisonment were one of the primary means used to persecute pro-independence civilians, who were systematically selected, detained and imprisoned, on political grounds. The main detention centre was at the house of Vasco da Cruz [in Zulo Village] where over

* The sub-district administrator of Ermera, Constantino Soares, did not give active support to the pro-integration cause and indeed let CNRT members in danger hide in his residence. [See Robinson, p. 161].

45 villagers were detained. Across the road from Vasco da Cruz's house was the Indonesian government house, where Lino Barreto lived. Lino Barreto detained at least six persons in his house. A detention house also existed in Beilaco Sub-Village [Reimea, Zumalai], at the house of Napoleon dos Santos aka Napoleon Alves. Napoleon dos Santos, aka Napoleon Alves, detained at least 12 persons in this house. These detainees were subject to physical and psychological abuse, including beatings and torture, and suffered inhuman deprivation of basic necessities, such as adequate food, water and shelter. The detention camps were overcrowded, unsanitary and no medical attention was provided.[968]

713. The Commission received a number of statements which mention the detention and torture of civilians in Zumalai, particularly in April. According to Leontino Moniz, on 12 April five members of Mahidi arrested him in Boro and took him to the Mahidi headquarters in Zumalai. There T602, the East Timorese Mahidi commander, beat him over the head while others hit him with pieces of wood. He was interrogated, beaten and punched until he lost consciousness. Subsequently he and others accused of supporting independence were ordered to stand in a line to have their hair cut off. They were released when UNAMET was deployed in the area, but not before T602 and East Timorese militia members T643 and T644 told them that if autonomy lost, they would all be killed, including their wives and children.[969]

714. Six statements were received about the detention centre in Beilaco, Raimea Village (Zumalai).[970] Most detentions and experiences of torture were attributed to the East Timorese Mahidi members, T645 and T646, T647 and T648. Luis Soares was beaten with a rifle butt and kicked with military boots and then his hands were tied before he was taken to the Mahidi post in Beilaco. At the post he was beaten repeatedly by T645 and T646, causing him long-standing back pain.[971]

715. In the sub-district of Suai (Covalima) the Laksaur militia terrorised the population in collaboration with the police and the military. Carlos Pereira described his arrest and torture on 24 April in Suai Town (Suai, Covalima):

The East Timorese Laksaur members, T654, T655 and T656, and an East Timorese TNI member, T657, came and arrested me in the village of Akar Laran because I was pro-independence. I was close to being killed by T658's machete but T659 stopped him so he only pushed me to the door. He started to hit me in the face and ears until my nose and ears were bleeding. I fell but stood up again. I was hit in the face, blood came from my mouth and I fell for the second time. Then T654 lifted me and threw me to T657, who tied my hands to my neck with wire. I was beaten by the three members of Laksaur for 20 minutes. After that I was ordered by the two Laksaur and a TNI to walk from Akar Laran to the Akar Laran intersection. I saw T658, a policeman, carrying a weapon and waiting for me with a Kijang vehicle, and I was told to get into the Kijang, which took me to be handed over to T662, the East Timorese Suai Loro village head, at his house.

When we got to his house many militia sat surrounding me. It wasn't long before twins from Suai Loro whose names I don't know started to hit Agustinho and me. They hit us across the mouth with their hands, kicked us in the chest and hit our bodies for 20 minutes. Then T662 accused me of being a radical from the pro-independence side. He had heard that from East Timorese informants T664, T665 and T666. Not long after this Agustinho and I were taken to the Sub-district police station in Suai Loro and handed over to a policeman from Indonesia. I don't know his name. We were put in a cell and I was punched once in the mouth.[972]

Cailaco, Bobonaro, April 1999

716. After the killing of Manuel Gama, a pro-autonomy figure and a member of the Koramil, on 12 April in circumstances that are disputed,[973] the military carried out a violent operation in the sub-district of Cailaco (Bobonaro) to find the killers.* This case provided strong evidence of the close cooperation between militia members and officers in the TNI in wreaking terror in the community. The SGI commander in Marco, the main town of Cailaco, T623, ordered the TNI and members of the Halilintar militia to carry out sweeps. They arrested about 30 residents of Marco, including women and children, and took them to the Cailaco Koramil in Marco. The women and children were separated from the men and released after several days. The male detainees, however, were severely beaten. The Bobonaro Kodim in Maliana and the militia commander, João Tavares, reportedly specifically authorised the beatings. The Cailaco indictment filed on 3 February 2001 described the beatings:

The detainees were told to lie on the floor and the TNI and militiamen present hit them with their fists and boots. They were also beaten with rifle butts while being questioned about the murder of Manuel Gama.[974]

717. The Commission received six statements from individuals detained during this operation. Deponents described how residents and civil servants were ordered to gather at the house of the deceased Manuel Gama, where they were told that independence supporters present would be killed just like the three already killed in Purugoa (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Killings and Enforced Disappearances). Some were then detained in the Cailaco Koramil[975] or surrounding BTT posts in Purugoa and Bilimau (Cailaco, Bobonaro).[976] Statements mention a number of perpetrators, including the Koramil, the Halilintar militia, the Guntur Merah Putih militia, the Cailaco police and TNI forces such as BTT 143.[977]

718. In one case that occurred on 13 April, T624 and three other members of Dadurus Merah Putih (DMP) militia arrested a CNRT official, Adriano João, at his sister's house in Cailaco. They hit and punched him, and then took him to the house of T1, where he was further beaten and kicked, breaking some of his bones.[978]

* See also HRVD Statement 9167, which states that the operation was conducted because they did not participate at an inauguration meeting of BMP earlier that month.

Oecussi, April 1999

719. The Sakunar militia group was formed on 14 April 1999 in Oecussi.[979] It was formed with the full support of the governor of Timor-Leste, Abilio Osório Soares, the district administrator of Dili, Domingos Soares, the national militia leaders João Tavares and Eurico Guterres and local leaders Laurentino Soares (Moko) and Simão Lopes.* [980] Sakunar militia member Jacinto Colo described the inaugural meeting:

> On 14 April, I was approached by the village head of Nipani, Candido Meko, to go to the house of the District Administrator Filomeno Mesquita for a meeting about the formation of the Sakunar militia in Ambeno. The people gathered there included Candido Meko, Elvis Lopes, Simão Lopes, Belarmino da Costa, Laurentino Soares (Moko) and Carlos Pereira. In the meeting the structure and leadership was decided, and Simão Lopes was made the Sakunar commander-in-chief and Candido Meko was made the commander for Sakato Village. I also became a commander.[981]

720. A sharp increase in arrests, detention and torture was reported all over Oecussi in the month of April,[982] continuing into May.[983]

721. Many of the arrests were made during operations in which large numbers of militia members assisted by Kodim members went from village to village destroying houses of suspected members of CNRT. The Commission received at least nine reports of the Sakunar militia arresting and forcing suspected members of CNRT into the militia, especially during April 1999.[984] The Commission received six reports of an operation led by Sakunar militia Commander T603 on 22 April 1999 in which many of those arrested were taken to his house in Cunha, (Pante Makassar). Victims reported being beaten by members of the militia and tortured.[985] Following another arrest operation in April, led by police officer T604, many of the detainees were taken to the Abani village office (Passabe, Oecussi),[986] T604's house[987] or the Sub-district police station.[988]

722. Another mass arrest of leaders and members of the CNRT took place in mid-April in Abani Village (Passabe, Oecussi). The community described how around 42 people connected to the CNRT were taken to the house of militia leader and village head, T603, and the Koramil, where they were beaten with wooden clubs. Some were beaten so hard that they lost consciousness.[989]

723. The Sakunar militia was responsible for the most of the arrests reported to the Commission in Oecussi in 1999. Most such arrests were under the command of militia leaders such as the village head of Cunha, T603,[990] the village head of Abani, the police officer T604,[991] the East Timorese Babinsa T609[992] and civil servant T610.[993] The Koramil Commander T611 was also involved in many arbitrary detentions and acted in coordination with the militia commanders.[994] The victims in cases reported to the

* Sakunar received full political and financial backing from the district administrator, head of the district police and the Kodim commander (Dandim) from its time of formation. [Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004 p.184.]

Commission were either members of CNRT or people suspected of having a connection with the clandestine movement.

Dili, 17 April 1999

724. A member of the Sakunar militia told the Commission of the rally of militias in Dili on 17 April 1999, and the violent attacks after this rally:

> On 17 April 1999, I attended the mass inauguration of pro-integration militias [the PPI] in Dili, with 40 members of Sakunar militia from the aldeia of Sakato in Oecussi. [The PPI] in Dili was under the leadership of commander-in-chief João Tavares, and his deputy, Eurico Guterres, who was also the commander of Aitarak. After the ceremony, all the pro-integration militias including Sakunar militia paraded around the city of Dili, led by Eurico Guterres. In the parade, all the militias used two and four-wheeled vehicles from the [East Timor] Regional Police Headquarters. When we arrived in the house of Manuel Carrascalão near the Dili Tropical, some militia open fired at the door and windows and they started to burn the house.[995]

725. Francisco da Silva Serrão and Raul dos Santos were hiding in the bathroom of Manuel Carrascalão's house when it was attacked. They were found by a member of BMP called Francisco Afonso do Rosário. Francisco da Silva Serrão told the Commission:

> So we immediately surrendered...While our hands were up in the air T268 cut Raul's left hand...Then T268 called Raul and stabbed him in the back. Again, Raul was stabbed in the chest with two knives that went all the way through to his back until he died. Then Brimob [Mobile Brigade police] rescued us…They took us to the Sub-district police headquarters near the old market. When we arrived at the Sub-district police headquarters I was separated with two other prisoners, Santiago Canselo and Filomeno, from the other refugees. We were held in the Regional Police Headquarters in Comoro for three days and not given any food or drink. We were interrogated by a police officer…I didn't know who had put a stone in the mouth of my friend, André Serrão...[T]hen Lieutenant-Colonel Paulo asked me to look at my friend. He said: "See, your friend is eating a stone now; how can people like you want independence?"[996]

726. Another attack was carried out at Meti-Aut (East Dili, Dili) on 17 April. Agapito Ximenes described how 15 militia members smashed up the house of clandestine member Carlito, then verbally abused the youths in the area. When five youths ran off, the militia members shot at them and four were wounded, Carlos da Silva, João Baptista, Julião da Costa Xavier and Agapito Ximenes himself.[997] Amnesty International also reported that António Barbosa, a civil servant and independence activist, was arrested at his home on the same day by unknown perpetrators.[998]

727. Aitarak militia were strong in the village of Hera (East Dili, Dili). The Commission received several reports of arrests of independence supporters by the militia, the TNI and the police in Hera in 1999.[999] In one incident the Commission was told of the arrest of 17 youths suspected of supporting independence on 22 April 1999. T630, the former head of Hera Village who had become the local Aitarak commander, asked teachers, students, and the community at Hera Polytechnic to come to a peace dialogue with the Aitarak militia. As soon as the villagers gathered, members of the Aitarak militia, Brimob and the BMP militia surrounded the youths and arrested those believed to be activists at the Polytechnic. They were then brought to the village head's home, and they were last thought to be held at the Regional Police Headquarters in Dili.*

Viqueque, April 1999

728. After a ceremony at the Kodim 1630 Viqueque on 20 April, the deputy commander-in-chief of the PPI, Eurico Guterres, gathered all PPI members from the sub-districts of Viqueque and had them take an oath while drinking dog's blood (asu malibuti). Members of both PPI and the TNI then started to intimidate residents of the community, particularly those suspected of being pro-independence. They arrested and tortured several youths in the village of Ahic (Lacluta), including Domingos Amaral Bosi, Paulo Sarmento, Jovelino Andreas Sarmento, Geronimo dos Santos, Francisco Gomes, Cipriano Correia, Francisco Sarmento, Norberto Soares, Adriano de Jesus and Izac Martinho.[1000]

729. The following event in the sub-district of Lacluta (Viqueque) illustrates how village heads and other civilian government employees were also targeted. On 30 April in Lacluta, 14 local civil servants from the village of Ahic were arrested after they had intervened in a militia event some days earlier.† They included the village head, Germano Gomes Amaral; the village secretary, José Martins Lopes; five RK (Rukun Keluarga, the village level neighbourhood association); three RT (Rukun Tetangga, the sub-village level neighbourhood association); and a church catechist, Eugenio Soares. According to Eugenio Soares, the militia and the TNI assembled the community at night to kill cows and had them listen to pro-autonomy speeches. The 14 civil servants jointly decided to tell the population to go home and rest rather than to participate.[1001] The Koramil commander, T598 together with members of Team Makikit militia[1002] arrested the group and took them to the Lacluta Koramil.‡ The victims were interrogated, beaten

* HRVD statements 3757, 615, 6952 The names of the victims kidnapped were Belai, Leopoldino, Quieros, Cesaltino, Amoe, Kobuti, Eurico Gaspar Amaral, Alberto da Silva Costa, António da Costa, Domingos da Silva, Sebastiao da Silva, Egidio da Silva, Elvino Cerilo dos Santos, Fernando dos Santos, Helio Tavares Guterres, Jose Cai and Laurento Sarmento.

† The 14 civil servants arrested were: Germano Gomes Amaral, the village head of Ahic; José Martins Lopes, the village secretary; Domingos Belo, RK; Luciano Lemos, RT; Acacio Soares Ximenes, RK; Gilberto Paiva, RT; Moises Marques, RT; Mateus Horta, RK; Teofilo Gusmão, RK; Inácio Soares, village government official; Mateus Soares; Eugenio Soares, a church catechist; Pedro da Costa Araújo, RT; and Zacarias da Silva Belo. [See HRVD Statements 0404; 0471; 0469; 9167; 0477; 0475 and Robinson, p.189].

‡ According to HRVD Statement 0469 they were told they were taken to the Koramil, but in actual fact were taken to the BMP post. HRVD Statement 0475 states that they taken to the KUD (Koperasi Unit Desa) office.

with sticks and pipes, kicked and stomped on, resulting in such serious injuries that one of the group, Zacarias da Silva Belo, died.[1003] The perpetrators were the Koramil commander, T598, and nine East Timorese members of the Makikit militia.

Molop, Bobonaro, 24 April 1999

730. Operations were also sometimes held in a particular village because of intelligence or rumours that the village was involved in clandestine activities. If the TNI heard of such a village, TNI soldiers, militia or both sometimes terrorised the whole village or even the sub-district. Thus it was not only those suspected of engaging in pro-independence activities who were victims of intimidation, detentions and torture, but the whole community was made to suffer. Justino Barreto, the head of the aldeia of Omelai in Molop Village (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) described how his community was intimidated by members of two militia groups armed with automatic weapons:

> On 24 April 1999, the community of Omelai in Molop Village, Bobonaro District was visited by T684, the East Timorese commander of the Halilintar militia and a member of Halilintar, T685, and East Timorese members of Dadurus Merah Putih (DMP) including T686. They came from Bobonaro with M-16 and Z-3 rifles to carry out the operation. They encircled my house because I was suspected of being clandestine, of working with the Falintil [commander] Loro Mesak and of distributing a letter of appeal to the community which contained a political vision contrary to the view of the Indonesian forces, namely to fight for independence.
>
> A Koramil member came into the house and pulled me outside and left me in the sun for a full day. They brought knives to kill me…He confiscated Rp1.3 million [that had been collected] for the appeal and Rp1.4 million of my personal money, and they forced the whole community to dance with them. If they refused, all of the people of Molop would have been killed. So out of fear, I, as the head of the aldeia, called nine young people to dance with the militia until morning. On 25 April 1999, they handed me over to the Bobonaro Koramil 01 for interrogation about the publicity I had made and then I was released to go home.[1004]

May 1999

731. The agreements signed on 5 May 1999 between the United Nations, Indonesia and Portugal in New York assigned responsibility for security in the territory to the Indonesian police. Detention and torture of East Timorese declined slightly overall after these agreements were signed but, according to reports received by the Commission, in many districts detentions and torture continued unabated.

732. Public ceremonies continued to be held to denounce the independence option, particularly in early May. On 1 May, a large ceremony was held in the Palapan village square, in Palapan (Oecussi) in which 100 members of CNRT were forced to renounce their affiliation with the organisation and take an oath supporting the autonomy option.

The district administrator of Oecussi, Filomeno Mesquita da Costa, the chief of police for Oecussi District, Lieutenant Colonel (Pol.) Wilmar Marpaung, and the Kodim commander, Lieutenant Colonel Kamiso Miran, as well as the man who succeeded him in August, Lieutenant Colonel Bambang Sungesti, all attended this ceremony.[1005]

733. Ceremonies to forcibly recruit militia members were also held in the sub-districts of Atabae and Lolotoe in the district of Bobonaro. Both were attended by the Halilintar commander, T1. Basilio Sousa da Silva told the Commission how he and his friends Laurentino Martins, Tomás Tavares, Maria Fernandes, Sérgio Soares and Agustinho Pereira da Silva were forced to join the Halilintar militia in Atabae:

> In May 1999 Halilintar commander T1 and Armui commander, T689, forced us to join the Armui militia. If we didn't they would kill us. After we became Armui militia we didn't damage anyone's property and our hands never touched any person.[1006]

Falintil attack in Lolotoe, Bobonaro, May 1999

734. In May 1999, a Falintil attack on the Koramil in Gole, Deudet Village (Lolotoe, Bobonaro) resulted in the death of three soldiers. This in turn sparked a crackdown by both the Indonesian armed forces and militias in the area.* The day after the attack, on 16 May, the local BTT and Kaer-Metin Merah Putih (KMP) militia members moved into the area and rounded up hundreds of suspected independence supporters and CNRT leaders.[1007] Lolotoe, a region on the border with West Timor, was a known stronghold of pro-independence support even before the attack.

735. According to members of the communities of Opa and Deudet Villages in Lolotoe, the Koramil's head of intelligence and militia members arrived from Maliana in 17 trucks to carry out a large-scale operation. They burned down houses and beat people. One resident named Armindo was stabbed in the back by an East Timorese militia member, T690, but was not killed. The majority of people of Gole were moved into the Deudet Catholic Primary School where they were subject to continual intimidation until UNAMET arrived in Timor-Leste and they were released. Community members of Ope and Deudet described how 22 people were detained in the Sub-district police headquarters and the village square, and given no food, although their families provided them with food secretly. They were ordered to dig two large graves, each five metres square.[1008] Statements received by the Commission indicate that many others arrested in connection with this operation were detained in the Lolotoe Koramil.[1009]

736. João dos Santos described how he was forced to attend a traditional ceremony while being held by the Koramil and members of the Kaer Metin Merah Putih militia in Lolotoe:

* The soldiers Caetano Vicente, Vitorino and Bendito were killed. Another member of the Koramil, Gabriel, escaped as did two members of the KMP militia, Jhoni Franca and Mouzinho (José Cardoso) [HRVD Statements 5612, 7164 and CAVR Community Profiles of Opa and Daudet Villages, Lolotoe Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 14 July 2003].

*In May 1999, members of the local BTT, Koramil members and members of KMP militia from Lolotoe, led by militia commanders T691 and T692, came and arrested me and 21 other clandestine members and took us to Lolotoe Town. We were forced to make a traditional oath…The elders from Lebos and Lolotoe were invited to a ceremony where a goat and a chicken were sacrificed. One bottle of wine and coconut juice were mixed with the goat and chicken blood. Then they ordered us 21 people, to line up below a flagpole from which the red and white [Indonesian flag] was flying. Halilintar militia commander and PPI commander T1 and his followers started to make the blood-drinking oath, [saying that] those of us working in the clandestine network would no longer be a part of the organisation from that moment onwards and that we would no longer be "two-faced" [or "two-headed"]. My friends and I joined in the traditional oath because we were afraid that otherwise we would die. But we still thought that there was only one way, namely "Ukun Raik An" [Independence].*

737. People detained by the military in other areas were made to join the operation. Saturnino Mali Eli described how he was arrested at his home in Maliana (Bobonaro) by the TNI, the local Babinsa and a member of TNI, T694, together with three members of military intelligence, Lieutenant T695 [head of intelligence in Maliana], T696 and T697, all carrying AR-16 rifles. They took him to the Raifun 1 village office in the town of Maliana, where he was forced to join an operation in the sub-district of Lolotoe. This operation was probably the operation discussed above. On his return from Lolotoe, he was held in a cell at the Maliana Kodim for four days, where he was investigated and beaten by a member of TNI, T698. He was then taken out to be killed, but was saved by a member of TNI named Domingos.*

738. As a result of the Lolotoe operation Mário Gonçalves, a CNRT leader from the village of Guda (Lolotoe, Bobonaro), was also detained and tortured by a large group of KMP militia as well as the village head on 24 May. The following description is taken from an indictment issued by the Serious Crimes Unit in May 2001 of Mário Gonçalves's treatment by members of the KMP militia:

> When Mário Gonçalves came out of the church he was beaten by the KMP militia members whilst being dragged to the field outside the CNRT office. At the field, Sabino Gouveia Leite [the village head], José Cardoso Fereira alias Mouzinho [the KMP deputy commander] and João Franca da Silva alias Jhoni Franca [the KMP commander] ordered members of the KMP militia to beat Mário Gonçalves in turns. Approximately 37 KMP militia members beat Mário Gonçalves. João Franca da Silva alias Jhoni Franca also attacked Mário Gonçalves with a machete, cutting him on his right arm and stabbing him in the left shoulder.

* HRVD Statement 2535; see also HRVD 1868 in which the head of the intelligence section, T695, is described as interrogating the victim in the Maliana Kodim 1636, placing a table leg on his foot with two people sitting on the table.

Sabino Gouveia Leite incited José Cardoso Fereira alias Mouzinho and João Franca da Silva alias Jhoni Franca to cut off Mário Gonçalves' ear… His ear was thrown on the ground and Sabino Gouveia Leite and João Franca da Silva alias Jhoni Franca forced Mário Gonçalves to eat it. Mário Gonçalves feared for his life and did as he was ordered by eating his right ear.[1010]

Ermera, May 1999

739. Violence continued to occur in the district of Ermera in May 1999 as the military and militia conducted operations throughout the district. Operations reported to the Commission included the following:

- On 2 May, the military conducted an operation in Lauala Village (Ermera, Ermera) and detained pro-independence youths. José Xavier do Amaral was arrested by members of Kodim and SGI.
- In Mau Ubo Village (Hatolia, Ermera) between 9 and 11 May the local BTT carried out a mass arrest of pro-independence supporters or their families.[1011] According to Jacinto de Jesus Soares, the operation was instigated at the request of the village head of Mau Ubo, T700, who called on the BTT to conduct an operation in the village after Falintil allegedly surrounded his house on 8 May. All the men of the village fled to the forest leaving their families behind. Jacinto de Jesus Soares stated that his wife, Branca Araújo dos Santos, and a relative, Deolinda Santos, were detained and then forced to find their husbands.[1012] On 12 May, Jacinto Soares and his brother, Gregório Araújo, reported to the BTT. They were immediately beaten and kicked for three hours and then forced to apologise to the village head. As security for the family they then had to pay Rp200,000 to T700 and give one buffalo, two goats and two sacks of coffee to members of the BTT.*
- In Haturegas in Fatubessi Village (Hatolia, Ermera) on 14 May, the Darah Merah militia (also known as Darah Integrasi) conducted an operation to detain supporters of independence. NN described how at least 30 people from the community were beaten with green coffee branches by the militia. NN was beaten for several hours, then taken to Fatubessi by T147, a member of Darah Merah militia, with his wife, ON and his adult son, PN, all pro-independence supporters. There, ON was raped and PN was tortured so badly that he died soon after from his injuries.[1013]
- Nine pro-independence supporters were arrested on 26 May 1999 by a Babinsa T702, and six BTT members, including T699. They were taken to the Lauana

* HRVD Statement 6421; 6428. HRVD Statement F9425 also relates that the victims had to pay one sack of coffee and two chickens to a civil servant named T700 to obtain the husband's release.

(Letefoho, Ermera) village office where they were beaten and jabbed with a rifle, and then held for one night. The detainees included Saturnino de Deus Soares, the clandestine leader in the area, Domingos Soares, Manuel Soares, Serafin Soares, Paolino de Araújo, Maulino, Jaime, João and Pedro. Regina dos Santos, the wife of Saturnino Soares, was then ordered by the wife of the former village head, to cook for the members of the Darah Merah Militia.[1014]

Continuing search for clandestine members

740. Arrest and interrogation of clandestine members also continued in May. Monica Amaral described her detention in Zumalai (Covalima) for four days. She was tortured by female militia members, a new phenomenon that emerged in 1999:*

> On 2 May 1999, a female East Timorese member of Mahidi militia, T704, and an Indonesian TNI member, T709, with about ten other members of Mahidi attacked our SMP (junior high school) in Beco to arrest me… [along with] Domingas dos Santos, Cecilia da Costa and Lucia da Costa. They took us to the Mahidi post in Zumalai in a Kijang [vehicle]. When we got there we were interrogated. They said that we were hiding grenades, weapons and Fretilin flags, but we said that we didn't know [anything]. On 3 May 1999, they took us back to a house in Beco to look for the grenades, weapons and a Fretilin flag. Because they didn't find anything, T704, T711 and T712 hit and kicked us on our backs. T704 punched me in the face until I was bleeding. T713 burned my mouth with a cigarette. The three of them beat us. When they finished the beating they took us to the house of the Mahidi coordinator, T602, in Zumalai. They put the four of us in a cell and started interrogating us. We weren't given any food or drink.[1015]

741. In the sub-district of Lequidoe (Aileu), AHI militia forces and Rajawali soldiers made several arrests while searching for clandestine members, CNRT members, clandestine documents or ordinary people who provided Falintil with food. The arrests were sometimes made in collaboration with the Koramil and the Sub-district administrator, T715, whose office was used for detaining people.[1016] Sabino das Neves told the Commission:

> In May 1999, the chief of the RT (Rukun Tetangga, Neighbourhood Association), T716, and members of the AHI militia ran in and out of houses looking for clandestine documents. In my aunt Maria Fátima's house in the aldeia *of Fatu Merin they found a letter of appeal (apelo)*

* See for example the case of Ana Maria Mouzinho (par. 687) in which T704 was also a perpetrator. In another case, T705, a member of Aitarak militia, was named by Manuel Soares Lemos as the one who hit him across the head with an iron rod in the Aitarak post in Kampung Alor, West, Dili (Dili) on 14 September 1999. Community members of Ahic Village (Lacluta, Viqueque) told the Commission that two women from Ahic, Hermelinda da Conceicão and Rita Correia, were beaten severely by T706, the wife of a PPI member, resulting in serious head injuries. [HRVD Statements 6260; 7024 and CAVR Community Profile of Ahic Village, Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District, 22 November 2002].

from the Falintil Chief-of-Staff [Chefe do Estado-Maior]…My aunt told them that her "son", Sabino das Neves, had brought that letter to the house. I was in the SMP (Junior High School) Liquidoe at that time. After school, two other friends, Domingos Araújo and João Oliveira, and I were questioned by T716 and members of AHI militia. Later we were taken to Koramil headquarters. In the headquarters we were interrogated by Liquidoe Sub-district Administrator T716 and the Liquidoe Koramil Commander, T710. They took off our clothes and accused us of assisting Falintil. The Koramil commander ordered four members of Koramil to point their guns at us and they threatened us with death if we didn't provide clear information. After we were interrogated for about four hours they released us and told us to report to the Koramil every day. But that very same day we ran away to Dili.[1017]

742. Intelligence organisations were also involved in identifying and detaining pro-independence supporters. After the military found out that Lucas João was hiding six members of Falintil in his house in Lahomea (Maliana, Bobonaro) he was arrested on 11 May by members of Dadurus Merah Putih, Kaer Metin Merah Putih, the SGI and the Kodim. His hands and feet were tied and he was put into a bag. He was then taken to the Maliana Kodim where he was beaten while still in the bag. He was later put in a dark cell, where he was not given food and drink for five days. He was threatened with a gun before he was released.[1018]

743. On 19 May 1999, Vicente Lourdes and Martinho da Costa Barreto were captured by the ABLAI militia commander T717 in Letefoho (Same, Manufahi). He handed the detainees over to Koramil member T434, a Kodim member called T719 and an ABLAI leader T720, who took the victims to the Manufahi Kodim 1634. At the Kodim, T434, members of Kopassus and civilian staff of the Kodim interrogated the detainees. They were told to stand against the wall, hands raised in the air, and were then punched, kicked and beaten in the ribs and burned with cigarette butts in the face and over the rest of their bodies. They were held in the Kodim for ten days.[1019]

744. Tomás dos Santos told the Commission that he and other pro-independence supporters were arrested and tortured on 30 May 1999:

At 4.00 in the morning, a Halilintar militia member, José Zoro, pulled me from my house in Abatninin [Rairobo, Atabae, Bobonaro]. He held me very tightly and brought me to the street and immediately a TNI wearing a green beret took me to a car. There were already other people in the car, namely: Ernesto Soares, Baptista Guterres, Hermenegildo Tavares, Henriques, João da Culu, Francisco Martins, Afonso Haletalo and Jacinto Barros. We were forced to lie face downward in the car and our backs were pinned with wood while the Atabae Koramil Commander stepped on the wood. We were taken to the Koramil and when we arrived we were stripped naked, beaten with the root of a banyan tree...[and] they beat my face. Then they told us to lie on the floor while they tied our hands.

In the evening, the SGI came and took us out, covering our eyes with handkerchiefs, and then they beat us with weapons until our bodies were bruised. Until now, I cannot do any heavy work; my back was affected so that if I work, it hurts all the time.[1020]

Identifying marks

The cutting off of Mário Goncalves's ear by a member of the KMP in Lolotoe was not the only instance of such an act reported to the Commission. One statement suggests that it was not only the Indonesian authorities who resorted to cutting off ears in Lolotoe. Armando do Rêgo, a former member of Falintil, told the Commission that on 9 August 1999, when he was walking to Mass with his wife in Lolotoe, they were stopped by Falintil and he was taken away. His captors, Falintil members T722 and T723, beat him with a block of wood, kicked him until his nose bled, and threatened him with a knife. He said that a car then arrived and two police officers named Constantino and Caetano were pulled out and their ears were cut off.[1021]

Indonesian armed forces also committed similar acts. The community of Laclo (Atsabe, Ermera) reported that in May members of the SGI, the TNI and Team Pancasila cut off the ear of a man called Bereleki in the village of Laubano, and Agustinho's ear in the village of Obulo. The following day members of the SGI, Partisans and Team Pancasila cut off Lourenço's ear in Atara.[1022]

The Commission also received various accounts of people whose hair was shaved or cut off. In one instance a man's hair was shaved into the shape of a cross, in another all those identified as independence supporters were lined up and their hair cut off.[1023]

Manatuto, the involvement of the district administrator

745. The district administrator (bupati) of Manatuto, T724, was also named in three statements given to the Commission for personally interrogating people and allowing his house to be used as a detention centre.[1024] Connected with the TNI since he became a Tonsus commander in the late 1970s (see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation), and allegedly made an honorary Kopassus officer,[1025] he allowed his house to be used as a Kopassus post. Joaquim Soares stated that he was detained in T724's home. Joaquim told the Commission that in May 1999, when he was on his way to a CNRT opening ceremony with his family and other civilians, members of the Team Morok militia, T726, T727, T728, and T729, stopped them. They were ordered to go to the Manatuto Kodim to receive weapons but were instead taken to the house of T724. There they were blindfolded with black cloth and then interrogated individually about the whereabouts of the CNRT office. When Joaquim Soares answered that he did not know, his hands and feet were tied, he was beaten with wood, kicked and punched, and burned with cigarettes. After this abuse he was locked in one of the rooms in T724's house for seven days, while still tied up.[1026]

746. John Hornai Sarmento described how, in early 1999, the six village heads and the sub-district administrator of Soibada were suspected of clandestine activity and so were summoned to see the district administrator of Manatuto. He questioned and interrogated them on their involvement in clandestine activity. Following the interrogation, John Hornai Sarmento and his colleagues were given Rp25,000 each to return to Soibada but the sub-district administrator (camat) of Soibada, Zaolino, was kept in detention in Manatuto. John Sarmento heard that a Mahadomi militia member, T732, tortured Zaolino and that eventually Zaolino was killed.*

Detentions and torture between June and 30 August, the day of the Popular Consultation

747. The United Nations Assistance Mission for East Timor (UNAMET) arrived in Timor-Leste on 4 June 1999. After UNAMET deployed, reports of arrests and torture decreased, though people continued to be intimidated and some were threatened with death, usually to force them to vote for autonomy in the Popular Consultation. One deponent, from Zumalai, referring to this period, stated:

> After UNAMET arrived they released us to go home but [Mahidi] militia members T733, T602 and T644 said to us: "If autonomy loses we will kill all of you including your wives and children."[1027]

748. In this period, pro-integration supporters continued to pressure people to support their cause, sometimes resulting in the detention of pro-independence supporters. "Socialisation visits" to communities, during which the authorities purportedly sought to inform communities about the Popular Consultation, were often used to intimidate people in the hope of getting them to support autonomy.

749. In June, in the village of Lebos (Lolotoe, Bobonaro) 20 youths were detained for a day and a night in the village office during a "socialisation visit" by the Kodim 1636 head of intelligence, and members of the local BTT and the Dadurus Merah Putih militia. They were threatened and warned not to get involved in clandestine activity before being released.[1028] The community of Saburai (Maliana, Bobonaro) also told the Commission that in June the commander of the Dadurus Merah Putih militia in Saburai, T736, threatened the community by telling them that whoever chose to vote to reject autonomy at the Popular Consultation would have their hands cut off.[1029] The community of Saboria (Aileu Town, Aileu) said that militia leaders, the TNI and the police engaged in autonomy socialisation events in which they forced members of the community to endorse the autonomy option, attend a blood-oath ceremony and join the AHI militia.[1030]

* A teacher called Vicente was also killed at the same time [HRVD Statement 0643].

750. People began to flee from their homes and were also liable to detention if caught (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Famine and Forced Displacement). In the district of Liquiçá there were cases where people whose husband, child or other family members had fled to the forest or were trying to hide in the forest, were themselves arrested and their family members also.[1031] Abilio Lobato de Fatima stated:

> On 7 June 1999, a joint force of BMP militia, police and TNI came to Fatunesu in the village of Fahilebo to arrest me because they had received information that I had run away to the forest. They took me to the BMP command post in Fatumasi Village (Bazartete, Liquiçá) where they held me for 40 days. On 23 June 1999, BMP militia went again to my house and arrested the wives of all our brothers who had fled, to explain where their husbands were. I gave Rp500,000 to T737 so that the wives of our brothers would be released. I was still kept at the command post and while I was there, I had to be on duty to watch the post 24 hours a day, without a break. I tried to give Rp950,000 to T738 and T739 to protect me from the threats of other militia. When the results of the referendum were announced on 4 September, I fled to the forest without them knowing.[1032]

751. Pro-independence campaigners were also detained. For example, on 26 June the DMP militia in Maliana reportedly detained five clandestine members – Mateus Barreto, Agusto Marques, Joséfina Marques, Joanico Soares and Fernando Vicente – when they gathered to distribute CNRT banners. They were pushed around and then taken to the Bobonaro District police station where they were held for one month.[1033]

752. Despite the UN presence, the military still carried out occasional arrests on its own. An East Timorese man told the Commission how in Fatululik (Covalima) at the end of June he was arrested by an Indonesian intelligence officer, T740, and taken to the Fatululik Koramil. The Koramil commander, T741, interrogated him about certain documents and he was held for three nights.[1034]

753. Others were released. On 8 July 1999, the Lolotoe Koramil Commander Lieutenant Bambang Indra, the Guda village head, Sabino Gouveia Leite, and the KMP commander, José Cardoso Fereira (Mouzinho), co-signed a document confirming the release of six people back to their village of Guda. It stated that they had been held for "guidance" since 22 May and that they were now being returned to their village "in a safe and healthy condition", but that they might be called for further questioning at some time in the future.[1035] The letter is another clear demonstration of the continuing cooperation between the military, militia and the civil administration.

754. In August, as the date of the Popular Consultation approached, terror campaigns by the militias escalated. On 25 August, five days before the Popular Consultation, two East Timorese BMP members, T742 and T743, arrested an East Timorese man and took him to the Command Post in Fatumasi (Bazartete, Liquiçá). The Commission was told that he received fierce beatings resulting in a loss of hearing, was kicked in the back and was then ordered to guard the BMP post in Unahei.[1036]

755. On 26 August, Aitarak militia members including four East Timorese members T744, T745, T746 and T747 attacked six men – Calistro, Julio, Sergio, Fernando, António and Tomás – in Calistro's house in Hudi Laran (Bairro Pite, West Dili). They were beaten, kicked and slashed on the head and then taken to an Aitarak post were they were held briefly before being handed over to the SGI for interrogation.[1037]

Detentions and torture after the Popular Consultation

756. As has been described in earlier sections of this Report, the period immediately following the Popular Consultation was violent. Tensions increased further after the announcement of the result on 4 September, which was followed by a frenzy of destruction of houses and infrastructure. The incidence of detention and torture rose. Whereas before the Popular Consultation detention and torture were perpetrated to intimidate and coerce detainees into supporting integration, after the Popular Consultation the reasons for these violations included the following:

- Punishment and revenge
- Detentions of targeted victims in order to execute them
- Holding people to prevent them from fleeing to the mountains or catching them as they came back to their homes to find food
- Gathering groups of people in one place so that they could be sent to West Timor, in an attempt to demonstrate to the outside world that the majority of East Timorese people did not agree with the result of the Popular Consultation and that they would rather stay in Indonesia.

757. After casting their votes on 30 August, many CNRT and other pro-independence supporters, particularly the movement's leaders, felt unsafe in their homes and fled to the forest or mountains. Sometimes family members left behind were targeted for detention and ill-treatment. Community members of Ahic (Lacluta, Viqueque) described how this occurred in their region. José Andrade dos Santos and 39 other pro-independence supporters in Dilor (Lacluta, Viqueque), while on their way to vote, noticed militia posts at strategic points. They decided that after the vote they would flee and stay the night in Ue-Aiheres (beyond Mount Manutargele, in Bibileo Viqueque) to organise hiding places for the community. Their wives and families stayed behind in Dilor Town. Pro-autonomy supporters subjected some of those who remained behind, including José Andrade dos Santos's relatives, to degrading treatment, threats, intimidation and torture.[1038]

758. Others were caught and detained after they had fled but returned to their homes to find food. For example Abilio Paicheco, who had fled to the hills after the vote, came down to Mota Ulun, Becora (Dili) with two friends to find food on 17 September 1999. On the way they ran into six members of the Aitarak militia. The militia beat and kicked them and shot Abilio in the back. He survived but told the Commission that he still carries the bullet in his body.[1039]

759. A week after the Popular Consultation, on 7 September 1999, Evangelino da Conceição and his friend Mateus also came down from the hills to look for food, but they were caught and suffered ill-treatment. They were caught on the road to Dare (Dili) by an East Timorese TNI officer, T335, and Battalion 613 troops. They were beaten, and a member of Battalion 613 grabbed Evangelino around the waist and stabbed him in the ear with his bayonet. For the next two hours, a civil servant beat both men and kicked them in the face and ears. They were then taken to the Dare Koramil, where they were again stabbed with a bayonet on their backs and thighs. Evangelino was burned with cigarettes and thrown into the water by the TNI, while an East Timorese civilian who worked for the Koramil, T749, threw a stone at his head causing it to bleed.[1040]

760. The military, police and their auxiliaries were also looking for members of Falintil coming down from the forest and mountains. Because a person from the forest had been seen in Amelia do Carmo's house in Asumaten in the town of Suai (Suai, Covalima), her house was attacked on 4 September 1999 by the Laksaur militia members T750, T751, T752, T753, T754 and 40 police from the Lorosae Contingent. They found four young men in her house, though Amelia only knew one of them. All were beaten on the spot and taken first to the police station and then to the Covalima Kodim. Amelia's two-year old child died after her mother was threatened with a machete, and the Commission was told that her mother believes this was due to the shock of the attack.[1041]

After the Popular Consultation

761. After the Popular Consultation, but before the results were announced on 4 September, pro-independence supporters and clandestine members continued to be detained.

762. The Commission received six statements from members of PDI-P (Partai Demokrasi Indonesia-Perjuangan), the Indonesian political party in Oecussi and Ataúro (Dili).[1042] The deponents believe they were targeted because of their affiliation with that party.[1043] According to Gonzalo Abi from Oecussi, this was because many members of PDI-P were also clandestine or CNRT members.[1044] Tito da Costa, a member of PDI-P as well as a clandestine member, told the Commission how he was called along with others, some of whom were also PDI-P members, to attend the Ataúro Koramil commander's office after the Popular Consultation:

> After the Popular Consultation, on 1 September 1999 at 9.00am, the Koramil commander came and called me and some friends, namely José, Alfredo, Tomás Alves, Cézar Brandão, Pedro dos Santos, Daniel, José Rambo and Apoli to the Ataúro Koramil headquarters. When we arrived at the Koramil, the Koramil commander ordered us to line up. Then he played a tape and we all had to dance. Because we didn't dance the Koramil commander told his East Timorese subordinates, T755 and T758, to beat us. Then he ordered us to go out and show our respect to the red and white flag for about two hours. We were then told to go home, but so that we could summon our other friends from Makadede. We were ordered to report to the Koramil for two weeks. After the result of the Popular Consultation was announced the Koramil commander [left Ataúro] and we were free.[1045]

763. In Covalima, violence increased dramatically after the Popular Consultation. Perpetrators included not only members of the Laksaur militia and the TNI, but also the local police and the Lorosae Contingent (Kontingen Lorosae), an Indonesian police contingent assigned to Timor-Leste specifically for providing security during the Popular Consultation. Detainees were taken to police stations throughout Covalima. In Fohoren (Fohorem, Covalima), many civilians fled to the Fohoren Nossa Senhora do Rosário Church after they had voted, anticipating post-Popular Consultation violence. The police arrested 14 people seeking refuge there and took them to the Fohoren police station.[1046] Community members of Fohoren described how they were beaten, stripped of their clothes and burned with cigarettes at the police station. The women were sexually harrassed. They were touched and fondled, and threatened with lewd remarks and sexual advances. The Laksaur militia leader, T757, came from Salele to interrogate some of the detainees.[1047]

764. Later East Timorese police officers T758 and T759 and police commander T760, together with Laksaur militia company commander T761, commander T762 and a deputy commander T763, went to the church in Fohoren and arrested 16 of the men.* Informers had told Laksaur that the men had influenced their family members to join the clandestine movement. Basilio Amaral described their treatment:

> We were taken to the Laksaur post at the police station, where we were interrogated and then beaten one by one. Our clothes were taken off before we were beaten, punched, kicked and hit with weapons until our faces were covered with blood. They put weapons in our mouths and punched me until my face was bruised. We were tortured like this for two days.[1048]

Punishment and revenge

765. After the result was announced the military and the militias responded with more violence. Hundreds of pro-independence supporters were detained and tortured or suffered other cruel, degrading and inhuman treatment. Many victims of arbitrary detention and torture told the Commission that the motive for their detention after the Popular Consultation was simple revenge on the part of the militia and the military for the result of the Popular Consultation. In the district of Dili the Commission received statements describing how people were taken to the Aitarak headquarters at the Tropical, Aitarak posts, police stations and the Koramil in Metinaro and beaten.[1049] Detention was, as in earlier months in 1999, very short – usually no more than a few days.

766. The AHI militia acted alone in detaining and interrogating Domingos da Cruz. He stated that he was arrested on 5 September 1999 by T764 and T765, members of AHI militia, and taken to the local government agriculture office where he was beaten, kicked and punched. Then he was taken to the AHI headquarters where he was interrogated by the AHI commander, T766, and slapped and threatened with death by T767. A militia member named T768 beat him into unconsciousness. Fernando, another militia member, later rescued him.[1050]

* Basilio Amaral, Fernando Sarmento, Hipolito Afonso, Daniel de Araújo, Anito Saldanha, Grasiano do Rego, Paulo dos Santos, José Barreto, Antonio Amaral, Julião Cardoso, Gabriel dos Santos, Angelo dos Santos, Constâncio dos Santos, Roberto Gomes, Pedro do Rego and Salvador Pereira.

767. In Balibó (Bobonaro), Agapito da Purificação, a clandestine and CNRT leader who had given money and rice to Falintil in Sector 4, described how he was arrested with his friends Alexio Gama, Sabino da Purificação, Manuel Caiero and Paulo Soares on 17 September 1999 in Balibó Town (Balibó, Bobonaro). TNI member T769 made the arrest with Firmi militia commander T770 and militia members T771 and T772. They were taken to the Firmi headquarters in Balibó for interrogation, during which T772 beat Agapito over the head with a home-made firearm (rakitan) until he was unconscious. They were threatened with death and held captive for three days without food before being released.[1051]

Cases of detention before evacuation

768. As the militia and military began to withdraw, they transported thousands of people over the border. Many of those forcibly displaced in this way reported a short period of detention, sometimes as short as a few hours, before they began moving.

769. The community of the village of Ahic (Lacluta, Viqueque) described their detention on the day the result of the Popular Consultation was announced, 4 September. Members of the community of Dilor who had not fled were gathered in the garden of the Koramil by members of PPI militia. They were guarded tightly for a short period after which they were evacuated to West Timor.[1052]

770. In the district of Lautém in the weeks after the Popular Consultation, amid scenes of burning houses and the sound of gunshots, some people who were unable to flee were captured and sent to the Kodim 1629 in Lautém.[1053] Some were immediately sent on to West Timor, while others were detained in the Kodim for a few days.

771. Manuel Mendonça was taken to the Koramil in Metinaro (Dili) on 6 September by members of the Aitarak militia, where he was forced to put his and his family's name down on a list of people to be sent to Atambua, West Timor. But the following day, Manuel and three of his family fled to Kotomurin.[1054]

Detention of individuals targeted for execution

772. The Commission also heard of individuals known to be leaders who were targeted for arrest and detention so that they could be executed (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). Militia leaders and the TNI identified certain people for capture. Sometimes lists were drawn up to distinguish those to be sent to West Timor and those to be executed.*

* Serious Crimes Unit investigator Dave Savage told the Commission: "We have obtained evidence across all districts of Timor-Leste that lists of Independence leaders were drawn up during 1999. These were the people that were hunted down and in many cases executed. This can be shown by the number of CNRT, and leading Pro-Independence supporters who were hunted down, even in West Timor (Kupang and Atambua) arrested, detained and executed. In many cases those arrested in West Timor were transported back to Timor-Leste for the execution phase of their detention. This is not to say that there weren't additional killings to those identified and listed, either as part of a larger offensive (Suai Church, Maliana District police station, clergy killings, Passabe massacre) or even part of a crazed mass killing of anyone not under the control of TNI/militias (Maliana 3-9 September) or opportunistic paybacks for any number of reasons." (E-mail from Dave Savage, CAVR Archive).

773. António da Costa Guterres told the Commission that the BMP militia arrested José da Costa Guterres in Odomau (Maliana, Bobonaro) on 5 September and took him to the Bobonaro District police station in Maliana, where he was then killed because of his membership of the CNRT.[1055]

774. Anibal do Régo and Lito da Costa Amaral both gave statements describing their arrest as they tried to flee to West Timor on 9 September. As they neared the Suai Koramil, Anibal said that he was arrested by the Koramil commander and the Laksaur militia. The Koramil commander, Lieutenant T774, and T775 of Laksaur ordered him and four others – Paulo Ximenes, Cancio, Lito da Costa Amaral and Anis Tahu – to get into a car. When they arrived at Audian in Camanasa (Suai), they were told to get out of the car and three of them, Paulo Ximenes, Anis Tahu and Cancio, were selected to be killed. They were shot immediately, while the other two prisoners, Anibal do Régo and Lito da Costa Amaral, were driven home but on the way were kicked and stamped on.[1056]

775. Domingos Araújo, a member of the Mahidi militia, described to the Commission how on 12 September 1999 he and eight other militia members attended a meeting called by the East Timorese Mahidi commander, T776, at his house in Cassa (Ainaro, Ainaro). T776 and his brother T779 called for the capture of Paulino Maria Bianco because he was suspected of being a clandestine member and helping Falintil. Immediately after the meeting Mahidi members caught Paulino and brought him to T776 the following morning. Paulino's face was wrapped in plastic and his hands and feet were tied. T776 then ordered Mahidi members T782 and T783 to take Paulino to Sildena Harikain, Cassa (Ainaro, Ainaro) to have him killed.[1057]

Release

776. In most cases of detention reported to the Commission from 1999, the victims were allowed to walk out and go home, sometimes as soon as a few hours after arrest. Most were released after receiving warnings and threats and being ill-treated. Threats were both implicit and explicit. For example, it might be suggested that if the warning was not heeded, the captors could easily find and capture the victim again. As mentioned above, some were released only after participating in a blood oath ceremony and after promising to become a member of the militia.

Reporting requirements

777. For those victims detained before the Popular Consultation, many had reporting requirements following their release for days, weeks and sometimes even several months.[1058] This is a similar pattern to earlier periods and, as in earlier periods, it allowed the Indonesian authorities to monitor the movements of suspected troublemakers. Sometimes the reporting requirements were onerous and involved multiple institutions. Francisco da Conceição Guterres described how when he was released from the Kodim and District police station in Ermera (Ermera) on 10 April 1999 he was required to report to the following institutions for nine days:

- 8.00 - 10.00am at the Ermera Kodim 1637
- 11.00 - 12.00 at the Ermera District police station
- 1.00 - 2.00pm at the Prosecutor's Office
- 2.00 - 4.00pm at the court.

778. Francisco was tried on 19 April 1999 and sentenced to two months imprisonment.[1059]

Bribes

779. Several statements told of detainees being forced to pay the police, militia or the military for their release. Extortion had been used in this way before 1999, and it became much more common in 1999.[1060] The Commission also heard of at least one case in which the deponent described having to pay a kind of protection money as the price for not being arrested. In this case the whole community in Atabae (Bobonaro) was forced to contribute money at the end of April. Cristovão Afonso described his arrest with seven friends by the Armui militia on 26 April because they were suspected of giving food to Falintil.* He told the Commission of the coercion to provide money and goods to the Halilintar militia on 27 April:

> The commander of the Halilintar militia gathered all of the residents of Diruaben and Bia-Matae to listen to his orders. They ordered everyone in Diruaben and Bia-Matae to give or collect money, livestock and rice to feed the Halilintar forces operating in Hatas Village. We were released only after these things were collected.[1061]

780. Often family members were told that their loved ones would not be released or worse, would be killed in detention, if they would not pay.[1062] Some were forced to sell their belongings in order to pay. Marcus Pereira da Costa Freitas had already been released from a BMP post in Fatumasi (Bazartete, Liquiçá) but was still harassed and eventually had to pay to be able to live in relative peace. He told the Commission:

> I was ordered to go to the house of the East Timorese village head T784. Each night members of the BMP militia were watching me. Then T784 said to me that the Sub-district administrator of Bazartete, Jacinto Gonçalves, the Deputy Sub-district administrator, Laurindo, and a BMP militia member, Manuel Rosário, needed money. So I told my wife to take a traditional necklace belonging to my grandmother and I sold it to T784 for Rp800,000. That, together with Rp1.3 million from my father, totalled Rp2.1 million. [This money] was given to T784 to give to Laurindo, Jacinto, Manuel Rosário and their men. After that they started to treat me well.[1063]

* The seven friends were Anselmus Nunes, Julio Nunes, Agustino Soares, Marcelino Ximenes, Flabiano Lopes, Pedro dos Santos and Agusta. The deponent stated that all detainees apart from himself and Julio Nunes died while in detention because of their "terrible physical condition" after the torture.

Intervention by others

781. The Commission has received several statements from people who were released because of the intervention of others. A visit by a priest would sometimes result in the release of a detainee.* Other detainees stated that the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) facilitated their release.† Sometimes a family member or friend in a position to intervene would assist. For example, in January Paulo dos Santos had been taken from the Marines Headquarters in Cassa (Ainaro), where he was interrogated by a member of the Marines about his clandestine activities. After two days his uncle Agustinho Sarmento, the Sub-district administrator of Hatu Odo (Ainaro) came and freed him and took him to Hatu Odo, where he hid for a month.[1064] José Brites was held in a BMP post in April and was told to escape by one of the militia members, Ventura, because he was going to be killed the next day by other militia members.[1065]

Escape

782. The Commission also received a number of reports of detainees escaping from detention, often by simply running away.[1066] This was possible because improvised and poorly secured buildings were used to hold most detainees, as discussed above. Several statements reveal that detainees fled after their captors threatened them with death.[1067]

Torture and ill-treatment in 1999

783. As in earlier periods, victims of torture and ill-treatment in 1999 suffered being beaten, punched, kicked and burned with cigarettes. For example Armindo Soares Salsinha, a CNRT leader in the town of Ermera, was captured on 30 April by members of the TNI, Rajawali and DMP militia and was taken to the Rajawali post at the Integration Hall. He was later moved to the Koramil. He described his treatment to the Commission:

> When we arrived ar the Koramil, T785 (a soldier), T789 and T786 (DMP militia) interrogated me while pressing a chair onto my foot, and José used his weapon to hit me across the face, knocking out two of my teeth. T786 kicked me in the chest and kicked and punched my forehead. A soldier from the BTT punched me and a BTT used his gun to hit my back so that now I suffer if I lift anything heavy. I was beaten continuously from midnight until morning.[1068]

784. There were some differences from earlier periods in the methods of torture and ill-treatment used in 1999. For example, on the one hand the Commission received very few reports of the use of electricity in comparison to the decades before.[1069] On the other hand, death threats were much more commonly reported than in previous years.

* For example Agusto da Silva and another victim were released from the Covalima Kodim in March 1999 after Father Hilário met with the head of intelligence, Sergeant Yus Nampun [HRVD Statements 5135-2. See also HRVD statements 2161-2; 5641; 8445; 5176].

† For example, the ICRC was mentioned as facilitating releases from the Covalima Kodim in May 1999 and the Dili District police station on 27 January 1999 [HRVD Statements 7399; 5176].

785. Other methods of torture to emerge in this period include the following.

Humiliation and degradation

786. Many incidents of torture or ill-treatment of victims had an element of humiliation and degradation of the victim, both while in detention centres and in public. Public humiliation of the victim was not only used to dissuade the person from "reoffending" but also to send a clear message to the community about the consequences of being pro-independence.

787. Some detainees were humiliated by being stripped naked in public. Carlito Fernandes described how on 13 April 1999, the village head of Malabe Village (Atsabe, Ermera) called the people of Malabe to the village office and then ordered Carlito Fernandes to undress completely. Carlito was forced to stand in front of the crowd naked while the perpetrators beat him with wood, kicked him and then pushed him into a buffalo mud hole. He was sent home naked and ashamed. This occurred because his clandestine activities were discovered.[1070] Domingos da Conceição told the Commission that members of TNI from Atsabe (Ermera) arrested him because he was a clandestine member in Maliubu (Bobonaro, Bobonaro). They ordered him to take off his clothes and then made him stand on an anthill while they beat him with their rifle butts.[1071]

788. Degrading treatment of detainees also occurred after the Popular Consultation, as punishment for the result. José Costude Cardoso stated that he was told to strip naked in front of his house in Borohun, Duyung (Metinaro, Dili) by members of Aitarak militia on 31 August 1999.[1072] Fernando de Araújo Sarmento (the zone 1 clandestine secretary for Foheren Sub-district, Covalima) was arrested with Basilio Amaral, whose statement is quoted above. He told the Commission that on 1 September he and 13 others were captured by a joint group of Laksaur militia, BTT, Contingent Lorosae and the chief of police in Fohorem, T760.* They were taken to the Fohorem police station where they were forced to stand on one leg with their hands on their head while they were beaten by East Timorese police officers T759, T790, T791 and T792.[1073]

Public violence

789. Public violence was also a more common phenomenon than in previous years, perhaps to instil fear in the community and because the militia members acted with impunity. For instance in Manufahi, on 30 August, the day of the Popular Consultation, two men were decapitated and their severed heads were displayed in public to terrorise the community into leaving for West Timor.[1074]

* The other victims known to the deponent were: Basilio Amaral, Hipolito Afonso, Anito Saldanha, Paulo de Jesus, Angelo, António, Julio, Daniel, Graciano do Rego and Gabriel.

Verbal abuse

790. Insulting remarks about the independence movement and death threats were much more common than in previous years.[1075] The blood oaths in which participants were forced, often under threat of death, to drink mixed animal and human blood and swear allegiance to Indonesia was also a form of abuse.

Other cruel and degrading treatment

791. Many people suffered numerous other kinds of cruel and degrading treatment during 1999, including having their head covered with plastic, being deprived of food and drink or forced to eat non-food items, or being urinated on.

792. On 30 April, Alexandre dos Reis was captured by East Timorese Laksaur militia members T794 and T795, and a police officer, T796, in the village of Akar-Laran in Suai Loro (Suai, Covalima) and taken to the Covalima Kodim. He described his treatment to the Commission:

> Before I was beaten they put me in a room and then tied my neck with wire, tied my hands, tied my waist and handcuffed my hands…[They] covered my head with a black plastic bag and then beat me with their hands. The people who tortured me were a soldier, T797, and three others I did not know. I was tortured from 10.00pm until 12.00pm the next day. Then the ties and the plastic over my head were taken off but my hands remained handcuffed. For three days and three nights I was given no food and drink. Because I was so hungry and thirsty I lied and said that I needed to use the toilet, and then I drank the toilet water.[1076]

793. While detained in a cell behind the village office of Cassa (Ainaro, Ainaro), Filomeno Soni and Basilio were stripped of their clothes, their heads were wrapped in plastic for 30 minutes and their toenails pulled out with pliers by members of the local BTT, Gadapaksi and Mahidi.[1077]

794. On 13 September, Raimundo Madeira was detained by Aitarak militia and taken to a TNI post in Resende Hotel, Dili. After being blindfolded, beaten unconscious and dragged along the main road, he was ordered to sleep on the floor. He was later urinated on and burnt with cigarette butts.[1078]

795. After voting in the Popular Consulation, Justino do Rego dos Santos was trying to flee to Dili airport. He was stopped by Aitarak militia and taken to their Comoro post. He was heavily beaten, resulting in bleeding from inside his ear, and he was forced to chew his CNRT identity card and swallow it.[1079]

796. Carlos Pereira described a rather odd kind of ill-treatment while detained in the Suai Loro Sub-district police station:

> On 25 April 1999, early in the morning, a police officer went out and bought one rice meal and forced me and Agustinho to eat it. He gave us only to the count of ten to finish. Because we couldn't eat it all by the time he had counted to ten, the police officer hit my chest, my back and my mouth with his weapon until blood poured out.[1080]

Conclusion

797. Several conclusions can be drawn from the evidence about the patterns of arbitrary detention, ill-treatment and torture in 1999:

- Arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment were used by the military or its militia proxies explicitly to intimidate the population and coerce people into support for integration with Indonesia.
- Militias were given free rein by the military to terrorise the community through the private and public abuse and torture of civilians. The Commission did not come across any examples of militia being punished or even reprimanded for their abuses. On the contrary, the evidence suggests that the military was very often involved in the detentions, torture and ill-treatment of victims.
- Military installations were used to detain, interrogate and torture victims.
- Militia groups also used improvised detention centres in which conditions of detention were poor.
- Periods of detention were short, usually no more than a week, although there were some exceptions to this. Sometimes an authority figure facilitated the release of a detainee. In other cases bribes were paid to the victim's captors.
- Torture and ill-treatment was designed not only to punish the victim but also to degrade and humiliate him or her.

Findings

Detentions, torture and ill-treatment by UDT

Detention

798. The Commission finds that:

1. Members and supporters of UDT and UDT forces carried out widespread detentions during the period of the armed movement in August 1975. These acts were clearly directed towards leaders, members and supporters of Fretilin. The Commission bases this finding on interviews with, and first-hand testimony of, hundreds of people who were detained by UDT or who witnessed UDT detaining people, as well as historical profiles prepared by communities.
2. UDT members and UDT forces detained victims in every district of Timor-Leste except Oecussi, but the largest numbers of people were detained in Ermera, Dili and Bobonaro. Most detentions occurred on the first day of the UDT armed movement, 11 August 1975, but more people were detained over the following ten days.

3. These detentions were a central strategy of the UDT action. However, UDT had no legal authority to arrest civilians, and these arrests and detentions arose from the legitimate exercise by Fretilin supporters of their rights to freedom of political opinion and freedom of association.
4. Victims of arbitrary detention were held in improvised prisons, usually large buildings in the area where the arrests were made. They included warehouses, schools, private houses, a former Portuguese prison, military barracks and animal pens. UDT also established main detention centres, including Palapaço in Dili and Descascadeira in Baucau, to which detainees arrested in other districts were brought.
5. Periods of detention were short because the UDT movement which began on 11 August was short-lived. Most detainees were released within two weeks but some were held for longer than one month. While in detention, detainees were regularly forced to perform work such as cooking for other detainees and cleaning detention centres, building roads or carrying rocks and wood. UDT released some detainees of its own accord but most were abandoned when Fretilin forces attacked the areas where detainees were being held and UDT forces fled.
6. The victims of arbitrary detention by UDT known to the Commission were predominantly male, of military age and believed by the perpetrators to have an association with Fretilin. Sometimes family members of these victims, including their wives, parents and children, were arbitrarily detained.
7. The perpetrators of arbitrary detention were predominantly UDT leaders at the district level or people under their command. These leaders knew the population in each district and were able to effectively target members or supporters of Fretilin.

Ill-treatment and torture

8. Members and supporters of UDT and individuals mobilised by UDT leaders carried out widespread cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of detainees during the armed movement in August 1975. In some cases detainees were tortured but this was not widespread. These acts occurred between 11 August 1975 and the end of August and in every district of Timor-Leste except Oecussi, but were concentrated in Ermera, Dili, and Bobonaro.

799. The Commission bases these findings on interviews with, and the first-hand testimony of, hundreds of people who were ill-treated and tortured by UDT or witnessed UDT detaining people.

9. Forms of physical abuse suffered by victims included:
    - Heavy beatings by hand or with a rifle, by one perpetrator or sometimes by a group of perpetrators
    - Whipping
    - Being tied up for long periods, sometimes for more than one week

- Death threats
- Cutting the victim with a machete or razor blades
- Slapping and kicking
- One victim reported being burned with lit cigarettes.

10. Individual UDT leaders held prisoners in buildings or structures that were not equipped to hold large groups of people for long periods of time. Sanitation and ventilation were grossly inadequate and little or no effort was made to improve conditions by members of UDT in charge of detention centres. Many detention centres were severely overcrowded. Further, UDT made no provision for feeding the hundreds of people whom it detained. Detainees from the main UDT detention centres reported being deprived of food; some received no food for up to nine days. At least two people died of starvation while in detention. The severity of these conditions amounted to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment.
11. Physical abuse of detainees was not carried out for the purpose of extracting information or to coerce the victim. Rather, victims suffered the violent acts listed above in the process of arrest, transportation to the prison and while in detention as punishment or as a manifestation of the wider unrestrained violence that was unleashed in this period.
12. The victims of ill-treatment and torture by UDT were primarily detainees or people under arrest. They were therefore predominantly military-aged men with a real or suspected association with Fretilin. Leaders of Fretilin were treated with particular brutality.
13. Ill-treatment and torture were not necessarily ordered by the UDT Political Committee, but the tensions of the time, the incitement to arrest made over the radio and the general incitement to "purge communists" created an atmosphere in which abuse of detainees was highly likely to occur. Further, members of the UDT Political Committee would have been aware that individual UDT leaders, members and UDT forces were ill-treating and in some cases torturing prisoners. The most extreme forms of abuse occurred in the UDT headquarters in Dili and in UDT's strongholds in the districts of Ermera and Liquiçá and senior UDT leaders were sighted in these places.
14. Only minimal efforts were made by the UDT leadership collectively to prevent abuse occurring or to stop the abuse of prisoners once the leadership became aware of what was happening.

Detentions, torture and ill-treatment by Fretilin

During the internal armed conflict

Detention

800. The Commission finds that:

15. Fretilin responded to the armed movement by UDT with an armed insurrection, which included the widespread capture and detention of leaders, members and supporters of UDT. Although this was partly motivated by a desire to halt violence against Fretilin members, it was also motivated by revenge for the violations that UDT members and forces had perpetrated. Detentions were carried out in all districts of Timor-Leste except Oecussi and Lautém, but numbers were highest in Aileu, Manufahi, Ainaro and Dili. More than one thousand people were detained around the territory.

16. Fretilin detained most members or supporters of UDT in the first week of the armed general insurrection, 20–27 August 1975, after which members and leaders of UDT fled the territory into West Timor (Indonesia). Isolated cases of detention of UDT members who remained behind continued until the Indonesian invasion. Fretilin also detained leaders, members and supporters of Apodeti who were involved in the UDT movement which began on 11 August through August and September. On 4 October, the Fretilin Central Committee ordered the widespread detention of members of Apodeti in response to rumours of an Apodeti coup and ABRI infiltration of Timor-Leste's borders, and it then detained the senior leaders of Apodeti as well as other members and supporters. Fretilin also detained members of the Portuguese administration including the Portuguese chief-of-police Lieutenant Colonel Maggiolo Gouveia because of his involvement in the UDT armed action of 11 August 1975.

17. Victims of arbitrary detention were held in improvised prisons, usually large buildings in the local area. Some of these had been been used by UDT during the armed movement. They included warehouses, schools, former Portuguese prisons, the Dili museum, military barracks. The largest detention centres were in the Fretilin headquarters of Aissirimou, in the district of Aileu.

18. After Fretilin had control of the territory it concentrated detainees from the districts of Ermera and Manufahi with detainees from Aissirimou and on 7 December, when Indonesia launched a large-scale invasion, detainees from Dili were also moved to Aissirimou. By 9 December, prisoners detained in Aissirimou numbered close to 1,000.

19. The victims of arbitrary detention by Fretilin members and supporters known to the Commission were predominantly male, of military age and believed by the perpetrator to have an association with UDT or Apodeti. Leaders of the KOTA and Trabalhista political parties were also detained. Sometimes family members of these victims were also arbitrarily detained.

20. The perpetrators of arbitrary detention were predominantly Fretilin commanders at the district level or people under their command. These commanders knew the population in each district and were able to effectively target members or supporters of UDT and Apodeti.

21. After the end of the internal armed conflict by late September 1975, Fretilin made efforts to accord due process to detainees. It established a commission of investigation (Comissão de Inquêrito) to decide on the guilt or innocence of detainees held after the UDT armed movement of 11 August 1975. This process involved people providing testimony. This process of investigation operated at the district level but in the atmosphere of recent conflict was no better than mob justice. The accused was not presumed innocent before being found guilty by the populace and had no right of reply. The form of punishment decided on by the people was often harsh and disproportionate to the crime alleged.

22. Victims were held in detention for up to five months, until the advance of Indonesian forces made holding prisoners untenable and they were abandoned, released or in some cases executed.

23. Detainees were regularly forced to perform tasks such as cooking for other detainees and cleaning detention centres, building roads and carrying rocks and wood. Some of the detainees were also recruited into Fretilin/Falintil forces after the large-scale invasion by Indonesia. In order to feed prisoners labour camps were established in which they were forced to work in rice-fields and coffee plantations.

24. Fretilin held onto its prisoners in Dili and Aileu after the Indonesian invasion for fear that they would fall into the hands of the Indonesian military. It moved the prisoners away from the invading forces, first taking those held in Dili to Aileu and then moving all prisoners from Aileu through Maubisse to Same Town and finally to Hola Rua in the sub-district of Same in Manufahi District. Some UDT detainees were taken to Ainaro. In Same, the majority of remaining detainees who were UDT were released and a small number of remaining Apodeti prisoners were released with conditions (Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances deals with the killing of prisoners).

Torture and ill-treatment

25. Members and supporters of Fretilin and Fretilin forces carried out widespread cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment of detainees during the internal armed conflict in 1975. The severity of the treatment suffered by detainees in some cases verged on torture and a number of people died as a result of the abuse they suffered. This abuse occurred in an atmosphere of unrestrained violence and in the spirit of revenge for the violations perpetrated by UDT. Members of Apodeti were also caught up in the violence and suffered ill-treatment and torture, particularly as the Indonesian incursions grew in intensity.

26. The brutality with which members of Fretilin treated detainees or allowed detainees to be treated is apparent from the following partial list of what took place:

- Heavy beatings by hand or with an implement including a rifle, an iron bar, wooden sticks, bamboo, rattan, car-brake cords, a helmet, a pestle, nails and a barbed whip; some detainees were beaten to death or until they were unconscious, blind or deaf
- Prisoners were ordered to beat each other, including prisoners who were related to each other

- Stabbing
- Whipping
- Tying detainees up before beating them so that they could not defend themselves
- Dragging detainees along the ground until they were injured and bleeding
- Stripping detainees and forcing them to sleep naked on the rough ground.

801. These acts began to occur on 20 August 1975 in every district of Timor-Leste except Oecussi but were concentrated in Ermera, Dili, Baucau, Manufahi and Aileu.

27. The treatment of detainees varied between detention centres but the Balide Comarca and the Museum in Dili were the only locations in which violence against detainees was not reported. In other detention centres guards beat prisoners frequently and, in at least one Fretilin prison, a particular guard was appointed to be in charge of abusing prisoners.
28. Few detainees were interrogated by Fretilin and the violence was, in most cases, for no other reason than to punish the detainee or as a manifestation of the general atmosphere of conflict and violence.
29. As UDT had done previously, Fretilin commanders and members used buildings or structures to hold prisoners that were not equipped to hold large groups of people for long periods of time. Conditions of sanitation and ventilation were deplorable and little or no effort was made to improve conditions by Fretilin members in charge of detention centres. Detention centres were often severely overcrowded, particularly those in Aileu. These conditions were so deplorable as to amount to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment.
30. The amount of food received by Fretilin detainees varied. In Baucau and in the Comarca in Dili detainees reported receiving three meals a day from August to October. In other detention centres detainees reported receiving insufficient food. By November, as Indonesian incursions along the border continued, there were severe food shortages in all detention centres. The Fretilin leadership was aware of the food shortages and set up labour camps in Aileu, but this failed to feed the detainees largely due to the Indonesian attacks. Fretilin did not release detainees after it realised that it could not feed them. This amounted to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment.
31. Although the violence occurred in the context of armed conflict, it was clear that senior members of the Fretilin Central Committee were aware of the abuse of prisoners. The most brutal treatment of detainees occurred in the Fretilin headquarters in Taibessi and in Aissirimou, Aileu. The treatment of detainees varied between districts, as did the level of responsibility for ill-treating and torturing prisoners. In Baucau, prisoners said that they were beaten regularly but only by the guards after their superiors had left. In Manufahi and Aileu however, Fretilin leaders were present at the torture of UDT leaders and not only allowed it but incited the community to attack members of UDT. Several members of the Fretilin Central Committee spoke of their knowledge of the abuse of prisoners, but stated that they were not able to control it.

32. Insufficient efforts were made by the Fretilin leadership to prevent abuse occurring or to stop the abuse of prisoners after the leadership became aware of what was happening.

1976–1979

802. The Commission finds that:

Detention

33. After the Indonesian invasion Fretilin continued to detain people across the territory within the Fretilin controlled "liberated zones" (zonas libertadas) until the destruction of the Resistance bases. The Fretilin Central Committee routinely used detention to maintain discipline and control and to resolve political differences.

34. Because detentions were a recognised element in the administration of the zonas libertadas, there were members of the Fretilin Central Committee who either personally carried out or who ordered arrests to be made. Arbitrarily arresting and detaining suspects was procedurally within the authority of Falintil commanders and investigations were overseen by political commissars. Arbitrary detention was therefore clearly condoned by the Central Committee.

35. Fretilin detained people for violations of Fretilin rules established by the Central Committee. This included being a traitor to Fretilin's political position, to the nation or to the party, or for disciplinary breaches. Because there were no guidelines, these rules were applied inconsistently and therefore in practice any act or suspected act of which the Central Committee disapproved could be denounced as treason or as a breach of Fretilin rules.

36. The victims of detention were all those under Fretilin control including members of Fretilin and Falintil and ordinary civilians. People considered to be "reactionaries" and "traitors" were targeted. Often people associated with a particular Fretilin/Falintil leader were detained.

37. Fretilin made efforts to accord due process to detainees through justice practices (justiça popular) for trying and sentencing detainees but sentences of imprisonment resulting from these processes were arbitrary. There was no opportunity for accused persons to defend themselves or to appeal the decision or sentence. Further, many people were detained for months before being "tried" or not informed of the charges against them, or were never tried at all.

38. Detainees were held in unsuitable structures such as "pig-pens"*, chicken coops, bamboo huts or holes in the ground. In the beginning these were simply places in which people were detained, but in late 1977 many were turned into national rehabilitation camps (Campo de Rehabilitasão Nacional, or Renal). Other Renals were purpose built and included these kinds of conditions. Renals were identical to prisons in the conditions in which detainees were kept, except that they were established on the principle that wrong-doers could be "rehabilitated". Detainees received political education and sometimes literacy training. They were also made to work in communal fields in a supposed ethos of equality.

* The "pig-pen" prisons were not structures formerly used to hold pigs. Rather they were usually improvised detention structures, sometimes similar in shape and size to a pig-pen, to hold detainees. The name "pig-pen" was adopted to refer to the fact that the detainees ate, slept and toileted in the cell like a pig in a pen.

39. Sentences of imprisonment were theoretically indefinite and these periods of detention lasted until the bases de apoio were destroyed. Even at that point, the Central Committee released few detainees of its own accord but detainees either escaped when Indonesian forces arrived in the area or Fretilin released them when further detention became practically untenable.

Torture and ill-treatment

40. Members and supporters of Fretilin and Fretilin forces carried out widespread cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment as well as torture of detainees in detention centres and Renals between 1976 and 1978. Torture and ill-treatment were perpetrated more cruelly than in the period of internal conflict, as they became a routine part of Fretilin-administered justice practices. Torture and ill-treatment were used not only to control detainees but also were used during interrogation and to punish political opponents. Many people died in detention.

41. Methods of torture and ill-treatment commonly suffered by victims included:

- Heavy beatings by hand, with a rifle, with thorny branches or other pieces of wood
- Whipping
- Burning the victim's flesh with heated iron rods, cigarettes, or burning pieces of wood
- Tying victims to a tree or pole and leaving them in the sun for long periods
- Tying victims in a way that their movement was highly restricted and they could not feed or relieve themselves
- Urinating on victims
- Placing victims in a hole filled with ants
- Threatening victims with death
- Kicking with military boots.

42. Members of the Fretilin Central Committee were often directly involved in, or witnessed, the torture of prisoners and took no action to halt it.

43. In some places prisoners were held in overcrowded and poorly ventilated conditions and in all places sanitation was extremely poor. Some detainees were left to urinate and defecate where they sat. In many cases the conditions of detention constituted cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment.

44. Fretilin frequently deprived detainees of food or were unable to provide sufficient food. Detainees died of starvation and illness related to starvation.

Detainees who were ill were still required to work. This amounted to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. This treatment can be partly explained by the difficult circumstances of the time: as Indonesian forces advanced, they burned Fretilin food crops and thus forced Fretilin to move. But Fretilin did not release detainees after it knew that it could not feed them. Further, in many cases Fretilin deprived detainees of food intentionally to punish the victims, including withholding food brought to detainees by members of their family.

Detentions, torture and ill-treatment by the Indonesian military, police and agents

Arrest and detention

803. The Commission finds that:

45. Members of the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries committed, encouraged and condoned widespread and systematic arbitrary arrest and detention during the period of the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste.

804. The Commission bases this finding on around 150 interviews and thousands of statements containing first-hand testimony about arbitrary detention and on corroborating evidence contained in witness statements and other documents, including Indonesian military documents in the possession of the Commission.

46. Over the course of the occupation it is likely that tens of thousands of East Timorese were detained. The Commission bases this finding on the fact that its statement-taking process identified 18,518 victims of arbitrary detention by the Indonesian military and its auxiliaries in over 20,895 acts of detention. As the statement-taking process took statements from only around 1% of the population, the actual numbers of people detained is certain to be far greater.
47. Detentions increased during and after military operations. The number of people detained peaked in 1979 but was consistently high between 1975 and 1983, the period of major military operations. Detentions peaked again in 1999 during preparations for the Popular Consultation and after the announcement of the results of the Popular Consultation.
48. The Indonesian authorities arrested people in every district in Timor-Leste, although the highest numbers of detentions occurred in Dili, which had the largest state prisons and the main interrogation centres, followed by the eastern districts of Timor-Leste. Very few people were arrested in Oecussi after the initial invasion period until the militia violence of 1999. The Commission's data is consistent with the hypothesis that the Indonesian military, police and their East Timorese auxiliaries used arbitrary detention more in areas where the Resistance movement was perceived to be strong, and also in Dili where its administrative and logistical headquarters were located.
49. The victims of arbitrary arrest and detention were predominantly men of military age (20-39 years old) with a real or suspected association with groups resisting the occupation, including Fretilin/Falintil, clandestine networks or other pro-independence groups. Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries also targeted family members, including wives, parents and children, of suspected members of the armed Resistance, clandestine networks or other pro-independence groups. These arrests were made in the name of national security and ridding Timor-Leste of members of the "Bands of Security Disruptors" (Gerombolan Pengacau Keamanan, GPK).

50. Seventy percent of reported detentions were carried out directly by the Indonesian security forces. This included members of combat battalions, members of the provincial, district and sub-district commands and their associated battalions and intelligence branches, members of the Joint Intelligence Unit (Satuan Gabungan Intelijen, SGI) or Indonesian Special Forces (Kopassandha/Kopassus) and members of police stations at the sub-district, district and provincial levels. In the beginning, the military made most arrests. Over the period of the occupation this changed and by the mid-1990s the police were responsible for most arrests.

51. Kopassandha/Kopassus was active from central to village level throughout the occupation. Its direct role in detaining people peaked between 1983 and 1986 after the uprisings in the eastern districts. Kopassandha/Kopassus later began to form, train and arm local militias.

52. After the Indonesian military and police, the next largest amount of detentions were attributed to East Timorese auxiliaries of the Indonesian military. Auxiliaries (including civilian defence or Hansip, public servants, paramilitaries and militias) were named as being directly involved in 34% of reported detentions, but in many cases the arrest was made on the orders of the Indonesian military or carried out together with the military. Some paramilitary and militia groups were established by the Indonesian military specifically to terrorise the local population in areas where the Resistance was strong, including detaining and torturing suspected clandestine members. Collaborators were also essential in providing intelligence information to the military.

53. During the Indonesian invasion and occupation, arrest and detention were used to crush the Resistance in Timor-Leste in the following ways:

- By keeping members of the Resistance in detention, they were prevented from continuing their activities or communicating with their colleagues.
- Intelligence and other military personnel used the interrogation of prisoners to obtain information about Resistance structures and strategies, or the whereabouts of particular members of the Resistance.
- Arbitrary detention and the other violations that often occurred during a period of detention were used to punish real or suspected members of Resistance groups, thereby warning others of the consequences of following their examples.
- Detaining family members and associates of suspected members of the Resistance could provide the security forces with intelligence about a suspected member, and was also used to punish the family member or associate in the place of the suspected member of the Resistance.

- Where large groups were arrested, members of Fretilin and Falintil could be separated from ordinary civilians based on intelligence information and then detained.

54. The institutional practice of the Indonesian security forces was arbitrarily to arrest suspects without any regard for due process, particularly in the early years of the occupation. Persons arrested were not read their rights or told the charges against them. Excessive force was routinely used in the arrest of suspects.
55. This finding is based on strongly and widely corroborated evidence, which demonstrates that the practice of arrest without warrant and the use of excessive force were carried out by a wide range of military units, the police and Kopassandha/Kopassus in all districts of Timor-Leste in every year of the occupation.
56. Throughout the occupation, but particularly between 1975 and 1984, the Indonesian authorities made regular mass arrests of groups of 98 people or more. These arrests were made during large-scale military operations in response to Resistance attacks, or after intelligence information identified a specific village supporting the clandestine movement or hiding members of Falintil. Sometimes mass arrests were carried out as a collective punishment for the actions of a few.
57. From 1985, people were more commonly arrested individually than in large groups suggesting that detentions were made in a more targeted fashion than previously. Indonesian security forces used intelligence from East Timorese auxiliaries to identify members of Fretilin, Falintil and clandestine networks or their families, and targeted these people for arrest.
58. Sometimes intelligence was used to create "black lists" containing names of suspects, which were used to arrest people. The people on these lists were arrested repeatedly. They were often rounded up in anticipation of some Resistance event such as a demonstration.
59. In most cases people were arrested at their home or work place or were summoned to a police station or military post by an East Timorese auxiliary and then taken into custody. Others were detained during military operations. Only a few were "caught in an act" of resistance, such as attending a demonstration.
60. East Timorese people living in Indonesia, particularly students, were also subject to arrest and detention, especially in the 1990s, when many were detained for participation in demonstrations or clandestine activities.

Conditions of detention

805. The Commission finds that:

61. Members of the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries committed, encouraged and condoned widespread and systematic detention of East Timorese in conditions that were below the internationally accepted minimum standards for the treatment of detainees. Hundreds of people died while in detention, of deliberate ill-treatment or of neglect, hunger and illness. Of the 18,518 individuals who were reported to have been detained by the Indonesian military and police, 378 were known to have died whilst in detention. Another 1,314 detainees died, but the exact date of their death was unknown and hence it is not certain whether they died while being held in detention.

62. The Indonesian security forces used a wide variety of detention centres to hold detainees, both official and unofficial. They included:

- Large buildings commandeered by the military, such as shops, hotels, public buildings, like warehouses at the Dili Port, and private homes. Occupied public and private buildings were used to hold prisoners when there were large numbers of people detained and not enough space. For example after the invasion of Dili and when the military first moved into other areas, after the Resistance uprisings (levantamentos) around Mount Kablaki in 1982, in the eastern districts in 1983 and in Alas (Manufahi) in 1998. Such buildings were also used by paramilitaries and militias when they detained victims. Examples are the detentions by Team Sukarelawan in Ainaro in 1991 and all militias in 1999.
- Military and police buildings including military commands and police stations at the sub-district, district and provincial levels, the SGI headquarters, military bases, the Korem Mess, military barracks, military posts and Kopassandha/Kopassus bases. In most cases detainees were held in cells but sometimes they were locked in rooms in the headquarters or post, including in the toilet.
- Government buildings such as village offices, village meeting halls or the offices of the sub-district or district administration. Such buildings were used with either the involvement or the acquiescence of the administrative officer in charge of the building.
- State prisons: the Comarca in Balide, Dili, was used immediately after the invasion. Other state prisons in regional centres were opened in the second half of the 1980s.
- Improvised structures such as holes in the ground or buildings made from branches and bamboo. This was most common during the period 1978-79 when masses of people surrendered or were captured in rural areas.
- The detainee's home. Detainees were put under house arrest when there were large numbers of people in detention, such as during the invasion and during military crackdowns after the Resistance uprising in 1982 in Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro).
- Ataúro Island. Between 1980 and 1983 around 3,500 East Timorese who were either real or suspected members of the clandestine networks or suspected of association with the Resistance in any way were sent to the arid island where they were held until 1983 and in some cases as late as 1987.

- Transit camps. These camps, established around the territory, were used in the late 1970s after mass surrenders of people who had been under Fretilin control.
- Prisons in Indonesia. According to reports received by the Commission, apart from a group of prisoners sent to Kupang, West Timor, in 1983, prisoners from Timor-Leste were sent to prisons on Java after they had been put on trial and convicted. They were usually high-profile members of the clandestine movement or Resistance.

63. It was institutional practice to deprive prisoners of adequate food and clean water or to make completely inadequate provision for feeding and housing prisoners. Prisoners frequently died of starvation and illness in numerous detention locations up until the mid-1980s, when numbers of detainees declined and state prisons were constructed to house detainees. Even after this time there were frequent reports of detainees being deprived of food for several days at a time or being given food that was inedible.
64. It was institutional practice to detain prisoners in unofficial detention centres far from their family and friends. In many cases families did not know what had happened to their relatives who had been arrested, and if they did find out they were prohibited from communicating by letter or from making visits. The presence of the ICRC improved this situation for some detainees, but only during the times it was permitted to operate in Timor-Leste and only in those prisons and detention centres to which ICRC representatives gained access.
65. It was institutional practice to move detainees between detention centres, sometimes between a number of places on the same night. This was to disorient the victims, to allow different military units or organisations to interrogate the victim, or to place victims in the custody of different units. Sometimes detainees were taken from one detention centre by a military unit for interrogation and then returned. These patterns occurred throughout the occupation, beginning from the first days of the invasion.

806. Other examples of the conditions in which detainees were commonly held include:

66. Providing food but making it inedible, for example by dropping it on the floor, mixing it with broken glass or other sharp objects or cat faeces, or giving prisoners food that was burned or rotten.
67. Stripping the victim of their clothes, leaving them naked or in only their underwear. Sometimes this was done before interrogation but in some places it was the practice for all detainees to be kept in this condition.
68. Placing detainees in solitary confinement, sometimes for up to a year.
69. Placing victims in cells known as "dark cells", in which there was no light and extremely poor ventilation. All detention centres, including prisons, police stations and military commands, had dark cells.

70. Extremely poor sanitary conditions, including providing no toilet so that detainees were sitting in their own or each other's excrement, or providing only a small toilet for a large group of people.
71. Restricting detainees' access to activities while in detention. Permission to play sports, read books or papers and other forms of leisure activity was routinely denied. Some activities were forced on detainees, however, such as singing the Indonesian national anthem or honouring the Indonesian flag.
72. Restricting access to legal advice or representation until the 1990s, and even then the access granted was limited.
73. Before and after visits from the ICRC, lawyers or a foreign delegation to a detention centre, conditions tended to improve. However, some detainees were punished for having talked to the visitors.
74. Overall conditions sometimes improved when detainees were transferred to an official prison. This was particularly true of the Becora Prison in Dili after it was opened in 1986. Ill-treatment and torture, including beatings and abuse by prison guards, being kept in solitary confinement and restrictions on leisure activities, communication with the outside world or family visits still occurred in these institutions but much less frequently.
75. Before late 1983 the Indonesian authorities did not put detainees on trial. Detainees had no means to challenge their detention or to request a release date. Their detention was indefinite. Even when trials began in 1983, Indonesian authorities held many people for long periods before putting them on trial. By the 1990s those detainees who were tried were charged and put on trial relatively quickly. Nevertheless, even in the 1990s many detainees were never put on trial. In 1999 almost no detainees were put on trial.

Interrogation

807. The Commission finds that:

76. It was institutional practice to interrogate detainees. Interrogation was used to obtain information about the activities of the victim, to punish or to intimidate the victim, or to obtain information about the structures and strategies of the Resistance, the locations of weapons or documents, or the names of other members of the Resistance.
77. These patterns shifted over time. In the early years of the occupation the military used interrogation to increase its understanding of the Resistance.
78. When the police became more active in the detention and interrogation of suspects and detainees were put on trial, interrogations also focused on obtaining evidence, such as a confession, for use in a trial. Interrogators often prepared a written confession before the interrogation began which was then read to the detainee, who was then forced to sign it, or police would force the detainee to make a false confession. Many detainees signed the confession simply to put an end to the interrogation and torture.

79. In 1999, before the Popular Consultation, interrogation was used to intimidate the victim as well as to find out the movements of pro-independence groups.

80. It was institutional practice to use highly coercive practices during interrogation. Methods included the widespread use of torture, death threats against the victim or the victim's family, firing numerous or confusing questions at the detainee or twisting the detainees words, telling the detainee that a fellow detainee had already confessed to an alleged crime, and depriving detainees of food, drink, sanitary facilities and sleep, between interrogation sessions.

81. When there was international attention on particular detainees, the treatment of these detainees by Indonesian security forces during interrogation was markedly better.

82. Detainees were usually interrogated inside detention centres, in their cell or an interrogation room. A smaller number were interrogated at home before the arrest. Some detainees were taken to special interrogation centres to be questioned, such as the Sang Tai Hoo building in Dili. Some of these places became particularly notorious for the treatment of detainees. Some detainees were sent to Java or Bali for further interrogation.

83. The duration of interrogations varied. Sometimes detainees were subject to lengthy interrogations spanning several days in an effort to "break" the victim. Some detainees had an interrogation timetable whereby they were interrogated on the same day each week or at the same time on certain days. At other times interrogations were short and intense, particularly when the purpose of the interrogation was to intimidate the detainee.

84. Different agents of different institutions often interrogated detainees, either at the same time or consecutively. Usually intelligence officers were in charge of interrogations. In some cases high-ranking military officers from Jakarta would fly to Timor-Leste to interrogate victims.

85. Tactics used by clandestine members during interrogation include only mentioning the names of comrades who had already been arrested, only releasing information already in the hands of the interrogators and taking responsibility for the actions of others themselves.

Torture and ill-treatment

808. The Commission finds that:

86. Members of the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries committed, encouraged and condoned widespread and systematic torture and ill-treatment of victims during the period of Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste. In some cases torture led to death, sometimes as a direct result of the torture applied to the victim and sometimes as a result of wounds sustained during torture being left untreated.

87. The victims of torture and ill-treatment were overwhelmingly male, of military age, and involved in Fretilin/Falintil or other pro-independence groups.

Victims who identified themselves as civilians were the second largest group to be subjected to torture and ill-treatment. These people were usually suspected members of Resistance groups, civilians in villages that were targeted for supporting or hiding members of Fretilin/Falintil, or the family or associates of members of Fretilin/Falintil or other Resistance groups.

88. The Indonesian security forces were named as the direct perpetrator in 64% of reported torture cases and 55% of reported ill-treatment cases. Different institutions within the security apparatus played prominent roles at different times. Early in the occupation military battalions and officers were involved in most cases of torture, particularly intelligence officers. Between 1985 and 1987, Kopassandha/Kopassus was involved directly in many cases of torture. In the late 1990s the involvement of the police in torturing detainees increased and peaked in 1999.

89. East Timorese auxiliaries were also heavily involved in the torture of victims. They were named as responsible for 35% of reported torture cases and 40% of reported cases of ill-treatment. In many cases victims were tortured by auxiliaries on the orders of the military or carried out together with the military. Auxiliaries played a significantly less prominent role than the military in all years apart from 1999. In 1999, they were the main perpetrators of violence against victims.

90. The majority of acts of torture and ill-treatment were carried out during or after arrest or while in detention. Some victims were tortured and ill-treated outside of a place of detention including being assaulted in public, in their homes, in a field or on the journey to a place of detention.

91. The purpose of torture was to obtain information from the victim, to punish the victim, to threaten the victim, to humiliate the victim, to intimidate the victim or others sharing the victim's political allegiance or to force a change in a victim's loyalties.

92. Torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment usually took place when detainees first arrived in a detention centre, or during interrogation. It was perpetrated in the cells, sometimes in front of other detainees, and sometimes in specific interrogation rooms. In the early years of the occupation the Indonesian military used some buildings specifically for the torture of prisoners.

93. Public torture and ill-treatment occurred frequently over the course of the occupation, but was particularly marked in 1999. Not only did it cause pain and humiliation to the victim, it was intended to terrorise those who witnessed it. Conversely much torture and ill-treatment was carried out in secret, away from the eyes of the victim's loved ones or the eyes of the international community.

94. Over the course of the occupation, the correlation between torture or ill-treatment and detention increased. During the period 1985-98, although there were fewer people detained, those detained had a much higher chance of being tortured than during the period 1975 to 1984 when there were frequent mass arrests.

95. The following acts of torture and other cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment were commonly used by the security forces:

- Beating with fists or with implements such as a wooden club or a branch, an iron bar, a rifle butt, chains, a hammer, a belt, electric cables
- Kicking, usually while wearing military or police boots, including around the head and face
- Punching and slapping
- Whipping
- Cutting with a knife
- Cutting with a razor blade
- Placing the victim's toes under the leg of a chair or table and then having one or more people sit on it
- Burning the victims flesh, including the victim's genitalia with cigarettes or a gas lighter
- Applying electric shocks to different parts of the victim's body, including the victim's genitalia
- Firmly tying someone's hands and feet or tying the victim and hanging him or her from a tree or roof
- Using water in various ways, including holding a person's head under water; keeping a victim in a water tank for a prolonged period, sometimes up to three days; soaking and softening a victim's skin in water before beating the victim; placing the victim in a drum filled with water and rolling it; pouring very hot or very cold water over the victim; pouring very dirty water or sewage over the victim
- Sexual harassment, sexual forms of torture and ill-treatment or rape while in detention. Women were the main victims of this kind of abuse
- Cutting off a victim's ear to mark the victim
- Tying the victim behind a car and forcing him or her to run behind it or be dragged across the ground
- Placing lizards with sharp teeth and claws (lafaek rai maran) in the water tank with the victim and then goading it to bite the softened skin on different parts of the victim's body including the victim's genitalia
- Pulling out of fingernails and toenails with pliers
- Running over a victim with a motor-bike
- Forcing a victim to drink a soldier's urine or eat non-food items such as live small lizards or a pair of socks
- Leaving the victim in the hot sun for extended periods
- Humiliating detainees in front of their communities, for example by making them stand or walk through the town naked
- Threatening the victim or the victim's family with death or harming a member of the victim's family in front of them.

96. There are other examples of forms of torture and cruel and inhuman treatment that were not widely reported but nevertheless confirm the general pattern of widespread and systematic physical abuse of detainees. These include:

- Rubbing chillies in the victim's eyes
- Forcing the victim to sweep the floor with his or her body
- Forcing the victim to carry a decapitated head around the victim's village
- Beating two male victims while their genitals were tied together
- Cutting off of the victim's ear and forcing him to eat it
- Tying the victim inside a sack filled with snakes
- Dousing a group of prisoners with petrol and threatening to burn them alive.

97. As well as physical abuse, detainees were also subject to mental and emotional torture and cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. Methods included:

- Keeping prisoners in detention indefinitely without access to family and friends
- Keeping prisoners for extended periods in solitary confinement or in cells with no light and little ventilation
- Taking a detainee to a place used for extra-judicial executions and pretending to the victim that they were going to be killed, even to the point of firing a shot in the victim's direction
- Verbal abuse and insults
- Forcing victims to beat each other
- Torturing a family member in an adjoining room so that the victim could hear the screaming, or torturing or threatening to torture a family member in front of the victim
- Blindfolding or placing a black cloth, helmet or bucket over a victim's head during interrogation and torture
- Using symbolism to humiliate and break the spirit of the victim such as forcing the victim to drink water in which an Indonesian flag had been soaked, writing "I am Fretilin" on detainees foreheads, making detainees sing well-known Fretilin or Portuguese songs or conversely the Indonesian national anthem, forcing detainees to sit on the Fretilin or Portuguese flag, beating a detainee with a Portuguese or Fretilin flag, or tying victims to the flag-pole of an Indonesian flag
- Insulting a victim's religion such as by tearing off the victim's crucifix or tying the victim to a cross
- Spitting on the victim
- Sleep deprivation by methods such as playing loud music throughout the night in detention centres

- Stripping the detainees, both male and female, and touching their genitals.

Release

98. The Indonesian security forces rarely released political prisoners absolutely.
99. In some cases political detainees were forced to make some form of statement of allegiance to Indonesia including:
    - Signing a declaration ("clearing list") in which they pledged allegiance to the Indonesian flag and promised no longer to engage in clandestine activities
    - Drinking water in which an Indonesian flag had been soaked
    - Participating in traditional blood oaths by drinking animal and human blood. This was a powerfully symbolic act in East Timorese culture that was co-opted by the military, and later the militias, for their own purposes.
100. A payment in cash or kind was often demanded on release. The incidence of extortion increased significantly in 1999.
101. The security forces also developed ways of monitoring detainees after they were released. These included using them as forced labour or recruiting them into the security forces, civil defence organisations or paramilitaries, or forcing them to find their relatives who had not yet surrendered. Others were given the status of "outside detainees" (tahanan luar) which meant that they were still under close supervision.
102. Most detainees were required to report to a military base, police stations or other agency regularly after their release, sometimes for several years (wajib lapor).

Endnotes

1. Article 3 UDHR, Article 9 ICCPR and customary law: Human Rights Committee [henceforth HRC] General Comment 24, para 8.
2. See UN High Commissioner for Human Rights Fact Sheet No. 26 on the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention; see also for example the 2003 Opinions adopted by the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention, E/CN.4/2004/3/Add.1.
3. HRC, General Comment 8 para 2; see also Jijon v Ecuador (1992) HRC Comm. No. 227/88 where a delay of five days in bringing a prisoner before a judge was held to breach Article 9(3) ICCPR.
4. Article 9(3) ICCPR.
5. Article 5 UDHR, Article 7 ICCPR, and customary law: HRC General Comment 24, para 8.
6. See for example Article 1(1) Convention Against Torture and Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment.
7. See for example HRC General Comment 20, para 2.

8. Mukong v Cameroon (1994) HRC Comm. No. 458/91 at para 9.4.
9. Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture on Israel, A/52/44, 9/5/97 at para 257; see also Ireland v UK (1978) ECHR Applic. No. 5310/71, at paras 96 and 167.
10. Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture on Israel, A/52/44, 9/5/97 at para 257.
11. Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture on Israel, A/52/44, 9/5/97 at para 257; see also Ireland v UK (1978) ECHR Applic. No. 5310/71, at paras 96 and 167.
12. Concluding observations of the Committee against Torture on Israel, A/52/44, 9/5/97 at para 257.
13. Article 5 UDHR, Article 7 ICCPR, and customary law: HRC General Comment 24, para 8.
14. In violation of Article 5 UDHR; Article 7 ICCPR, Article 16 CAT.
15. Article 10(1) ICCPR, and customary international law: HRC General Comment 29, para 13(a). See also the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners; the Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment and the Basic Principles for the Treatment of Prisoners.
16. HRC General Comment 21, para. 3.
17. HRC General Comment 20, para. 6; HRC General Comment 7, para 2, El-Megreisi v Libyan Arab Jamahiriya (1990) HRC Comm. No. 440/90, para 5.4; Mukong v Cameroon (1994) HRC Comm. No. 458/91 at paras 9.3-9.4.
18. HRVD Statements 7659; 2399; 1123; 5606; 8354; 6155; 4677; 5036; 3751 and 3728.
19. José Ramos-Horta, Timor Leste: Amanha em Dili, Dom Quixote, Lisbon, 1994, pp. 107-113.
20. CAVR Interview with Armindo Soares Mariano, Kupang, West Timor, Indonesia, 20 July 2004.
21. CAVR Interview with José Catarino Gregório Magno Trindade de Mello (Labut Mello), Kupang, West Timor, Indonesia, 23 July 2004.
22. Paul Freitas, testimony to the CAVR Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
23. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
24. João Carrascalão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
25. CAVR Interview with Mário (Marito) Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 27 July 2003.
26. HRVD Statement 2447. João Lopes did not provide the dates of his detention.
27. HRVD Statement 2412. See also HRVD Statement 5408.
28. CAVR Interview with Lucio Dias Marques, Maliana, Bobonaro, 13 June 2003.
29. CAVR Interview with Manuel Agustino Freitas, Bobonaro, Bobonaro, 12 June 2003.
30. Mario Carrascalão, testimony at the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
31. CAVR Interview with Lucio Dinis Marques, Maliana, Bobonaro, 13 June 2003.
32. CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 27 July 2003.
33. CAVR Interview with Lucio Dinis Marques, Maliana, Bobonaro, 13 June 2003.
34. HRVD Statement 5062.
35. CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 27 July 2003.
36. Xanana Gusmão, "The Coup and Civil War, 10 August 1975" in Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, Lisbon, Editora Colibri, 1994.
37. CAVR Interview with Miguel Agustinho Freitas, Carabau, Bobonaro, 12 June 2003. Manuel gave his testimony at the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
38. HRVD Statement 5036.
39. HRVD Statement 5694.
40. HRVD Statement 5699.
41. HRVD Statement 3745.
42. HRVD Statement 5698.
43. HRVD Statement 3784.
44. CAVR Community Profile, Fatukero Village, Railaco Sub-district, Ermera District, 27 March 2003.
45. CAVR Interviews with Lourenço dos Santos, Ermera, 25 August 2003; Manuel Duarte, Hatolia, Ermera 23 September 2003; Florentino de Jesus Martins, Ermera, 25 June 2003. See also HRVD Statement 6442.

46. HRVD Statements 6203. Eufrasia de Jesus, Gleno, Ermera. She also says that 32 Fretilin delegates were killed in detention. See Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearance.
47. HRVD Statements 8330.
48. CAVR Interview with Adelino Soares, Ermera, Ermera, 12 October 2003.
49. HRVD Statement 8346.
50. Manuel Duarte, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
51. HRVD Statements 1084; 6202; 1039 and 6155.
52. HRVD Statements 1080; 1730; 5102 and 1663.
53. HRVD Statements 3570; 3596; 3541; 3502; 3559; 2107 and 3570.
54. HRVD Statements 4568 and 8262.
55. HRVD Statement 8262.
56. HRVD Statement 1071.
57. HRVD Statement 1772.
58. HRVD Statement 1088.
59. HRVD Statement 1745.
60. HRVD Statement 1077.
61. Ibid.
62. CAVR Interview with Lay Kuon Nhen (Manisera), Mandarin-Dili, 2003.
63. CAVR Interviews with José Guterres, Dili, 19 July 2004; and João Godinho, Dili, 26 July 2004.
64. HRVD Statement 2455 and CAVR Interview with João Godinho, Dili, 26 July 2004.
65. CAVR Interview with João Godinho, Dili, 26 July 2004.
66. CAVR Interview with José Pinto Guterres, Bairro Maravilha, Maliana, 19 July 2004.
67. HRVD Statements 2414; 2455 and 2412.
68. HRVD Statement 2600.
69. HRVD Statement 2412.
70. HRVD Statements 2412; 4355; 8992; 5606; 5639; 2600; 5622 and 2454.
71. HRVD Statement 3703.
72. HRVD Statement 5606.
73. CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 10 June 2004; HRVD Statement 8992.
74. HRVD Statement 5622.
75. CAVR, Community Profile, Guda Village, Lolotoe Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 26 August 2003.
76. HRVD Statements 5472 and 5486.
77. HRVD Statement 5472.
78. HRVD Statement 5486.
79. HRVD Statement 1585.
80. CAVR Interview with Santina de Jesus Soares Ly, Baucau, Baucau, 10 October 2003; HRVD Statements 6119; 2399; 7634 and 7764.
81. HRVD Statement 7634.
82. HRVD Statement 6119.
83. HRVD Statement 2399.
84. HRVD Statement 1994.
85. HRVD Statement 0293.
86. HRVD Statement 5904.
87. HRVD Statement 1994.
88. CAVR Interview with Edmundo da Conceição Silva, Denpasar, Bali, Indonesia, 3 August 2004.
89. CAVR Interview with José da Conceição, Kupang, West Timor, Indonesia, 24 August 2004.
90. HRVD Statement 3447.
91. CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 10 June 2004.
92. HRVD Statement 5904.
93. HRVD Statement 5450.
94. James Dunn, A People Betrayed, 1966, p. 187.
95. CAVR Interview with Rogério Tiago de Fatima Lobato (Rogério Lobato), Dili, 26 August 2003.

96. CAVR Interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
97. CAVR Interviews with Rogério Tiago de Fatima Lobato, Dili, 26 August 2003; and Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
98. CAVR Interview with Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes, Dili, 5 May 2004.
99. CAVR Interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
100. CAVR Interview with Paul Freitas da Silva, former President of the Trabalhista Party, Dili, 9 July 2003.
101. HRVD Statements 8152 and 4987.
102. CAVR Interview with Assis dos Santos, Dili, 17 July 2003.
103. Rogério Lobato, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
104. Ibid.
105. CAVR Interview with Francisco Gonçalves, Dili, 14 June 2003.
106. HRVD Statement 3764.
107. HRVD Statement 9081.
108. CAVR Interview with Mari Alkatiri, Dili, 25 June 2004.
109. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
110. International Committee of the Red Cross, East Timor Relief Operation, 16 September 1975. Email from Noel Barrow, archivist of Australian Red Cross, National Office, Melbourne to CAVR, 8 October 2004. Due to the confidential nature of ICRC records regarding the organisation's visits to prisons, no specific details are available.
111. HRVD Statement 6146.
112. HRVD Statements 3764 and 9081.
113. CAVR Interview with Frederico Almeida Santos, Dili, 2003.
114. CAVR Interview with Anselmo dos Santos, Maubara, Liquiçá, 9 March 2004.
115. CAVR Interview with Monis da Maia, Dili, 5 December 2004.
116. CAVR Interview with Rafael dos Nascimento, Aileu, June 2003.
117. HRVD Statement 1413.
118. CAVR Interview with Monis da Maia, Dili, 5 December 2003.
119. CAVR Interviews with João da Costa, Same, Manufahi, 24 June 2003 and Monis da Maia, Dili, 5 December 2003.
120. CAVR Interview with Monis da Maia, Dili, 5 December 2003; Monis da Maia, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
121. CAVR Interview with João da Costa, Same, Manufahi, 24 June 2003.
122. See for example HRVD Statement 3595.
123. HRVD Statement 2156.
124. HRVD Statement 3594.
125. HRVD Statement 6146.
126. HRVD Statement 6357.
127. HRVD Statement 3568.
128. HRVD Statement 9062.
129. HRVD Statement 8300.
130. HRVD Statement 6409
131. HRVD Statement 6409.
132. HRVD Statements 8337; 2220; 8371.
133. HRVD Statements 4971; 5975; 7201; 5982.
134. HRVD Statement 2694.
135. HRVD Statements 2375; 7658; 9056
136. HRVD Statement 8040.
137. HRVD Statement 9056.
138. Clementino dos Reis Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December, 2003.

139. HRVD Statement 2375.
140. Paul Freitas, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
141. CAVR Community Profile, Rasa Village, Lospalos Sub-district, Lautém District, 1 March 2004.
142. CAVR Interview with Edmundo da Conceição Silva, Bali, Indonesia, 3 August 2004.
143. Ibid.
144. CAVR Community Profiles, Bauro Village, Lospalos Sub-district, Lautém District, 26 January 2004.
145. HRVD Statements 5919; 4541; 5853; 5930.
146. HRVD Statement 5919.
147. HRVD Statement 4541.
148. HRVD Statement 5853.
149. HRVD Statement 6018.
150. Paul Freitas, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
151. HRVD Statements 6502; 7995; 8025; 1918; 6501; 8021.
152. HRVD Statement 6502.
153. HRVD Statement 7946.
154. CAVR Community Profile, Carabau, Cotabot, Tebabui, Maliubu and Colimau Villages, Bobonaro Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 24 October 2003, and Community Profile of Lourba Village, Bobonaro Sub-district, Bobonaro District.
155. HRVD Statement 2540.
156. HRVD Statement 1082. See also HRVD Statement 8347.
157. HRVD Statement 5546.
158. HRVD Statement 8152.
159. HRVD Statement 5524.
160. HRVD 0186; 5546; 1162; 8152.
161. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
162. HRVD Statement 3666.
163. HRVD Statement 8025.
164. HRVD Statement 8021.
165. HRVD Statement 2510.
166. HRVD Statement 2375.
167. CAVR Interview with Monis da Maia, Manleuwana, Dili, 5 Desember 2003.
168. CAVR Interview with Edmundo da Conceiçâo Silva, Bali, Indonesia, 3 August 2004.
169. CAVR Interviews with Assis dos Santos, Dili, 17 July 2003; Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes, Dili, 5 May 2004; Luis António de Aquino Caldas, Dili, 21 May 2004, José Catarino Gregório Magno de Mello (Labut Mello), Kupang, West Timor, Indonesia, 23 July 2004; Armindo Soares Mariano, Kupang, West Timor, Indonesia, 20 July 2004.
170. Apodeti campaign on Timor Radio, Dili. Audio Tape is at CAVR Archive.
171. Mari Alkatiri, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003.
172. HRVD Statement 0826.
173. HRVD Statement 8950.
174. HRVD Statement 6243.
175. HRVD Statement 9034.
176. CAVR Interview with Luis António de Aquino Caldas, Dili, 21 May 2004.
177. CAVR Interview with Frederico Almeida Santos, President of Apodeti Pro-Referendum, Dili, 2003.
178. Testimony of former detainee at Sub-district prison in Same; CAVR Interview with Monis da Maia, Manleuana, Dili, 5 December 2003; João da Costa, Letefoho-Same, 24 June 2003; Bento Reis, Same, 2004.
179. CAVR Interview with Bento Reis, Same, Manufahi 2004.
180. Monis da Maia, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.

181. CAVR, research papers on the theme of the Party Conflict: Case 7, A Collection of Case Reviews, January 2004.
182. HRVD Statement 3265.
183. Monis da Maia, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
184. CAVR Interview with Eufrazia de Jesus Soares, Gleno, Ermera, October 2003
185. CAVR Interview with José Maukabae, Maubara, Liquiçá, 9 March 2004.
186. CAVR Interview with Rafael do Nascimento, Aileu, June 2003.
187. CAVR Interviews with Monis da Maia, 5 December 2003; Rafael Nascimento, Aileu, June 2003.
188. CAVR interview with Amelia Mesquita, Seloi-Malere, Aileu, 27 June 2003.
189. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, ASDT/Fretilin leader 1974–1977, First President of the RDTL 1975–1977, Dili, 28 August 2003.
190. António Serpa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
191. CAVR Interview with João da Costa, Letefoho, Same, Manufahi, 24 June 2003
192. CAVR Interview with Monis da Maia, Dili, 5 December 2003.
193. CAVR Interview with Edmundo da Conceição Silva, Bali, Indonesia, 3 August 2004; José de Conceição, Kupang, West Timor, Indonesia, 24 August 2004.
194. CAVR Interview with Edmundo da Conceição Silva, Bali, Indonesia, 3 August 2004.
195. HRVD Statements 1082 and 8347.
196. HRVD Statement 6416.
197. HRVD Statement 2375.
198. Paul Freitas, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
199. CAVR Interviews with Assis dos Santos, Dili, 17 July 2003; Luis António de Aquino Caldas, Palapaço-Dili, 21 May 2004; José Maukabae, Maubara, Liquiçá, 9 March 2004; and Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes, Dili, 5 May 2004.
200. Xanana Gusmão, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
201. CAVR Interview with José Maukabae, Maubara, Liquiçá, 9 March 2004.
202. António Ximenes Serpa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
203. The statement in this box constitutes a summary of the CAVR Interview with Anselmo dos Santos, Maubara, Liquiçá, 9 March 2004, as well as the CAVR Interview with Frederico Almeida Santos, Dili, 2003.
204. CAVR Interview with Monis da Maia, Dili, 5 December 2003.
205. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
206. António Serpa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on the The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
207. CAVR Interview with José Maukabae, Maubara, Liquiçá, 9 March 2004.
208. Assis dos Santos, Relatório da Tortura na Prisão de Fretilin 1975, 1976, 1977 [Report of the Torture at Fretilin Prisons 1975, 1976, 1977]. A copy is available at CAVR Archive.
209. CAVR Interviews with Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes, Dili, 5 May 2004 and Assis dos Santos, Dili, 17 July 2003, Monis da Maia, Dili, 5 December 2003; Bento Reis, Same, Manufahi 2004.
210. CAVR Interviews with Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes, Dili, 5 May 2004 and Assis dos Santos, Dili, 17 July 2003; Monis da Maia, Dili, 5 December 2003.
211. CAVR Interview with Luis António de Aquino Caldas, Dili, 21 May 2004.
212. Monis da Maia, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15–18 December 2003.
213. CAVR Interviews with Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes, Dili, 5 May 2004, and Assis dos Santos, Relatório da Tortura Na Prisâo de Fretilin 1975, 1976, 1977, Museu Dili, Taibessi, Aileu, Maubisse, Same, Uatolari, nahareca, Ossu. A copy is available at CAVR.

214. CAVR Interview with José Maukabae, Maubara, Liquiçá, 9 March 2004.
215. CAVR Interviews with Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes, Dili, 5 May 2004; Assis dos Santos, Dili, 17 July 2003.
216. CAVR Interview with Assis dos Santos, Dili, 17 July 2003.
217. CAVR Interview with José Maukabae, Maubara, Liquiçá, 9 March 2004.
218. CAVR Interview with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004.
219. CAVR Interviews with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004 and Marito Reis, Dili, 21 September 2004.
220. CAVR Interview with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004.
221. Ibid.
222. CAVR Interview with João Veinas, the person responsible for the village in 1975, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003.
223. CAVR Interview with Egas da Costa, 19 May 2004.
224. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 30 June 2004.
225. Ibid.
226. CAVR Interview with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004.
227. CAVR Interviews with Marito Reis, Dili, 21 September 2004 and José Manuel Monteiro, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004.
228. CAVR Interview with Pedro Faria, Lospalos, Lautém, ND.
229. João Vienas, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003.
230. HRVD Statement 1697.
231. CAVR Interview with Modesto de Jesus Sanches, former person in charge of Secai in Zona Iliomar, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004.
232. CAVR Interview with Orlando Silva Correia Belo, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004.
233. CAVR Interview with Miguel da Silva, Ossu, Viqueque, 23 February 2003.
234. CAVR Interview with Luis da Costa, Lisbon, Portugal, 15 October 2003.
235. CAVR Interviews with António da Silva and Raquel da Silva, Ossu, Viqueque, 10 June 2003.
236. HRVD Statement 4872.
237. CAVR Interview with Celestino de Carvalho Alves, Fatubessi, Ermera, 6 October 2003.
238. CAVR Interviews with Celestino Alves, Fatubessi, Ermera, 27 June 2004, Fatubessi Ermera, 6 October 2003.
239. CAVR Interview with Celestino de Carvalho Alves, Fatubessi, Ermera, 6 October 2003.
240. CAVR Interview with Jerónimo Albino da Silva, Ermera, Ermera, 10 September 2003.
241. CAVR Interview with Eduardo de Deus Barreto, Gleno, Ermera, 26 August 2004; CAVR Interview with Celestino Alves, Fatubessi, Ermera, 6 October 2003
242. CAVR, Community Profile, Tirilolo Village, Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District, 4 July 2003.
243. Constantinho Hornay, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29–30 March 2004.
244. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003. See also CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
245. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, Dili, 15–18 December 2003. See also CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
246. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004.
247. Xanana Gusmão, "Autobiography" in Niner (ed.), To Resist is to Win, Aurora Books, Victoria, 2000, p. 51; CAVR Interviews with Horacio de Conceição Savio, Irara, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004, and Modesto de Jesus Almeida Sanches, former logistics chief in Iliomar Zone, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004.
248. HRVD Statement 5418.
249. HRVD Statement 1467.
250. CAVR Interview with Tomás de Araújo, Turiscai, Manufahi, 14 October 2003.

251. CAVR Interview with Feliciano Soares, Cailaco, Bobonaro, 2003.
252. HRVD Statement 3460.
253. HRVD Statement 3448.
254. HRVD Statement 4845.
255. HRVD Statement 4818.
256. CAVR, Massacres research project, Field Report IV: Viqueque, 12–15 December 2003, p. 10.
257. CAVR, "Case Summary: The Detention of Mariano Meneses", internal research document, 2003.
258. HRVD Statement 2099.
259. HRVD Statement 6541.
260. HRVD Statement 2112.
261. CAVR Interview with António Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, Manatuto, 11 December 2003.
262. CAVR Interview with António da Silva dan Raquel da Silva, Ossu, Viqueque, 10 June 2003; Bernardo Quintão, 4 June 2003.
263. CAVR Interview with Marito Reis, Dili, 21 September 2004.
264. CAVR Interview with Filomeno Paixão, Dili, 17 June 2004.
265. CAVR Interviews with Horacio Savio, Irara, Lospalos, Lautém 10 September 2004; Orlando Silva Correia Belo, Lospalos, Lautém, 11 September 2004; and José Manuel Monteiro, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004.
266. CAVR Interviews with Marito Reis, former political assistant, Zona 20 de Maio Centro Leste, Dili, 21 September 2004; Francisco Xavier do Amaral, first President of Fretilin, Dili, 18 June 2004; Filomeno Paixão, Lieutenant Colonel in Falintil/FDTL, Dili, 17 June 2004; Xanana Gusmão, Former Commander of Falintil, Dili, 30 June 2004; Egas da Costa Freitas, former Political Assistant Zona 20 de Maio Centro Leste, Lahane, Dili, 19 May 2004; Orlando Silva Correia Belo (Fernando So), former village secretary, former zona secretary of Sacalu, Tutuala, Lautém and former person responsible for Marabia Renal (Iliomar, Lautém), Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004; Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004; José da Costa, Kupang, West Timor, 24 August 2004; and Horacio de Conceição Savio, Irara, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004.
267. CAVR Interview António Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, Manatuto, 11 December 2003.
268. CAVR Interviews with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004; Orlando Silva Correia Belo, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004; Marito Reis, former political assistant, Dili, 21 September 2004; and José Manuel Monteiro, former attack commander and head of the Nundamar Renal, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004.
269. HRVD Statement 1742.
270. CAVR Interview with João Adriano, Bairro Maravilha, Bobonaro, 6 October 2003.
271. CAVR Interview with Celestino Carvalho Alves, Fatubessi, Ermera, 13 June 2003.
272. CAVR Interview with Clementino da Silva, Ossu, Viqueque, 2003.
273. CAVR Interview with Antonio da Silva Ossu, Viqueque, 10 June 2003.
274. CAVR, Massacres Research Project, Field Report IV: Viqueque, 12–15 December 2003.
275. CAVR Interviews with Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004; Orlando Silva Correia Belo, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004; Marito Reis, former political assistant, Dili, 21 September 2004; José Manuel Monteiro, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004; and José Manuel do Santos, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004.
276. CAVR Community Profile, Bautate in Irabin de Baixo Village, Uato Carbau Sub-district, Viqueque District, 26 August 2003.
277. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 30 June 2004.
278. HRVD Statement 7442.
279. CAVR Interview with Orlando Silva Correia Belo, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004.
280. CAVR Interview with Gaspar Seixas, Iliomar, Lautém, 2003.
281. CAVR Interview with Modesto de Jesus Sanches, formerly in charge of Zona Iliomar, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004.
282. CAVR Interview with Horacio de Conceicão Savio, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004.
283. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 30 June 2004.

284. CAVR Interview with António Amado de Jesus Ramos Guterres, Laclo, Manatuto, 11 December 2003.
285. CAVR Interviews with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004; Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 30 June 2004; Marito Reis, Dili, 21 September 2004; Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004; Filonimo Paixão, Dili, 17 June 2004; Egas da Costa Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2004; Orlando Silva Correia Belo, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004; and Horacio de Conceicão Savio, Lospalos, Lautém, 10 September 2004.
286. CAVR Interview with José Manuel do Santos, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004.
287. Ibid.
288. CAVR Interview with José Manuel do Santos, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004; and CAVR Interview with José Manuel Monteiro, Remexio, 6 October 2004.
289. Ibid.
290. CAVR Interview with José Manuel do Santos, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004.
291. Ibid.
292. Ibid.
293. CAVR Interview with José Manuel do Santos, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004; and CAVR Interview with José Manuel Monteiro, Remexio, 6 October 2004.
294. CAVR Interview with José Manuel do Santos, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004.
295. CAVR Interview with José Manuel do Santos, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004; and CAVR Interview José Manuel Monteiro, Remexio, 6 October 2004.
296. Ibid.
297. Ibid.
298. CAVR Interview with José Manuel dos Santos, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004.
299. CAVR Interview with Maria Fatima Pinto, Dili, 31 May 2004.
300. CAVR Interviews with Maria Antónia Santos Sousa, Laclo, Manatuto, 28 April 2003; José Manuel do Santos, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004; and José Manuel Monteiro, Remexio, Aileu, 6 October 2004.
301. CAVR Interview with Maria Antónia, Laclo, Manatuto, 20 March 2003.
302. CAVR Interview with Raul da Costa, Remexio, Aileu, 16 October 2003.
303. CAVR Interview with Domingos Maria Alves (Ambulan), Liquidoe, Aileu, 15 October 2003.
304. HRVD Statement 5761.
305. HRVD Statement 5763.
306. CAVR, Massacres Research Project, Field Report IV: Viqueque, 12–15 December 2003.
307. CAVR Interview with Tomé da Costa Magalhães, Same, Manufahi, 12 August 2004.
308. CAVR Interview with Valentino da Costa Noronha, Hola Rua, Manufahi, 14 August 2004.
309. CAVR Interview with Alexandrino de Jesus, Hatolia, Ermera, 2003.
310. HRVD Statement 2195.
311. HRVD Statement 0292.
312. HRVD Statement 0570.
313. Ibid.
314. HRVD Statement 8159.
315. HRVD Statement 8027.
316. HRVD Statement 1132.
317. HRVD Statement 4607.
318. HRVD Statement 1794.
319. HRVD Statement 0175.
320. HRVD Statement 3752.
321. CAVR Interview with Marcus Valadares, Dili, 2 August 2003.
322. HRVD Statement 3826.
323. CAVR Interview with W2 (confidential source), Dili, 24 August 2004. See also CAVR Interview with Rita Ximenes, Dili, 10 December 2003.
324. CAVR Interview with António Caleres Junior, Dili, 2 October 2004.
325. CAVR Interview with Francisco Calçonha, Dili, 13 August 2004.

326. CAVR Interview with António Caleres Junior, Dili, 2 October 2004. See also CAVR Interview with Alberto de Oliveira Camara, Dili, 1 September 2004.
327. CAVR Interview with Maria Olandina Isabel Caeiro Alves, Dili, 6 May 2004.
328. For cases of UDT members cooperating with ABRI see for example: HRVD Statements 1352 and 2012. For cases of Apodeti members cooperating with ABRI see for example: 5728; 5694; 5662 and 8086. For cases of an Apodeti member making arrests alone see for example HRVD Statements 5725 and 5099.
329. HRVD Statement 5731.
330. HRVD Statement 5730.
331. HRVD Statement 5728.
332. See for example HRVD Statements 3752; 4881; 0175; CAVR Interview with Maria Olandina Isabel Caeiro Alves, Dili, 6 May 2004. For 1975/1976 see for example HRVD Statements: 3742; 5666; 5107; 5050.
333. Neil Barrett interview with Saturnino Belo, Neil Barrett, The Comarca Video Project, Submission to CAVR, August 2002.
334. CAVR interview with Afonso Correia Lemos, Comarca, Balide, 5 September 2004.
335. HRVD Statement 3793.
336. Amnesty International, Statement of Amnesty International's Concern in Indonesia and East Timor, ASA: 21/05/80, London, 29 April 1980, p. 10.
337. CAVR Interview with António Caleres Junior, Dili, 2 October 2004.
338. CAVR Interview with Maria Fatima Maia, Dili, 16 February 2003.
339. Ibid.
340. HRVD Statement 5666.
341. HRVD Statement 5730.
342. CAVR Interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 August 2004.
343. CAVR Interview with Maria Fatima Maia, Dili, 16 February 2003.
344. João Balthazar Martins, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.
345. See for example HRVD Statements 4881; 5730; 0175; 0113; 3752; 3780; 5050; 0041.
346. HRVD Statement 5730.
347. CAVR Interview with Maria Olandina Isabel Caeiro Alves, Dili, 6 May 2004.
348. Ibid.
349. HRVD Statement 4881.
350. Maria José Franco Pereira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003.
351. HRVD Statement 3737.
352. CAVR Interview with Maria de Fatima Acaçio Guterres Leong, Dili, 21 February 2003, p. 3.
353. HRVD Statements 5010 and 1088.
354. HRVD Statement 5790.
355. HRVD Statements 4930 and 5121.
356. HRVD Statement 1985.
357. HRVD Statement 3358.
358. CAVR Interview with Maria Olandina Isabel Caeiro Alves, Dili, 6 May 2004.
359. HRVD Statement 1659.
360. CAVR Interview with António Junior Caleres, Dili, 2 October 2004.
361. HRVD Statement 4930.
362. CAVR Interview with Julio Alfaro, 18 February 2003.
363. CAVR Interview with FN, Dili, 21 February 2003.
364. HRVD Statement 1138.
365. HRVD Statement 3075
366. HRVD Statement 4858.
367. HRVD Statement 0051.
368. HRVD Statement 0463.

369. HRVD Statement 3797.
370. HRVD Statement 2012.
371. HRVD Statement 2017.
372. HRVD statement 0543.
373. CAVR Interview with Luis Pereira, Laclubar, Viqueque, 12 April 2003.
374. See for example: HRVD Statements 2091; 5834; 3282; 8908; 5052; 1061; 5834; 7642; 8086; 3086; 2651.
375. HRVD Statement 2651: See also HRVD Statements 3295 and 5712.
376. CAVR Interview with António Caleres Junior, Dili, 2 October 2004.
377. CAVR Women and Conflict Research Team, Women and Conflict. See especially Appendix G: "Depiction of Detention Location in Baucau", 10–13 June 2003.
378. HRVD Statement 7528.
379. CAVR Interview with Cornelio Gama ("L-7"), former Commander of Region 3, Dili, 9 April2003.
380. HRVD Statement 5662.
381. HRVD Statement 8345.
382. Ibid.
383. See for example HRVD Statements 3607; 5834; 6624.
384. HRVD Statement 3072.
385. Ibid.
386. CAVR Interview with Raul da Costa da Silva Araújo, Remexio, Aileu, 17 October 2003.
387. HRVD Statement 1298.
388. HRVD Statement 7792.
389. HRVD Statement 5417.
390. HRVD Statement 5337.
391. See for example: HRVD Statements 8392 and 3234; CAVR Interviews with Alfredo Manuel de Jesus, Ermera District, 8 October 2003; Rui Soares de Araújo, Dili, 27 October 2003; CAVR, Community Profiles of Sibuni Village, Lour Village and Molop Village, Bobonaro Sub-district, Bobonaro District; 24 October 2003; CAVR, Community Profile of Uamoritula Village, Viqueque, Viqueque, 6 September 2003.
392. See for example: HRVD Statements 8561 and 6442.
393. See for example: HRVD Statements 5677 and 2406.
394. HRVD Statement 6319.
395. CAVR Interview with António Caleres Junior, Dili, 2 October 2004.
396. HRVD Statement 8735.
397. Ibid.
398. HRVD Statement 5680.
399. HRVD Statement 8112.
400. HRVD Statement 5679.
401. CAVR Interview with HN, Viqueque, 17 September 2003. See also HRVD Statement 1632 in which the deponent describes being arrested because her husband was in the forest.
402. CAVR Interview with IN, Uatolari, Viqueque, 17 September 2003.
403. Ibid.
404. HRVD Statement 0762.
405. HRVD Statement 5680.
406. For other surrenders, see HRVD Statements 1469; 9001; 0646; 3479.
407. HVRD Statement 0646.
408. HRVD Statement 1469.
409. HRVD Statement 7200.
410. HRVD Statement 0682.
411. CAVR Interview with António Peloy, Dili, 1 June 2004.
412. CAVR Interview with Xisto Fernandes (alias Helio Espiritu Santo), Uato Carbau, Viqueque, November 2003.
413. HRVD Statement 7525.

414. CAVR, Community Profile of Hautuho Village, Remexio Sub-district, Aileu District, 23 May 2003.
415. CAVR, Community Profile of Uma Ki'ik Village, Viqueque Sub-district, Viqueque District, 11 July 2003.
416. CAVR, Community Profile of Caisido Village, Baucau Sub-district, Baucau District.
417. CAVR, Community Profile of Sibuni Village; Lour Village; Molop Village, Bobonaro Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 24 October 2003.
418. Ibid.
419. CAVR, Community Profile of Bahatata Village, Uato Carbau Sub-district, Viqueque District, 11 September 2003.
420. CAVR, Community Profile of Dato Village, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 13 March 2003.
421. CAVR, Community Profile of Hatura Village/Naroman Village, Isolado Village, Vera Cruz Sub-district, Dili District, 9 June 2003.
422. CAVR, Community Profile of Uatuhaco Village, Venilale Sub-district, Baucau District, 8 July 2003.
423. HRVD Statement 6821.
424. HRVD Statement 4586.
425. CAVR, Special Report on Forced Displacement and Famine in Uma Metan, Alas.
426. For surrenders to Uma Metan see HRVD Statements 4083-2; 4023. For people arrested and taken to Uma Metan see eg. HRVD Statements 3494, 5442, 3428, 3431-3, 5413, 3429, 3430.
427. HRVD Statements 5442, 5413 and 4083.
428. HRVD Statements 3428, 3431 and 4065.
429. CAVR, Massacres Research Project, "Massacres in Uma Metan", Manufahi, Case Summary Collection, March 2003.
430. CAVR Interview with Mateus Pereira, Uma Metan, Alas, Manufahi, 25 February 2003.
431. CAVR, Community Profile of Uamoritula Village, Viqueque Sub-district, Viqueque District, 6 September 2003.
432. CAVR, Community Profile of Manetu Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, 8 July 2003.
433. CAVR Interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 August 2004.
434. Ibid.
435. CAVR Interview with Francisco Xavier do Amaral, Dili, 18 June 2004; see also section on Fretilin detention centres in this Part.
436. HRVD Statement 5353.
437. CAVR Interview with Luis Maria da Silva (Maukiak), Dili, 16 December 2003.
438. CAVR Interview with José da Silva Amaral, 18 September 2003.
439. HRVD Statement 8561.
440. Military manual No. 01/IV/1982 written by Colonel Radjagukguk. Translation contained in Carmel Budiardjo & Liem Soei Leong, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, p. 209.
441. CAVR Interviews with: Maria Pinto, Dili, 31 May 2004; Bernardino Ximenes Villanova, Ataúro, 7 March 2002; José Simões, Dili, 9 March 2004; Beatris Miranda Guterres, Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque, 24 March 2003. See also interview with José Gomes Guterres, Lisbon, Portugal, 1988; Francisco de Carvalho; José de Sousa, a former military policeman; HRVD Statement 3490, and Neil Barrett interview with David Dias Ximenes, The Comarca Video Project, Submission to CAVR, August 2002.
442. HRVD Statement 5032.
443. HRVD Statement 5730 and 5651.
444. HRVD Statements 5730; 5651; 8101; 2094 and 6943.
445. CAVR Interview with Serafin do Nascimento, Aileu, 15 October 2003; HRVD Statements 2094; 2069; 8073; 8101; 5032; 6941 and 6983.
446. Neil Barrett interview with Maria Immaculada, The Comarca Video Project, Submission to CAVR, August 2002.
447. HRVD Statements 6981 and 2080.
448. HRVD Statements 2069; 5032; 5042; 5092; 5655; 5651; 5679; 5696; 5730; 6941; 6983; 8031; 8275; 8735 and 3490.
449. HRVD Statements 3793; 6981; 8101; 8073 and 1498; CAVR Interviews with Serafin do Nascimento, Aileu, 15 October 2003; Bernardino Ximenes Villanova, Ataúro, 7 March 2002; Maria Fatima de Pinto, Dili, 31 May 2004; Neil Barrett interviews with Maria Immaculada and David Dias Ximenes, The Comarca Video Project, Submission to CAVR, August 2002.

450. Neil Barrett interview with David Dias Ximenes, The Comarca Video Project, Submission to CAVR, August 2002.
451. Jill Jolliffe, interview with José Gomes Guterres, Lisbon, Portugal, 1988, quoted in Association of Ex-Political Prisoners (Assepol), Political Prisoners in Timor-Leste 25 April 1974-September 1999, Submission to the CAVR, Dili, 2003. [henceforth Assepol Submission]
452. CAVR Interview with Maria de Fatima Pinto, Dili, 31 May 2004. See also Neil Barrett interview with Maria Immaculada, The Comarca Video Project, Submission to CAVR, August 2002.
453. See for example. HRVD Statements 8101; 6981 and 6983, CAVR Interview with Bernardino Ximenes Villanova, Ataúro, Dili, 7 March 2002
454. HRVD Statement 6981.
455. HRVD Statement 6983.
456. HRVD Statement 5032.
457. HRVD Statement 6981.
458. CAVR Interview with Maria Immaculada, HRVD Statements 5037 and 5042 [David Ximenes, Mariano Bonaparte Soares, Luis Bobonaro, Januario].
459. Bernardino Villanova, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003.
460. Amnesty International, Annual Report 1981.
461. Bernardino Villanova, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003.
462. CAVR Interview with Guilherme da Costa, Bucoli, Baucau, 3 October 2004.
463. CAVR Interview with Vasco Lopes da Silva, Ataúro, Dili, 7 March 2002.
464. CAVR Interview with Adelino Soares, Ataúro, 27 October 2003.
465. CAVR Interview with Guilherme da Costa, Bucoli, Baucau, 3 October 2004; CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 21 August 2004.
466. CAVR Interviews with Ceu Lopes Federer, Dili, 30 August 2003 and 7 April 2004; Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 21 August 2004.
467. CAVR Interview with Ceu Lopes Federer, Dili, 30 August 2003 and 7 April 2004; CAVR, Case Summary 1014: Forced Displacement and Famine.
468. CAVR Interviews with Rosalina da Costa, Ataúro, Dili, 27 October 2003 and Adelino Soares, Ataúro, Dili, 27 October 2003.
469. CAVR Interview with Faustino Gomes de Sousa, Ataúro, Dili, 1 November 2003.
470. CAVR Interviews with Guilherme da Costa, Bucoli, Baucau, 3 October 2004; Rui Soares de Araújo, Ataúro, Dili 27 October 2003 and Adelino Soares, Ataúro, Dili, 27 October 2003.
471. CAVR, Interview with Alexandrina Amaral, Ataúro, Dili, 26 October 2003.
472. CAVR Interview with Faustino Gomes de Sousa, Ataúro, Dili, 1 November 2003.
473. Ibid.
474. Abilio dos Santos, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, Dili, 28–29 July 2003; CAVR Interview with Alexandrina Amaral, Ataúro, Dili, 26 October 2003. CAVR, Case Summary 1014: Forced Displacement and Famine.
475. International Committee of the Red Cross, Annual Report 1982; CAVR Interview with Adelino Soares, Ataúro, Dili, 27 October 2003.
476. CAVR Interviews with: Faustino Gomes de Sousa, Ataúro, Dili, 1 November 2003; Adelino Soares, Ataúro, Dili, 27 October 2003; and Vasco Lopes da Silva, Ataúro, Dili, 7 March 2002.
477. CAVR Interview with Faustino Gomes de Sousa, Ataúro, Dili, 1 November 2003.
478. CAVR Interviews with Ceu Lopes Federer, Dili, 30 August 2003 and 7 April 2004.
479. Ibid.
480. CAVR Interviews with Rui Soares de Araújo, Ataúro, Dili, 27 October 2003 and Maria Fatima da Costa, Same, Manufahi, 26 February 2003. See also HRVD Statement 6530.
481. CAVR Interview with Maria Fatima da Costa, Same, Manufahi, 26 February 2003.
482. CAVR Interview with Guilherme da Costa, Bucoli, Baucau, 3 October 2004.

483. CAVR Interview with Adelino Soares, Ataúro, Dili, 27 October 2003.
484. CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 21 August 2004.
485. Neil Barrett interview with Maria Immaculada, The Comarca Video Project, Submission to CAVR, August 2002.
486. HRVD Statements 6145; 8744 and 6081; CAVR Interview with Celestino Verdial, Ataúro, Dili, 27 October 2003.
487. CAVR Interview with Celestino Verdial, Ataúro, Dili, 27 October 2003.
488. HRVD Statement 5220.
489. HRVD Statement 7724
490. HRVD Statement 3820.
491. HRVD Statements 5220; 6530; 2662 and 4710.
492. Rosalina da Costa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, Dili, 28–29 July 2003.
493. HRVD Statement 4710.
494. HRVD Statements 1967; 0953; 1968; 4885 and 3345.
495. CAVR Interview with Adelino Soares, Ataúro, Dili, 27 October 2003.
496. CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Baucau, 27 May 2004.
497. CAVR Interview with Alexandrina Amaral, Ataúro, Dili, 26 October 2003
498. See CAVR, Women's Research Team Report, Field Report Mau Chiga, 27 May– 1 June 2003.
499. CAVR, Community Profile of Mau Chiga Village, Hato Builico Sub-district, Ainaro District, 17 September 2003.
500. CAVR, Community Profile of Mau Chiga Village, Hato Builico Sub-district, Ainaro District 17 September 2003; CAVR, Women's Research Team Report, Appendix I.0: Human Rights Violations of Women from a Community Perspective: Mau Chiga Society 1982-87, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 2003.
501. Abilio dos Santos Belo, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, Dili, 28–29 July 2003.
502. Ibid; CAVR and Fokupers, Women's Research Team Report, Appendix I.0, Violation of Women's Rights from the Community's Perspective: Mau Chiga Community, 1982-87, Mau Chiga, 27 May–1 June 2003.
503. Ibid.
504. CAVR, Massacres Research Project, Field Report VI, Ainaro, 15–18 December 2003.
505. Ibid.
506. CAVR and Fokupers, Women's Research Team Report, Appendix I.0: Abuse of Women's Human Rights from a Community Perspective: Mau Chiga1982-87, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 2003, p. 10.
507. Ibid.
508. HRVD Statement 7149.
509. HRVD Statements 4720; 4109; 4708 and 7252.
510. HRVD Statement 2050.
511. HRVD Statements 7193; 7194; 7258; 7259; 7270; 8901; 8038 and 8047.
512. HRVD Statement 4712.
513. CAVR, Massacres Research Team, Field Report VI: Ainaro, 15–18 December 2003.
514. Abilio dos Santos Belo, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003; CAVR Interview with Rui Soares de Araújo, Ataúro, Dili, 26 October 2003; HRVD Statements 7193; 7259; 7270; 8047 and 7382.
515. CAVR, Community Profile of Mulo Village, Hato Builico Sub-district, Ainaro District.
516. CAVR and Fokupers, Women's Research Team Report, Appendix I.0. Abuse of Women's Human Rights from a Community Perspective: Mau Chiga1982-87, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 2003, p. 10.
517. Abilio dos Santos Belo, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, Dili, 28–29 July 2003; CAVR Interview with Rui Soares de Araújo, Ataúro, Dili, 26 October 2003; HRVD Statements 7193; 7259; 7270; 8047 and 7382.
518. HRVD Statement 7193.
519. CAVR Interviews with Hermalinda Britos, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 30 May 2003 and Crismina de Conceição, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 28 May 2003.
520. CAVR Interviews with Francisca Barbosa, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 28 May 2003; Laurentina de Orleans, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 31 May 2003; Joaninha Britos, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 30 May 2003 and Zelia da Conceição, Dare, Ainaro, 1 June 2003.

521. CAVR Interview with Manuel Martins, Dare, Ainaro, 1 June 2003 and Joaninha Britos, Mau Chiga, Ainaro, 30 May 2003.
522. CAVR Interview with Amelia dos Santos, Mau Chiga, Hato Builico, Ainaro, 28 May 2003.
523. CAVR Interview with Bernardino dos Reis Tilman, Mau Chiga, Hato Builico, Ainaro, 15 January 2003.
524. HRVD Statement 8047.
525. HRVD Statement 4708.
526. HRVD Statement 7269.
527. CAVR Interview with Rui Soares de Araújo, Ataúro, Dili, 26 October 2003.
528. CAVR Interview with RN, Mau Chiga, Hato Builico, Ainaro, 28 May 2003.
529. CAVR Interview with Leonel Cardoso Pereira, Mau Chiga, Hato Builico, Ainaro, 30 May 2003.
530. CAVR Interview with Adelino de Araújo, Mau Chiga, Hato Builico, Ainaro, 29 May 2003.
531. CAVR and Fokupers, Women's Research Team Report, Annexe 1.0 of Violations of Women's Rights from a Community's Perspective: The Community of Mau Chiga, 1982–1987, Mau Chiga, 27 May to 1 June 2003.
532. HRVD Statement 7252.
533. Ibid.
534. Ibid.
535. HRVD Statement 2316.
536. HRVD Statement 0853-2.
537. HRVD Statements 6788 and 6013.
538. HRVD Statement 1061.
539. CAVR Interview with Jose de Conceição, Kupang, West Timor, Indonesia, 24 August 2004.
540. CAVR, Massacres Research Project, Field Report IV, 12–15 December 2003.
541. HRVD Statements 6008 and 6013.
542. CAVR, Community Profile of Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 10 September 2002; CAVR Interviews with Pedro Faria, former head of Fretilin in Lautém District, Iliomar, Lautém, 1 June 2003; Gaspar Seixas, former Deputy Sub-district Administrator of Iliomar 1979-85, Iliomar, Lautém, 29 May 2003; Fernando Amaral, Village Head of Fuad Village, Iliomar, Lautém, 28 May 2003.
543. CAVR Interview with Domingos Alves Fernandes, Lospalos, Lautém, 21 March 2003.
544. CAVR, Community Profile of Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 10 September 2002.
545. Ibid; CAVR Interview with Domingos Alves Fernandes, Lospalos, Lautém, 21 March 2003.
546. HRVD Statements 3930; 3952; Ernest Chamberlain, The Struggle in Iliomar, Resistance in rural East Timor, unpublished, Point Lonsdale, Australia, 2003.
547. Lembaga Studi dan Advokasi Masyarakat (Elsam), Kerangka Pencarian dan Pengumpulan Data Operasi Militer ABRI di Wilayah Timor Timur: Periode 1974–1999, Jakarta, March 2001 [Institute for Study and People Advocacy, Elsam, Framework for Finding and Collecting Military Operation Data of ABRI in East Timor Period of 1974-99].
548. CAVR, Summary of the Kraras Case, Preliminary research report from CAVR; CAVR Interviews with José Gomes, Olinda Pinto, Martins Miguel, Viana Martina Rangel, Beatris Miranda Guterres, Domingos Amaral, Vasco Tilman Pinto and Hermenegildo da Cruz, Dili, January 2004.
549. Democratic Republic of East Timor - Fretilin, Report, 1985. pp. 3-6.
550. CAVR, Massacres Research Project, Field Report IV: Viqueque, 12–15 December 2003 at p. 7.
551. CAVR Interview with Thomás Guterres of Afolocai, Uatolari, Viqueque, CAVR Massacres Research Project, Field Report II, 27 November–1 December 2002.
552. CAVR, Massacres Research Team, Field Report IV: Viqueque, 12–15 December 2003, p. 7.
553. Mariano Soares, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003.
554. HRVD Statement 8045.
555. HRVD Statement 0417-03.
556. HRVD Statement 6015-04
557. António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2005.
558. CAVR, Massacres Research Project, Field Report IV: Viqueque, 12–15 December 2002, p. 7.

559. Ibid.
560. Mariano Soares, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003; HRVD Statements 0007; 8045; 4203; 6015; 6016 and 6023.
561. HRVD Statements 6015; 6016 and 6023.
562. CAVR Interview with Tomás Guterres of Afolocai, Uatolari, Viqueque, CAVR Massacres Research Project, Field Report II, 27 November–1 December 2002.
563. CAVR Interview with Father Maubere (Domingos Soares), Dili, 22 September 2003
564. Mariano Soares, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003; see also Jill Jolliffe, Cover Up: The Inside Story of the Balibó Five, Scribe Publications, Victoria, 2002, p. 292.
565. HRVD Statement 7523
566. HRVD Statement 7332.
567. Fretilin, hand-written list of victims in Lautém, Viqueque, Baucau and Dili, late 1983-84, prepared for the Fretilin Delegation for External Services (Delegasaun Fretilin im Servicos Na Exterior), Doc. No. 4/Ag/84, Timor-Leste, 20 August 1984. CAVR Archive.
568. Ernest Chamberlain, op.cit., 2003, p. 30.
569. HRVD Statements 2113; 3930; 3934; 3972; 3977; 4371; 4407; 4408; 3925; 3938; 3947; 3949; 3951; 3972; 3986; 3989; 4376; 4387; 4393; 4397; 4399; 4436 and 4445.
570. HRVD Statements 3951and 4402.
571. HRVD Statement 7591.
572. Ernest Chamberlain, op.cit., 2003, p. 30.
573. For arrests in which T389 [East Timorese] was involved, see HRVD Statements: 2113; 3918; 3930; 3947; 3950; 3952; 3972; 3977; 3985; 3990; 4371; 4387; 4397; 4399 and 4408. For T390, see HRVD Statements: 3918; 3930; 3952; 3977; 3985; 4371; 4387; 4397; 4399 and 4408. For T801 [East Timorese], see HRVD Statements: 3930; 3952 and 4402. For T802 [East Timorese], see HRVD Statements: 3930; 3952; 4402 and 3989.
574. Community Profile of Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 10 September 2002.
575. CAVR Interview with Domingos Alves Fernandes, Lospalos, Lautém, 21 March 2003.
576. Grasilda Quimaraes, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003.
577. CAVR, Community Profile of Porlamanu in Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 10 September 2002.
578. HRVD Statements 1609; 1611; 0741; 0784 and 0787.
579. HRVD Statements 0717; 0731; 0739 and 0782.
580. HRVD Statements 0717 and 0731.
581. CAVR, Community Profile of Porlamanu in Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 10 September 2002.
582. Ibid.
583. CAVR Interviews with Filipe José Dias de Castro, Tutuala, Lautém, 10 January 2003, and Edmundo da Cruz, the village head of Com Village, Lospalos Sub-district, Lautém, 10 January 2003. See also CAVR Interviews with Justino Valentim and Albino da Silva, Dili, 17 April 2004.
584. CAVR Interview with Abraham Tomás Martino, CAVR Massacres Research Project, Field Report II, 1 December 2002.
585. For example from Viqueque see HRVD Statements: 0417; 4128; 8045; 6015; 6023; 4160; 6016; 6957; 7344 and 7340. From Lautém see HRVD Statements: 7591; 8000 and 7607.
586. CAVR Interview with Isabel da Silva, Beaço Village, Viqueque, Viqueque, 14 December 2002.
587. HRVD Statement 6023.
588. HRVD Statement 6016.
589. HRVD Statement 7607.
590. HRVD Statements 0007 and 8045; CAVR Interview with Carlos Alfredo da Costa Soares, Ataúro, Dili, 28 October 2003.
591. Mariano Soares, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003; CAVR Interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak) Dili, 1 November 2002.

592. CAVR, Massacres Research Project Field Report IV, Viqueque, 12–15 December, 2002, p. 5.
593. HRVD Statements 3986; 4387.
594. HRVD Statement 3927.
595. HRVD Statements 3949; 3951; 3985; 4003; 4371; 4408; 4436 and 2291.
596. HRVD Statements 0755; 0760; 0762; 0763; 0771; 0793; 0778; 0741 and 0758.
597. HRVD Statement 0755.
598. HRVD Statement 3927.
599. HRVD Statement 0778. The letter was identified as: Surat Perintah [Letter of Order] of Kodim Commander 1629 Lospalos, Nomor Sprin/028/V/1984, dated 27 May 1984.
600. HRVD Statement 5164.
601. HRVD Statements 7810; 6148; 7819; 3883 and 0567.
602. See for example HRVD Statements 2323 and 2370.
603. HRVD Statements 2323 2370; 2371; 2387.
604. HRVD Statement 2371.
605. HRVD Statement 5244.
606. Ibid.
607. CAVR, Community Profile of Fatisi Village, Laulara Sub-district, Aileu District, 9 October 2002.
608. HRVD Statement 1437.
609. HRVD Statement 1483.
610. HRVD Statement 1454.
611. HRVD Statement 5045.
612. HRVD Statement 1407.
613. HRVD Statement 1420.
614. HRVD Statement 1483.
615. Assepol Submission, 2003, p. 7.
616. CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Baucau, 17 November 2002.
617. Ibid.
618. José Antonio de Jesus das Neves, Submission to the CAVR, 29 September 2004.
619. CAVR Interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004.
620. CAVR Interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 16 October 2003.
621. CAVR Interviews with Henrique Belmero, Dili, 25 May 2004, and António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 1 November 2002; Mariano Soares, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003.
622. CAVR Interview with António Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 1 November 2002.
623. CAVR Interview with Francisco Miranda Branco, Dili, 30 July 2004.
624. Mariano Soares, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17–18 February 2003.
625. CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Baucau, 17 November 2002.
626. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.
627. CAVR Interview with João Freitas da Camara, Dili, 5 June 2004.
628. CAVR Interview with Antonio Tomás Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 1 November 2002; Dili, 16 October 2003 and Dili, 28 April 2004.
629. CAVR Interview with Justo dos Santos, Dili, 3 November 2002.
630. Assepol Submission to the CAVR, 2003, p. 8.
631. CAVR Interview with Caetano Guterres, Dili, 22 May 2004.
632. CAVR Interview with Marito Nicolau dos Reis, Dili, 17 November 2002.
633. CAVR Interview with Caetano Guterres, Dili, 22 May 2004.
634. Military Regional Command XVI Udayana, Sub Regional Military Command 164/Wira Dharma, Prosedur Tetap (Protap) No. PROTAP/01-B/VII/1982 regarding the procedure for the Interogation of Prisoners, dated July 1982.
635. CAVR Interview with Aquilino Fraga Guterres, Baguia, Baucau, 17 May 2004.
636. HRVD Statements 1265; 5157; 5169; 5156; 6681; 8182 and 8187.

637. HRVD Statement 5121.

638. CAVR Interview with Lucio Dinis Marques, Maliana, 14 June 2003.

639. See list of 45 victims – "Daftar Nama Korban Yang Dibantai Tahun 1984 di Bobonaro." ("List of Victims Who Were Slaughted in 1984 in Bobonaro") Provided by Olandino Guterres, in Bobonaro District Report (11–14 June 2003).

640. HRVD Statements 7172; 8143; 6715; 7168; 5203 and 3695.

641. CAVR Interview with Dinis de Araújo, Maliana, Bobonaro, 14 June 2003.

642. HRVD Statement 1265.

643. CAVR Interview with Armando dos Santos, Maliana, Bobonaro, 14 June 2003.

644. HRVD Statements 5751 and 5817 (Aileu); HRVD Statements 7233 and 2803 (Ainaro); HRVD Statements 7028; 7060; 7662; 7764; 7092; 7735 and 2401 (Baucau); HRVD Statement 6681 (Bobonaro); HRVD Statements 1265; 5156 and 5203 (Covalima); HRVD Statements 3747; 3167; 5016 and 3785 (Dili); HRVD Statements 2142; 5356; 4433; 5333; 5393; 5394; 8726; 8754; 2797; 4439 and 4459 (Lautém); HRVD Statements 0902; 0922; 0932; 0981; 0992 and 0993 (Liquiçá); HRVD Statements 6515; 1913; 1560 and 3452 (Manatuto); HRVD Statements 3080; 6798; 7331; 7515; 7465; 9180; 4123; 4163 and 6037 (Viqueque).

645. HRVD Statement 0922.

646. HRVD Statement 9180.

647. See Keputusan Presiden Republik Indonesia, Nomor 62 Tahun 1988 Tentang Penyelenggaraan Pemerintahan dan Pembangunan di Propinsi Daerah Tingkat I Timor Timur [Decision of the President of the Republic of Indonesian, Number 62, 1988, Regarding the Implementation of Governance and Development in the Province of East Timor].

648. HRVD Statement 7603.

649. Ibid.

650. HRVD Statement 3338.

651. HRVD Statement 5049.

652. HRVD Statement 6987.

653. HRVD Statement 0483.

654. HRVD Statement 6235.

655. HRVD Statement 4873. See also HRVD Statement 4874 in which the victim suffered the same period of arbitrary detention in the Dili Kodim because Infantry Battalion 723 members disbelieved his identity card was his.

656. HRVD Statements 7213; 7220; 1012; 3334 and 9175.

657. HRVD Statements 3778; 5049; 6025; 4209; 4126 and 4189.

658. CAVR Interview with Januario Freitas Ximenes, Baucau, 3 September 2004.

659. CAVR Interview with Mário Filipe, Baucau, 3 September 2004.

660. CAVR Interview with David da Conceição Thon, detained in Becora Prison in 1991, Dili, 13 August 2004. Interview with Dominggos Martins Pereira, Aileu, 15 October 2004.

661. CAVR Interview with Octavio da Conceição, Dili, 3 November 2002.

662. CAVR Interview with Eduardo Lopes, detained in the Maliana Prison 1995-99, Maliana, 28 August 2004.

663. Ibid.

664. CAVR Interview with José da Costa Ximenes (detained in the LP Buruma, Baucau on 10 July 1994), Baucau, 3 September 2004.

665. CAVR Interview with Felismina da Conceição, Dili 4 May 2004 (detained in Becora Prison in 1992).

666. CAVR Interview with Julio Araújo Martins, Gleno, Ermera, 26 August 2004.

667. CAVR Interviews with Jacinto Alves and Gregório Saldahna, Dili, 4 June 2004. Both were detained in Becora Prison in 1992.

668. CAVR Interview with Felismina da Conceição, Dili 4 May 2004 (detained in Becora Prison in 1992).

669. CAVR Interview with David da Conceição Thon, Dili, 13 August 2004 (detained at the SGI building in Colmera in 1988).

670. CAVR Community Profile of Darulete Village, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 13 February 2003; mentions 15 people arrested.

671. CAVR Community Profile of Darulete Village, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 13 February 2003; HRVD Statements 0907; 2989; 1985 and 2874.

672. Interrogation by SGI: HRVD Statement 2989. Interrogation at the Liquiçá Koramil described in CAVR Community Profiles of Loidahar Village, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 4 March 2003; CAVR Community Profiles of Luculai Village, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 19 February 2003; HRVD Statement 1985.

673. CAVR Community Profile of Luculai Village, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 19 February 2003; HRVD Statement 1985.

674. The Submission by Elsam to the CAVR notes that Gadapaksi was founded around March 1994, and Geoffrey Robinson Report noted July 1995, p. 154.

675. HRVD Statement 2874.

676. CAVR Interview with José da Silva Amaral, Afalocai, Uato Carbau, Viqueque, 18 September 2003.

677. Amnesty International, Statement to the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation, ASA 21/14/91, August 1991.

678. HRVD Statements 4779 (40 people) and 4790 (46 people).

679. HRVD Statement 4779.

680. CAVR Community Profile of Vatuvou Village, Maubara Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 5 June 2003; and HRVD Statement statement 1996.

681. CAVR Community Profile of Vatuvou Village, Maubara Sub-District, Liquiçá District, 26 June 2003 HRVD Statements 3004; 5892; 2994; 5882; and 1996. Amnesty International, Indonesia and East Timor: Twenty years of violations, statement before the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization, 11 July 1995, AI Index: ASA 21/33/95.

682. HRVD Statement 1996.

683. CAVR Community Profile of Vatuboro Village, Maubara Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 5 June 2003; HRVD Statements 5882 and 1996.

684. HRVD Statement 6739.

685. HRVD Statement 8098.

686. CAVR Interview with Chiquito da Costa Guterres (alias Michael Savio, alias Kaiwua), Dili, 14 June 2004.

687. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor: Possible "disappearance", 4 July 1991, AI Index: ASA 21/12/91; Amnesty International, Extrajudicial Execution/Arrest/Fear of Torture, 30 October 1991, AI Index: ASA 21/18/91.

688. Amnesty International, Legal Concern/Fear of Torture, 22 November 1991, AI Index: ASA 21/26/91.

689. Amnesty International, Further information on UA 408/91 (ASA 21/26/91, 22 November 1991) and follow-up ASA 21/28/91, 29 November 1991 - Legal Concern/Fear of Torture, 10 December 1991, AI Index: ASA 21/29/91.

690. Amnesty International Statement to the UN Special Committee on Decolonisation, ASA 21/14/91, August 1991.

691. CAVR Interview with José António de Jesus das Neves, Dili, 3 May 2004.

692. Constâncio Pinto and Matthew Jardine, East Timor's unfinished struggle: inside the Timorese Resistance, South End Press, Boston, 1997, p. 108.

693. CAVR Interview with Gregório Saldanha, Dili, 10 November 2002.

694. CAVR Interview with José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, Dili, 31 October 2002.

695. Ibid. See also testimony of Gregório Saldanha to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, 17–18 February 2003.

696. Kodam IX Kolakops, "Rencana Operasi Halo Kapaz," dated 31 August 1991, secret, cited in Samuel Moore, "The Indonesian Military's Last Years in East Timor: An Analysis of its Secret Documents," Indonesia 72, October 2001, p. 21.

697. CAVR Interview with Afonso Maria, Dili, 1 November 2002.

698. HRVD Statement 1970.

699. Ibid. The deponent did not tell the Commission the fate of his friends Calisto and Amadeo.

700. HRVD Statement 5070.

701. CAVR Interview with David da Conceição, Dili, 13 August 2004.

702. Amnesty International Urgent Action 04/92, ASA 21/01/92, 3 January 1992.

703. HRVD Statement 5070.
704. CAVR Interview with José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, Dili, 31 October 2002.
705. HRVD Statement 8046.
706. HRVD Statement 8088.
707. CAVR Confidential Interview, by source not to be named, Dili, 15 November 2004.
708. HRVD Statement 5070.
709. CAVR Interview with José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, Dili, 20 December 2004.
710. Constâncio Pinto and Matthew Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle, Inside the Timorese Resistance, 1997, South End Press, Boston, MA, p. 112.
711. Amnesty International, East Timor: Short-Term Detention and Ill-treatment, AI Index: ASA 21/01/90.
712. HRVD Statement 8084-4.
713. HRVD Statements 2989; 8384-4 and 8304.
714. HRVD Statement 0195.
715. HRVD Statements 2726; 6731; 7157; 7420; 5071; 9126; 6352; 0921; 4169; 4217/3; 9126; 7736; 4705; 0195-4; 1996 and 0634.
716. See testimonies of Simplicio Celestino de Deus to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 28–29 November 2003; and Alexandrino da Costa to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and the Conflict, 28–29 March 2004.
717. HRVD Statements 6731, 7157 and 4217-3; CAVR Interview with Simplicio Celestino de Deus, Dili, 8 October 2004.
718. HRVD Statement 5071.
719. CAVR Interview with José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, Dili, 31 October 2002.
720. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor: A new order? Human rights in 1992.
721. HRVD Statement 2726.
722. CAVR Interview with Simplicio Celestino de Deus, Dili, 5 December 2003.
723. For arrests in Liquiçá, see for example HRVD Statements 0634; 0195; 1996 and 4705 (They were arrested by head of intelligence Duranto and Tomé Diogo). For arrests in Bobonaro, see for example HRVD statements 8634 and 5615-2. For arrests in Baucau, see for example HRVD statement 2363-4 and Neil Barrett interview with Saturnino Belo, Dili, as part of The Comarca Video Project, Submission to CAVR, August 2002.
724. CAVR Community Profiles of Uma-Anaico Village and Uma-Analu Village, Venilale Sub-district, Baucau District, 12 June 2003; CAVR Community Profile of Tasi Village, Vemasse Sub-district, Baucau District, 28 March 2003.
725. CAVR Community Profile of Uatu-Haco Village, Venilale Sub-district, Baucau District, 8 June 2003.
726. CAVR Community Profile of Quelicai Town, Baucau District [undated].
727. CAVR Interview with Simplicio Celestino de Deus, Dili, 5 December 2003.
728. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East-Timor, the trial of Xanana Gusmão and a follow-up to the Dili Massacre, April 1993, Vol. 5, No. 8, p. 22.
729. Ibid, p. 23.
730. CAVR Interview with Simplicio Celestino de Deus, Dili, 5 December 2003.
731. For arrests in connection with the visit in Ainaro, see section on Team Sukarelawan which was founded to counter preparations for visit.
732. CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 10 June 2004.
733. CAVR Interview with Julio Araújo Martins, Gleno, Ermera, 26 August 2004.
734. Lembaga Studi dan Advokasi Masyarakat (Elsam), Kerangka Pencarian dan Pengumpulan Data Operasi Militer ABRI di Wilayah Timor Timur: Periode 1974–1999, Jakarta, March 2001 [Institute for Study and People Advocacy, Elsam, Framework for Finding and Collecting Military Operation Data of ABRI in East Timor Period of 1974-99]. The Commission was told of several cases where individuals were forcefully recruited into these teams, see for example HRVD Statement 0745.
735. HRVD Statements 1887; 1106; 1172; 1115 and 1108.
736. CAVR, Community Profile of Atabai Village, Atabae Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 8 October 2002.
737. HRVD Statement 1115.

738. HRVD Statement 1106.
739. HRVD Statement 1140.
740. CAVR, Community Profile of Atabai Village, Atabae Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 8 October 2002.
741. CAVR, Community Profiles of Manetu Village (8 July 2003), Hohoraikik Village (24 July 2003).
742. CAVR, Community Profiles of Maulau Village (26 May 2003), Manelobas Village (23 May 2003), Manetu Village (8 July 2003), Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District.
743. CAVR, Community Profiles of Manutasi Village, Ainaro Sub-district, Ainaro District, 17 February 2003.
744. CAVR, Community Profiles of Maulau Village (26 May 2003), Manelobas Village (23 May 2003) and Manetu Village (8 July 2003), Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District; CAVR, Community Profile of Cassa Village, Ainaro Sub-district, Ainaro District, 18 February 2003.
745. HRVD Statement 2682.
746. CAVR Community Profile of Maulau Village (26 May 2003), Manelobas Village (23 May 2003) and Manetu Village (8 July 2003), Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District; CAVR, Community Profile of Cassa Village, Ainaro Sub-district, Ainaro District, 18 February 2003.
747. CAVR, Community Profile of Manetu Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, 8 July 2003; CAVR, Community Profile of Manutasi Village, Ainaro Sub-district, Ainaro District, 17 February 2003; CAVR, Community Profile of Cassa Village, Ainaro Sub-district, Ainaro District, 18 February 2003.
748. HRVD Statement 2683.
749. HRVD Statement 3379.
750. HRVD Statements 3309; 3342; 4911; 5956; 5006; 3378; 3386; 3387; 3389; 4919; 4930; 5971; 3307; 4983; 5000; 5977; 3379; 3383; 4950; 4964; 5003 and 4921; CAVR, Community Profile of Manelobas Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, 23 May 2003; CAVR, Community Profile of Manetu Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, 8 July 2003; CAVR, Community Profile of Maubisse Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District.
751. CAVR, Community Profile of Ainaro Village, Ainaro Sub-district, Ainaro District; CAVR, Community Profile of Maubisse Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District; CAVR, Community Profile of Manetu Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District all in May–July 2003.
752. CAVR, Community Profile of Ainaro Village, Ainaro Sub-district, Ainaro District; CAVR, Community Profile of Maubisse Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, all in May–July 2003; CAVR, Community Profile of Manetu Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, 8 July 2003; CAVR, Community Profiles of Manutasi Village, Ainaro Sub-district, Ainaro District, 17 February 2003.
753. CAVR, Community Profile of Hohoraik Village, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro District, 24 July 2003.
754. CAVR Interview with José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, Dili, 31 October 2002, Assepol Submission to the CAVR 17 February 2003.
755. Assepol Submission to the CAVR (17 February 2003), confirmed in CAVR Interview with José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, Dili, 20 December 2004.
756. Ibid.
757. CAVR Interview with José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, Dili, 20 December 2004.
758. Ibid.
759. HRVD Statement 7157.
760. CAVR Interview with Francisco Miranda Branco, Dili, 24 November 2002; CAVR Interview with Jacinto Alves, 5 June 2005.
761. HRVD Statement 7420.
762. HVRD Statement 0921.
763. HRVD Statement 9126.
764. HRVD Statement 5071.
765. HRVD Statement 7736.
766. Ben Anderson, Douglas Kammen and Arif Djati interview with Mario Carrascalão, Dili, 20 March 2002. CAVR Archive.
767. CAVR Interview with José Manuel da Silva Fernandes, Dili, 20 December 2004.
768. CAVR Interview with Gregório Saldanha, Dili, 4 June 2004.
769. CAVR Interview with João Freitas da Camara, Dili, 5 June 2004.
770. CAVR Interview with Virgilio da Silva Guterres, Dili, 5 November 2002.

771. CAVR Interview with Domingos Barreto, Dili, 6 May 2004.
772. CAVR Interview with Virgilio da Silva Guterres, Dili, 5 November 2002; CAVR Interview with João Freitas da Camara, Dili, 5 June 2004.
773. CAVR Community Profile of Florestal Village, Nain Feto/Dili Oriental Sub-district, Dili District, 12 June 2003; CAVR Community Profile of Nazare Village, Nain Feto/Dili Oriental Sub-district, Dili District, 9 March 2003; HRVD Statements 3076-8; 5066; 5674; 9189 and 6982-2.
774. AFP, Jakarta, 12 July 1994.
775. HRVD Statement 5066.
776. HRVD Statements 5674 and 6982-2.
777. East Timor Human Rights Centre (ETHRC) Annual Report 17 February 1998, http://www.asia-pacific-action.org/southeastasia/easttimor/resources/reports/ethrc97.htm.
778. Amnesty International ASA 21/86/97, ASA 21/88/97, ETHRC Annual Report 17 February 1998, http://www.asia-pacific-action.org/southeastasia/easttimor/resources/reports/ethrc97.htm.
779. Lembaga Studi dan Advokasi Masyarakat (Elsam), Kerangka Pencarian dan Pengumpulan Data Operasi Militer ABRI di Wilayah Timor Timur: Periode 1974–1999, Jakarta, March 2001 [Institute for Study and People Advocacy, Elsam, Framework for Finding and Collecting Military Operation Data of ABRI in East Timor Period of 1974-99].
780. HRVD Statements 7530 and 7465.
781. HRVD Statement 8177.
782. HRVD Statement 8177.
783. CAVR Interview with Hernani Deolindo de Araújo, Maliana, 28 August 2004.
784. CAVR Interview with Eduardo Lopes (Lorico Lopes), Maliana, 28 August 2004.
785. HRVD Statement 2436.
786. CAVR Community Profile of Macadique Village, Uatolari Sub-district, Viqueque District (undated); Amnesty International 1997 Indonesia/East Timor: Further information on fear of torture/medical concern, AI Index: ASA 21/06/97, 14 February 1997.
787. Amnesty International 1997 Indonesia/East Timor: Further information on fear of torture/medical concern, AI Index: ASA 21/06/97, 14 February 1997.
788. Detained in the Sub-district police station (Polres): Balthasar SH Belo (Amnesty International, Indonesia: Fear of torture, AI Index: ASA 21/01/97, 8 January 1997); Detained in District police station (Polda): José Maria Geronimo, João Budiono C Moraes, Gregório Sequira, Luis Afonso, Abel Fernandes and Bobby Xavier (Amnesty International, Indonesia: Fear of torture, AI Index: ASA 21/01/97, 8 January 1997.); Detained in SGI Colmera: Armanda C Soares (Amnesty International, Indonesia: Fear of torture, AI Index: ASA 21/01/97, 8 January 1997); Detained in Becora Prison: HRVD Statement 5075; CAVR Community Profiles of Bidau Santana & Meti Aut Villages, Nain Feto/Dili Oriental Sub-district, Dili District, 1 September 2003; CAVR Community Profile of Hera Village, Cristo Rei/Dili Oriental Sub-district, Dili District, 1 September 2003; CAVR Community Profiles of Benamauk, Kamea, Fatu-Ahi Villages, Cristo Rei Sub-district, Dili District, [undated]; Amnesty International, Indonesia: Further information on fear of torture, AI Index: ASA 21/16/97, 18 March 1997.
789. Amnesty International, Indonesia: Fear of Torture, AI Index: ASA 21/01/97, 8 January 1997.
790. HRVD Statement 3739.
791. Amnesty International, Intimidation/Fear for Safety: 29 Abducted by "Ninja" Gangs in Dili 13 February 1995, AI Index: ASA 21/14/95.
792. Amnesty International, Indonesia and East Timor: Political prisoners and the "rule of law". AI Index, ASA 21/16/95.
793. Reuters 21 February 1995.
794. HRVD Statement 8069-6.
795. HRVD Statement 8069.
796. HRVD Statement 9082.
797. Tapol Bulletin, No. 102, December 1990, p. 16.
798. HRVD Statements 2698; 3342; 9321 and 2687, 5719; 0076-8. 3120; 0445-7&8; 3139-4; 7375-2 and 6741.
799. HRVD Statements 1346; 2698; 3342; 9321 and 2687.
800. John G Taylor, East Timor: The Price of Freedom, London, Zed Books, 1999, p. 220.

801. HRVD Statement 2687.
802. HRVD Statement 2006.
803. HRVD Statement 7375/2.
804. HRVD Statements 5719; 0076 and 6983.
805. HRVD Statement 5768.
806. HRVD Statement 6269.
807. HRVD Statements 3139-4 and 3076-9.
808. HRVD Statements 4736 and 4733.
809. HRVD Statement 4733.
810. HRVD Statements 4173-3; 4169-3; and 4137.
811. HRVD Statements 0154-3; 8006; 3123-6 and 7681.
812. CAVR, Community Profile of Bualale Village, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 16 December 2003.
813. HRVD Statement 9321.
814. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor: The Trial of Xanana Gusmão and a Follow-up to the Dili Massacre, Vol. 5 No. 8, April 1993, p. 8.
815. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004, p. 1.
816. Ibid, p. 5.
817. Amnesty International, East Timor: Xanana Gusmão–A Briefing, AI Index: ASA/21/58/97, August 1997.
818. Commission on Human Rights, Forty-Ninth Session, "Situation in East Timor: Report of the Secretary-General", 10 February 1993, p. 14.
819. Ibid.
820. Assepol Submission to the CAVR, 18 February 2003, p. 11.
821. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor: The Trial of Xanana Gusmão and a Follow-up to the Dili Massacre, Vol. 5 No. 8, April 1993, p. 9.
822. Ibid, p. 10.
823. CAVR Interview with Armandina Gusmão, Dili, 3 September 2004.
824. CAVR Interview with Afonso Maria, Dili, 1 November 2002.
825. HRVD Statement 3120. See also HRVD Statements 3127, 7375 0445-7&8 and 3139-4 for arrests in the Ossu region in 1992.
826. CAVR Interview with Olga Corte Real, Datina, Same, Manufahi, 3 June 2003.
827. HRVD Statements 4005; 4385 (1985) 4009; 7584 (1986) and 4075 Manufahi (1987).
828. HRVD Statement 7091.
829. HRVD Statements 8375 and 8342.
830. HRVD Statement 8342.
831. Ibid.
832. Ibid.
833. HRVD Statement 8375.
834. CAVR Interview with Reinaldo Marcal, Dili, 10 July 2004.
835. Human Rights Watch, Deteriorating Human Rights Situation in East Timor, CAVR Archives at HRW East Timor\reports\1997\indtimor\index.html.
836. CAVR Interview with, Francisco da Costa, Dili, 7 May 2004.
837. Amnesty International mentions other arrestees: José Acacio, João Angelo, Francisco Magno. AI Index: ASA 21/38/97.
838. ETHRC Urgent Action, 4 June 1997, Amnesty International Urgent Action 2 June 1997.
839. HRVD Statement 8005.
840. CAVR Interview with Reinaldo Marcal, Dili, 10 July 2004.
841. HRVD Statement 8005.
842. HRVD Statement 5074, Romeo da Conceição [In HRVD Statement, the date is 31 July, but it is very clear from context that it is 31 May].
843. CAVR Interview with Mariano da Costa Sarmento Soares, Dili, 10 July 2004.

844. CAVR Interview with Reinaldo Marcal, Fatumeta, 10 July 2004
845. Ibid, and CAVR Interviews with Mariano da Costa Sarmento Soares, Dili, 4 May 2004 and 10 July 2004
846. Ibid.
847. CAVR Interview with Reinaldo Marcal, Dili, 10 July 2004; CAVR Interview with Mariano da Costa Sarmento Soares, Dili, 10 July 2004.
848. CAVR Interview with Vasco da Gama, Becora, Dili, 18 May 2004; CAVR Interview with Luis Maria da Silva (Maukiak), Dili, 16 December 2003; CAVR Interview with Francisco da Costa, Dili, 7 May 2004.
849. HRVD Statements 7815 and 7783; CAVR Community Profiles of Bualale Village (16 December 2003), Guruça Village (21 November 2003), Uaitame Village (12 December 2003), and Lelalai Village (20 October 2003), Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District.
850. HRVD Statement 7783.
851. CAVR Interview with Vasco da Gama, Becora, Dili, 18 May 2004; CAVR Interview with Luis Maria da Silva (Maukiak), Dili, 16 December 2003; CAVR Interview with Francisco da Costa, Dili, 7 May 2004; HRVD Statements 7707; 7098 and 3702.
852. CAVR Interview with Francisco da Costa, Dili, 7 May 2004.
853. CAVR Interview with João Bosco, Quelicai, 2 September 2004.
854. CAVR Statement 8046.
855. CAVR Interview with Mário Filipe, Baucau, 2 September 2004.
856. CAVR Interview with Vasco da Gama, Becora, Dili, 18 May 2004.
857. CAVR Interview with Mário Filipe, Baucau, 2 September 2004.
858. CAVR Interview with Francisco da Costa, Dili, 7 May 2004.
859. Ibid.
860. CAVR Interview with Luis Maria da Silva (Maukiak), Dili, 16 December 2003.
861. CAVR Interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.
862. Ibid.
863. CAVR Interview with Constâncio da Costa Santos, Balide, Dili, 7 July 2004.
864. CAVR Community Profile of Maumeta Village, Bazartete Sub-district, Liquiçá District; HRVD Statements 1974; 1987 and 1984.
865. HRVD Statement 1974.
866. HRVD Statement 1987.
867. HRVD Statement 1984.
868. Ibid.
869. Ibid.
870. HRVD Statements 3446; 3472 and 1558.
871. HRVD Statement 3446.
872. HRVD Statement 3472.
873. HRVD Statements 3472; 1558 and 3446.
874. HRVD Statements 1531; 9019; 1566.
875. HRVD Statement 9033.
876. HRVD Statements 1581; 1586; 1580; 1575; 1601; 1602; 1558; 1510; 1568; 1550; 1526; 1589; 1530; 1549; 1557; 1521 and 1531.
877. HRVD Statement 1558.
878. HRVD Statements 1550; 1526 and 1589. According to HRVD Statement 1526, T541 is the village head; according to HRVD Statement 1589, T541 a commander of the ABLAI. It is likely that the same person held both positions.
879. HRVD Statement 1526; 1530; 1549; 1557 and 1575.
880. HRVD Statement 1526.
881. HRVD Statement 1557.
882. HRVD Statement 1521.
883. HRVD Statements 1526 and 1550.
884. HRVD Statements 1549; 1530; 1557; 1580; 1531.

885. HRVD Statement 8124 and 1549.
886. HRVD Statement 1549.
887. HRVD Statement 8124.
888. For mention of Koramil members, see HRVD Statements 1505; 1518; 1520; 1540; 1559 and 9022. For intelligence section head T434, see HRVD Statements 3407; 3436 and 3437.
889. HRVD Statements 1568 and 1523.
890. HRVD Statements 1505; 1518; 3467 and 4029.
891. HRVD Statement 1507.
892. HRVD Statements 1510, 1514; 1559 and 3437.
893. HRVD Statements 1540 and 1514.
894. HRVD Statement 1514.
895. Ibid.
896. Alas Koramil: see HRVD Statements 1505; 1518; 1573; 1593 and 3480; Alas Nanggala Post: see HRVD Statements 1564 and 3473; police station: HRVD Statements 1507 and 3436; private homes: see HRVD Statements 9015 and 1541.
897. HRVD Statement 1559.
898. HRVD Statement 1568.
899. HRVD Statement 9022.
900. HRVD Statement 6861.
901. HRVD Statement 1079.
902. HRVD Statements 2645; 5298; 5922 3515; 8405; 5934; 4633; 5789; 5794; 4191.
903. HRVD Statement 8046.
904. HRVD Statement 3245; 2019; 5602; 1021; 6887.
905. HRVD Statement 3245.
906. HRVD Statement 5602.
907. HRVD Statements 03691; 3692; 02543, 1866; 2637; 0804; 5133; 8619; 0093; 5492; 0929; 3298; 5592; 2681; 5133; 3691, 2021, 3679, 5151, 3690, 3692, 8893; 1866; CAVR, Community Profile of Saboria Village, Aileu Vila Sub-District, Aileu District, 14 March 2003.
908. HRVD Statements 5133; 8619; 0093; 5492; 0929; 3298; 5592; 2681.
909. HRVD Statements 2637; 0804.
910. HRVD Statement 5133.
911. CAVR, Community Profile of Saboria Village, Aileu Vila Sub-district, Aileu District, 14 March 2003.
912. Ibid.
913. OHCHR Submission to the CAVR, April 2004, pp. 201-205.
914. HRVD Statement 5888; 9158.
915. Information from Dave Savage in an email to the CAVR, 2 November 2004. CAVR Archive.
916. HRVD Statements 7134, 6277, 6349, 6348.
917. HRVD Statement 6348.
918. HRVD Statement 1179.
919. HRVD Statement 8221.
920. HRVD Statement 6631.
921. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004. p. 169.
922. CAVR, Community Profile of Rainaba Sub-Village, Guguleur Village, Maubara Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 12 June 2003.
923. HRVD Statements 04697; 4610; 4615; 4638; 5855; 5920 (Gugleur); HRVD Statements 4642; 4659; 4689; 4608; 4654 (Vatuboro); 5908; 5909; 5934 (Vatuvou); 4666; 4646; 4613; 4622; 4651; 4629; SR1/99-43 (Guico).
924. HRVD Statement SR2/98 (ETHRC).
925. HRVD Statement SR1/99-63.
926. HRVD Statement 5168.
927. HRVD Statement 5908.
928. HRVD Statement 6260.

929. HRVD Statements 5133, 04628, 02934, 04920, 1954, 3670, 3692.
930. HRVD Statement 5133.
931. CAVR, Community Profile of Rai Fun Village, Maliana Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 3 February 2003.
932. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 189.
933. HRVD Statement 0408.
934. HRVD Statement 0411.
935. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 144
936. Ibid.
937. HRVD Statement 3692.
938. HRVD Statements 8495; 7418; 1233; 3582; 0643; 4986.
939. HRVD Statements 3858; 8162; 2036; 0225; 1204.
940. HRVD Statements 6396; 6912.
941. HRVD Statement 1554.
942. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 149, see also The Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes vs Sediyono et al. indictment (case number 14-2003), 7 April 2003.
943. HRVD Statements 3690, 3699.
944. HRVD Statements 3691, 2021, 3679, 3699, 3670, 5138, 3688, 8893, 7419, 3698, 5151 and CAVR Community Profile of Fatuleto Village, Zumalai Sub-district, Covalima District, 21 May 2003.
945. HRVD Statements 5152, 7419, 2021, 7422, 3670, 5130, 3698, 3690.
946. HRVD Statements 3691, 2021, 3679, 5151, 3690, 3692, 8893.
947. HRVD Statement 2976.
948. HRVD Statement 4644.
949. HRVD Statement 0276-1.
950. CAVR, Community Profile of Loidahar Village, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 4 March 2003.
951. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 169.
952. HRVD Statements 4644; 5865; 4633; 5884; 5903.
953. HRVD Statements 3509; 2103.
954. HRVD Statements 9025; 9027.
955. HRVD Statement 6157.
956. Ibid.
957. HRVD Statements 2193; 2224.
958. HRVD Statement 2193.
959. Ibid.
960. HRVD Statement 3578.
961. HRVD Statements 4594; 4544.
962. HRVD Statement 6174.
963. HRVD Statement 4594. See also HRVD Statement 4544.
964. HRVD Statements 8295; 8296.
965. HRVD Statements 3510-2; 8295; 8296; 9471-10.
966. HRVD Statement 6401.
967. HRVD Statement 8296.
968. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes, Indictment of Vasco da Cruz, Domingos Alves, Guilhermino de Araújo, Napoleon dos Santos, Simâo Tasion, Lino Barreto and Cancio Lopes de Carvalho, 29 November 2004, at p. 6.
969. HRVD Statement 3670.
970. HRVD Statements 5177; 5155; 3699; 5151; 5148.
971. HRVD Statement 5155.
972. HRVD Statement 7399.
973. HRVD Statement 5535.
974. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004. The Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes vs Burhanuddin Siagian indictment (case number 2-2003), 3 February 2003.

975. HRVD Statements 4321; 5532; 5535.

976. HRVD Statements 4281; 4341.

977. HRVD Statements 4321; 4281; 4341; 5532; 5535; 4235. Deputy General Prosecutor vs Burhanuddin Siagian et al. Indictment, 3 February 2003.

978. HRVD Statements 8992; 5626.

979. HRVD Statements 2930, Community Profile of Abani Village, Passabe Sub-district, Oecussi, 10 September 2003.

980. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 184.

981. HRVD Statement 0354.

982. HRVD Statements 2930; 6888; 2852; 6895; 0326; 0378; 0401; 2931; 2622; 2921; 2622; 2935; 2947; 6832; 6840; 6899; 6898; 6890; 6897; 2934; 2848; 2957; 2950; 2953; 2930; 2936; 6884; 2851; 6837; 6892.

983. HRVD Statements 0337, 9183, 0093; 2857.

984. HRVD Statements 2852; 6888; 0336; 2614; 2957; 2637; 2852; 2950; 2947.

985. HRVD Statements 2921; 2935; 2947; 2934; 2950; 2930.

986. HRVD Statements 6890; 6897; 2848; 2936; 6884; 2851; 6837.

987. HRVD Statements 6892; 6898; 6840; 6832.

988. HRVD Statements 2851; 6892.

989. CAVR, Community Profile of Abani Village, Passabe Sub-district, Oecussi District, 10 September 2003.

990. HRVD Statements 2931; 2622; 2921; 2935; 2934; 2957; 2950.

991. HRVD Statements 6832; 6888; 6895; 6899; 6897; 6892; 6837; 2851.

992. HRVD Statements 6888; 2852; 6899.

993. HRVD Statements 2953; 2950; 2930; 6899; 2957.

994. HRVD Statements 6888; 2848; 6892; 6837; 2930.

995. HRVD Statement 0354.

996. HRVD Statement 4661.

997. HRVD Statements 5736; 5726.

998. Amnesty International, Indonesia (East Timor): Further information on Fear for Safety, AI Index: ASA 21/35/99, 26 April 1999.

999. HRVD Statements 3757; 0615; 6952.

1000. CAVR Community Profile of Ahic Village, Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District, 22 November 2002.

1001. HRVD Statement 0469.

1002. HRVD Statements 0471; 0404.

1003. HRVD Statement 0471.

1004. HRVD Statement 6697.

1005. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 184.

1006. HRVD Statement 1866.

1007. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 145.

1008. CAVR, Community Profiles of Opa and Daudet Villages, Lolotoe Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 14 July 2003.

1009. HRVD Statements 5641; 7127; 5580; 5639.

1010. The General Prosecutor of UNTAET, against João Franca da Silva et al. Indictment (Case No: 4a-2001), 25 May 2001.

1011. HRVD Statements 6428; 6393; F9425; 6429.

1012. See also HRVD Statement 6371.

1013. HRVD Statement 6405. See also HRVD Statements 6403; 6441.

1014. HRVD Statements 1754; 1747; 1719; 1755.

1015. HRVD Statement 7419.

1016. HRVD Statements 5824; 4850; 5790; 5753; 5752.

1017. Ibid.

1018. HRVD Statement 2576.
1019. HRVD Statement 6647.
1020. HRVD Statement 1833.
1021. HRVD Statement 5602.
1022. CAVR Community Profile of Laclo Village, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District, 16 June 2003.
1023. HRVD Statements 1325; 3688; 3670; 1260; 6912; 3508; 2957.
1024. HRVD Statements 0643; 5298; 7904.
1025. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 176.
1026. HRVD Statement 5298.
1027. HRVD Statements 3670; 3858.
1028. CAVR, Community Profile of Gildapil Aldeia, Lebos Village, Lolotoe Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 9 September 2003.
1029. CAVR Community Profile of Sabarai Village, Maliana Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 13 January 2003.
1030. CAVR, Community Profile of Saboria Village, Aileu Vila Sub-district, Aileu District, 14 March 2003.
1031. HRVD Statements 0225; 2868; 1954; 4652.
1032. HRVD Statement 0225.
1033. HRVD Statement 8204.
1034. HRVD Statement 1294.
1035. See: "Surat Pengembalian," [letter of return] July 8, 1999 (HRU Collection, Doc. BOB#9), OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 209.
1036. HRVD Statement 0227.
1037. HRVD Statement 3754.
1038. CAVR Community Profile of Ahic Village, Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District, 22 November 2002.
1039. HRVD Statement 7023.
1040. HRVD Statement 7203.
1041. HRVD Statement 6333.
1042. HRVD Statements 6994; 7007; 7009; 7010.
1043. HRVD Statements 2953; 2957; 7007; 7009.
1044. HRVD Statement 2957.
1045. HRVD Statement 7007.
1046. CAVR, Community Profile of Fohoren Village, Fohorem Sub-district, Covalima District, 22 January 2004; HRVD Statements 6272; 8933.
1047. Ibid.
1048. HRVD Statement 8933.
1049. HRVD Statements 3726; 4884; 4886; 5687; 0170; 3711; 0122.
1050. HRVD Statement 4837.
1051. HRVD Statement 8626.
1052. CAVR, Community Profile of Ahic Village, Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District, 22 November 2002.
1053. HRVD Statements 8738; 8743; 8734.
1054. HRVD Statement 0143.
1055. HRVD Statement 2412.
1056. HRVD Statement 7398, see also HRVD Statement 8958.
1057. HRVD Statement 2008; see also HRVD Statement 2676.
1058. HRVD Statements 8278, 6178, 4450, 4657, 4630, 0235, 3446, 5787, 3298, 4322, 7151, 4321, 1803, 8629, 5149, 1243, 7387, 5138, 7006, 6158, 7009, 3510, 7007.
1059. HRVD Statement 3510.
1060. HRVD Statements 1777; 0230; 6225; 2895; 5601; 0988; 4082; 7156; 6749; 2427; 1139; 5127; 2193.
1061. HRVD Statement 1777.
1062. HRVD Statements 4082; 6749; 1139; 5127.

1063. HRVD Statement 0988.

1064. HRVD Statement 5168.

1065. HRVD Statement 4667.

1066. HRVD Statements 2950-1, 0411, 4192-2, 5790, 5835, 1119, 7024, 6752-3, 0414-6&7, 5756, 4986, 3229, 7405-2, 4341-6, 5132, 3508, 4651, 0378-1, 0410, 1817.

1067. HRVD Statements 2950-1; 0411; 4192-2; 5835; 1119; 6752-3; 0414-6 & 7; 5756; 4986; 3229; 7405-2; 4341-6; 5132; 3508; 4651; 0378-1; 0410; 1817.

1068. HRVD Statement 8313.

1069. HRVD Statement 6279; 0091.

1070. HRVD Statement 8294.

1071. HRVD Statement 6751.

1072. HRVD Statement 0145.

1073. HRVD Statement 6272. See also HRVD Statement 8933.

1074. OHCHR submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 54.

1075. HRVD Statements 3670; 3858.

1076. HRVD Statement 6348.

1077. HRVD Statement 7418.

1078. HRVD Statement 3743.

1079. HRVD Statement 3769.

1080. HRVD Statement 7399.

Chega!

Part 7.5.

Violations of the Laws of War

Part 7.5. Violations of the Laws of War

Tables:

Graphic:

7.5. Violations of the Laws of War

Introduction

1. The mandate of the Commission required it to report on human rights violations, including violations of international humanitarian law. These laws are also sometimes referred to as the laws of war, or the laws of armed conflict.[1]

2. Many of the violations of international humanitarian law which occurred during the mandate period 1974-1999, were also violations of international human rights standards and have therefore been dealt with in other parts of this Report. The primary purpose of this part is to report on violations of the laws of war which are not covered in other parts. This includes the failure of combatants to protect civilians, prisoners of war, the wounded and other classes of protected persons, the failure to distinguish between military and civilian targets during military operations, forced recruitment, intentional destruction of civilian property, the use of illegal weapons such as chemical weapons, and other violations of the rules regarding the conduct of military operations.

3. This part relies extensively on primary source information gathered by the Commission in its process of taking statements and conducting Community Profile workshops in villages, and through in-depth interviews. Because violations of the laws of war, such as the killing or torture of civilians, are also violations of other international human rights standards, there is some degree of overlap between this part and other parts of the Report.

4. The evidence considered by the Commission in this and other parts provides a picture of widespread and systematic violations of the laws of war by the Indonesian security forces during the invasion of Timor-Leste and the subsequent years of occupation, including a programme of intimidation, violence and destruction related to the Popular Consultation in 1999.

5. Responsibility for violations cannot be equated between the Indonesian military (ABRI/TNI) and Fretilin/Falintil, although the actions of both armed forces resulted in a wide array of violations, causing immense suffering to the East Timorese civilian population. ABRI/TNI and their surrogate forces were clearly the primary perpetrator in this regard. Fretilin/Falintil caused suffering and deaths among civilians. Although they were in many cases extremely serious, the violations of Fretilin/Falintil constituted only a minor proportion of the total violations.

6. The general humanitarian obligations which apply to situations of internal armed conflict were violated by members of both Fretilin and UDT during the period of political conflict in 1975. These violations, such as killing, detention and torture of civilians and prisoners have been dealt with comprehensively in the respective parts on these subjects, and in Vol. IV, Part 8: Responsibility and Accountability. The events of the civil war have not therefore been referred to in detail in this part, although a brief overview follows (see in particular Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances and Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment and Part 7.8: The Rights of the Child).

7. On 11 August 1975, UDT launched an "attempted coup" referred to by many as the 11 of August Movement. The background and details of this armed action are considered in detail in Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict. Mário Lemos Pires, Portuguese Governor of Timor at the time, told the Commission that UDT seized power using guns taken from the Portuguese police.[2] The Fretilin leadership retreated to their headquarters in the hills of Aileu, south of Dili. UDT captured members of Fretilin in districts across the country and held them prisoner (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment). Attempts by the Portuguese administration at negotiating a settlement failed, and on 20 August Fretilin launched its counter-action, referred to by many in the community as the counter coup. Violence broke out in districts across the country for several weeks, and by late September Fretilin was in control of virtually the whole territory. Members of UDT, Apodeti, and the smaller parties Trabhalista and KOTA and their families, fled west to the border. Fretilin held hundreds of UDT members prisoner from this conflict, and in October also took members of Apodeti prisoner. Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment considers these circumstances in detail.

8. East Timorese who had fled to the border area came under the influence of the Indonesian military and intelligence agents, and many joined the Partisan troops who had been trained by the Indonesian military since late 1974. Cross border attacks commenced in late August, with the Indonesian military using these Partisan troops with regular Indonesian army troops.

9. On 15 October, the Indonesian military launched full-scale attacks with sea and air support, and occupied towns such as Batugade and Balibó (Bobonaro) in Timor-Leste. The attack on Balibó included the killing of 5 international journalists (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

10. With Indonesian troops occupying East Timorese towns as far east as Atabae (Bobonaro), the Portuguese authorities remaining on the island of Ataúro without responding to Fretilin pleas to return, and international talks between Portugal and Indonesia ignoring the reality of Indonesian troops occupying East Timorese towns, Fretilin became increasingly desperate for international intervention and support to protect the territory from foreign aggression. It unilaterally declared independence on 28 November 1975.

11. With the support of the Indonesian Parliament, the Indonesian military launched a full-scale invasion of Timor-Leste on 7 December 1975. The Fretilin leadership retreated to the interior. Large numbers of the civilian population either fled the attacking Indonesian military or were obliged by Fretilin to flee to the interior with them (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). These civilians later suffered terribly in the interior, during the war that ensued.

12. During the invasion, Indonesian armed forces committed violations of the laws of war in the execution of civilians in Dili on 7 and 8 December 1975 (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

13. During the large-scale military operations which followed across the territory, the Indonesian military failed to discriminate between civilians and combatants, using their massive military strength to kill large numbers of unarmed men, women and children. As well as being caught indiscriminately in the crossfire, civilian populations were specifically targeted in operations aimed at achieving their surrender from Fretilin/Falintil controlled areas (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). In very few instances were civilians given prior warning before the launch of military operations.

14. Members of ABRI/TNI routinely executed, tortured and raped civilians and prisoners who were captured or surrendered during the early years of attacks and resistance. The Indonesian military resorted to all available means to overcome resistance to the invasion and occupation. In the years 1976, 1977 and 1978 these violations were widespread and systematic. This included the systematic destruction and looting of civilian property, including buildings, homes and personal items, destruction of food sources, and use of weapons which are prohibited by the international laws governing armed conflict. The means employed included chemical weapons which poisoned water supplies, killed crops and other vegetation, and napalm bombs, whose effect was to indiscriminately burn everything and everyone within their range, including men, women and child civilians.

15. The Resistance led by Fretilin/Falintil in the early years after the invasion developed an ideological position of aiming to build a social revolution based on a transformation of the civilian population, which lived with the political and armed leadership in the interior (see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy). As Indonesian military offensives intensified and increasingly encroached on Fretilin-controlled areas, divisions developed in the Fretilin leadership. This resulted in a violent purge within the party in 1977. Fretilin/Falintil was responsible for violations such as the detention and torture of civilians and other prisoners such as Falintil members, and for summary executions of prisoners (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment). These were committed in an organised, systematic way.

16. After Indonesian military offensives destroyed the Fretilin/Falintil bases in the mountains (bases de apoio) in late 1978, causing massive suffering to the thousands of civilians living in these areas, the surviving political and military leadership of the Resistance undertook a major change in its strategy. This fundamentally changed the relationship between the armed resistance and the civilian population, large numbers of whom were initially held in transit camps and detention centres and who were later able to resettle into towns and villages. In the 1980s, a large clandestine structure and network was established to support the guerrilla armed resistance (see Vol I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy). During this period Fretilin/Falintil violated the laws of war by attacking civilian populations, burning houses and stealing foodstuffs from civilians believed to be working in collaboration with the Indonesian armed forces.[3]

17. Members of ABRI/TNI systematically undertook forced recruitment of civilians to take part in their military operations against the armed resistance. The largest single operation involved the forced recruitment of over 60,000 civilians during the months of Operation Kikis in 1981 (see section on forced recruitment below, par. 140 ff). In addition it was routine military practice to force civilians into service to carry weapons and ammunition and to cook, clean and care for the personal needs of military masters. Forced recruits, many of them children, were treated poorly and often subjected to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment.

18. In the years of occupation and resistance that followed, ABRI/TNI regularly conducted collective punishment of civilian populations, including killing, rape and torture of family members and civilians belonging to the same communities as individuals suspected of supporting Fretilin/Falintil. This widespread practice against civilians was especially harsh after Falintil conducted military operations against ABRI/TNI targets (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment).

19. Violations of the laws of war committed by members of Fretilin/Falintil include the execution of prisoners and killing of civilians, particularly those suspected of collaboration with the Indonesian military. Members of Fretilin/Falintil tortured and killed members of their own forces who disagreed with the policies of the Central Committee. They also burned houses of suspected collaborators, and looted their property (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances and Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment).

20. East Timorese women and girls who were held prisoners, or who were forced to work for members of ABRI/TNI, were routinely raped and forced into conditions of sexual slavery, including being "passed" from one officer to another at the end of periods of duty in the territory (see Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence).

21. As urban youth became increasingly involved in the Resistance in the late 1980s and early 1990s, and public demonstrations became a new feature of Resistance action, ABRI/TNI committed violations against civilians. The Santa Cruz Massacre was the most well-known example of the Indonesian military opening fire on unarmed civilians engaged in peaceful demonstration, causing large numbers of deaths and serious injuries (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

22. Throughout the 1990s ABRI/TNI was responsible for continuing practice of detention and torture of civilians, usually those suspected of involvement with the clandestine network of the Resistance. These practices were especially targeted at young people who became increasingly involved in the Resistance in this period. This included the killing and disappearance of those detained (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment; Vol. IV, Part 10: Acolhimento and Victim Support).

23. In late 1998 and early 1999, ABRI/TNI formed groups of armed militia across the territory. ABRI/TNI implemented a programme of systematic forced recruitment of thousands of young East Timorese men into these groups, in addition to those who had voluntarily joined (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict; Vol. IV, Part 9: Community Reconciliation). The Indonesian security forces and their proxy militias were responsible for a wide range of violations of the laws of war, including killing, rape, torture and the intentional massive destruction of civilian property across the territory after the ballot (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances and Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment and Part 7.7: Sexual Violence).

Relevant standards

24. The standards employed by the Commission in relation to the international laws of armed conflict are referred to in detail in the Annexe to Vol. I, Part 2: The Mandate of the Commission. Most of the legal principles relevant to the conflict in Timor-Leste are derived from the Geneva Conventions, to which Indonesia and Portugal were parties, and from customary international law. The most fundamental of these rules are reflected in four basic principles:[4]

1. Such force should only be used as is necessary for achieving a legitimate military objective (the principle of military necessity).
2. All actions taken must be in accordance with principles of humanity.*
3. Attacks must only be carried out against military targets, and in such a way as to minimise harm to civilians and civilian objects. Attacks must never be intentionally directed at civilians or civilian objects (the principle of distinction).
4. Where an attack may cause some incidental civilian casualties, the attack is only permitted if the harm to civilians and civilian objects is not excessive in relation to the military advantage to be gained (the principle of proportionality).

* The principle of humanity is most famously reflected in the Martens Clause contained in the Preamble to the Hague Convention (IV) Regarding the Laws and Customs of War on Land of 1907.

25. These standards applied to the Indonesian military forces. They also applied to Falintil, which could be recognised in international humanitarian law as a resistance movement as it complied generally with the requirements for such recognition: it had in place a command structure; its members generally distinguished themselves from civilians; they carried arms openly; and it conducted operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war.

26. Even in instances when the Commission has had full access to all factual evidence, it has not always been possible to distinguish between situations where civilians were directly and intentionally targeted, and other circumstances where civilians were killed or injured in fighting that did not deliberately target them. In many military operations examined by the Commission throughout this Report, the Commission has found that attacks were indiscriminate in their impact on civilians, or disproportionate to the military necessity, and therefore constituted violations of the laws of war. In particular, the evidence outlined in this part and referenced to more detailed analysis in the relevant parts of this Report, demonstrates that ABRI/TNI systematically ignored and deliberately violated its obligations to protect East Timorese civilians under the Geneva Conventions to which the Republic of Indonesia was party.

Violations of the laws of war by Indonesian military forces

Attacks on civilians and civilian properties

27. International laws of armed conflict provide clearly that attacks must not be targeted at civilians, civilian objects or undefended towns or buildings.[5] It is also prohibited to carry out acts with the primary purpose of spreading terror among the civilian population.[6]

28. Attacks must not be carried out in ways or using weapons that make it impossible to distinguish between civilian and military targets.[7]

29. Incidental civilian casualties and damage to civilian objects that are caused by an attack on a military objective are permitted only so long as they are not disproportionate in relation to the military necessity of the attack.[10] Attacks should be carried out in such a way as to minimise civilian casualties and damage to civilian objects.[9] Wherever possible, advance warning should be given to civilians of attacks that may harm the civilian population.[10]

30. This sub-section will focus on violations of the laws of war by ABRI/TNI in the early years of the conflict.

31. From August 1975, ABRI/TNI carried out cross border attacks in Timor-Leste, which included the killings of civilians and the destruction of civilian property (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). On 15-16

October 1975, the Indonesian armed forces intensified operations, including large-scale air and sea bombardments inside Timor-Leste. These attacks caused civilian casualties and destruction of civilian property.

32. Full-scale invasion began on 7 December 1975, with combined land, air and sea attacks first on Dili and then Baucau. These attacks expanded to the districts of Bobonaro, Ermera, Manufahi, and Covalima. They caused many civilian deaths, mass displacement and widespread destruction of public and private property. During these initial attacks unarmed civilians were directly targeted by ABRI forces in summary executions, and there was generally a failure to distinguish between civilian and military targets.

33. The use of heavy machine guns, bazookas, grenades, mortars, and artillery in both urban and rural settings inevitably resulted in heavy civilian casualties. It is often unclear as to whether these attacks were targeted or indiscriminate. The Commission received significant evidence from statements collected across the territory that indicate strongly that the invading Indonesian military employed a policy which involved the systematic destruction and looting of houses, livestock and crops, as well as the deliberate killing of civilians.[11] José da Silva Amaral told the Commission of the deliberate destruction of food sources by ABRI/TNI during their attack on Osso-Gori, Uaibobo (Ossu, Viqueque) in 1976:

> When ABRI attacked Ossu in the dry season in 1976, my wife Ceverina, my son Arlindo and I were in Basilau, Osso-Gori, in the village of Uaibobo. We fled to Mount Builo, Ossorua. ABRI entered Ossu and continued their advance. They built a post near my land in Loilubu, Ossurua. During a patrol, they burned my house in Basilau. ABRI abandoned the post after about a month. When I found out that ABRI had left, a brother-in-law, Patricio, and I returned to see my coconut trees. They were all destroyed. ABRI cut down all the banana trees to build a post. They also cut down all 300 coconut trees. Only one tree was left intact.[12]

34. In addition to being targets and suffering from indiscriminate attacks, civilians were also severely punished by ABRI/TNI if they were suspected of assisting Fretilin/Falintil forces. This punishment varied according to circumstances and the individuals involved. Lobato Amaral, a young Falintil soldier, told the Commission that his older brother, Leonardo Freitas, and 11 civilians were captured and killed by ABRI/TNI in Bobonaro because they were suspected of providing food for him and other Falintil soldiers in 1979.[13]

35. Any suspicion of contact with people who had fled into the forest, whether or not they were part of Fretilin/Falintil forces, could result in retribution by ABRI/TNI. In 1977, for example, Frederico Gonçalves from Atabae (Bobonaro) reported that his livestock was confiscated by members of the Halintar militia who suspected him of maintaining links with his brother in the forest.[14]

36. During the early period of the invasion there was fierce fighting in many areas, as Fretilin/Falintil forces frustrated the advance of Indonesian forces. The Commission received a number of reports of brutal retribution from Indonesian troops against civilians after they had captured a particular location. In the village of Leimea Kraik (Atsabe, Ermera), for example, ABRI/TNI deliberately burned houses with their owners inside them.[15] Non-violent resistance from civilians was also often met with lethal force, contributing to widespread fear and panic as tens of thousands fled into the hills and forests in search of protection and sanctuary. The Commission received a large number of reports to this effect from across the country, indicating the vulnerability of East Timorese civilians to the advancing Indonesian military through to the end of 1978.[16]

37. Although many sought protection and refuge in the areas controlled by Fretilin/Falintil forces, this respite proved to be only temporary as the Indonesian forces attempted to consolidate the occupation. Agustino Soares told the Commission:

> I was 17 when we evacuated to the forest in Katrai Leten, at the foot of Mount Ramelau. I hid there with 10 family members. Thousands of villagers gathered in Katrai Leten, including those coming from Letefoho, Ermera, Ainaro, Aileu and Cailaco.
>
> Katrai Leten was the second largest Fretilin base in Ermera after Fatubesse, so it was safe there. Fretilin troops guarded us from the enemy, while we stayed behind and grew food crops to feed us…In Katrai Leten, deaths due to starvation or illness were rare.
>
> But two years later, in 1978, the Indonesian military attacked our base in Katrai Leten, forcing us to move from Katrai Leten to other locations. ABRI troops came from Atsabe, Ainaro, Same and Bobonaro, and completely encircled us, isolating us at our base in Katrai Leten, before they [ABRI] attacked simultaneously.
>
> ABRI fired their mortars, bazookas and cannons. From above, the planes dropped bombs on us. The bombs did not burn us, but the shrapnel killed many people because they couldn't find a good place to hide. ABRI attacks destroyed our resistance base in Katrai Leten on 18 May 1978.[17]

38. Across Timor-Leste, entire communities were forced to stay on the move. The Commission heard testimony of a similar pattern of experiences, culminating in death, capture or surrender from communities and individuals across the country. The experiences of the community of the village of Muapitine (Lospalos, Lautém) illustrates this pattern. When ABRI/TNI forces landed on Com Beach in February 1976 and began shooting at civilians, local residents fled into the hills. For two years, they stayed together, moving from place to place. During 1977-1978, 155 Muapitine villagers died of starvation, while a further seven died during an ABRI/TNI attack in 1978. As in so many other areas, by late 1978 the remaining villagers of Muapitine began to surrender to ABRI/TNI.[18]

39. The Commission obtained testimony outlining incidents in which ABRI/TNI commanders deliberately failed to protect civilians from abuse, or to discriminate between civilians and armed Fretilin/Falintil troops. A former East Timorese ABRI/TNI soldier who was based in Same during 1977, told the Commission that before launching operations around Mount Kablaki members of Kodim and the local civil defence forces (Hansip) in Manufahi were instructed by the Kodim commander to kill anyone they encountered during the operation, regardless of whether they were civilians or Fretilin/Falintil soldiers:

> During an operation in Kablaki in 1977, soldiers and Hansip came from two directions, Ainaro and Same, and formed a full circle to prevent Falintil and civilians hiding on the mountain. The attack on Kablaki was simultaneous and the Kodim commander told us that whoever we encounter, whether civilians or Falintil, there should be no mercy, [we should] shoot on the spot or, if necessary, arrest them.
>
> When we arrived at the top of Mount Kablaki, we saw a group of five or six people and we shot them. We did not know whether they were civilians or Falintil. [Some] fled, and we could only find abandoned items, such as bags of food supplies that they had left behind. Then we continued the operation back to Same via Rotuto.[19]

40. The same former soldier described another incident during operations around Same aimed at finding Falintil and civilians who were still hiding in the forest, in which an old lady found by soldiers in a hut in a deserted village was executed by a Hansip member.[20]

41. Indonesian military advances and attacks against communities in territories it did not control continued throughout 1978. Predictably, civilians continued to bear the brunt of these attacks. Maria José da Costa described the experience of her community around the area of Dolok in the southern district of Manufahi to the Commission:

> In 1978 the enemy surrounded us in Dolok and many people died due to starvation. All the food supplies…were burnt. They surrounded us by attacking from the sea with warships, from the air with warplanes and on land by burning the dry grass and sending in the army. At that time it was August, which is the dry season. The army made big fast-burning fires by spraying gasoline over the tall grass. Many died because they could not escape the fire surrounding us.[21]

42. The Indonesian military had incorrectly predicted that it's overwhelming firepower could secure its occupation of Timor-Leste relatively swiftly. When this did not occur and Indonesian forces were bogged down, with Fretilin/Falintil forces living with a large civilian population in parts of the territory in the interior, the Indonesian military launched a massive offensive against these resistance bases. In 1978, these attacks became known as the campaign of encirclement and annihilation, and caused vast casualties among the civilian population in these bases. The fact that so many civilians lived with Fretilin/Falintil forces in these bases may have contributed to difficulties in distinguishing between civilians and combatants. However, the evidence presented to the Commission provides a clear picture of an ABRI/TNI military campaign in which there was little consideration of the principle of the protection of civilians or the need to discriminate between civilians and combatants. The attacks across the territory appeared to be based on the assumption that anyone, insurgent or civilian, who resided outside of the area under the control of the Indonesian military was a legitimate target (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killing and Enforced Disappearance and Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

43. The Commission heard similar testimony from many parts of the country, as individuals and entire communities tried desperately to stay ahead of the advancing Indonesian military. Many spent between three and four years on the run, moving from location to location, living in dire circumstances that resulted in the steady loss of individual lives and even entire families.[22] The communities of the villages of Aiassa and Malilait, in the sub-district of Bobonaro (Bobonaro) told the Commission:

> In January 1976, the Indonesian military entered the sub-district of Bobonaro. Continuous ground and aerial attacks forced civilians to flee to Lour. Villagers did not take much food. We stayed in Holba, Anapal for about one year growing food crops and rice. While waiting for the harvest, we ate edible roots. At harvest time, ABRI/TNI and the Partisans forced people to move from Holba to Fatuleto and abandoned their gardens and fields unharvested. People stayed in Fatuleto for one year, but they had to keep moving, first to Molop, and then to Dikehili, where many died from wounds sustained during aerial attacks, or from illnesses and starvation.
>
> In 1978, once again people had to flee to Halik after…aerial attacks from 7.00am to 9.00am claimed seven lives, and [there were] other deaths due to starvation, illnesses and poisoning after eating vegetables.
>
> When there was nowhere else to go, villagers gradually surrendered to Battalion 507 in 1979.[23]

44. The Commission received 247 statements from the district of Baucau alone reporting 278 cases of attacks on civilians and civilian targets throughout the period of Operation Seroja in the 1970s. Similar reports were received from Aileu, in which 97 civilian deaths and the destruction of civilian targets during ABRI/TNI operations were recorded.

45. Civilians also died as a result of starvation, after their livestock and food supplies were destroyed or stolen, or having fled with little or no supplies to sustain them. During the same period, increasing pressure on life in the zonas libertadas due to ABRI/TNI operations caused great hardship and loss of life among the civilian population living in these areas. Movement was initially restricted within these zones, and later civilians were forced to be constantly on the move to escape ABRI/TNI attacks, and so unable to grow and harvest crops (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

46. For Fretilin/Falintil, the precariousness of their situation was of paramount concern. Restricting civilian movements was a direct consequence of the need to secure and maintain a measure of physical geographical control. Such impositions were not only applied by Fretilin/Falintil political and military cadres. Harsh, even brutal measures were sometimes self-imposed by ordinary civilians who were intent on survival. Remaining undetected in the forest, for example, often presented life or death choices. Adriano João was a Fretilin political assistant (adjunto) in the Cailaco Zone, and described to the Commission the desperate measures taken by ordinary people to survive during this period:

> [In Purugua] I saw a father choke his four-year-old son to death because he kept crying. Then, there was a consensus amongst villagers that whoever revealed their position to ABRI should be eliminated, including children. We almost had to throw away our own 18-month-old baby because he kept crying.[24]

47. Once the Indonesian military had located a concentration of fighters or civilians in a particular area, the usual practice was to bombard the location with heavy armaments. These attacks were often indiscriminate and lethal. In 1978, for example, aerial and naval bombardments caused 100 deaths among the village population of Aidantuik (Suai, Covalima) who had sought refuge in Beco (Suai, Covalima).[25]

48. The Fretilin/Falintil base at Mount Matebian (Baucau and Viqueque Districts) in the east, became one of the final centres of resistance in 1978 as ABRI/TNI attacks overran the Fretilin/Falintil bases de apoio. Following the invasion, in early 1976, Fretilin/Falintil forces evacuated many civilians from the eastern districts of Baucau, Viqueque and Lautém to the mountain. Many East Timorese civilians fled to the mountain from Indonesian military attacks in the early years after the invasion. By 1978, it had become one of the last major places of refuge. As military advances overran other bases, Fretilin/Falintil forces and civilians fell back to the Matebian base. In response, between August and October that year the Indonesian military launched devastating ground, air and naval attacks against those on the mountain. Armindo da Silva, who sought refuge on the mountain at the time, told the Commission:

> When my family and I were in Matahoi in Uatolari [Viqueque], I heard that ABRI/TNI was about to attack Osso Lero at the foot of Mount Matebian, in Baguia. Many civilians from Ossu died during ABRI's indiscriminate aerial bombings and mortar attacks from Quelicai [Baucau]...My cousin Januario da Silva, aged 20, my mother, Paeloi… and the liurai of Uaibobo were hit by the bombs and died.[26]

49. The mountain refuge was encircled by ABRI/TNI and a systematic campaign to force the surrender of all on the mountain began. Many of the communities that the Commission engaged with reported on the death and destruction that accompanied the ABRI/TNI assault.[27] The Commission received reports of several thousand people being killed or injured before permission was finally given by Fretilin/Falintil commanders on 22 November 1978 to surrender (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances and Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

The bombs came from the sky, or the coast and the ground

The community of the village of Defawassi, in the sub-district of Baguia in the mountain area of Matebian in Baucau, told the Commission of their experiences as the Indonesian military conducted its final assault on the mountain in late 1978:

1978 was the year the Indonesian army, navy, airborne units (Paskhas) and Police Mobile Units (Brimob) attacked, by encircling Mount Matebian. They made a ring formation around the mountain. Villagers from Defawassi, Viqueque, Baucau and Lospalos were inside the circle. This "fence" tightened every day while more and more civilians were trapped on Mount Matebian.

The Indonesian military used this opportunity to attack people, using ground fires. They attacked with cannons, bazookas, mortars and rockets, as well as aerial bombings and naval attacks bombardments. These incessant attacks destroyed water springs, and left no chance to prepare food. They created a chaotic situation.

Many people died from the bombings or due to starvation or when they got lost on the mountain. Villagers also died of bullet wounds from automatic weapons and the bombardments. An estimated 100 people of all ages, male or female, from our village of Defawassi died on Mount Matebian. From 2 October until 28 November 1978, the people of Defawassi returned to Baguia Town from the mountain.[28]

50. The escalation of ABRI/TNI assaults during 1978 led to a further deterioration of conditions for civilians in the interior, which in turn forced more civilians to surrender to ABRI/TNI. Others remained constantly on the run from attacks until they were eventually captured or forced to surrender.[29] The final mass civilian surrender took place after the fall of the Mount Matebian base in November 1978, after Fretilin/Falintil gave the order to surrender (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

51. The situation upon capture or surrender was grim. The Indonesian military separated those they identified as Fretilin/Falintil, many of whom were executed or disappeared (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). Other civilians were held first in transit camps, then in detention centres and later were resettled in areas under ABRI/TNI control. Food and medicines were inadequate for these massive numbers of civilians effectively held in detention, and thousands died of starvation and disease in perhaps the most tragic years of Timor-Leste's history. Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine examines these tragic events and the human rights violations associated with them. Communities across the country recounted their experiences during this period to the Commission. For example, communities in Liquidoe (Aileu), Remexio (Aileu) and Metinaro (Dili) recalled the large number of civilian deaths after surrender to Indonesian forces due to starvation and disease in camps.[30]

52. Although assaults on civilians and civilian targets subsided markedly following the culmination of Operation Seroja in 1979, civilians continued to be targeted and adversely affected as a result of on-going counter-insurgency tactics by ABRI/TNI throughout the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste.

53. During Operation Kikis in 1981, for example, the Commission received a number of reports about ABRI executions of both surrendering civilians and civilians who had been forced to join the operation. The community of the village of Orlalan Batara (Laclubar, Manatuto) described their experience of being forced to join the operation:

> After receiving orders from Manatuto and Dili to prepare civilians to join Operation Kikis, the Laclubar Koramil commander ordered the Village Heads from six villages to select strong civilians to join the operation, excepting only children and the elderly. All schools were closed. Civilians were only allowed to carry knives, spears, arrows, bamboo drums. Each person had to have a black ribbon tied to their head as a marker, and each person had to carry their own food rations. Each village had a leader. Civilians were forced to walk from 6.00am to find Falintil and civilians still living in the forest. When they found them, they had to kill them, so that the war could finish quickly.
>
> In Fatuhada [Laclubar, Manatuto], there was an armed clash between Battalion 744 and Falintil, which claimed the lives of 15 Falintil members and 50 civilians who surrendered to Battalion 744. There was a pregnant woman stabbed in the stomach, killing the baby instantly. Then the dead bodies were cut up and buried.
>
> During the operation, soldiers from Battalion 744 who suspected villagers in Laclubar of working with Fretilin, ordered the villagers to burn all food crops to prevent Fretilin making use of them and to force their quick surrender. The order came with a threat of execution for refusal to comply. During the 40 days of the advance, one villager from Laclubar died of an untreated illness and another villager was shot by an ABRI soldier in Aitana. The soldier claimed that he had mistaken the person for someone else. Then villagers returned to their villages in Laclubar.[31]

54. Albino da Costa, former Falintil soldier, told the Commission:

> I witnessed with my own eyes how the Indonesian military, Battalion 744, killed civilians. They captured those unarmed people, tied them up then stabbed them to death. There was a pregnant woman captured and killed just like that. I saw it from a close distance, just 100 metres from where it happened.[32]

55. When the advance reached the area of Lacluta (Viqueque) in September 1981, a massacre occurred that according to several accounts killed hundreds of people. While Indonesia claimed a military victory in this area during this time, citing the capture of 450 Fretilin members and 150 weapons, Monsignor da Costa Lopes, Catholic Apostolic Administrator of Timor-Leste at the time, claimed that 500 people had been killed (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). Indonesian authorities admitted 70.[33] Others place the toll in the hundreds.[34] While a definitive account of the incident does not exist, including the detail of whether those killed were combatants or civilians, most sources describe this as a brutal massacre of civilians (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

56. The 1983 uprising by East Timorese members of Hansip and Ratih against the Indonesian military in Kraras (Viqueque, Viqueque) is one of the most notorious cases of ABRI/TNI retaliation against the civilian population (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). The uprising was coordinated closely with Falintil. After killing 12 members of the Zipur 4 Engineering Battalion, the members of Hansip and Ratih defected to Falintil with their weapons. The civilian population were left vulnerable. Many fled to the surrounding forest and mountains fearing retribution. The Indonesian military carried out a terrible act of collective punishment against this civilian population who had not been involved in the attack against their forces.

57. A series of massacres of the civilian population of the area followed. On 7 September, ABRI/TNI soldiers entered the village of Kraras and killed 4 or 5 civilians, including one old woman. They then burned most of the houses in the village. The bodies of several of those killed were left in the burning houses.[35] In the following weeks Indonesian soldiers conducted patrols throughout the neighbouring mountains in order to force those who had fled to return to the villages of Kraras and Buicaren, and to the town of Viqueque. The Commission received reports that a number of individuals were executed during these operations, including a 15 year old boy on or about 12 September, and three other individuals on 15 September.[36] During this time a large number of people were also detained and tortured, many at Olobai, where one company from the 745th Infantry Battalion was based.

58. The Commission was told by survivors that on the morning of 16 September, Indonesian soldiers and Hansip took a large group of civilians, including women and children, to the village of Caraubalo. The villagers were taken to a location called Welamo where they were told to stand in a hole created by a landslide, and they were then executed by the soldiers and members of Hansip.[37] The Commission has compiled a list of the names of 54 victims executed at Caraubalo.

59. On 17 September, Indonesian soldiers approached a large group of civilians from Kraras who had fled to the nearby village of Buicaren. The village was surrounded and those from Kraras were detained. The men were separated from the women and were told that they would be marched to Kraras under the supervision of the military to bring food. According to evidence received by the Commission between 6 and 8 Indonesian soldiers and two East Timorese Hansip escorted dozens of men to the Wetuku river in an area known as Tahuben. They were then shot. Only four people are reported to have survived the massacre. There are conflicting reports about the number of victims killed at Tahuben, with figures ranging from a low of 26 to a high of 181.[*] The Commission has received the names of 141 victims, all of whom were male.[†]

Economic and property violations – collateral damage or deliberate strategy?

60. In terms of the laws of war, civilian property[‡] can only be destroyed justifiably when its destruction is necessary and proportionate to achieving military objectives.[38]

61. Information gathered by the Commission indicates that the destruction and theft of property was itself a central military objective, and not a collateral effect of the attacks. The Commission received statements about 1,256 cases of the burning and destruction of homes, destruction of livestock and crops, stealing and looting of property. Although much of this destruction came about because of indiscriminate attacks, there is also considerable evidence that civilians who were suspected to be pro-independence were deliberately targeted by ABRI/TNI in violations of such economic rights, at different periods of the conflict ranging from the earliest days of the invasion through to the destruction after the ballot in September 1999.

62. Analysis of statements made to the Commission indicates that violations of civilian property and economic rights were invariably accompanied by other direct violations to civilians such as arrests, detention, torture or killing.

* CAVR Interviews with: António Soares, (undated) who cited 79 killed; Miguel Viana, Viqueque, 17 July 2003, who cited 181 killed; Silvino das Dores Soares, Viqueque, 10 March 2004, who cited 143; Manuel de Jesus Pinto, Buicaren, Viqueque, 20 March 2004, who said that he counted 82 bodies.

† The list of victims from this massacre is also included in full in Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances.

‡ Article 52, Additional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions, which is also recognised as customary law. See J. Henckaerts and L. Doswald-Beck, ICRC's Customary International Humanitarian Law, Vol I: Rules, (2005) pp. 25-26.

63. Violations of economic and property rights were an integral component of Indonesia's military policy during this period. They were employed for a number of reasons, including punishment, the destruction of resource bases and the institution of a system whereby collaborators would be rewarded materially by forcefully diverting the property of political opponents to them.

64. The nature and extent of the destruction of civilian property during the invasion and its aftermath bear a striking similarity to the events of September 1999, when a "scorched earth" policy led to the TNI and its agent militias burning and destroying approximately 60,000 houses and the majority of government infrastructure in Timor-Leste in just a few weeks.[39]

1975–1977

65. The Commission collected evidence of deliberate theft and property destruction by Indonesian forces from the start of the invasion. A former member of UDT who joined the East Timorese Partisan forces who assisted ABRI/TNI in the full-scale of the invasion, Rui Emeliano Teixeira Lopes, described the looting by Indonesian soldiers:

> On the morning of 7 December 1975, Kopassus [known as RPKAD back then], Ranger, Kujang, Kostrad and Marines landed in Dili. We stayed on the ship. We saw fire spreading and we heard gunfire, but we didn't land because they didn't need us. When we headed for Baucau, we just saw that ABRI took people's cars and suitcases and loaded them onto the ship. We didn't like what we saw at all. Were we in a war or in a robbery? This kind of theft did not only happen in Dili [and Baucau], but also in Balibó and at the Maliana Hospital.[40]

66. Partisans were accused of widespread destruction and looting in Baucau.[41] Comparable accounts were also recorded in the districts of Liquiçá,[42] Ermera,[43] Viqueque,[44] Lautém,[45] and Bobonaro from this period.[46]

67. Following the initial invasion, Indonesian forces sought to consolidate and expand their territorial control. The Commission received reports of theft and the destruction of property from across Timor-Leste during the ABRI/TNI advance, from its Community Profile workshops, including from communities in the districts of Bobonaro (in Atabae and Lolotoe), in Aileu, in Baucau (in Baguia, Quelicai, Venilale, Vemasse), in Viqueque (in Lacluta, Ossu, Uato Carbau, Vemasse) and in Manatuto (in Uaimori). Upon taking charge of a new location, ABRI/TNI forces regularly confiscated or destroyed property, effectively dispossessing and rendering homeless the owners and occupants. Homesteads and other properties were burnt, unharvested crops were destroyed and large herds of livestock were slain. In some locations, the uma lulik (sacred house of a clan) and its contents were destroyed.[47] Such gratuitous destruction was indicative of a deliberate intention to undermine East Timorese culture and identity.

68. In many areas, civilians had already fled to the surrounding hills and forests before the Indonesians forces arrived. With their properties undefended, ABRI/TNI had effective carte blanche to destroy or steal whatever property they wished.

69. These practices continued relentlessly over the first years of the occupation. The Indonesian military openly admitted this behaviour as part of its standard military practice:

> Operation Pamungkas V, on 6 to 7 March 1978, with the objective of freeing the people in SAS MAUBU [who were] held captive by GPK [ed: Falintil], [was conducted] with the force of 2 Ki [companies] together with Hansip and Danpur-12. The results achieved were 3 people surrendered, 8 houses burned down and 2.5 hectares of cornfield was destroyed.[48]

70. ABRI/TNI was assisted in its offensive actions by a number of surrogate forces, including Partisans, and later civil defence structures such as Hansip and militia groups such as Halintar in the district of Bobonaro. The Commission received numerous reports of the involvement of these proxy or surrogate forces in property theft, either in concert with ABRI/TNI or acting unilaterally.

71. The Commission received numerous reports about the theft of livestock and harvested crops. In addition, valued possessions, including items of cultural importance and financial value such as tais (woven cloth), beads and silver coins were also stolen. Domingos da Costa da Silva of Fatuberliu, Manufahi, told the Commission of the theft of a large amount of valuable traditional items:

> In 1976 we ran to the forest and hid in a place called Orboa in the aldeia of Orlara, until 1978. At one time, a group of members of Hansip came with their leader, L1. They captured my brother, João da Costa, and beat and pulled him like an animal. They also took all of our property including 15 mortens*, 7* belaks*, 7* caibauks*, 15* fucadors*, 30* osan manu liras*, 25 necklaces, 10* sasakis*, 2* loku liman*, 10* buti liman*,* 4 golden combs and 2 murak bulu ayams.* These things were taken by the perpetrators and we were left with nothing but bruises.[49]

72. The extent of the reports to the Commission of continuing widespread looting and stealing by Indonesian troops indicates that it must have been known and supported by the senior military hierarchy. Certainly the use of foodstuffs from stolen property eased the need for essential support for the Indonesian troops. Available livestock also provided an opportunity for additional income generation for members of ABRI/TNI. The Indonesian military used East Timorese civilian property as an essential element in the support of their military operations. João Pinto Dias told the Commission:

* Morten: necklace made of orange, stone beads; belak: a circular silver breastplate hung from the neck with strong cotton; caibauks: horns made from gold or silver tied to head with strong cotton; fucadors: a heavy silver or gold wrist chain; osan manu liras: large antique portuguese silver coins; sasakis: (?) loku liman: an upper arm brace made of gold or silver; buti liman: a thin silver bangle; murak bulu ayam: feathered headdress.

> In 1976, I had 12 horses. Commander of Kombet, L2 [East Timorese] and his men took my horses. Some of them were shot dead, some were eaten and some were sold. I had more than 40 buffaloes, but Commander L2 and L3 [East Timorese] with his men shot some of them and the rest were taken to be sold in Batugade to people from Atambua.[50]

73. Property theft and destruction also often followed the execution of civilians. António Soares told the Commission of the murder of his uncle, the burning of his house and the theft of his property by members of Hansip in the village of Esa-isi (Ossu, Viqueque):

> The Hansips led by L18 with two of his members, L4 and L5 patrolled Esa-isi. They saw Uncle Cristovão and killed him [shot him to death]. Then they burned down our house and took our livestock of 40 buffaloes, 31 horses and 58 goats, as well as 5 barns of rice.[51]

74. Jacinto Olo Mau said that in 1975 ABRI from Battalion 501 attacked Lahomea (Maliana, Bobonaro) and killed his parents, Bere Soro and Bui Bere. After his parents were killed, and with the house empty, soldiers from the battalion took the opportunity to loot the possessions of victims, after which they burned down the house with the bodies of the victims inside. Jacinto Olo Mau told the Commission:

> After both my parents were killed and the house was empty, the perpetrators used the opportunity to break in and take everything that belonged to the victims, after which they set the house on fire with the victims' bodies still inside.[52]

75. The theft of livestock and destruction of crops had direct consequences, as people in many parts of the country suffered from acute food shortages, resulting in widespread hunger and starvation. Reports of hunger and starvation as a result of ABRI/TNI destruction were received from a number of locations including Cailaco and Lolotoe (Bobonaro) and Zumalai (Covalima). Alfredo Moniz Soares reflected to the Commission:

> In 1977, when ABRI attacked and there was no opportunity to look for food, many members of my family died of starvation and lack of medicines. Additionally, the perpetrators [ABRI] also burned our homes and seized our livestock.[53]

1978–1979

76. When massive numbers of civilians came down from the mountains and surrendered to the Indonesian military in 1977-78, they were not generally allowed to return immediately to their home areas. Held first in transit camps, many continued to be held in ABRI/TNI-controlled detention centres or resettlement villages for years (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). When they did return to their places of origins many found their villages and homes had been looted and burned. While the Fretilin/Falintil bases had been destroyed and the form of armed resistance had been fundamentally altered, the war was not over and it continued to have a critical impact on all aspects of civilians' lives. The civilian population no longer lived with the armed resistance in the interior, but during this period were held in conditions of intense control by the Indonesian military whose objective was to ensure that the civilian population was not able to contact and support the Resistance. Surveillance, intelligence gathering and severe control of civilian movement were day to day realities for most civilians in these ABRI/TNI controlled camps. ABRI/TNI continued to destroy crops and steal property as a form of punishment, intimidation and economic opportunism. Many people held in the camps were subjected to beatings and other physical violations by the Indonesian armed forces.[54]

77. A known past association with Fretilin invariably resulted in being targeted by the Indonesian military. East Timorese aligned with the occupying forces were also able to take advantage of the situation. José António told the Commission that former members of UDT took his land during 1979, in Beikala, (Hato Udo, Ainaro) because of his background as a Fretilin member.[55] Another deponent told the Commission that he was arrested by the ABRI/TNI in March 1979, tortured in connection with Fretilin activities and then forced to surrender his coffee plantation.[56] Others continued to be targeted because of suspected links to resistance fighters who remained in the forest.

78. Reports of theft and the confiscation of property by Indonesian security forces from those surrendering were received from the districts of Bobonaro,[57] Baucau (in the sub-districts of Laga,[58] Vemasse,[59] Quelicai[60] and Baguia[61]), Manufahi,[62] Manatuto,[63] Covalima,[64] Ermera,[65] Viqueque[66] and Oecussi.[67] In some cases this was accompanied by beatings and torture.[68]

79. In Lautém, renewed efforts by ABRI/TNI in 1979 to locate Fretilin/Falintil forces resulted in further civilian deaths.[69] Maria Alves surrendered to the Indonesian military in 1979 in the old town of Fatuberliu (Fatuberliu, Manufahi). She told the Commission of the destruction of her property:

> I was ordered by ABRI and Hansip L6 and L19, to build a house and make a paddy field. After building the house and making the field, I was told to move again to Sukaer Laletek by the Sub-district administrator, L7 [East Timorese], and ABRI. Then the crops I planted such as papaya and cassava were destroyed. The house I built was also destroyed.[70]

1980s

80. By the end of 1979, there were only a few locations in a few districts that remained under Fretilin/Falintil control. In the early 1980s, while some civilians remained in resettlement camps under the direct control of the Indonesian military much of the civilian population had returned to their homes. During this period ABRI/TNI had developed a territorial capacity which ensured that there were military posts based in villages across the entire territory. Civilians lived under close scrutiny by ABRI/TNI and the East Timorese auxiliaries such as Hansip and Babinsa (see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation).

81. The numbers of reported economic violations received by the Commission were considerably less for this period than the preceding four years. Between 1980 and 1989, ABRI/TNI operations were focused on destroying the remaining Fretilin/Falintil forces, and often concentrated in specific areas of the country to carry out this campaign.

82. In mid-1981, the Indonesian military launched Operation Kikis,* as noted in the section on Indonesian military attacks on civilians and civilian objects, above. The Commission received reports that during these operations, ABRI/TNI and members of Hansip continued to burn houses, steal livestock and property, and destroy crops and other food supplies.[71] The Commission, for example, received 43 reports of civilian homes being burned in the village of Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) between 20 and 24 August 1982 by ABRI/TNI and members of Hansip.

83. As Indonesia consolidated its control over the territory, it began to focus its actions and attention on specific locations, communities and individuals thought to be linked to the Resistance. Efforts by the Indonesian military to close down clandestine activities supporting the Resistance resulted in widespread intimidation and repression. Across the country arrests, beatings and torture continued to be accompanied by theft and the destruction of property.[72]

84. As ABRI/TNI attempted to exert control over civilian populations who had returned to their home areas, they relied heavily on their East Timorese auxiliaries such as Hansip and Babinsa. Conditions were very repressive for civilian communities and at times there were tensions between members of ABRI/TNI and their East Timorese auxiliaries. There were several internal rebellions from these auxiliary forces in the early 1980s, which resulted in harsh retribution against the civilian population by ABRI/TNI. In August 1983, following a mass desertion of civil defence Hansip and Ratih members from ABRI/TNI in Tutuala (Lautém), the Indonesian military retaliated by killing scores of livestock owned by the families of the renegade auxiliaries.[73]

85. The collective punishment meted out by ABRI/TNI against the civilian population of Kraras (Lacluta, Viqueque) in September 1983, reported in the section on Indonesian military attacks on civilians and civilian objects, above, also included acts of destruction of property. Houses were burned and livestock killed by members of the Indonesian military in retribution for the revolt by East Timorese Hansip and Ratih. The social and economic impact of these actions and the large-scale massacre of the men of the village continues to disadvantage this community to the current day.

* In Timor-Leste it was known as Operasi Kikis. This was the short name for a military tactic known as Operasi Saber Kikis Baratayudha (named after a mythical war in the world of Javanese shadow puppets), also known as Operation "Fence of Legs". It was a technique of using tens of thousands of civilians as a human shield that literally moved in front of ABRI forces in a massive coordinated effort to flush out Fretilin/Falintil forces. This technique was first used during the Darul Islam insurgency in the 1950s. See for example Ken Conboy, KOPASSUS, Inside Indonesia's Special Forces, Equinox Publishing (Asia), Jakarta, 2003, pp. 297-8. See also Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine.

86. Across the country throughout the 1980s the Indonesian military operational objectives were aimed at breaking the clandestine network between Falintil and its civilian supporters. ABRI/TNI with the help of militia members forced civilians to participate in Operation Curlog,* aimed at destroying food stocks in order to starve the Falintil.[74] Civilians were targeted, their houses burnt and possessions taken.[75] In addition, ABRI/TNI also confiscated people's food supply (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).[76]

The 1990s

87. During the 1990s, although ABRI/TNI maintained a significant presence across Timor-Leste it was generally no longer involved in ongoing large-scale military operations. The strategy of the Resistance shifted from direct armed conflict with ABRI/TNI to one focused on international diplomacy and urban resistance based largely on the growing youth movement. ABRI/TNI operations primarily targeted civilians suspected of involvement in clandestine activities supporting the Resistance. These operations were often supported by Hansip and other East Timorese quasi-military organisations developed during this period (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict; Part 4: The Regime of Occupation). The Indonesian riot police, Brimob, also played a very active role clamping down on dissent in this period.

88. This ABRI/TNI strategy invariably involved violent attacks on civilians. As for the periods in the 1970s and 1980s, the Commission received numerous reports of the destruction of houses and other property, as well as theft and extortion based on the threat of violence. The Commission also received a number of reports implicating members of the Indonesian police service in violent abuses, and the destruction of property and extortion during this period.

89. As in earlier periods, theft and property destruction is best understood as a deliberate form of punishment. Houses were burnt if the owners were suspected of supporting or sympathising with Falintil forces.[77] A person from Ainaro told the Commission that ABRI/TNI soldiers burned down his house in November 1991 shortly before the Santa Cruz Massacre, on suspicion that he possessed an RDTL flag.[78]

90. Another deponent from Liquiçá told the Commission that he was arrested for being in possession of a Fretilin flag, and was only released after his wife gave

* Curlog (hancur logistik) literally means the Destruction of Logistics. It aimed to destroy all kinds of crops that could be used by Falintil. It deprived both Falintil and civilians of food as crops were destroyed (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

Rp300,000 and seven silver coins to an ABRI/TNI commander.[79] The Commission received a number of statements from different parts of the country, revealing how extortion by the military and the police had become common practice during this period. Often, individuals were detained and only released if they were able to pay the officers in charge. Families were often obliged to pay for the release of loved ones, and payments of between Rp100,000 and Rp1,800,000 were reportedly paid.[80]

91. Such practices were largely opportunistic, and much depended on the specific military officers involved. Actions targeted the clandestine activist community. In Baucau, ABRI/TNI soldiers confiscated people's properties and valuables and extorted money from civilians they accused of collaborating with the Resistance.[81]

92. In Dili, following the Santa Cruz Massacre in November 1991, ABRI/TNI searched houses across Dili to find the demonstrators who escaped from scene of the shooting. The Commission received statements attesting that those found harbouring demonstrators, or who were found in possession of pro-independence literature or materials, had their house burned.[82]

93. Similar reports of violence, arson and extortion during the 1990s were collected in Ermera. Various military units, including the Linud 700 (Airborne), were identified as perpetrators.[83]

94. Falintil attacks against ABRI/TNI during this period were generally limited to strategic moments, in which it aimed to gain maximum psychological impact as a reminder of their continuing presence and capability, or international impact to highlight that the conflict continued (see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy). When attacks did occur, the Indonesian military practice of collective punishment against the civilian population was routinely applied. On 9 November 1998, Falintil attacked the Koramil in Alas (Manufahi). ABRI/TNI launched a massive operation in an attempt to capture the Falintil attackers. During these operations civilians were murdered, detained, sexually assaulted and their property destroyed (see Vol. II, Part: 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment and Part 7.7: Sexual Violence).[84] The Commission also received testimony from José Tilman who was a civilian who participated in the ABRI/TNI destruction of property:*

> On 12 November 1998, L12, and L13 [both East Timorese] and other Koramil soldiers burned people's houses in Lurin. They started in Kulutetuk and finished in Hasbot. In Natarwaen, the destruction also included traditional objects and private possessions. The attackers also ransacked sacred objects, such as statues of saints. I was with the soldiers in Natarwaen. First, they burned Rémigio's house, then other houses...Before that, they had ordered the villagers to abandon the village and detained them in an elementary school building (SD Inpres Alas Town), about 10 metres from the Koramil 02 Office.[85]

* José Tilman was in Soe (West Timor, Indonesia) when he made this statement to the Commission.

Destruction in 1999

95. With the fall of President Soeharto in May 1998, political space in Timor-Leste appeared to open through the second half of the year. Unprecedented rallies and calls for a referendum on the political status of the territory went ahead unhindered by the Indonesian military or authorities. However, this “Dili Spring” was shortlived. Reports of TNI troop reductions were proved false, and by late 1998 TNI was reportedly establishing a network of militias across the territory. This programme was developed rapidly in the early months of 1999 as Indonesia, Portugal and the UN negotiated the modalities for an act of self-determination in Timor-Leste (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict and Part 4: The Regime of Occupation).

96. With the signing of the 5 May Agreements and the announcement of the Popular Consultation, the CNRT (Concelho Nacional da Resistência da Timor-Leste, National Council of Timorese Resistance) and students organisations began to organise openly across the territory in preparation for the vote on Timor-Leste’s future.

97. The recruitment, forced and otherwise, of civilians into the TNI-backed militias increased rapidly in the early months of 1999. With TNI and the Indonesian police, they began a campaign of terror aimed at intimidating the East Timorese people to support integration with Indonesia. Major acts of violence and the patterns of violence and intimidation are considered in detail in a number of parts of this Report, including Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict and Part 4: The Regime of Occupation; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances and Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment and Part 7.7: Sexual Violence. Economic and property violations were also a common element of this programme of terror and intimidation. These occurred before the announcement of the 5 May Agreements and the Popular Consultation, in the lead-up to the ballot, and in the notorious campaign of violence after the announcement of the result rejecting integration with Indonesia.

98. A quantitative analyis of statements taken by the Commission reflects certain patterns of human rights violations, intimidation and violence perpetrated by TNI and the militia between January and October 1999. In particular, they indicate that large-scale attacks generally occurred in the periods when there was limited or no international presence in the territory: for example, in the period January-April before the 5 May Agreements were signed and UN and other internationals deployed to the territory; and in the period after the announcement of the results of the ballot when most internationals, including media, had either left or evacuated the territory, or were trapped in the UNAMET compound in Dili, leaving district communities entirely isolated from international monitoring. This quantitative analysis also indicates that property destruction by TNI and the militias occcured in all districts of the territory, although the scale of destruction differed between districts and sub-districts (see Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations).

99. By the time President Habibie made his announcement on 27 January 1999 that the people of Timor-Leste would be allowed to choose their political future, the short-lived "Dili Spring" was already over. Following the TNI attacks on civilians in Alas (Manufahi) in November 1998 and the increase in recruitment of militia, TNI and militia violence increased in the territory while negotations continued to finalise the modalities for an act of self-determination.

100. At the end of March, negotiations broke off while Indonesian representatives returned from New York to Jakarta to seek final approval of the Agreements. The month of April saw an escalation of violence by the Indonesian military and the militias under its control, targeted against civilians. The massacre of civilians in the Liquiçá Church on 6 April was one of the most notorious attacks on civilians, coordinated by TNI, the police and militia (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

101. With the UN yet to arrive in the territory, this violence was openly organised, to the extent that on 17 April a mass rally in front of the government building on Dili's waterfront was held with the senior leadership of the militias and the TNI present. The Commission has examined film footage of this rally, identifying the presence of TNI members as well as militia leaders such as Eurico Guterres and João Tavares. Immediately after the attack, militia paraded around the city in trucks and on motorbikes intimidating the civilian population. They attacked and massacred refugees sheltering in the house of Manuel Carrascalão in the centre of the city.

102. TNI and militia also destroyed a house belonging to Filomena da Cruz, a Zone secretary of the clandestine movement.[86] The offices of the only newspaper in the territory, Suara Timor Timur (Voice of East Timor), were also destroyed in what was apparently an act of retribution and intimidation due to the normally pro-integration newspaper's relatively open reporting of calls for a referendum on the future of the territory (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict).

103. In Liquiçá, the military and Besi Merah Putih [BMP] militia members were implicated in a series of house-burnings, lootings and thefts from early 1999.[87]

104. Similar accounts of direct military involvement in attacks and intimidation of the civilian population during this period were reported to the Commission in different parts of the country. Reports of such violence in this period were received from the districts of Bobonaro,[88] Baucau,[89] Viqueque,[90] Manufahi,[91] Covalima,[92] and Ermera.[93] A former commander of the Darah Merah Putih militia, which operated one of the sub-districts of Ermera during this period, told the Commission:

> In April 1999, the commander of Kodim 1637 in Ermera, L20, gave me seven machine guns, one truck, two Kijang cars and one Taft car. I had 200 militia members, who were recruited to kill pro-independence supporters in Hatolia. I attacked Hatolia with the 200 militia...We burned houses in the aldeia of Kukara and the village of Manusae Kraik. People fled their homes to save themselves.[94]

105. Many people fled their homes across the territory in fear of such attacks, leaving their houses and property vulnerable to destruction and looting (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

106. The enclave district of Oecussi was particularly vulnerable, completely surrounded by Indonesian territory and cut-off from the rest of the Timor-Leste. Although the Sakunar militia in this district was one of the last to be established by the TNI, in April 1999, it was to prove one of the most violent. Most of the adult male population was forcibly recruited into the militia, using various forms of violence including arrests, detention, intimidation, torture, and destruction of properties to scare civilians.[95] As in other districts, the militia immediately set about burning property and looting. Those targeted included the general populace, as well as specific pro-independence supporters, CNRT activists and leaders. In addition, reluctant militia members were also targeted by TNI and pro-autonomy supporters. The Commission also received reports that pro-independence supporters were also forced to burn the homes of their leaders.[96]

107. Following the announcement of the 5 May Agreements, pro-autonomy supporters reacted hostilely, publicly threatening terror, murder, detention, rape and destruction of houses and property. Within days TNI and militia conducted joint attacks against civilians suspected of pro-independence sympathies in districts across the country.[97] In an attack in Atara and Lasaun (Atsabe, Ermera) on 16 May 1999, SGI (Joint Intelligence Force) and the Tim Pancasila militia burned houses, destroyed crops, and looted the property of civilians in both villages.[98] There were also several large-scale attacks. On 8 May, three days after the UN announcement, a group of TNI soldiers led over 400 militia members in an attack on the village of Tumin (Oesilo, Oecussi) where they burned houses, slaughtered animals, killed a number of civilians, and forced more than 75 people to go to Imbate (West Timor, Indonesia).[99]

108. With UNAMET deployed from June, together with large numbers of international media and observers, the scale of violence by TNI and militias generally subsided across the territory. However, there were still particular places or periods when the violence increased. This was particularly so during the final lead-up to the ballot. For example, in August the TNI and militia groups intensified the violence in Oecussi, targeting CNRT leaders and supporters. On the morning of 28 August 1999, a joint force of Sakunar and Besi Merah Putih militias from Liquiçá, together with TNI and members of the Indonesian police, attacked the CNRT Office in Oecussi, razing it to the ground and killing two CNRT supporters who were trapped inside the building.[100] On the same day a joint attack by Sakunar, Aitarak and Besi Merah Putih militias, acting together with TNI and the Indonesian police, resulted in the looting and burning of houses in the towns of Cruz, Bobometo, and Oesilo in Oecussi.[101] Three days later, TNI, the militias and the police burned 120 houses in the aldeia of Debaha in the village of Bobometo (Oesilo, Oecussi).[102]

109. When the East Timorese people voted overwhelmingly to reject the option of special autonomy and to opt instead for independence the Indonesian military, with the militias, executed a scorched-earth campaign that forced more than 300,000 people to flee to the interior of the territory, and a further 250,000 to West Timor.[103] While some people may have chosen to leave for West Timor voluntarily, in general it was a military-coordinated campaign of fear and terror to transport the population outside the territory. Inside the territory, the Indonesian military supported and coordinated a massive operation of destruction of private and public property across the territory. The bulk of Timor's infrastructure was also razed to the ground, over 60,000 houses were estimated to have been destroyed with people's possessions, and livestock was slaughtered across the territory.[104] During Community Reconciliation Hearings facilitated by the Commission between 2002 and 2004 across the territory, a common refrain from victims of this property destruction was their continuing plight of extreme poverty caused by these violations (see Vol. IV, Part 9: Community Reconciliation).

110. The Commission received statements and reports during its Community Profile workshops of violence after the ballot by the Indonesian military and militias from every district. Many highlighted the fact that the Indonesian military and the militias conducted operations together, for example in Ermera,[105] Manatuto,[106] Manufahi,[107] Baucau,[108] Viqueque,[109] Covalima[110] and Oecussi.[111]

111. The Commission received the largest number of statements about violations during the post-ballot period from the district of Oecussi.* Hundreds of villagers from the sub-district of Oesilo had been forced to join the Sakunar militia and then subsequently forced by the Indonesian military to burn houses in the sub-district of Bobometo (Oesilo, Oecussi) and other locations.[112] Statements made to the Commission explain that these were often were well coordinated and large operations. As elsewhere, attacks often involved militia members with both police and military assistance.[113]

112. The Commission received over 200 statements from the district of Bobonaro in relation to property crimes during 1999. Many of these included detail on joint militia, military operations and attacks.[114]

113. While the pattern of the burning of houses, the slaughtering of livestock and the destruction of food crops was similar to earlier periods of the conflict, the scale of devastation in such a condensed period of time was unprecedented. As in the 1970s and 1980s, there is no evidence of any meaningful attempts to avert or halt these abuses by the Indonesian police who had responsiblity for maintaining law and order and security, under the 5 May Agreements. Neither is there evidence of the Indonesian military seeking to prevent this destruction once it was given responsbility for law and order under the decree for martial law issued by President Habibie in early September 1999. On the contrary, there is overwhelming evidence that the Indonesian military were primary perpetrators in these violations. Evidence of collusion between the military and the various militia groups across the territory is clear and damning. Contemporaneous reports were reinforced by hundreds of statements submitted to the Commission of people who witnessed the direct involvement of military and police members in this violence (see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings

* 110 statements referred to 117 cases in which ABRI/TNI and militia groups were mentioned as perpetrators of violence.

and Enforced Disappearances and Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment and Part 7.7: Sexual Violence; Vol. IV, Part 8: Responsibility and Accountability).

114. Allegations of military collusion and direct involvement in the violence were further corroborated by statements given to the Commission by former militia members, as well as statements provided and testimonies made by former militia members made at Community Reconciliation Hearings across the country.[115] In addition, Community Profile reports compiled by the Commission from workshops it conducted in villages across the country also recorded the involvement of the Indonesian military in this massive operation of property destruction across the territory.[116]

115. The Commission also received a submission detailing the looting of the national museum in Dili of hundreds of East Timorese cultural and historical artefacts. The submission outlined that members of TNI prepared trucks, loaded the artefacts and drove them to West Timor, Indonesia, where they remain today.*

Mistreatment of enemy combatants

116. International law provides clear protections for captured combatants. Usually when a combatant falls into enemy's hands he is entitled to Prisoner of War (POW) status. This includes those who fall within any of the following groups:

- members of armed forces;
- people who spontaneously take up arms to resist an invading army, and who have not had time to form themselves into organised units, but who carry their weapons openly (sometimes referred to as a levée en masse); and
- resistance fighters or members of militias who have complied with certain rules requiring them to distinguish themselves from civilians.[117]

Status of Falintil

Falintil were not the armed forces of a state party to the conflict, and as they were not merely civilians who spontaneously took up arms against an invading forces they cannot be said to constitute a levée en masse. Falintil could therefore be entitled to POW status only if they complied with the requirements set down in the Third Geneva Convention for resistance movements, militias and other similar groups.[118] These requirements are as follows:

* The Commission received a Submission based on an interview with Virgilio Simith, who in 1999 was a senior member of CNRT responsible for cultural affairs. Virgilio Simith recounted that nearly 3,000 cultural artefacts and objects were taken by Indonesian authorities from the museum in Comoro, Dili in September 1999 and have not been returned. [Interview with Virgilio Simith, 7 July 2005 by David Hicks, Maxine Hicks and Phyllis Ferguson, Submission to the CAVR. CAVR Archive. See also Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict].

- The group in question must be commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates (that is, the group must have an effective command structure).
- Members of the group must wear a fixed distinctive sign recognisable at a distance. The purpose of this requirement is to enable the enemy to distinguish members of the group (who are legitimate military targets) from civilians (who are not legitimate targets). For this reason it seems likely that under customary law it has been subsumed by the more liberal requirement that members of the group must distinguish themselves from civilians in some way.*
- Members of the group must carry their arms openly.
- The group must generally conduct its operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war.

The Commission is satisfied that the members of Falintil sufficiently complied with the above requirements for them to be considered privileged combatants for the purposes of this Report.

Falintil had relatively strict and enforced command structures and discipline, carried arms openly and generally conducted their operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war. At the commencement of the conflict members of Falintil wore the uniforms of the Portuguese armed forces. By 1978 many of these uniforms had become worn and were at various times replaced with other military fatigues. However the combination of the available uniforms and insignia and other very distinctive features, such as Falintil members adopting an exclusive and uniform policy of wearing extremely long hair, made them easily distinguishable from a distance. Civilians during the conflict cut their hair short so that they would not be considered to be Falintil members by the Indonesian military forces.[119]

117. If it is unclear whether a person is entitled to POW status, he must be treated as a POW until his status is determined by a competent tribunal.[120]

* Article 43(3) First Additional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions 1977. It seems likely that this broader requirement either reflected pre-existing custom in 1977 or became customary soon thereafter: see Christopher Greenwood, "Customary Law Status of the 1977 Geneva Protocols", in Astrid J.M. Delissen and Gerard J. Tanja (eds), Humanitarian Law of Armed Conflict: Challenges Ahead, Dordrecht, Martinus Nijhoff, 1991, p. 107.

118. Prisoners of war must be treated humanely.[121] They must not be tortured, killed or subjected to intimidation or insults.[122] They must be provided with food and water and any necessary medical treatment.[123] They must be held away from areas in danger of attack during military activities.[124]

119. Combatants who are not POWs are still entitled to certain standards of treatment. In all cases they must be treated humanely.* They are also protected by human rights law, which forbids extra-judicial killing, torture and arbitrary detention, and guarantees rights to a fair trial. Additionally, the Fourth Geneva Convention provides that persons in occupied territories who are suspected of acts hostile to the occupying power must be treated with humanity and are entitled to a fair trial.[125]

120. The Commission obtained a copy of an official Indonesian document that set out interrogation procedures for surrendering or captured civilians and Falintil soldiers. The document recognises that in order to extract good quality information, it is necessary to ensure the safety of prisoner(s) under interrogation. Techniques included convincing prisoner(s) that ABRI/TNI was aware of the dangers their prisoners faced from Fretilin/Falintil in retribution for divulging sensitive information. The document also highlighted acts to avoid during interrogation, such as forcing the interrogator's will on prisoners, the use of force and threats or drawing rash conclusions.[126]

121. In reality, prisoners, and in particular Falintil soldiers, were invariably subjected to torture during interrogation. Some were deliberately killed and others died as a result of injuries sustained during interrogation. Vol. III, Part 7.4 of this Report, on Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment, provides detail of these procedures and establishes that the modus operandi of interrogation were essentially illegal.

122. The period of Operation Seroja by the Indonesian military, in the years immediately following the invasion in 1975, saw the greatest number of Fretilin/Falintil soldiers being captured or surrendered. The Indonesian military implemented specific operations to try to convince senior Fretilin/Falintil leaders to surrender, such as Operation Skylight (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). In addition, President Soeharto introduced an amnesty for surrendering Fretilin/Falintil members in 1977. Both initiatives failed to ensure the protection of surrendering or captured Fretilin/Falintil members, many of whom were tortured and executed or disappeared (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment). It has not been possible to determine how many Fretilin/Falintil members suffered this kind of treatment during the early years of Operation Seroja in the 1970s.

123. Statements to the Commission provide some insight into the treatment of captured Fretilin/Falintil soldiers, including torture and ill-treatment.[127] Many disappeared in custody, were never seen again and are presumed dead.[128] As large numbers of civilians came down from the mountains after massive military operations aimed at destroying the Fretilin bases throughout 1978, the Indonesian military tried to identify those it considered Fretilin/Falintil members. They also interrogated civilians to try to find out information about the remaining Resistance forces in the mountains. For example, the community of the village of Lifau (Laleia, Manatuto) explained to the Commission how ABRI/TNI interrogated a group captured from their village. Three men were exposed as Fretilin/Falintil leaders, and the Commission was told that they were executed by the Indonesian military.[129] Terms such as "re-education" or "bathe in the sea" or "go swimming" became euphemisms for extra-judicial executions by the Indonesian military.[130]

* More specifically, by application of the Martens Clause (set out in the Hague Convention IV of 1907 and a number of other conventions), the "principles of humanity" apply: see Report of the International Law Commission on the Work of its Forty-sixth Session, 2 May-22 July 1994, GAOR A/49/10, at p. 317; Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1986), ICJ Reports at para 78 and the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen.

124. In 1980, after the uprising by the Resistance in its attack on the television station in Marabia on the outskirts of Dili, the Indonesian military retaliated with brutal treatment of those suspected of involvement with the Resistance. Hundreds were detained and tortured, and a large number were executed or disappeared (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment). Accounts of similar violations against Fretilin/Falintil were recalled during the implementation of Operation Kikis in 1981.[131]

125. The Commission received a number of reports of ill-treatment as well as the killing of captured Falintil soldiers in the 1980s.[132] In 1984, for example, a battle broke out between Falintil and ABRI in the forest around Manatuto, in which three Falintil soldiers were captured by ABRI/TNI and taken to Dili. One soldier was placed into a drum full of water for two hours, forced to sleep in wet clothes and beaten with a piece of wood in the head, legs and hands every night for a week.[133] The mistreatment of combatants and civilians continued during the 1990s,[134] confirming allegations that ABRI/TNI's treatment of captured combatants violated international legal principles.

126. The Commission recognises that because of the limited time and resources allocated to its work, and its limited access to Indonesian military records, many cases of ill-treatment and killing of captured or surrendering Falintil soldiers were not reported during its information gathering activities. Further research concerning the experience of Falintil/Fretilin forces during this period is recommended to enrich the material collected by the Commission.

Unlawful means of warfare

127. Humanitarian law limits the range of weapons and techniques ("means of warfare") that may be used to cause harm to opposing forces.[135] Two general principles apply:

1. It is forbidden to use means of warfare which cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering.[136]
2. It is forbidden to use means of warfare which do not allow the attacker to distinguish between military targets and civilians ("indiscriminate means").[137] This prohibition would include tactics such as the poisoning of water or food supplies,[138] and attempts to starve populations.[139]

128. The Indonesian invasion of Timor-Leste in 1975 was a large-scale military operation, involving thousands of troops using both heavy and light combat equipment. An official military document that the Commission obtained listed weapons and ordinance used during operations in Timor-Leste.[140] Much of this ordinance has a primary purpose of large-scale destruction, yet ABRI/TNI frequently used these bombs in their operations to destroy non-military targets including civilian houses, food crops, rice fields and even civilians, reflecting a disproportionate use of force.

129. The Commission also secured information about the types of ammunition employed by the Indonesian military during its operations in Timor-Leste.[141] Although the law permits the use of the ammunition types listed for military operations targeting the enemy's armed forces and certain military targets, or civilian targets that have been employed for military purposes, these ammunitions cannot be used against civilians during military operations, or in a manner in which it is impossible to discriminate between combatants and civilians. The Commission also received a report claiming that ABRI/TNI planted landmines in or around civilian buildings. The community of the village of Maneluma (Laulara, Aileu) told the Commission that in 1978 many villagers surrendered to the Indonesian military. At this time, one member of the community, Aurelia Daumali, was reported to have stepped on a landmine while searching for food around the church, and died.[142]

130. The Commission received statements relating to 285 aerial bombings by the Indonesian military between 1975 and 1999, 125 of which provided detail on how the bombings caused civilian deaths, the destruction of houses, as well as other buildings and crops. The bombings occurred in all districts with the exception of Oecussi. Most reports received related to bombings that occurred in 1978, as the Fretilin zonas libertadas (liberated zones) came under intense attack which caused many civilian deaths and ultimately resulted in destruction of the zones and many thousands of civilians surrendering to ABRI/TNI forces (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances and Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

131. Several Commission Community Profile reports confirm that the aerial bombardment killed a significant number of civilians fleeing from the invasion. The Commission received a number of reports confirming the use of chemical or biological weapons by the Indonesian forces against both civilian and military targets.* Village communities in a number of locations told the Commission of large death tolls due to such poisoning after Indonesian aerial bombardments. A Community Profile workshop in the sub-district of Atsabe (Ermera) reported that bombing in their areas during 1976 and 1977 caused limb paralysis and subsequent death, and said that as many as 2,500 are believed to have died from the related poisoning.[143] A similar experience occurred in Laclo (Atsabe, Ermera) and Paramin (Atsabe, Ermera) in January 1977. Approximately 1,500 members of the community who had moved to Cailaco in Lesumau (Atsabe, Ermera) to avoid starvation died after

* Several statements (see for example, HRVD Statement 04078) contained detail about the bombs that indicate that these were more than simply standard ordinance. [See also CAVR Interview with Francisco Barbosa, Manumera Village (Turiscai, Manufahi), 8 September 2003].

consuming vegetables and corn and drinking water. Survivors told the Commission that they believed that this was caused by poison that was dropped by Indonesian bombers.[144] In a subsequent incident in 1978 at the village of Laubono in Lesumau (Atsabe, Ermera) large numbers of villagers from Lasaun (Atsabe, Ermera), along with Falintil soldiers gathered in Lesumau, died of food and water poisoning during a one-month period after ABRI/TNI bombings.[145] Villagers in Guololo (Letefoho, Ermera) also told the Commission that during June 1978 many civilians in Cailaco (Bobonaro) had died of food and water poisoning.[146]

132. Agusto Soares, then aged 17, told the Commission of civilian deaths due to poisoning in Lesumau between 1977 and 1978:

> This time, TNI did not drop bombs. Instead it loaded poison into water drums, carried them on planes and dropped them on Lesumau. This caused contamination of all food supplies. Villagers would pick leaves and vegetables, cook and eat them, then die. They would drink water and die. They would dig up cassava roots 15 centimetres deep to eat, then die. Around 400 people died. Most who died came from the village of Katrai Kraik [Letefoho, Ermera], including all the villagers from one part of the village except for one elderly woman and her daughter. Now they still live in the village of Katrai Kraik.[147]

133. Agusto Soares told the Commission that thousands of those who had fled ABRI/TNI advances from Letefoho (Ermera) to Ermera, Ainaro, Aileu and Cailaco (Bobonaro) sheltered at the Fretilin/Falintil base in Katrai Leten, at the foot of Mount Ramelau (Letefoho, Ermera). Falintil troops gathered these civilians behind the firing line, allowing them to grow crops to avoid starvation. In 1978, the Indonesian military attacked Katrai Leten from Atsabe (Ermera), Same (Manufahi) and Bobonaro. They encircled civilian villages and fired mortars, bazookas and cannons from the four directions, while planes dropped bombs that caused many deaths, resulting in the destruction of the Katrai Leten base and the capture of many civilians.[148]

134. The Commission also received reports of helicopters dropping poison, causing over 200 civilian deaths in the villages of Bora and Manelima (Laclubar, Manatuto).[149] The Commission has been unable to verify the types of bombs used to poison food crops and water, due to its lack of access to Indonesian military records. After the completion of Operation Seroja, the Indonesian military continued to use poison which caused the destruction of plants and vegetation. Community members of the village of Kakae Uman (Natabora/Barique, Viqueque) reported that the Indonesian military poisoned food crops during Operation Kikis in 1981. The community also told the Commission that for one month in 1983, the Indonesian military forced villagers to join an operation in the forest and to poison all food crops, which some claimed was done in order to poison and kill Falintil soldiers who may have relied on them for food.[150]

135. Indonesian forces relied heavily on high-powered bombs that had limited accuracy, resulting in significant civilian casualties even if they were aimed at military targets. The Commission was told, for example, that in 1978 up to 800 people from the village of Guruça (Quelicai, Baucau) who had fled to Mount Matebian, were killed as a result of aerial bombardment.[151] A number of other reports from communities clearly illustrate the devastation wrought by the sustained bombing campaign during this period.[152]

136. According to Lucas da Costa Xavier, a former ABRI soldier based in Same (Manufahi) who participated in a number of military operations, for two weeks in 1978 the Indonesian military fired rockets in all directions every night, including into suspected Fretilin hiding areas in Tutuluro, Kablaki, Roin and Hola Rua (Same, Manufahi). Lucas da Costa told the Commission that a civilian told him about a related operation, explaining that:

> The trees and grass would burn when the bombs hit them, and the water would become undrinkable because it was contaminated with poison. Many civilians died from drinking the water contaminated with schrapnel from bombs dropped from the planes, and many died of burns...It was the dry season so the grass burned easily.[153]

137. Given the description provided to the Commission about many bombings, and the strategic objectives of the military's counter-insurgency campaign, the Commission concludes that incendiary bombs were used during the campaigns. The US-supplied OV-10 Bronco planes that were employed[154] were equipped with light weapons, rockets and "Opalm", a Soviet equivalent of Napalm bought by Indonesia during its campaign in West Irian during 1962.[155] The Commission received copies of Indonesian military propaganda film about the campaigns of the late 1970s, including extensive footage of preparations for bombing raids at Baucau Airport, and footage of raids themselves. In this footage, Indonesian military personnel are filmed clearly loading bombs labelled "OPALM" into the OV-10 Bronco planes at the Baucau Airport. The planes are then shown taking off.[156] In addition an Indonesian military secret document supplied to the Commission provides details of weapons employed, including Opalm bombs, bombs with widespread, non-targeted impact, and use of OV-10 Bronco and Sky Hawk airplanes. The tables below are extracted from this secret Indonesian military document.*

Table 1: Capabilities of tactical planes
Types of Weapon	A-4 SKY HAWK	OV-10F BRONCO
Machine guns	Two 30 MM cannons (250 bullets)	4 cannons 12.7 (1600 bullets)
Rockets	6 Pods (42 Rx FFAR-2,75)	4 Pods (28Rx FFAR-2.75)
Bombs	8 bombs	5 bombs

* Official Operational Procedure, No.: PROTAP/3/IV/1988, Capabilities of Tactical Planes, 30 April 1988, the Indonesian Armed Forces, Security Operation Command in East Timor.

Ammunition	Bullets 30 MM	Bullets 12.7 MM
	Rockets FFAR 2,75 inch	Rockets FFAR 2.75 in
	Bombs MK-81-130 Kg	Bombs MK-81-130-Kg
	Bombs MK-82-250 Kg	Bombs MK-82-250 Kg
	Bombs FAB-250 Kg	Bombs FAB 25 Kg
	Bombs OFAB-100 Kg	Bombs OFAB 100 Kg
	Bombs TAL-1-250 Kg	Bombs TAL 1-250 Kg
	Bombs ZHB-100 Kg	Bombs ZHB-100 Kg
	Bombs MK-1-130 Kg

Table 2: Types of ammunition and their safe range

Ammunition	Capabilities	Minimum Safe Range
Bullets 12,7 MM	Anti-personnel, within a 10 m radius	500 m
Bullets 30 MM	Anti-personnel and capable of penetrating steel, within a 35 m radius	500 m
Rockets FFAR 2,75 inch	Anti-Tanks and anti-personnel, within a 130 m radius	700 m
Bombs KM-1-130 Kg	General purpose, within a 400 m radius	1,700 m
Bombs MK-82-250 Kg	General purpose, within a 540 m radius	2,000 m
Bombs MK-5B-250 Kg	Burn targets, with heat reaching +/- 1,725 degrees Celcius for 15 minutes, within a 600 m radius	2,000 m
Bombs TAL-1-250 Kg	Anti-personnel, within a 260 m radius	2,000 m
Bombs FAB-250 Kg	Anti-personnel and soft targets (houses), radius 495 m	2,000 m
Bombs OFAB-100 Kg	Anti-personnel and hard targets (warehouses), within a 370 m radius	1,700 m
Bombs ZHB-100 Kg	Anti-personnel and burned within a 340 m radius	1,700 m
OPALM	Burn targets with heat reaching +/- 1,725 degress Celcius, within a 400 m radius	1,500 m

138. Table One indicates the importance of foreign-supplied airplanes to attacks, and the significant capability of these airplanes. Table Two verifies the supply of "OPALM" for use in Timor-Leste, as well as bombs listed for use on "soft targets (houses)", and anti-personnel bombs with a significant radius and "burn targets" unlikely to be safely guaranteed to impact only upon military targets if used in mountainous regions close to civilian populations. The document is dated 1988, but the testimonies to the Commission verify the use of OV-10 Broncos in the late 1970s operating bombing raids on areas heavily populated by civilians with terrible effect upon civilians (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

139. Although a treaty prohibiting the use of incendiary weapons such as napalm was not created until 1980,[157] and has never been signed or ratified by Indonesia, most uses of such weapons violate the general principles prohibiting indiscriminate means of warfare and weapons that cause superfluous injury or unnecessary suffering.

140. Adriano João, who was the Fretilin Delegado in Cailaco (Bobonaro) until 1979, told the Commission that in 1977 napalm bombs and rockets were fired from Indonesian military Sky Hawk planes, causing severe skin irritation and death to many civilians.[158] Villagers from Obulo and Butamanu (Atsabe, Ermera) also reported that that the Indonesian military dropped napalm bombs on Atasuro in Lesumau, causing 12 civilian deaths in 1979.[159]

Forced recruitment into military activity

141. Humanitarian law prohibits parties to a conflict from forcing enemy nationals to take part in military operations that are directed at their own country.[160] An occupying power must not compel civilians to serve in its armed or auxiliary forces,[161] and must not use pressure or propaganda to encourage enlistment.[162]

142. Following the late 1975 invasion and subsequent military advances to control the territory, the Indonesian military initiated processes to recruit East Timorese civilians to assist them in operations. From late 1974, the Indonesian military had been training members of the pro-integration political party Apodeti, calling them Partisan forces. Members of the UDT political party who fled to West Timor, Indonesia, after defeat in the internal armed conflict joined the Partisans and assisted the Indonesian military in the cross border operations and ultimately full-scale invasion. Having invaded Dili and Baucau, and already occupying territory in the western districts of Timor-Leste, the Indonesian military began a process of conscripting civilians, especially men and boys, to be used for transporting supplies and other military logistical needs. This ongoing recruitment campaign was known as Tenaga Bantuan Operasi [Operation Assistance Force/TBO]. TBOs often accompanied troops to the front line of battle, carrying ammunition and other supplies. At times they also acted as trailblazers for the Indonesian military, and were even infiltrated into Fretilin zonas libertadas (liberated zones) as spies for ABRI/TNI (see Vol. III, Part 7.8: The Rights of the Child, specifically the box on the role of TBOs in military operations).

143. Some specific military operations involved the forced recruitment of civilians. Operation Kikis, as discussed above, for example, required forced participation of civilians on a mass scale (see also Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict); the Tombak (Spear) Troops, as discussed below; forced searches for civilians' family members in the forests and hills; night watch duties in specific communities; as well as forced participation in local civil defence and militia structures.

144. Statements given to the Commission, indicate that the Indonesian military's recruitment of civilians, forced and otherwise, was primarily of adult men, though also included large numbers of children (see Vol. III, Part 7.8: The Rights of the Child). Statements also recount that this recruitment began before the invasion, grew shortly after the invasion, and steadily increased during the Operation Seroja period from 1975 to 1979. Between late 1979 and 1981, before Operation Kikis was introduced, recruitment dwindled. This increased on a large scale with the massive forced recruitment campaign that accompanied Operation Kikis in 1981. After this operation, the number of recruited civilians continued to fall, before rising again in late 1998 and early 1999.

145. The Commission took statements about 405 individual cases of forced civilian recruitment into Indonesian military operations during the 1975-1979 period. A further 292 cases were recorded during the 1980-1990 period, and this decreased further to 143 cases for the period from 1990 to 1999. The number of recruitment cases increased again at the end of 1998 and early 1999 when the Indonesian military began its campaign of forming pro-autonomy militia groups across the territory. The relatively small number of reported cases of TBO recruitment in the period of Operation Seroja and Operation Kikis, when large numbers of civilians were forcibly recruited to support military operations across the territory, is consistent with public opinion that does not generally regard forced recruitment as a serious violation compared to other violations which were widespread during these years including detention and torture, sexual violence, killings and disappearances and other serious violations.

146. The Commission recognises that not all East Timorese people who participated as TBOs or in other capacities to support the Indonesian military were forced to do so. There were clearly people who became TBOs or other support personnel to ABRI/TNI for a variety of economic, security, personal and political reasons (see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation; Vol. III, Part 7.8: The Rights of the Child, section on child TBOs).

Number of reported acts of forced recruitment, 1974-1999

Source: Database of Narrative Statements Given to the CAVR

Patterns of recruitment

147. In each period of the conflict, conscription and forced recruitment of East Timorese civilians were employed for particular strategic military and political objectives. Over and above the practical benefits of engaging and utilising local "manpower", these practices also served to divide, fragment and ultimately weaken East Timorese communities and society at large, as well as providing a basis for Indonesian propaganda that there was significant support for their presence in Timor-Leste.

148. Although recruitment focused on men, the Commission received clear evidence that both women and children were also compelled to participate in a number of locations during various military operations. Forced recruitment was employed as a tactic of consolidating the invasion, and was even used during the pre-invasion phase when Indonesian forces were covertly infiltrating the western parts of the territory. Odete dos Santos told the Commission of forced recruitment as TBOs even before the full-scale invasion:

> In 1975, L20, (then District Administrator of Bobonaro) from the UDT party, forced my family and me to move to Atambua [West Timor]. There [Atambua], TNI forced two people, Lesu Bere and Alfredo Lopes, to become TBOs.
>
> They later went on an operation in Atabae [Bobonaro] with TNI. Lesu Bere was shot dead by TNI in Atsabe [Ermera]. His body was taken and buried near the border with Atambua. TNI also killed and buried Alfredo Lopes in Maliana [Bobonaro]. His grave is still there today.[163]

149. During the period of Operation Seroja in the years immediately after the invasion, the Commission received statements about forced recruitment by the Indonesian military from every district in the territory with the exception of Oecussi, which had no military operations at this time.

150. Most TBO recruitment took place in the initial years of Operation Seroja between 1975 and 1979, the years when the Indonesian military undertook large scale military operations across the territory in its efforts to defeat the armed Fretilin/Falintil armed resistance. TBOs were recruited extensively from captured and surrendering civilian groups during this period.

151. Testimonies received by the Commission suggest that the Indonesian military deliberately targeted Fretilin supporters or Falintil members to be made into TBOs. Maumali Sarmento, a 31-year old member of Fretilin, was captured by ABRI on the day the invasion was launched and remained a TBO for the next three years. He told the Commission:

> On 7 December 1975, when the Indonesian military invasion of Dili took place, I was a member of Fretilin. With two of my friends, Mau Mali and Domingos da Silva, I was forced to become a TBO by members of Marinir 1, Zipur 10 and Armed 1 troops. We went along with the troops in operations as far as Metinaro [Dili]. During the three years we were TBOs, our tasks included collecting firewood, cooking, getting water and doing laundry.[164]

152. Similar testimony was received from José Nunes de Andrade, a Fretilin sympathiser who had fled to Same in 1975, where he was captured by ABRI when they overran the area. He was used as a porter carrying supplies by foot over the mountains, and remained a TBO until 1979. Flaviano dos Santos was an armed Falintil member when captured in Atabae (Bobonaro) in 1975.[165] He told the Commission that after he was captured he was forced to carry food and ammunition for two military battalions for 9 months. In 1976, when he was permitted to return to his home area, local East Timorese militia and ABRI personnel had seized his home and other property.[166]

153. In January 1976, when ABRI captured Atabae (Bobonaro), many civilians surrendered to or were captured by them. Agustinho dos Santos Barreto told the Commission that about 400 civilians were forced to become TBOs in military operations around Bobonaro, then in Maubara (Liquiçá), before returning to Atabae where some were permitted to return to their families and others were forced to remain TBOs.[167]

154. A similar account was reported to the Commission by the community of Guruça (Quelicai, Baucau). In May 1978, 500 members of the community surrendered to the Indonesian military after coming down from Mount Matebian. Despite many of the men being sickly and weak, they were forced to work for ABRI and Hansip, with around 60 recruited as TBOs for Indonesian military operations, while the women were forced to take part in night watches.[168]

155. Several reports received by the Commission revealed how Fretilin/Falintil members who had surrendered or had been captured during this period were sometimes forced to return to the forest to search for Falintil. In 1978, for example, Horacio Sousa, who had served with Falintil troops operating in Nunululi (Laclubar, Manatuto), was captured with four others. After spending a week in detention at Fatumakerek-Laclubar, they were given Hansip uniforms and weapons and forced to participate in a series of military operations with the Airborne Infantry 100 around Laclubar (Manatuto), Alas (Manufahi) and Maubisse (Ainaro).[169]

156. The Commission received testimony and heard from communities in the east that East Timorese TBOs were engaged in the ABRI/TNI final assault on Mount Matebian.[170]

157. The mass recruitment campaign that provided the civilians used in Operation Kikis was unprecedented, involving the local civilian administrative structures that had been established to complement the militarised administration that effectively controlled the territory. Participation was compulsory, and the Commission received a number of reports of torture against civilians who refused to take part.[171]

158. Similar operations were launched by the Indonesian military during 1982 and 1983, in an effort to find surviving Fretilin/Falintil fighters. However during this period civilian recruitment was relatively limited and military campaigns largely restricted to search operations in localised areas. During these operations villagers were ordered to destroy, poison and burn food crops they found in order to prevent Fretilin/Falintil from using them.[172]

Work as a TBO–risks and dangers

159. Working conditions for TBOs were dire, and they frequently found themselves in life-threatening situations. Danger and threats came from a number of sources. A poor diet and disease weakened and killed many; TBOs often became victims in battles, captured or killed by Fretilin/Falintil forces; some were killed by the Indonesian military; others did not return from operations and remain missing to this day.

160. Floréntina Santos from the village of Talimoro (Ermera, Ermera) told the Commission that her elder brother, who had been forced to become a TBO in Liquiçá, was captured and killed by Falintil in 1976.[173] Moises da Costa, who was 11 years old when his father surrendered to the Indonesian military in 1978, told the Commission that his father was forced to return to the forest to find his family, but was captured and killed by Falintil who accused him of being a spy for ABRI.[174] The Commission received a number of reports about missing persons who were last seen having been recruited as TBOs, but who never returned from operations.[175]

161. CAVR Community Profile workshops also shed light on the impact of TBO recruitment. Villagers from Defawassi (Baguia, Baucau), for example, explained how they had surrendered to ABRI forces in October 1978 following the attack on Mount Matebian. The Indonesian military forced them into camps, where many died of disease and starvation, and those who still had families in the forest were tortured. The men were forced to work as TBOs. About 40 youths from the village became TBOs, and most were killed in battle.[176]

162. Child TBOs were particularly vulnerable and many are believed to have died from exhaustion, combined with poor health due to lack of food and medicines, due to heavy loads they had to carry during military operations. According to Domingas Freitas, for example, her younger brother Rai Ano and his friend, Zeca, were recruited as TBOs in Viqueque in 1978. Domingas Freitas was told by Zeca that Rai Ano had died in the town of Uatolari (Viqueque) due to his vulnerable physical condition and his being forced to carry heavy battle equipment.[177]

163. Many TBOs were subjected to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. Anacleto Pires from Katrai Kraik (Letefoho, Ermera) for example, told the Commission that in 1976 he was forcibly taken to ABRI by the locally appointed head of the aldeia, who forced him to work as a TBO for the next two years:

> My tasks were to make coffee, carry backpacks for TNI Battalion 521 in their operations in the forest. I was subjected to abuse such as being beaten and immersed in a pool of water every night.[178]

164. With the completion of Operation Seroja in 1979, when the Indonesian military had overrun all the major Fretilin bases in the interior, ABRI concentrated its operations in areas not yet secured. Statements made to the Commission in the districts of Manufahi, Viqueque, Manatuto and Baucau indicate continued forced recruitment during this period.

165. Several CAVR Community Profile workshops in the district of Viqueque reported that the forced recruitment of civilians as TBOs in 1979 took place following the widespread capture of the civilians who had been hiding in the mountains.[179] The Commission also received a number of individual statements in Viqueque from those who were forced to work for the Indonesian military and its Hansip forces during this period.[180] Domingos Miguel told the Commission:

> In 1979, we were gathered in the town of Ossu by members of Hansip, who I didn't know. One day I was called to join an operation. During the operation, Hansip captured a Falintil member, Mateus. He was made a TBO right away and they resumed their journey to Uato Carbau. When we arrived to Uato Carbau, members of Hansip executed an unknown member of Falintil. After we returned from the operation, I was called by the Danramil (Sub-district Military Commander) and taken to the Koramil in Ossu where I was detained for one day with 40 others.[181]

166. Some of those who completed their "service" as TBOs were subsequently imprisoned. Mateus Damazo, for example, told the Commission that in 1979, after ABRI captured him in Alas (Manufahi), he was forced to carry food and ammunition and cook for troops during a series of operations. On completion of these operations he was not released, but was instead detained for one year in Betano Prison (Same, Manufahi).[182] João Baptista S. Martins, who was 11 years old when he was forced to be a TBO in October 1979, escaped after members of ABRI told him that they wanted to take him to Indonesia after he completed his TBO service.[183]

167. Civilians were particularly vulnerable to physical abuse in the context of ongoing hostilities, and were regarded with a high degree of suspicion by the Indonesian military in terms of their loyalties. The Commission received reports of civilians who had surrendered to ABRI being tortured before being forcibly recruited as TBOs.[184] The Commission also received a number of accounts of people being tortured after becoming TBOs, as they were suspected of maintaining links with Fretilin/Falintil. António de Jesus told the Commission about the disappearance of his brother, a young TBO in 1982, who was suspected by the Indonesian military of links with Falintil:

> In 1982, Battalion 320 took Domingos de Jesus to become a TBO. He and the troops went to Lospalos, to Soru village…He was later suspected [by the military] so they took him back by Indonesian military helicopter straight to Paitamor post. When they arrived in Paitamor, they interrogated and tortured him so that he would confess about his connections with Falintil and Fretilin. After hearing his statement, [they] concluded that he was a member of the clandestine network, and quite dangerous. So they took him to a place in Iliomar called Hama-Um to be killed. We still have not been able to collect his remains to this day.[185]

168. By the end of Operation Seroja it was common practice for ABRI soldiers to secure the assistance of civilians to help them with household tasks such as cooking and other individual needs. These TBOs usually lived with the soldiers in camps or barracks, and would sometimes accompany ABRI members on field operations. It was an existence characterised by a variety of abuses. The Commission was told of the vulnerability of young women in these circumstances:

In 1980, I was recruited as a TBO. During those two months, I witnessed my own sister, CM, raped and made into a sex slave by ABRI soldiers. When the troops moved from Fahinehan, she was finally released. But I was taken with them to Same, Kablaki, Ainaro, Mamlau, Ermera and Dili…During my assignment as a TBO, when we were operating in the forest, I had the chance to help a Falintil member by giving him food. Linus, a friend of mine from Aileu, told this to TNI Yonif 643. So I was kicked with army boots and they threatened to shoot me. They then added more to the load I had to carry to Ermera, Railaco and Dili.[186]

169. Some joined up as TBOs as it ensured some measure of socio-economic support, but most did not have any options and were obliged to participate. Some agreed to join out of fear,[187] others because they had been captured,[188] and some because ABRI threatened to harm their families if they did not cooperate.[189]

TBOs in Operation Kikis, 1981

170. During the second half of 1981, the Indonesian military launched a massive operation aimed at sweeping across the territory to flush out surviving Resistance fighters. Operation Kikis mobilised huge numbers of civilians and forced them into this forced march (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). ABRI's territorial troops and civilian officials from aldeia, village and district levels were tasked to recruit male civilians aged between 12 and 35 years old. In reality, however, ABRI recruited younger and older civilians in violation of the prescribed policy and they also recruited women.[190] According to several CAVR Community Profile Reports, men forced to join the operation included civil servants, teachers, students, nurses, traders, farmers and the unemployed. The recruitment led to temporary closure of schools, hospitals and community health centres during the operation.[191]

171. The number of civilians forcibly recruited into Operation Kikis remains contested. According to one Indonesian military document published in 1982, the operation involved 60,000 civilians, including members of ABRI-organised civil defence structures such as Wanra (People's Resistance) and Ratih (Trained Populace).[192] According to writer Ken Conboy, the operation involved 33,000 civilians, who marched from two directions with 12 ABRI battalions behind them: Laga Beach and Dili, moving towards the killing site near Aitana (Manatuto).[193] Another Indonesian military source suggests that many more civilians were engaged, claiming that eight battalions accompanied by 120,000 trained militias moved from east to west, complemented by a further seven battalions accompanied by 25,000 trained militias who moved from west to east.[194]

172. The Commission received statements from 80 people in seven districts about civilian recruitment as TBOs during Operation Kikis. In addition, details of recruitment were also provided in a number of CAVR Community Profile workshops from various parts of the country. Villagers from Lelalai (Quelicai, Baucau), for example, explained that in 1981 government officials from the district of Baucau issued instructions ordering all able-bodied men to take part in Operation Kikis for 3 months.[195] Similar reports were received from villagers in Muapitine (Lospalos, Lautém),[196] and from Rasa (Lospalos, Lautém), where hundreds of people were recruited as TBOs during this period. The community of Rasa told the Commission that this included three teenage children who died during the operation.[197]

173. The forced marching of the operation was very demanding, and many civilians forced into the operation by the Indonesian military died in circumstances never fully explained. Francisco António Menezes told the Commission about the death of his older brother:

> On 20 August 1981, Vicente was sick with malaria and he went to seek treatment in the town of Baguia. When he arrived, there were many TNI troops from Battalion 521 with members of Hansip. A member of TNI, L21, and a Hansip, L22 and his men captured Vicente and other civilians and youths. Battalion 521 ordered the young men to become TBOs, carrying backpacks and weapons to the forest… On 12 October 1981, I heard from a member of Battalion 521, L21, that Vicente and other friends had died in Uatolari [Viqueque]. L21 told me to visit Vicente's grave in Teulale. To this day, I still don't know what caused Vicente's death and where he was buried.[198]

174. By 1982, TBOs were in the main no longer involved in military operations, but were rather detained as prisoners and personal helpers in ABRI barracks. Those suspected of Fretilin/Falintil connections remained primary targets.[199] From about this time, the process of coerced recruitment was somewhat less arbitrary, and those ABRI soldiers who wanted to "recruit" a TBO were required to contact and arrange this through the local Babinsa.[200]

Forced to look for family in the forest

175. The Commission received 38 statements in relation to civilians who surrendered and were forced by the Indonesian military to return to the forest in order to find other family members. Orlando da Silva, from Rotuto (Same, Manufahi) told the Commission:

> In early 1976, ABRI Battalion 509 captured Aniceto Mendes and I while we were looking for food. They brought us to Rotuto and interrogated us at gunpoint about our family who were still in the forest. After being detained for a day, we were given rations of rice and salt then forced to find our family in the forest [and tell them] to surrender. We couldn't find any of our family. Infantry Battalion 509 also forced Rosalina, Angelina, Hermenegilda and Filomeno to go out and find their family who were still in the forest. But they didn't succeed either, so Infantry Battalion 509 detained Rosalina and Hermenegilda at the Yonif Post.[201]

176. Most of these cases occurred during the period of Operation Seroja until 1979.

177. Civilians who were coerced to go back into the forest to locate family members were not armed. Some eventually returned with their family. Alfredo da Silva Carvalho, for example, told the Commission that after surrendering to the Indonesian military on 29 November 1978, his brother, João do Rosario de Fatima and his three friends were forced to go back to the forest the following day to look for their families. They succeeded and subsequently returned to Dili with their family members.[202]

178. Villagers from Waetami (Quelicai, Baucau) told the Commission that about 1,000 people from the village surrendered to the Indonesian military in June 1979, after the Marines had taken over the area. The men were instructed to return to the forest to catch Falintil guerrillas, but they did not succeed and returned to Quelicai empty-handed.[203] Similar accounts were reported to the Commission in other areas.[204]

179. Former Falintil soldiers who were captured were also often forced to go back to the forest and look for other Falintil members after interrogation and torture. Mateus da Costa told the Commission:

> In 1979, I was entrusted to be a Fretilin commander. But TNI troops from Battalion 700 caught me in Betun Oan-Alas and took me to Fatuberliu. My friend, Mateus Torrejão, and I were ordered by TNI to go into the forest and look for our relatives who were still there. We went and looked but to no avail. On our way home, we met a company of Linud 100 troops and we were taken to Dili on foot.[205]

180. Césario de Jesus told the Commission that Indonesian soldiers forced him and his friends to go back into the forest and look for family or Fretilin/Falintil members in March 1979. He said that the Indonesian military took Falintil prisoners away by airplane, never to be seen again.[206]

181. Not all civilians who were forced to look for their family or Falintil in the forest returned safely. Magdalena Pereira from Letefoho (Ermera) was 14 in 1977, when she and her grandmother Laubrani were captured by ABRI and brought to the Koramil in Letefoho. After being interrogated, they were forced to look for their family in the forest. Magdalena did not continue the journey beyond Lauana, but Laubrani was forced by ABRI soldiers and Hansip to continue and when she began walking she was shot in the back and died instantly.[207] In a number of instances, those sent back into the forest simply never returned.[208]

182. Throughout the early 1980s, the Indonesian military continued to force civilians to look for family members who had not yet surrendered.[209] ABRI soldiers also beat and tortured civilians who did not succeed in finding family or Falintil in the forest. Arlindo Fernandes Xavier told the Commission:

> In 1983, TNI battalion 623 came and called Adolfo Fernandes Xavier and forced him to go to the forest to look for the Falintil member Manuel dos Santos. Because he couldn't find him, they beat Adolfo with weapons until he was bruised all over. Adolfo was held for one day and one night in Post 623 in Lautém. Anibal Fernandes Xavier and Etelvina Fernandes Xavier were also caught and brought to Kodim Lospalos by soldiers from the Kodim. They were interrogated, electrocuted, kicked and beaten with the butt of gun until they were bruised. They were put into a cell for a month. After that, Etelvina was sent home but Anibal was taken away by the perpetrators and is still missing to this day.[210]

183. In 1983, ceasefire talks were held between Falintil and the Indonesian armed forces. There were also a series of defections by member of ABRI's auxiliary forces such as Hansip in the districts of Lautém, Viqueque and Ainaro. In Lautém after receiving orders from Xanana Gusmao to bring weapons into the forest, a number of Hansip and Ratih captured weapons from the police and the Koramil and fled into the forest. In response, the security forces ordered the women whose husbands had fled to look for their husbands in the forest.* The Indonesian military reacted in the same manner in 1984 after Falintil burned houses in the village of Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém), and again in 1987 in Poros/Herana in the village of Mehara, when ABRI forced the women to look for their husbands who were still in the forest escorted by Hansip.[211]

184. In Kraras (Viqueque, Viqueque), following the levantamento (uprising) on 9 August 1983, civilians were attacked and killed by the Indonesian military in a series of massacres, ostensibly in retaliation for the killing of Indonesian soldiers by, and the subsequent defection of, Hansip and Ratih members to Falintil (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). By early 1984, a number

* The Levantamento Armado (Armed Uprising) in Ponta Leste took place on 9 August 1983, led by the liurai Miguel dos Santos, known also as Cuba Levantamento. It involved Hansip members and clandestine youths who were called Lorico Paicau. The uprising was on the orders of the Commander of Falintil, Xanana Gusmão. [CAVR Community Profile, Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 27 November 2002.]

of civilians and Ratih members remained in the forest. The community told the Commission that in early 1984 members of the special forces Kopassus abducted 13 people from Kraras and took them to the forest and forced them to look for other civilians and Falintil members. Of the 13 civilians forced into this, only six returned home, the other seven remain missing.[212]

Tombak (Spear) Troops

185. In the 1980s, another form of forced recruitment of civilians into Indonesian military operations were the Tombak, or Spear, Troops. They were named after the only weapon they were allowed to carry, limiting their military capacity in relation to their Indonesian military commanders.

186. Little is known about the origin and evolution of these troops, although the available data suggests that Tombak Troops were only formed by the Indonesian military in districts it regarded as susceptible to Falintil attack after the Operation Kikis in 1981. Following the breakdown of ceasefire talks with the uprising in Viqueque in 1983, and the return of civilians who had been detained on Ataúro since 1980 because of their suspected links to Fretilin/Falintil, Indonesian concern about East Timorese civilian clandestine support for the Resistance was high. It formed Tombak Troops to watch over civilian activity. Civilians were forcibly recruited into Tombak Troops in a number of locations across the country, but they were mostly recruited in areas where Falintil/Fretilin were still known to be active.[213] Recruitment continued in the mid-1980s, often focusing on communities where the men had fled to the hills following the uprisings in 1982 and 1983.[214]

187. The Commission received statements from 19 civilians who were forced to join the Tombak Troops. They were mostly from the districts of Lautém and Viqueque and recounted forced recruitment into these forces between 1982 and 1987.

188. Civilians recruited for Tombak Troops were often Falintil members who had surrendered, though they also included civilians whose families were still in the forest. Some of the statements suggest that the recruitment process followed the capture, detention and torture of civilians and others captured in areas controlled by Fretilin/Falintil.[215]

189. Given this background in terms of recruitment, it is not surprising that ABRI retained suspicions about certain civilians recruited into the Tombak Troops. The Commission received several statements from former Tombak Troops who were detained and tortured for failing to perform their duties or for being suspected of giving information or cooperating with Falintil/Fretilin. Paulino Freitas told the Commission:

> In September 1983, myself and young men who were strong were recruited as Tombak Troops. I knew some of them: Ernesto, Afonso, Brandão, Faikaik and Joaquim Kainoko. We were recruited by L23, the Babinsa in the village of Uma Oan Kraik, and by L24 and L25, the commander of the Babinsa. After being recruited we were trained in Audian Matan in the town of Viqueque. They also told us to do night watch…One day Adelino and I were on a night watch when L23 and L27 beat us with the butt of a gun and kicked us, accusing us of having plans with Fretilin to attack the post we were guarding.[216]

190. After the uprising in Kraras in 1983, many people fled to the forest fearing retribution by the Indonesian military against the civilian population. The Indonesian military conducted operations to force them to return to their villages, and a series of massacres of civilians by the Indonesian military took place (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). Some civilians who returned were forced to join the Tombak Troops as guards for the Indonesian military.[217]

191. Those recruited into the Tombak Troops were also at risk of being killed by Falintil when they were sent into the forest to search for Fretilin/Falintil forces who often saw them as an extension of ABRI.[218] Jacinta Hornay told the Commission of Tombak Troops being placed on the front line with Falintil and as a result being killed:

In May 1984, Jacinto Pinto and Tomás Ramos were captured by 2 members of ABRI, and taken to the Koramil in Luro. Both were suspected of having contact with [a member of] Falintil named Mateus Morreira. At the Koramil, they were held in a cell for three months.

After three months they were released but were still required to report every day at the Koramil. On 8 August 1984, on orders from the Luro Koramil, they and 24 other civilians from Luro were [forced to] go as Tombak Troops into the forest to look for a Falintil member, Mateus Morreira. In the forest, Jacinto was killed by Falintil in Lakira [Lospalos]. His body was recovered by Koramil troops and buried on 5 September 1984 in Luro.[219]

192. Tombak Troops were also used by ABRI to carry out acts of violence against civilians who were suspected of having connections with Fretilin/Falintil.[220]

Forced night watch and patrol

193. The Indonesian military also forced civilians to participate in night watch and patrolling duties in communities throughout the period of the occupation. The Commission received 74 statements which specifically recounted these types of experiences. Especially in rural communities where the Indonesian military feared attack by Falintil, civilians on night watch and patrol duties were effectively placed as a shield to protect members of the Indonesian armed forces.

194. Similar to the other situations of forced recruitment, it was often those who had recently surrendered or had been captured by Indonesian forces who were forced into these tasks. In a number of cases, civilians were tortured before being obliged by the military to conduct night watches.[221] Forced civilian night watches and civilian patrols were particularly common in communities who had recently come under Indonesian military control, as ABRI remained wary of their authority. Levels of trust between ABRI and these local security structures varied. However from statements received it seems that, as with other forced civilian deployments into military roles, the Indonesian military remained suspicious of civilians continuing links to Falintil. In some instances, villagers who had been tasked with such patrol duties were subsequently exiled with their families to the prison island of Ataúro.[222]

195. Commission Community Profiles indicate that in communities that had surrendered to or had been captured by the Indonesian military, women were often forced to conduct night watch duties and the men were forced to work as TBOs or to look for Fretilin/Falintil and other civilians in the forest. The Commission was told of the torture of women who refused to participate in night watch duties.[223] Ernesto Soares told the Commission of the violent coercion against civilians:

> In 1977, Battalion 711 troops built a post in the village of Leodato (Hatolia, Ermera) After it was erected, Infantry Battalion 711 forced me and my friends to guard at the post at night. If we refused to come we would be beaten and thrown into the swamp.[224]

196. It was not uncommon for civilians who were forced to do night watch to be subjected to violence if their ABRI or Hansip handlers considered they had make a mistake. Bernardo Savio told the Commission he had been forced to do night watch duties, and that if he was caught asleep during the watch he would be beaten and tortured.[225] Others described similar treatment to the Commission.[226] Daniel Suban from Caraubalo (Viqueque, Viqueque) told the Commission about his father, Rubigari, who was forced to do night watch.

> On 14 July 1980, Rubigari, Rai Olo, Rubi Gamu and Loi Gamu were forced by TNI to guard the post at night. My father, Rubigari, fell asleep when it was his turn to do the night watch. He was caught by 3 members of TNI Battalion 202. They shouted at him, kicked and hit him with their weapons until his ribs were broken and he died right there.[227]

197. Violent abuse from ABRI and Hansip members was arbitrary and remained a possibility at any time, even if there were no grounds for provocation. Alfredo da Costa Freitas, for example, related an incident to the Commission in which Hansip members beat him and three others for no apparent reason while they were on night patrol. They were then thrown into a river, their guard post was set alight and they were instructed to rebuild it the following day.[228]

198. Analysis of CAVR Community Profile workshop reports indicates that the Indonesian military also forced civilians to take part in various other activities at night, including attendance at dance parties and security patrols if there was a high level of Fretilin/Falintil activity in that area. The presence of East Timorese civilians at such events was supposed to lessen the risk of Falintil attack, and so civilians were effectively used as human shields. Civilians were often forced to prepare food for the soldiers.[229] These practices were common in the Indonesian military-controlled resettlement camps of the late 1970s and early 1980s.[230]

199. Civilians forced to work on night watch were at risk of being shot or killed by Falintil or members of the Indonesian military itself. The Commission received a number of statements which described incidents in which either Falintil or ABRI killed unarmed civilians who were on night watch duty.[231]

200. During Operation Kikis in 1981, with large numbers of able-bodied men forced into the operation, women were forced to conduct night watch duties in some areas.[232] Villagers in Bibileo (Viqueque, Viqueque) told the Commission that during this period, ABRI forced the elderly men and women to build posts around the village, and the women were forced to guard at night.[233]

201. During the 1990s, there were fewer reports of civilians being forcibly recruited for night watch duties. While this reflects a general shift in the context of the conflict and the Indonesian military security priorities and strategy, these practices continued to be employed in certain areas. Some reports received by the Commission for this period showed, however, that the civilians forced to conduct night watch duties were usually those who were arrested for clandestine activities. Some of these were also tortured by members of the Indonesian military or their paramilitary auxiliaries. Attacks by Falintil during the 1990s also resulted in casualties of civilians working on night watch. Mateus Soares told the Commission of a Falintil attack on a post in Carlilo (Aiteas, Manatuto):

> On 23 March 1990, José Soares Laka, Domingos Ramos, Sebastião Ximenes, António Coli, Domingos Larak, Hermenegildo Soares, Mateus Go'o, and my father, António Celo Soares, and I were doing the night watch in the neighbourhood security post.
>
> Around 9.00pm, Fretilin attacked the post. António Coli and Celo Soares were killed instantly in the attack, while Mateus Go'o, José Soares Laka and Domingos Larak were injured from the wild shooting from Falintil.[234]

202. As in the earlier years, those suspected of working in the clandestine network supporting Falintil forces were often tortured and then set to work on night watch or other tasks.[235] Civilians who disobeyed orders to do night watch were often tortured by the Indonesian military.[236]

203. These practices were revived on a large-scale during 1999 when TNI and its militias forced civilians to do night watch amongst other "duties" in the lead up to the Popular Consultation at the end of August.[237] In Community Reconciliation Hearings in villages across the country, the Commission heard testimony from former militia members about their activities. Recruitment was often forced or coerced, with the threat of violence or destruction of property by the Indonesian military. Local government authorities were often employed by the military in the recruitment process, as most communities were required to provide members of militia groups. Lower level members of the militia groups, often those who were forcibly recruited, were often required to conduct activities such as night watch and patrols, and manning of guard posts, and were subordinate to the Indonesian military in a manner similar to earlier periods of the conflict (see Vol. IV, Part 9: Community Reconciliation).

Violations of the laws of war by Fretilin/Falintil

204. The Commission received a number of reports of human rights violations perpetrated by Fretilin/Falintil relating to violations of the laws of war. Violations against civilians in this context, however, constituted only a small fraction of those concerning violations by ABRI/TNI. The available evidence indicates that the violations by Fretilin/Falintil were neither systematic nor widespread. Nevertheless, Fretilin/Falintil forces did attack and kill civilians, burned their houses, and committed other serious violations against civilians.

205. The Commission did not find evidence of the use of indiscriminate or disproportionate firepower during Fretilin/Falintil's military operations, nor of large-scale, illegal recruitment of civilians by Fretilin/Falintil to support and supplement its military operations. Despite this, it is clear that Fretilin/Falintil enforcement of its political ideology and policies between 1976 and1978 contributed significantly to the widespread suffering and deaths of civilians whom they prevented from surrendering to the Indonesian military and who became ABRI targets during attacks. Fretilin/Falintil also committed violations of the laws of war in relation to its treatment of prisoners and the killing of civilians.

206. When the Indonesian military invaded Dili on 7 December 1975, Fretilin retreated south to the hills of Aileu where it maintained its headquarters. The leadership decided to take with them large numbers of UDT and Apodeti prisoners it held in the Quartel Geral and Comarca Balide in Dili. Prisoners were forced to carry ammunition and supplies for the retreating Fretilin.[238] In late December 1975, members of Fretilin conducted a series of executions of these prisoners, in Aissirimou in Aileu, then as they retreated further south in Maubisse (Ainaro), and in January 1976 on the south coast in Same, Manufahi (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). The Commission interviewed Humberto Martins da Cruz, a Fretilin prison guard in Aileu at the time, who said that almost every night a prisoner was called out to be killed. He also told the Commission that between 23 and 26 of these executions in Aissirimou directly involved Fretilin Central Committee members.[239] He told the Commission that prisoners were ordered to dig graves for execution victims, and that the Fretilin leadership made no attempt to prevent these executions.[240] At the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict, the current President and the current Secretary General of Fretilin, Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo" and Mari Alkatiri respectively asserted that these killings were not Fretilin policy or done on the orders of the Fretilin Central Committee. They did, however, acknowledge that Fretilin as an organisation must take collective responsibility for these killings and apologised on behalf of Fretilin to the families of victims.[241] The then President of Fretilin, Francisco Xavier do Amaral, was not in Aileu at the time of the killings; however, he explained his understanding of events to the Commission during the public hearing:

> I can explain it like this. There was no decision. When you write something down, then we can say that it is a decision. Sometimes we share impressions, we talk with friends. And these ideas of ours, people called them – people called them – took them to be the same as decisions. Because our thoughts are just our opinions…
>
> We were in the middle of war, in this war…we ran from our enemies, we ran, we took those we had imprisoned, our enemies whom we had imprisoned, with us. Before we even had a chance to catch our breath, the enemy was close. We said, 'What do we do now? We must keep running. We don't have too many choices. There is no transport, no food, not much medicine, none of this.'
>
> Some of those we had imprisoned were already seriously sick, many were very weak. So we had to look at this. Do we nurse them? Do we leave them on their own? Or do we kill them and then run? I saw danger in both of these. If we leave a prisoner here alive, a UDT or Apodeti member, he can fall into the enemy's hands. Indonesians will press him and they will find us. They can trick him or maybe he will confess…[Whether we're] in town or anywhere, he can confess. Therefore we came to the conclusion that if they are weak already and can't walk with us, and if we want to carry them but we don't have the strength, there is no guarantee that we can make it to a safe place, then is it better if he dies or we die?
>
> Sometimes, a decision was taken to kill them so that the enemy could not endanger us. Perhaps this opinion was commonly held, more or less commonly, by leaders at all levels.[242]

207. In fact, while there is evidence that some prisoners were weak and sick, or suffered injuries from severe beatings administered while in Fretilin custody, there is no evidence to establish that the prisoners were executed because they were too difficult to move. The evidence indicates that they were executed by members of Fretilin out of fear that they would cooperate with Indonesia.

208. The Commission received testimony of a massacre of civilians in the village of Kooleu (Loré I, Lautém) in January 1976 (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).[243]

209. After the January 1976 executions in Same (Manufahi), the Fretilin leadership decided to stop the executions and exhorted the surviving prisoners to fight with them against the Indonesian military. Taur Matan Ruak, now Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the RDTL, recalled to the Commission the words of the Fretilin leader Nicolau Lobato, paraphrasing him:

> We believe in human transformation. The history of struggle in other countries has proven that a person considered a revolutionary today can be seen as a traitor tomorrow, and that a person considered a traitor today could be a revolutionary tomorrow…A man's common sense can improve the man. We have to believe in people's ability to transform themselves.[244]

210. During the period following the invasion, many people fled their homes to seek refuge in the forests and hills. Many fled voluntarily in fear of the invasion and sought the protection of Fretilin/Falintil forces. However, the Commission also received many accounts of Fretilin cajoling the civilian population to leave the towns and join it in the interior, and the Fretilin ideology of social revolution in these early years of war and occupation was based on the idea of the civilian population living with the political and military cadres where they would be educated and a new social consciousness developed. In this context there was considerable pressure for civilians to flee and stay with Fretilin in the interior, even when the situation became extremely difficult (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

211. Between 1976 and 1977, civilians established new communities under Fretilin's guidance in the bases in the interior behind the lines of battle with the Indonesian military. They grew communal gardens, conducted literacy programmes and developed basic health services. However, as the war encroached in 1977, it became increasingly difficult for Fretilin to sustain such a large civilian population in the interior.

212. Divisions arose within the Fretilin leadership about the best strategy to pursue the struggle, in particular about whether the large civilian population should surrender and return to the villages and towns. In 1976 in the Eastern Zone, Fretilin captured and executed the Fretilin leader Aquiles Freitas and a number of his supporters (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances).

213. A fundamental and violent split occurred with the arrest and detention of Fretilin President Francisco Xavier do Amaral and those thought to be aligned with him in September 1977. During this time Fretilin/Falintil committed violations against many civilians, including detention, torture and executions (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment).[245]

214. In the wake of this violent purge, suspicion reigned in Fretilin controlled areas and civilian movement was tightly controlled. Fretilin/Falintil required civilians to secure authorised travel passes (known as guia de marcha). Those caught outside authorised areas were accused of treachery and punished. Penalties included detention in very poor conditions, torture and sometimes killing. Fretilin established a system of detention centres known as Renal in bases across the country. They often detained people in underground holes for up to two weeks, and for longer periods, in the Renals (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment).

215. Other Fretilin/Falintil leaders who opposed Fretilin's war strategy of maintaining the civilian presence in the interior were also punished or killed.[246] They included Afonso Savio, Zone Secretary for Luro (Lautém) and José dos Santos, a Regional Commander, who were beaten, trampled on and burned to death.[247] According to some reports to the Commission, the Fretilin Central Committee ordered the execution of heads of aldeias who were suspected of ordering civilians to surrender to the Indonesian military.[248] Such actions sent a clear message to civilians who harboured thoughts of surrender that they would be labelled as traitors and severely dealt with.

216. The issue of whether civilians should surrender became extremely divisive, with the well-being of these civilians often sacrificed between competing political ideals. Lucas da Costa, a Fretilin cadre at the time, told the Commission:

> When a political leader spoke, a commander obeyed. But the commanders only saw the war from a military point of view. They said, "We cannot win if we bring the people along with us. If the people keep coming along we will be spending all our energy protecting them, rather than fighting the enemy. It is better to tell them to leave. We will stay in the forest." But this was incompatible with the [Fretilin] concept. If people were sent down [from the mountains], they would reclaim their social status, their social status would grow again. This was ideological suicide [for Fretilin], and the revolution would fail.[249]

217. Many civilians were effectively trapped in the Fretilin zonas libertadas (liberated zones), which then became targets of ABRI/TNI attacks. As restrictions on civilian movements tightened, significant numbers of these civilians died due to lack of food and medicine.[250] As the massive Indonesian military operations overran Fretilin bases in 1978, many civilians fled with Fretilin/Falintil forces to the Fretilin/Falintil base on Mount Matebian. The situation there was little better, with a severe lack of shelter and medicine for sick adults and children. In this situation thousands died of starvation, illness and the relentless Indonesian bombings and attacks.[251]

218. By 1978, scattered and with no alternatives, many civilians began to surrender to Indonesian forces. On 22 November 1978, Fretilin's Central Committee issued a directive, effectively consenting to this reality.

219. Xanana Gusmão, who was at Mount Matebian at the time, told the Commission:

> On 22 November 1978 we separated on Matebian. Though we were under siege, we kept in contact with the Central Committee in the Central Region. We confirmed that we could not go on any longer, and they told civilians to surrender and to maintain one guerilla post in the Eastern Region, to take charge of Baucau, Viqueque and Lospalos....

Then they appointed me commander of the Eastern Region, and on 22 November we mobilised our force and escaped from Matebian. We told civilians to surrender to the nearby towns while Falintil moved towards the Central Region to continue fighting.[252]

220. With the conclusion of Operation Seroja and the defeat of the Fretilin bases, the armed Resistance was nearly decimated. The strategy of the Resistance was completely overhauled in a national reorganisation conference in 1981 (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). Large numbers of civilians no longer lived with the armed resistance fighters in the mountains. People returned to villages and towns, though often after prolonged periods in transit camps, detention centres and ABRI-controlled resettlement villages (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). The Fretilin/Falintil relationship to the civilian population was fundamentally altered, as they aimed to foster a growing civilian clandestine network to support the Resistance. The new leader of the Resistance, Xanana Gusmão, gradually led the Resistance away from the hardened ideological stance that had seen the propagation of "ideological" or "revolutionary" violence against members of the Resistance (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict). In his autobiography, Xanana Gusmão recalled the violence he had witnessed or heard about during that earlier period, and his thinking in moving the Resistance away from this approach:[253]

> No! Although I was a member of the Central Committee, I was still unable to understand revolutionary violence. I did not like the concept and I did not practice it. Persuasion and compensation started to become an alternative political principle, which was fundamental for me.[254]

221. In the years that followed the reorganisation of the Resistance after the destruction of the bases which held large numbers of civilians, Fretilin/Faltintil violations of the laws of war, in particular against civilians, decreased significantly. However, the Commission did receive reports of Falintil violence and intimidation against those it considered aligned with the Indonesian military or working against the Resistance. This included the most serious violations, such as execution of civilians. Marta Ximenes testified that on 17 August 1979, three Falintil soldiers shot dead her husband Luis Lopes in their field in Paitaal-Bauro (Lospalos, Lautém) and stole their corn and cassava crops.[256]

222. In cases where East Timorese civilians were forced by the Indonesian military into such roles as conducting night watch and patrols, as discussed above, they sometimes became casualties of Falintil armed action. The status of such individuals may also have been unclear, and may have depended on the specific roles they were forced to fulfill by the Indonesian military. A member of the Tombak Troops patrolling the forest may have presented a real military threat to members of Falintil.* However, the circumstances of an individual forced to conduct night patrol in his or her home village would have been very different. Whether specifically targeted or whether such casualties were killed due to a disproportionate level of violence compared to the military objectives was not always clear.* The Commission did not receive any evidence to indicate that Falintil generally targeted civilians, and nor is there evidence that Falintil conducted military operations in such a way as to directly result in civilian casualties. However the kind of violence by Falintil troops referred to above, through the 1980s and to a lesser degree the 1990s, caused considerable suffering to communities.

* For example the death of a Tombak Troop member, Jacinto Pinto, mentioned above, see HRVD Statement 04439.

Attacks on civilian objects

223. Statements received by the Commission detail 80 cases of house-burning, destruction of buildings and property as well as looting by Fretilin/Falintil between 1975 and 1979. The bulk of these incidents occurred during 1976, and most were reported by villagers in the districts of Viqueque and Baucau. Several reports provided detail of Fretilin/Falintil violations in later years, including the destruction of civilian houses and other buildings and looting across 11 districts in Timor-Leste. No reports were received from the districts of Liquiçá and Oecussi.

224. Villagers in Obulo and Batumanu (Atsabe, Ermera) told the Commission that in 1977 after the Indonesian military attacked and burned houses in Obulo, a number of villagers surrendered to ABRI. Following this, Fretilin attacked and burned houses belonging to those civilians who had surrendered. Falintil troops were also reported to have attacked and burned houses in Obulo and Atsabe and forced villagers with them to the forest in February 1977. Many civilians taken by them suffered starvation, illness and death.[257]

225. It is clear that Fretilin/Falintil forces were responsible for considerable damage and suffering among elements of the civilian population. It is unclear, however whether official policy directed such attacks on civilians and their property. The fact that these violations were committed across many districts, and over different periods of time, suggest that at the very least the leadership of Falintil must have been aware of the attacks and took no adequate action to prevent them.

Findings

Findings concerning the Indonesian armed forces

226. During the invasion of Timor-Leste members of ABRI/TNI committed systematic violations of the Geneva conventions by failing to discriminate between civilian and military targets. In addition, on the initial days of the invasion, civilians were targeted by the Indonesian military in massacres and executions.

* See for example the case mentioned above of the Falintil killing of António Coli and Celo Soares at a neighbourhood security post in 1990 [see HRVD Statement 06483].

227. In the large-scale military operations which followed the initial invasion, thousands of East Timorese civilians, including men, women and children who were unarmed and unable to protect themselves, were targeted or indiscriminately killed by the Indonesian military.

228. During these military operations members of ABRI/TNI routinely tortured and killed civilians and prisoners of war who were captured. Prisoners who were executed included pregnant women and children (see Vol. III, Part 7.8: The Rights of the Child).

229. Members of ABRI/TNI routinely killed, detained and tortured individuals suspected of being supporters of Fretilin/Falintil. Punishment for those suspected of resisting the occupation also included burning of their houses, confiscation of land and property for redistribution to political supporters of the occupation, and rape of females suspected of collaboration with the Resistance.

230. Members of ABRI/TNI systematically violated their international legal obligations through the use of collective punishment of civilians in pursuit of military objectives. This included the torture, rape, killing or forced displacement of civilians because they were family members of, or belonged to, the same communities as individuals who were suspected of being members of Fretilin/Falintil.

231. Members of ABRI/TNI systematically destroyed property, including buildings and personal items belonging to civilians as a routine part of military operations. One of the purposes of this destruction was to punish East Timorese people who opposed the occupation, and to produce a climate of terror which it was believed would render the population easier to control, and to deter support for the pro-independence movement.

232. Looting for the personal gain of ABRI/TNI officers routinely accompanied their activities during military operations. This included stealing of vehicles which were loaded onto warships, transport of vehicles, goods and herds of animals to West Timor for sale, looting of priceless and irreplaceable traditional objects of spiritual and cultural significance, and general practices of armed banditry against the civilian population. Local government officials, acting under the protection of the ABRI/TNI, also participated in looting and stealing from civilians suspected of opposing the occupation.

233. Destruction and looting of civilian property was commonly accompanied by other violations, such as beatings, detention, torture, rape and killing of civilians. A common method was the looting of property, killing of the inhabitants of a house, and then burning the house with the victims inside. This method was utilised in order to punish and intimidate opponents of the occupation, and to destroy the evidence of the violations.

234. Members of ABRI/TNI systematically destroyed food sources of members of the civilian population. This included the burning of crops and slaughtering of herds of animals. These violations had dire consequences for the civilian population of Timor-

Leste and directly contributed to the loss of life on an enormous scale in the 1970s due to famine and related sickness.

235. In their military operations in Timor-Leste, ABRI/TNI used weapons which are prohibited by the international laws governing armed conflict. These included chemical weapons which poisoned water supplies, killed crops and other vegetation, and resulted in the deaths by poisoning of hundreds of civilians.

236. ABRI/TNI dropped napalm bombs indiscriminately on civilian targets. The illegitimate use of these bombs caused terrible suffering to civilians, including the death by burning of unarmed men, women and children.

237. ABRI/TNI forcibly recruited tens of thousands of East Timorese men, women and children to assist them in their military operations, particularly during the years 1975-79, and in periods of heightened military operations, across the territory. Those who refused to participate were subjected to beatings and torture. The illegal forced recruitment of civilians into military operations was carried out to provide cheap practical assistance and also to demean the morale of those who opposed the occupation.

238. East Timorese people who had been forcibly recruited to join ABRI/TNI units were routinely forced to carry large loads of food, ammunition and equipment under extreme conditions. They were often subjected to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment.

239. Members of ABRI/TNI summarily executed East Timorese civilians who had been forced to accompany Indonesian military operations, ostensibly over issues concerning disobedience and discipline.

240. Young East Timorese women who were forced to work for members of ABRI/TNI were routinely raped and forced into conditions of sexual slavery by their military masters (see Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violations).

241. Many pro-independence supporters who were captured or surrendered were tortured and then forced to perform duties as night guards or other security-related functions. If they failed to undertake these duties they were further tortured or ill-treated. Some Falintil fighters who were captured were forced to act as Indonesian troops against Falintil, armed only with spears, in order to ensure they could not effectively rebel against their ABRI/TNI commanders. This placed them in direct danger in combat situations and resulted in deaths.

242. In a number of cases East Timorese who had been forced to participate in ABRI/TNI operations were killed by Falintil during the operations.

243. Prior to the Popular Consultation in 1999, the TNI formed pro-Indonesia militia groups across the territory. ABRI/TNI implemented a programme of systematic forced recruitment of thousands of East Timorese men into these groups, in addition to those who had voluntarily joined in return for payment. The militia groups who were involved in this organised programme of violence and destruction had been intentionally formed, armed, funded and directed by the Indonesian military. The overwhelming evidence supporting this relationship is set out in detail in Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation, and accountability for these actions is considered in Part 8: Responsibility and Accountability.

244. Members of ABRI/TNI committed widespread and systematic violations of human rights, including the laws of war, in the lead up to, and following, the Popular Consultation in 1999. These violations are dealt with in detail in the relevant parts on specific human rights violations, viz Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances and Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine; Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment, Part 7.7: Sexual Violations and Part 7.9: Economic and Social Rights.

245. The programme of violence and destruction in 1999 was a systematic attack by heavily armed and organised military and militia groups on generally unarmed and defenceless civilians. It did not involve a conflict between two armed groups, as Falintil was, with very few exceptions, not involved in the conflict. It was a massive military exercise targeting a vulnerable civilian population for the purpose of forcing them to vote to remain with Indonesia, and, following the result, punishing them for not doing so. This military targeting of mass numbers of the civilian population constitutes violations of the laws of war by the Indonesian military.

246. The violations committed by members of the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliary militias during 1999 included:

- Killing of more than 1,400 civilians
- Rape and sexual violation of hundreds of women
- Assault and beating of thousands of civilians
- Forced deportation of approximately 250,000 of civilians out of Timor-Leste and the forced displacement of approximately 300,000 within the territory
- Forced recruitment of thousands of East Timorese into militia groups
- Burning of over 60,000 houses belonging to civilians
- Looting of vast amounts of civilian property in the territory, including almost all motor vehicles and valuable manufactured goods which were removed across the border into Indonesia
- Theft or killing of large numbers of livestock
- Intentional destruction of the majority of public infrastructure for no military purpose, including all hospitals, most schools, water installations, electricity generators and other equipment necessary for the supporting the well-being of the civilian population
- Looting of important and irreplaceable cultural and historical artifacts from the public museum in Dili in September 1999, and their removal to West Timor, Indonesia.

Findings concerning Fretilin/Falintil

247. Portugal was the UN-recognised administering power of Timor-Leste during the period of conflict with, and occupation by, Indonesia. Portugal had ratified the third Geneva Convention.

248. The laws of war applied to Fretilin/Falintil, which could be recognised in international humanitarian law as a resistance movement as it complied generally with the requirements for such recognition: it had in place a command structure; its members generally distinguished themselves from civilians, and carried arms openly; and it conducted operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war. Fretilin/Falintil was therefore required to obey the Geneva Conventions.

249. During the period of Indonesian occupation, members of Falintil forces were involved in violations of the laws of war, including the targeting of civilians, killing, torture, burning of houses and intentional destruction of private property. Although extremely serious, the scale of the violations committed by members of Fretilin/Falintil was a small fraction of those committed by ABRI/TNI.

250. Members of Fretilin/Falintil summarily executed prisoners in their custody who were members of the UDT and Apodeti political parties, soon after the invasion of the Indonesian forces in late 1975 and early 1976, and civilians in the village of Kooleu (Loré I, Lautém) in January 1976.

251. Members of Fretilin/Falintil summarily executed civilians who were suspected of being collaborators with the Indonesian security forces, members of their own organisation who were suspected of disloyalty, and civilians willing to surrender to ABRI/TNI in contravention of the Fretilin policy that they should remain together with Falintil in the interior. Members of Fretilin/Falintil also detained, tortured and ill-treated large numbers of civilians and Fretilin/Falintil military and political cadres in the 1970s who they suspected of holding views against the policies of Fretilin/Falintil especially in relation to whether civilians should leave the Fretilin/Falintil bases in the interior and return to their villages and towns.

252. Members of Fretilin/Falintil tortured and ill-treated civilians suspected of disloyalty or collaboration with the Indonesian military. Methods of torture employed included being detained in underground holes, beatings, being trampled on and severely burned.

253. Members of Fretilin/Falintil attacked and burned houses belonging to civilians who surrendered to ABRI, and of those who were suspected of collaboration with the Indonesian military. This destruction caused hunger, illness and hardship among the civilian population, and the attacks themselves caused civilian deaths.

Endnotes

1. UNTAET Regulation10/2001, Sections 3 and 1(c).
2. Mário Lemos Pires, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15-18 December 2003.
3. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
4. See A.P.V. Rogers, Law on the Battlefield (2nd ed), Manchester, Manchester University Press, 2004, pp. 3-23.
5. Article 25 Hague Regulations; Article 27 Geneva Convention IV; Articles 51(2) and 57(1) and (2)(a) Geneva Protocol I; Article 52(1) Geneva Protocol I.

6. Article 51(2) Geneva Protocol I.
7. Article 51(4) Geneva Protocol I; Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1986) ICJ Reports, para 78.
8. Articles 51(5)(b) and Article 57(2)(a)(iii) and (b) Geneva Protocol I.
9. Article 57(3) Geneva Protocol I.
10. Article 26 Hague Regulations; Article 57(2)(c) Geneva Protocol I. (Versi Indonesia: 57 (c) saja)
11. See for example, HRVD Statements 00691, 01301, 01466, 06699, 06976, 08149, 04200.
12. HRVD Statement 00445.
13. HRVD Statement 08200.
14. HRVD Statement 02406.
15. CAVR Community Profile, Laimea Kraik Village, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District, 20 August 2003.
16. See for example, CAVR Research Document on Forced Displacement and Starvation, CAVR Archive; CAVR Community Profile, Maubisse Sub-district, Ainaro, May-August 2003.
17. CAVR interview with Agustino Soares, Hatolia, Ermera, 13 August 2003.
18. CAVR Community Profile, Muapitine Village, Lospalos Sub-district, Lautém District, 18 February 2004.
19. CAVR Interview with former ABRI/TNI soldier in Same (name withheld), 13 August 2004.
20. Ibid.
21. Maria José da Costa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, 28-29 July 2003.
22. See for example CAVR Community Profile, Atara and Salaun Villages, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District, 14 April 2003; CAVR Community Profile, Maununo Village, Ainaro Sub-district, Ainaro District, 24 January 2003.
23. CAVR Community Profile, Aiasa, Bobonaro and Malilait Villages, Bobonaro Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 17 December 2003.
24. CAVR Interview with Adriano João, former Fretilin Political Assistant for Cailaco Zone (Bobonaro) between 1975 and 1979, Dili, 6 September 2004.
25. CAVR Community Profile, Aidantuik Village, Suai Sub-district, Covalima District, 1 December 2003.
26. HRVD Statement 00432.
27. See for example CAVR Community Profile, Tirilolo Village, Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District, 8 July 2003; CAVR Community Profile, Lelalai Village, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 20 October 2003; CAVR Community Profile, Maluro Village, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District 27 October 2003; Uailili Village, Baucau Sub-district, Baucau District, 28 October 2003; and Baduholo and Uai-Kana Villages, Venilale Sub-district, Baucau District, CAVR, 6 May 2003.
28. CAVR Community Profile, Defawassi Village, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, 23 September 2003.
29. For example, see CAVR Community Profile, Raihun Village, Tilomar Sub-district, Covalima District, 21 October 2003.
30. CAVR Community Profile Asbilitoho Village, Liquidoe Sub-district, Aileu District, 3 September 2003.
31. CAVR Community Profile, Orlalan Village, Laclubar Sub-district, Manatuto District, 24 August 2003
32. CAVR Interview with Albino da Costa, Dili, June 2003.
33. Asian Wall Street Journal, "Is There Enough to Eat in East Timor?", 21 June 1982.
34. Xanana Gusmão, Message to the 37th United Nations General Assembly, in Niner, p. 81.
35. CAVR Interviews with Silvino das Dores Soares, Viqueque, 10 March 2004; and António Soares,(undated). See also José Gomes, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19-21 November 2003.
36. CAVR Interview with Silvino das Dores Soares, Viqueque, 10 March 2004.
37. CAVR Interview with Gerónimo da Costa Amaral, Viqueque, 10 March 2004.
38. J. Henckaerts and L. Doswald-Beck, ICRC's Customary International Humanitarian Law, Vol. I:Rules (2005), p. 46.
39. See World Bank, Final Report of the Joint Assessment Mission to East Timor, 8 December 1999, CAVR Archive. See also Part 3: The History of the Conflict.

40. CAVR Interview with Rui Emeliano Texeira Lopes, Suai, Covalima, March 2003.
41. CAVR Interview with Santina de Jesus Soares Ly, Former OPMT Baucau Coordinator in 1975, Baucau 10 October 2003.
42. HRVD Statement 01741.
43. HRVD Statements 00941, 03558, 02167, 0913. 01043, 09471, 06443; and CAVR Community Profiles: Ponilala Village, Poetete and Mirtutu, Ermera Sub-district, Ermera District, 19-21 January 2004.
44. HRVD Statements 03855 and 04216.
45. HRVD Statements 02246, 02256, 00704.
46. HRVD Statement 07171.
47. HRVD Statement 03892.
48. Album Kenangan Perjuangan Siliwangi [no biblio info], p. 601.
49. HRVD Statement 04044.
50. HRVD Statement 01182.
51. HRVD Statement 03116.
52. HRVD Statement 02589.
53. HRVD Statement 02406.
54. HRVD Statement 05011.
55. HRVD Statement 01352.
56. HRVD Statement 0983.
57. HRVD Statements 01120, 06777, 05643 and 03663.
58. HRVD Statement 00512.
59. Ibid.
60. HRVD Statement 07774.
61. HRVD Statement 03852.
62. HRVD Statements 01348, 04928, 04045 and 05412.
63. HRVD Statement 04178.
64. HRVD Statements 02044, 06322 and 06288.
65. HRVD Statements 03503 and 01063.
66. HRVD Statements 02317, 03111, 04181, 06074 and 07363.
67. HRVD Statement 02813.
68. See for example, HRVD Statement 01348.
69. HRVD Statements 02254 and 01649.
70. HRVD Statement 04045.
71. HRVD Statements 04901, 07235, 07253, 07238, 07085, 03876, 00584 and 07791.
72. HRVD Statements 03695, 08037,09120, 03602, 01022, 05079, 01022, 01702, 08042, 00918, 00298, 00966, 03504, 08042, 00918, 00298, 00966, 03504, 05450, 04599, 04712, 06487, 00625 and 07527.
73. HRVD Statement 0797.
74. HRVD Statement 00427.
75. HRVD Statement 04334 and 08217.
76. HRVD Statement 03462.
77. HRVD Statements 05621 and 02294.
78. HRVD Statement 03366.
79. HRVD Statement 01985.
80. HRVD Statements 01262, 08531, 04285, 05684.
81. HRVD Statement 03845.
82. HRVD Statements 08077 and 08044.
83. HRVD Statements 02520, 06248, 08375, 08342, 06418, 06369, 06408, 02512 and 08290.
84. ETHRC, 28 February 1999, "Escalating Violations in East Timor: Is a Peaceful Solution Possible?" See also HRVD Statements 01531, 01581, 01583, 01603 and 01518.
85. HRVD Statement 09022.
86. HRVD Statements 00456, 02326, 00082, 05881, 00289 and 02990.

87. HRVD Statement 00082.
88. HRVD Statements 02573, 04240. See also CAVR Community Profile, Lebos-Gidapil Village, Lolotoe Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 9 September 2003.
89. HRVD Statement 00561.
90. HRVD Statements 00449, 00458, 00427.
91. CAVR Community Profile, Liurai Village, Turiscai Sub-district, Manufahi District, 17 September 2003.
92. HRVD Statements 02024, 02034, 08463, 06313, 06324 and 05138. See also CAVR Community Profile, Faholulik Village, Tilomar Sub-district, Covalima District, 21 October 2003.
93. HVRD Statements 03510, 08385 and CAVR Community Profile, Atara and Salaun Villages, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District 14 April 2003.
94. HRVD Statement 09031 from former militia leader, Belu, West Timor, Indonesia on 25 April 2003.
95. See for example, HRVD Statement 00309.
96. See for example, HRVD Statement 02950.
97. See for example, HRVD Statements 03685, 01239, 01208 and 01239.
98. CAVR Community Profile, Atara and Salaun Villages, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District 14 April 2003.
99. HRVD Statement 02835.
100. CAVR Community Profile, Costa Village, Pante Makasar Sub-district, Oecussi District, 16 February 2004.
101. HRVD Statement 02632.
102. HRVD Statement 02930.
103. CAVR Interview with Manuel Cárceres da Costa, UNHCR Repatriation/Protection Assistant, Dili, 25 November 2002.
104. See World Bank, Final Report of the Joint Assessment Mission to East Timor, 8 December 1999. CAVR Archive.
105. HRVD Statements 01101, 08303, 08312 and 08314. See also CAVR Community Profiles: Leimea Kraik and Samara Villages, Hatolia Sub-district, Ermera District, 20 August 2003; Ponilala, Poetete and Mirtutu Villages, Ermera Sub-district, Ermera District, 19-21 January 2004; Lihu and Railaco Kraik Villages, Railaco Sub-district, Ermera District, 20 February 2003, Laclo and Paramin Villages, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District, 26 June 2003; Eraulo Village, Letefoho Sub-district, Ermera District, 2 December 2002; and Hatugau Village, Letefoho Sub-district, Ermera District, 14 October 2002.
106. HRVD Statements 05271 and 08282.
107. HRVD Statement 04079.
108. HRVD Statements 07747, 07811, 03908, and 07089. See also CAVR Community Profile, Gurusa Village, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 21 November 2003.
109. HRVD Statements 04194 and 04129. See also CAVR Community Profiles: Ahic Village, Dilor, Lacluta Sub-district, Viqueque District, 22 November 2002; Luca Village, Viqueque Sub-district, Viqueque District, 10 June 2003; and Uaibobo Village, Ossu Sub-district, Viqueque District.
110. HRVD Statements 05173, 06351, 02046, 06263 and 08560.
111. HRVD Statements 02807, 02828 and 02630. See also CAVR Community Profile, Bobometo Village, Oesilo Sub-district, Oecussi District, 31 May 2003.
112. See for example, HRVD Statements 02930, 00853 00859; and CAVR Community Profile, Usitaqeno Village, Oesilo Sub-district, Oecussi District, 24 July 2003; Suni Ufe Village, Nitibe Sub-district, Oecussi District, 17 January 2003.
113. HRVD Statement 0831.
114. HRVD Statement 02418.
115. HRVD Statements 0140, 01391, 01392, 01307, 01312, 01334, 01335, 01381, 01382, 01392 and 03310.
116. See, for example, CAVR Community Profiles from: Asbilitoho Village, Asbilitoho Village, Asumano Village and Manukasa Village taken in Liquidoe Sub-district, Aileu District, between 11 July and 3 September 2003.
117. Article 4 Geneva Convention III; Article 44 (1), (3) and (4) Geneva Protocol I. (This includes combatants who are sick or wounded: Article 14 Geneva Convention I.)

118. Article 4A Geneva Convention III.
119. CAVR Interview with Jacinto Alves, former assistant to the Falintil chief-of-staff, Dili, 3 May, 2005.
120. Article 5 Geneva Convention III; Article 45 (1) Geneva Protocol I.
121. Article 4 Hague Regulations; article 13 Geneva Convention III.
122. Articles 13 and 17 Geneva Convention III.
123. Articles 15, 26, 30 Geneva Convention III.
124. Articles 19 and 23 Geneva Convention III.
125. Article 5 Geneva Convention IV.
126. Carmel Budiardjo & Kiem Soei Liong, The War Against East Timor, Document 8 Military Regional Command XVI, Udayana, Established Procedure for Interrogation of Prisoners, PROTAP/01-B/VII/1982.
127. HRVD Statements 01440 and 06571. See also CAVR Community Profiles, Fatuloro Village, Fatululik Sub-district, Covalima District, 20 November 2002; Tapo Village, Maliana Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 24 November 2003.
128. HRVD Statement 0485. See also CAVR Community Profile, Tapo Village, Maliana Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 24 November 2003.
129. CAVR Community Profile, Lifau Village, Laleia Sub-district, Manatuto District, 17 June 2003.
130. CAVR Interview with Zeferino Armando Ximenes, (undated).
131. HRVD Statement 07331 and 05069.
132. For example, HRVD Statement 00716.
133. HRVD Statement 06515.
134. HRVD Statement 01267.
135. Article 22 Hague Regulations; Article 35 (1) Geneva Protocol I; Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1986) ICJ Reports, para 77.
136. St Petersburg Declaration 1868; Article 23 Hague Regulations; Article 35 (2) Geneva Protocol I; Advisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons (1986) ICJ Reports, para 78.
137. Article 51 (4) Geneva Protocol I; A*dvisory Opinion on the Threat or Use of Nuclear Weapons* (1986) ICJ Reports, para 78.
138. See also Article 54 (2) Geneva Protocol I.
139. See also Article 54 (1) Geneva Protocol I.
140. Official Operational Procedure, No.: PROTAP/3/IV/1988, Capabilities of Tactical Planes, 30 April 1988, the Indonesian Armed Forces, Security Operation Command in East Timor.
141. The Official Operational Procedure, No.: PROTAP/3/IV/1988, 30 April 1988, Ammunition Capability and Safe Range, the Indonesian Armed Forces, Security Operation Command in East Timor.
142. CAVR Community Profile, Maneluma Village, Laulara Sub-district, Aileu District, 12 December 2002.
143. CAVR Community Profile, Laclo and Paramin Villages, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District, 16 June 2003
144. Ibid.
145. CAVR Community Profile, Atara and Lasaun Villages, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District, 14 April 2003.
146. CAVR Community Profile, Guololo Village, Letefoho Sub-district, Ermera District, 25 November 2003.
147. CAVR Interview with Agusto Soares, in Hatolia, Ermera, 13 August 2003.
148. Ibid.
149. CAVR Community Profile, Bora and Manelima Villages, Laclubar Sub-district, Manatuto District, 3 September 2003.
150. CAVR Community Profile, Kakae Uman Village, Natarbora/Barique Sub-district, Manatuto District, 11 April 2003.
151. CAVR Community Profile, Guruça Village, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 21 November 2003.
152. CAVR Community Profiles in Darulete Village, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District 13 Febuary 2003 ; Leimea Kraik and Samara Villages, Hatolia Sub-district, Ermera District, 20 August 2003; Souro Village, Lospalos Sub-district, Lautém District, 24 Febuary 2004; Lebos and Guldapil Villages, Lolotoe Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 9 September 2003 ; Fatuloro Village, Faululik Sub-district, Covalima District, 21 November 2002; and Lifau Village, Laleia Sub-district, Manatuto District, 17 June 2003.

153. CAVR Interview with Lucas da Costa Xavier, former ABRI/TNI soldier, Same, Manufahi, 13 August 2004.
154. Official Operational Procedure, No.: PROTAP/3/IV/1988, Capabilities of Tactical Planes, 30 April 1988, the Indonesian Armed Forces, Security Operation Command in East Timor.
155. Conboy, p. 276.
156. Indonesian military film footage, obtained by the Commission from anonymous sources, Jakarta 2005. CAVR Archive.
157. Protocol on Prohibitions or Restrictions on the Use of Incendiary Weapons 1980.
158. CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 21 September 2004.
159. CAVR Community Profile, Obulo and Butamanu Villages, Atsabe Sub-district, Ermera District, 13 May 2003.
160. Article 23 Hague Regulations.
161. Article 51 Geneva Convention IV.
162. Ibid.
163. HRVD Statement 02491.
164. HRVD Statement 05720.
165. HRVD Statement 03412.
166. HRVD Statement 01105.
167. HRVD Statement 04012.
168. CAVR Community Profile, Guruça Village, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 21 November 2003.
169. HRVD Statement 05685.
170. See HRVD Statement 07752, and CAVR Community Profile, Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 27 November 2002.
171. See for example, HRVD Statement 06081.
172. See for example, CAVR Community Profiles in Leber Village, Bobonaro Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 24 November 2003; Guda Village, Lolotoe Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 26 August 2003; Leohito Village, Balibó Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 21 January 2004; and Lourba Village, Bobonaro Sub-district, Bobonaro District, 25 January 2003.
173. HRVD Statement 08365.
174. HRVD Statement 03403.
175. See for example, HRVD Statement 04763.
176. CAVR Community Profile, Defawassi Village, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, 23 September 2003.
177. HRVD Statement 03101.
178. HRVD Statement 01071.
179. CAVR Community Profiles, Bibileo Village, Viqueque Sub-district, Viqueque District, 5 June 2003; Irabin de Baixo Village, Uatu Carbau Sub-district, Viqueque District, 26 August 2003; Assu da Cima Village, Ossu Sub-district, Viqueque District, 20 March 2003; and Manulesu Village, Liquedoe Sub-district, Aileu District, 27 August 2003.
180. HRVD Statement 03135.
181. HRVD Statement 03093.
182. HRVD Statement 03421.
183. HRVD Statement 00168.
184. HRVD Statement 01990.
185. HRVD Statement 03963.
186. HRVD Statement 03474.
187. HRVD Statement 06044.
188. HRVD Statement 04351.
189. HRVD Statement 05687.
190. Instruction – Operation No. INSOP/03/II/1982.

191. See for example, CAVR Community Profile, Asumano Village, Liquidoe Sub-district, Aileu District, 11 July 2003.
192. Instruction – Operation No. INSOP/03/II/1982, p. 8.
193. Conboy, p. 298.
194. See Korps Marinir TNI AL, 1970-2000, Marine Information Department, Jakarta, 2000, p. 274.
195. CAVR Community Profile, Lelalai Village, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 20 October 2003.
196. CAVR Community Profile, Muapetini Village, Lospalos Sub-district, Lautém District, 18 February 2004. (Apakah sama dengan Muapitine yg disebutkan sebelum ini?)
197. CAVR Community Profile, Rasa Village, Lospalos Sub-district, Lautém District, 1 July 2004.
198. HRVD Statement 06057.
199. HRVD Statement 05224.
200. Kepala Intelejen Mayor Willem Da Costa, Petunjuk Teknis Tentang Kegiatan Babinsa, (Juknis/06/IV/1982) [Head of intelligence Major Willem Da Costa, Technical Guidelines Regarding the Activities of the Babinsa], 10 September 1982. Budiardjo dan Liem, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, 1984, p. 201.
201. HRVD Statement 04107.
202. HRVD Statement 05040.
203. CAVR Community Profile, Uaitame Village, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 12 December 2003.
204. See for example, CAVR Community Profile, Fahisoi Village, Remexio Sub-district, Aileu District, 29 May 2003.
205. HRVD Statement 03465.
206. HRVD Statement 04071.
207. HRVD Statement 01022.
208. See for example, HRVD Statement 03252.
209. HRVD Statement 04756.
210. HRVD Statement 02283.
211. CAVR Community Profile, Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 21 November 2003.
212. CAVR Community Profile, Bibileo Village, Viqueque Sub-district, Viqueque District, 5 June 2003.
213. CAVR Community Profiles, Uairoke Village, Luro Sub-district, Lautém District, 7 October 2003; Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 11 November 2002.
214. CAVR Community Profile, Mehara Village, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 27 November 2002.
215. HRVD Statements 05317, 05365 and 05389.
216. HRVD Statement 04129.
217. HRVD Statement 00155.
218. HRVD Statement 05316.
219. HRVD Statement 04439.
220. See for example HRVD Statements 04251 and 06817.
221. HRVD Statements 01429 and 07696.
222. HRVD Statement 04386.
223. CAVR Community Profile, Guruça Village, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 21 November 2003.
224. HRVD Statement 01036.
225. HRVD Statement 05825 and 01313.
226. HRVD Statements 04793 and 01752.
227. HRVD Statement 03078.
228. HRVD Statement 07665.
229. CAVR Community Profile, Bualale Village, Quelicai Sub-district, Baucau District, 16 December 2003.
230. CAVR Community Profile, Namalesu, Liquidoe Sub-district, Aileu District, 27 August 2003.
231. See for example, HRVD Statements 00638 and 00427.
232. See for example, CAVR Community Profile, Uaimori Village, Tula (nama desa juga?), Viqueque Sub-district, Viqueque District, 19 June 2003.
233. CAVR Community Profile, Bibileo Village, Viqueque Sub-district, Viqueque District, 5 June 2003.

234. HRVD Statement 06483.
235. HRVD Statements 03408 and 04748.
236. HRVD Statements 06293, 00762 and 01425.
237. HRVD Statements 02934, 01958 (versi Indonesia 018958) and 00243.
238. António Serpa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Conflict 1974-76, 15-18 December 2003.
239. CAVR Interview with Humberto Martins da Cruz [undated].
240. Ibid; see also HRVD Statement 09081.
241. Francisco Guterres "Lú-Olo", testimony in his capacity as President of Fretilin, and testimony of Mari Alkatiri in his capacity as Secretary General of Fretilin, to the CAVR National Public Hearing on The Internal Political Conflict 1974-76, 15-18 December 2003.
242. Francisco Xavier do Amaral, ibid.
243. Angelo Araújo, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres 19-21, November, 2003
244. CAVR Interview with Brigadier General Taur Matan Ruak, Dili, 9 June 2004.
245. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
246. CAVR Interview with Agostinho Boavida Ximenes (Sera Malik), Soe, West Timor, Indonesia, 28 August 2004.
247. CAVR Interview with José da Conceição, Kupang, West Timor, Indonesia, 24 August 2004.
248. CAVR Community Profile, Faturasa Village, Remexio Sub-district, Aileu District, 20 June 2003.
249. CAVR interview with Lucas da Costa, Dili, 21 June 2004.
250. CAVR Community Profile, Fahisoi Village, Remexio Sub-district, Aileu District, 29 May 2003.
251. CAVR Community Profile, Guruça Village, Quelicai Sub-District, Baucau District, 21 November 2003.
252. CAVR Interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 7 July 2004.
253. Xanana Gusmão, Timor Leste: Um Povo Uma Pátria, Edicões Colibri, 1994, p. 31.
254. Ibid.
255. See for example, HRVD Statement 04149.
256. HRVD Statement 07612.
257. See CAVR Community Profiles from these sub-districts. CAVR Archive.

Photo/CAVR archives

Chega!

Part 7.6.

Political Trials

Part 7.6. Political Trials

7.6. Political Trials

Introduction

1. This part examines the trials of Timorese prisoners for political crimes by the Indonesian state during the period of Indonesian occupation in Timor-Leste. The Commission acknowledges that Fretilin also tried people for political crimes, including treason, under its system of administration in the late 1970s. Fretilin trials are considered in Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy and Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-treatment by Fretilin, 1976-79.

2. The Indonesian courts in Timor-Leste began to conduct criminal cases from 1977,* but the criminal law was not used to target political opponents to the claimed integration of Timor-Leste into Indonesia in the early years of the occupation. Instead of being put on trial, political prisoners in this period were either held in indefinite arbitrary detention or killed. In 1983, a new policy of "normalisation" led to a decision by the Indonesian government to charge people suspected of assisting the movement for independence with offences such as treason and subversion, and to prosecute them in the courts. Hundreds of East Timorese were tried and convicted of these offences during the next 16 years.

3. The Commission has read and considered the contents of several hundred of the Dili District Court files in relation to these trials. In addition it has interviewed and received statements from a variety of individuals who were defendants in trials, witnesses to events and lawyers, both East Timorese and Indonesian, who were involved in the cases.

4. The picture that emerged from these inquiries is that the trials did not necessarily signal a reduction in the human rights violations that were occurring, but to some degree altered their form. The killing, arbitrary detention, and torture of political opponents continued. In addition a range of actors including military intelligence officers, police, prosecutors, defence counsel and judges were involved in other violations related to the conduct of political "show trials".

* As early as 24 July 1976, the Kodahankam (Komando Daerah Pertahanan Keamanan, Regional Defence and Security Command) Commander, Colonel Dading Kalbuadi, issued an arrest warrant for the governor's driver, Tito Dos Santos Baptista (22), for violation of Article 359 of the Indonesian Criminal Code (KUHP) in connection with a fatal car accident. [Interview with Mario Carrascalão, 30 June, 204]

5. These trials were intended to demonstrate to the world that a change in policy had produced a new commitment to human rights and the rule of law. In fact the trials were a sophisticated production designed to produce an illusion of justice and due process. This veneer hid the reality that the trials were a tool that ensured the conviction of political opponents whilst providing a response to international critics.

6. The trials involved a range of violations of both the Indonesian criminal code and international law. Suspects were routinely tortured and intimidated into signing Records of Interrogation (RoI), which contained confessions and evidence against other co-accused. These Records of Interrogation were the basis for many convictions. Indonesian military and police officers consistently gave false evidence under oath in court, and intimidated other witnesses into doing the same or not providing testimony at all. Defendants were refused the right to select lawyers to defend them and in most cases were appointed with lawyers who did little more than speed up the prosecution case. Judges ignored indications of unethical behaviour and evidence that had been fabricated, and handed down judgments of guilty in all cases. The sentences were disproportionately harsh and often did not take into account lengthy periods of time already served in military detention. The Commission did not find a record of complete acquittal of a single defendant in any of the hundreds of case files examined. Appeal proceedings provided a rubber stamp of higher authority on the tainted decisions of the trial judges.

7. Because of the large number of political trials that were conducted, the Commission was unable to report in depth on all violations. It has therefore included in this part an analysis of some of the most significant political trials that occurred during the Indonesian occupation. The violations apparent from the conduct of these trials are generally consistent with the patterns found to exist in other trials examined by the Commission.

8. The section begins with a survey of the first wave of political trials from 1983-1985, then provides specific analysis of four high-profile sets of trials: the trials in 1992 of the organisers of the Santa Cruz demonstration; the 1992 trial of the organisers of the Jakarta demonstration; the trial of Xanana Gusmão in 1993; and the trial in 1997 of the organisers and participants in the Mahkota hotel demonstration.

Legal framework

9. As discussed in detail in the Mandate Part of this Report the purported integration of Timor-Leste into Indonesia was invalid according to international law. Indonesia was an occupying power in Timor-Leste.

10. Geneva Convention IV states that the penal laws in force in the territory immediately before the occupation shall "remain in force, with the exception that they may be repealed or suspended by the Occupying Power in cases where they constitute a threat to its security or an obstacle to the application of the present Convention".[1]

11. Civilians in the occupied territory may be tried for criminal acts designed to harm the occupying power.[2] However, the laws of armed conflict expressly state that the civilians in an occupied territory may not be required to swear allegiance to the occupying power.[*] Indonesia was therefore not permitted to persecute or punish the inhabitants of Timor-Leste for political opposition to the occupation, including for the crimes of subversion or treason.

12. Notwithstanding the above, the Commission accepts that, as a matter of fact, the Indonesian government applied the laws of Indonesia in their entirety to the territory of Timor-Leste during the relevant period. The Commission has found that not only was there no right to try individuals for political opposition, but the manner in which the trials of political opponents were carried out was in violation of many of the applicable provisions of Indonesian law and international law.

13. This section considers the extent to which the trials of East Timorese political opponents during the occupation violated either Indonesian law and/or international standards of a "fair trial". This includes reference to specific violations of the Indonesian Criminal Code (Kitab Undang-undang Hukum Pidana, KUHP), Indonesian Criminal Procedure Code (Kitab Undang-undang Hukum Acara Pidana, KUHAP) Indonesia's express treaty obligations under Geneva Convention IV, customary international law, and violations of international human rights standards included in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR).

Indonesian law

14. The vast majority of political defendants were charged under the Indonesian Criminal Code (KUHP) with makar[3] or under the Anti-Subversion Law 11/1963 with overthrowing, destroying or undermining the power or authority of the state.[†] "Makar" is defined as an attempt undertaken with intent to bring the territory of the state wholly or partially under foreign domination or to separate part thereof.

15. The Indonesian Criminal Procedure Code (KUHAP) governs all criminal trials in Indonesia. Although it does not provide extensive fair trial guarantees, it does contain provisions that protect the rights of suspects and defendants. These include:

---

* Article 45 of the Regulations Annexed to Hague Convention IV (under which it is prohibited to force the population of the occupied territory to swear allegiance to the occupying power); see also Geneva Convention III, Article 87 (in sentencing prisoners of war, the courts or authorities must take into consideration, to the widest extent possible, that the accused is not a national and owes no duty of allegiance).

† Article 1(1)b Anti-Subversion Law 11/1963: It is a punishable offence to overthrow, destroy or undermine the power of the state or the authority of the state or the authority of the lawful government or the machinery of the state.

- Access to independent lawyers (Article 54, 55), family (Article 60,61) and doctors pre-trial (Article 58)
- The right not to give evidence (Article 66)
- The right to a public trial (Articles 64, 153)
- The right to call witnesses (Article 65) and state a defence (Article 182 1b)
- The right of defendants and witnesses to be free from intimidation (Article 117)
- The right to appeal (Article 67).

International humanitarian law

16. A number of legally binding obligations in relation to the guarantee of a fair trial arise from the legal status of Indonesia as an occupying power according to international humanitarian law. As a party to the Fourth Geneva Convention from 1958, Indonesia was bound to observe the following obligations, among others:

- Article 67: "The courts shall apply only those provisions of law which were applicable before the offence, and which are in accordance with general principles of law, in particular the principle that the penalty shall be proportionate to the offence. They shall take into consideration the fact the accused is not a national of the Occupying Power."
- Article 71: "No sentence shall be pronounced by the competent courts of the Occupying Power except after a regular trial. Accused persons who are prosecuted by the Occupying Power shall be promptly informed, in writing, in a language which they understand, of the particulars of the charges preferred against them, and shall be brought to trial as rapidly as possible."
- Article 72: "Accused persons shall have the right to present evidence necessary to their defence and may, in particular, call witnesses. They shall have the right to be assisted by a qualified advocate or counsel of their own choice, who shall be able to visit them freely and shall enjoy the necessary facilities for preparing the defence."

International human rights standards

17. The minimal standards of the right to a fair trial are set out in Articles 14 and 15 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR). The relevant guarantees may be summarised as follows:

- The right to be promptly informed of the nature and cause of the charge. The information must enable the accused to understand what is being alleged so that they are in a position to prepare a defence.
- The right to adequate time and facilities to prepare a defence, and the right to communicate with counsel of the accused's choice. This includes access to relevant documents, and the ability to communicate freely and in confidence with counsel.

- The presumption of innocence. This means that the accused is presumed innocent until proven guilty. The burden of proving the offence lies with the prosecution.
- The right to a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal.
- The right to be tried without undue delay.
- The right to be tried in one's presence.
- The right to defend oneself in person or through legal counsel of one's choice. The accused cannot be limited in choice of available defences recognised by law.
- The right to have legal assistance provided by the State if the accused is not able to pay for legal assistance.
- The right to examine witnesses.
- The right to have the free assistance of an interpreter if the accused cannot understand or speak the language used in court.
- The right not to testify against oneself or implicate oneself.
- The right not to be tried for something that was not criminal at the time it was committed.
- The right not to be tried for something for which one has already been tried.

Analytical framework

18. Based on Indonesian law, international humanitarian law and customary international law, Indonesia was obliged to guarantee a fair trial to those charged with criminal offences in the occupied territory of Timor-Leste. The following analysis considers five critical moments during the occupation: the first wave of political trials in 1983-85; the Santa Cruz trials in the early 1990s; the Jakarta trials; the trial of Xanana Gusmão; and the Hotel Mahkota trial. It uses the procedural guarantees identified above to determine the extent to which trials in each of these five situations complied with Indonesia's obligations under domestic and international law.

The first wave of political trials, 1983–1985

Background

19. The Indonesian civil justice system was operational in Timor-Leste from at least 1977.[4] However, formal trials of Fretilin (Frente Revolucionaria de Timor-Leste Independente) supporters and others linked to the independence movement did not begin until 1983.* The period 1983-85 saw a surge in "political trials" of individuals charged with treason, subversion or similar offences.

* There are reports of informal proceedings taking place in detention centres such as Sang Tai Hoo.

20. The first four trials of individuals charged on the basis of their membership of "GPK"[*] /Fretilin took place in December 1983. A letter from Indonesian Foreign Minister Ali Alatas to Amnesty International, dated 30 April 1984, noted that a further 200 trials were planned. By the end of 1985 there had been at least 232 verdicts handed down in relation to political trials – all of them guilty.[†] In 1986 a further 70 individuals were prosecuted. By 1987 the number of political trials being held had decreased significantly. In contrast, the number of trials for ordinary criminal offences remained constant throughout this period.[‡]

21. The move towards formal trials for those accused of treason or similar offences signifies a shift in policy on the part of the Indonesian authorities. This policy involved adding the use of the formal justice system to the methods employed in the fight against the pro-independence movement.

22. However, this does not mean that the policy involved moving away from the previous practices of subjecting pro-independence activists to arbitrary detention, torture, and extrajudicial killings. Analysis of the violations reported to the Commission confirms that these practices continued after the decision was made to also use the formal justice system (see Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations and Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-treatment).

23. Indeed defendants in several of the cases will have been aware that people who had been detained with them had been killed, disappeared or had died in detention as a result of ill-treatment. In some of the cases brought to trial, people alleged in court to have conspired with a defendant were themselves unable to appear as witnesses because they had been killed or had disappeared.[§] The fate of these people was never

* Indonesian abbreviation for gerombolan pengacau keamanan, "band of security disruptors", the New Order name for resistance movements in Aceh, Papua and Timor-Leste.

† One former prisoner described Balide, where most political detainees were held, as full until 1983, with about 200 people. Interview with David da Conçeicão (Aleon), The Neil Barrett Comarca Video Project, Submission to CAVR, August 2002; Caetano Guterres estimated there were about 300 prisoners, see CAVR interview with Caetano Guterres, Dili, 22 May 2004, p.5.

‡ According to Judge Siregar, "GPK" trials began in 1983 with five defendants, increasing to 82 in 1984, and 69 in 1985 through to 13 August 1985. In June 1985, the government issued a list of 154 people from December 1983-March 1985, later revised upwards to 157. A second government list obtained by Amnesty International dated 28 May 1985 listed 31 dossiers submitted to the Public Prosecutor (Jaksa Penuntut Umum, JPU). A third list, dated 23 July 1985, has eight names tried in July (including one from the previous list). Taken together these lists indicated as many as 185 East Timorese tried for political offenses by July 1985. Amnesty International, Unfair Trials and Possible Torture in East Timor, December 1985.

§ Thus, for example: in the David Ximenes case two people alleged to have participated in meetings with the defendant, João Christorei and Danilo da Silva, both disappeared, along with many others, after being arrested following the Marabia attack of 10 June 1980; in the case of Zé Roberto Seixas Miranda Jeronimo, four people alleged to have attended meetings with the defendant, Francisco Serpa Rosa, Manuel Jeronimo, Manuel da Costa and Filomeno da Gama were reported to have been killed or to have disappeared at or around the time of Zé Roberto Seixas's arrest in November 1983. Several defendants, including Aitahan Matak, Henrique Belmiro, Fernando da Costa and Rogerio Pinto, were part of a group of 69 prisoners who were arrested in August 1983 and shortly afterwards taken to Penfui prison in Kupang. Only 14 of the 69 survived their year of imprisonment in Kupang. The rest either disappeared or died as a result of the deplorable conditions in which they were held. For more on all these cases, see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Disappearances.

mentioned in court, but could not have failed to prey on the minds of the accused as they faced trial.

24. The shift in policy also did not produce a situation in which pro-independence figures were granted fair trials on charges relating to their activities. What in fact took place was that a portion of those who were arrested for pro-independence activities were dealt with through trials, and these trials were manipulated to ensure that the defendants would be found guilty of treason and subversion.

25. Guilty verdicts for defendants were guaranteed through the use of physical torture and sleep deprivation during the interrogation process, intimidation of witnesses who might be able to testify on behalf of defendants, fabrication of evidence, collusion and fabrication of statements by prosecution witnesses, not allowing defendants to choose the lawyers who would defend them and manipulation of the trial process.

26. The trials therefore supplied the Indonesian government with a superficial answer to the increasing volume of international criticism over human rights violations in Timor-Leste. The trials created a basis for arguing that the program to suppress the pro-independence movement was no longer based on gross violations of the rights of those suspected of pro-independence activities. However, in fact it was only the form of some of the violations that had changed. The systematic use of torture, arbitrary imprisonment and killing continued at the same time as political opponents were subjected to unfair trial processes which violated many of their fundamental rights.

27. It may be that the violation of the rights of some of those suspected of pro-independence activities was less severe than it would have been had the policy shift to include trials as a tool in the program not taken place. The detentions, interrogations, unfair trial process and imprisonment may be argued to be an improvement on the previous practices, which were conducted almost totally "in the dark". At least the trials were public, they probably involved less violence, and defendants were less likely to be killed or disappeared following public trials. But this does not detract from the fact that the trials themselves, and the terms of imprisonment that inevitably followed, involved serious violations of the rights of all the accused persons who were prosecuted.

28. The trials were, in effect, a sham that provided an illusion of a policy shift towards more respect for fundamental rights. This illusion, to some degree, diverted attention away from the violations that were still taking place

29. In 1985 Amnesty International noted that:

> In 1984 and 1985, the Indonesian Government pointed to trials of political prisoners in Dili, East Timor as evidence that the human rights situation in the territory had improved…Press accounts have quoted Indonesian officials as stating that all prisoners either have been tried or are scheduled for trial. [5]

30. Indonesia's efforts proved a somewhat effective means of gaining international approval, particularly as international observers were not able to monitor the trial processes and conditions of imprisonment of defendants. In 1984, the US State Department wrote:

> Many East Timorese detained in earlier years were tried in civilian courts this year. Represented by government-provided civilian attorneys and charged with criminal code violations, seventy persons were convicted and sentenced to terms ranging from one to eighteen years.[6]

31. The Commission, through its examination of over 200 court files and by interviewing many of the persons tried and others involved in the trial process, has been able to establish a clear picture of what actually transpired in relation to the political trials.

Formal legal processes

32. Documents examined by the Commission show that a policy change, initiated by the Indonesian military, took place in September 1983. Orders were given for cases previously under the control of the military to be handed over to district police commanders to be processed as criminal cases in the courts.[*] This policy was designed to reinforce the legitimacy of Indonesia's presence through an impression of normality and application of the rule of law.

33. While this change in policy ostensibly meant that responsibility was handed over to police, prosecutors and judges, an active role continued to be played behind the scenes by senior military figures.[7]

34. Documents in a case file examined by the Commission indicate that in 1984 a Special Police Task Force was established to work on the investigations.[8] This team seems to have replaced the earlier Regional (ie Provincial) Police Task Force 11.3 of East Timor (Kowil 11.3 Timor-Timur) and the Operations Implementation Command (Komando Pelaksanaan Operasi, Kolakops) Investigation Team. On 21 February 1984, the Chief of East Timor Regional Police (Polisi Wilayah, Polwil), Drs. Soenardjadi, issued an order (No. Pol: Prinlak/69/Ii/1984/Polwil Tims) to "facilitate the tasks of the East Timor Police, within the framework of improving the efficiency of the Nusa Tenggara Police Task Force".[9]

---

* The document TR/130/1983, dated 26 September 1983, reads: "Aaa…many criminal cases were previously handled by the Kodim Commanders [.] Bbb…it is ordered that all recipients [of this order] immediately reassign their cases to the relevant Sub-district Police Commanders (Danres) [,] for the immediate processing of the cases [.]"
The document was sent by the commander of the military command for East Timor province (Korem 164/Wira Darma) to the commanders of all district military commands (Kodims 1627 to 1639) in Timor-Leste. Copies of the document were sent to the Kodam commander-in-chief (Pangdam) XVI/Udayana, who had direct command responsibility for Kolakops from 1978 to1990, the Police Commander of the provincial police of East Timor, Deputy Commander of the Nusa Tenggara Region Tactical Command of the Special Implementer (Wapa Kotis Laksusda Nusra), Korem 164/Wira Darma heads of sections one, three and five (Kasi 1, 3, And 5 Rem 164/WD).
This document was found in several files, including that of David Dias Ximenes, No. 22/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL. There are also references in the files to a TR and Kolakops No:TR/661/IX/1983 dated 28 September 1983 regarding the hand-over of the detainee to be processed following the prevailing procedure of law that is likely to be an implementation of the order.

35. Within three months of this order being issued, at least 15 persons were handed over to the police for judicial processing.[10] The Commission has examined a document addressed to the Dili District police commander from the Dili District Military (Komando Distrik Militer, Kodim) commander, Lieutenant Colonel Rohiat Wiseso. The document lists the handover of 15 suspects. Another such handover took place on 21 February 1984. The Korem commander, Colonel Rudito, in his capacity as Kolakops commander, handed over seven detainees to the police to be processed by law. Clearly, these were the cases considered "ready" for processing and did not represent the totality of operational detainees held.[11]

Informing defendants of their basic rights

36. The Commission has seen no evidence to suggest that those accused of political crimes were informed of their basic rights before trial. The Indonesian Criminal Procedure Code states that on arrest, a person may request assistance from a lawyer of his or her choice (KUHAP Articles 55 and 60) or from a lawyer designated by the state. In cases where the individual may face the death penalty or a sentence of five years or more, legal assistance is compulsory from the time of arrest.

37. All of the cases examined fell within the category of compulsory legal assistance. However, none of the Records of Interrogation (RoI, in Indonesia known as Berita Acara Pemeriksa or BAP) examined by the Commission from this period indicate that the accused was informed of this right, or provided with an opportunity to have defence counsel of their own choice present.

38. Under Indonesian law, there is a basic presumption of innocence until guilt is proved (KUHAP Article 6). Detained persons were not advised of this, nor were they told that they had a right to challenge the legality of their arrest and detention (Articles 77 to 83). Those accused were not advised of their right not to incriminate themselves (Article 66).*

39. Before being transferred to police custody for trial, suspects were often held for long periods of time in military custody. This was so despite international human rights standards requiring that persons detained on criminal charges be brought promptly before a judge, and the requirement under Geneva Convention IV that accused persons prosecuted by the occupying power must be brought to trial as rapidly as possible.[12] During the period of the Soeharto military dictatorship members of the military forces were granted the authority to investigate, arrest and detain individuals who were deemed to be a threat to national security.† (This authority was withdrawn after the fall of the

* The suspect and the defendant shall not be obliged to prove his/her innocence.

† This power was based on the formal letter given by President Soekarno to Soeharto on 11 March 1966. This "11 March Instruction", known as Supersemar, was used to establish the Command for the Restoration of Law and Order (Komando Pemulihan Keamanan dan Ketertiban, Kopkamtib) with Soeharto as its first leader, which replicated the military territorial structure. The authority of the Kopkamtib was extended by the Transitional People's Consultative Assembly (MPR) Decree (Ketetapan Majelis Permusyawaratan Rakyat Sementara, TAP MPRS No IXMPRS/1966), further extended by MPR Decree (Ketetapan Majelis Permusyawaratan Rakyat, TAP MPR NO X/MPR/1971) and given official recognition by President Soeharto's Presidential Decree No 9/1974. In 1988 the Kopkamtib was dissolved and replaced by the Bakorstanas (Agency for the Coordination of Support for the Development of National Security).

Soeharto regime). However many of those who were detained did not in reality pose a threat to national security, and the treatment of suspects in detention violated a wide range of international human rights standards.

40. In addition, the Criminal Procedure Code required that specific rules must be complied with if evidence were to be used against defendants in trials. These rules included that suspects be warned of their rights and be given the opportunity to have a lawyer present from the time of their arrest, particularly during interviews and interrogation. In the RoI of cases examined by the Commission not a single defendant was provided with this information at the time of interrogation. Accordingly the admissions made and evidence allegedly provided during interrogation should not have been admitted against the defendants at their trials. Despite this, these RoI formed the basis of conviction for the majority of defendants brought to trial.

41. David Dias Ximenes's file indicates that he was held in ABRI custody from 16 June 1980. On 21 February 1984, he was transferred to the police for processing. His RoI is also dated 21 February 1984. It is clear that he was held in military detention for over three years before being moved into the formal justice system. The file reveals that David Ximenes was transferred to the formal justice system together with six others, of whom three had been held in detention since November 1976.[13]

42. Domingos Seixas's RoI of 6 February 1984 records that he was arrested on 15 August 1983 by members of the Kodim, and was handed over to Sub-regional Military Command (Korem) 164/Wira Darma. On 16 August 1983, he was moved to Denpasar, Bali and then was moved back to the Comarca prison in Balide (Dili) on 9 November 1983. He appears to have entered police custody on 1 February 1984. In total, he was held in military detention for between three and six months before entering the criminal justice system.

43. Zé Roberto, the former sub-district administrator (Camat) of Illiomar, was arrested by the military in November 1983, but was not handed over to the police until 23 March 1984.[14] He was therefore held for between four and five months in military detention before entering the criminal justice system. The Commission's interviews with former political prisoners confirm that there were often periods of arbitrary detention before individuals were handed over for legal processing. Caetano Guterres informed the Commission that he was arrested in September 1983 and taken to the Dili Kodim where he was beaten and interrogated.[15] Guterres recalls being held for three months by Kopasandha/Kopassus in Colmera (Dili), where he was questioned every night. Maria Immaculada Araújo was arrested by the military on 12 June 1980 and taken to Balide prison. After one year she was moved to Ataúro, where she spent three years. She was then brought back to the Kodim for a month, followed by more time in the Comarca and then interrogation at the Office of Social and Political Affairs (Sospol)* in preparation for her trial in August 1984. She was therefore detained for over three years before being formally charged.

44. The degree to which the military illegally and arbitrarily detained suspects, and the way that suspects were treated while in military detention before trial, should have been raised with concern and examined by police, prosecutors, and the trial judges. Apart from the violations this treatment discloses on the part of military officers, it also throws considerable doubt on the value and admissibility of evidence supposedly given by defendants during periods of military detention. However, the court files (including standard documents such as those dealing with transfer of custody, detention, interviews and summaries of the case) indicate that police, prosecutors, and judges did not consider that prior arbitrary military detention was relevant.

* An office in the Ministry of Home Affairs.

Torture and ill-treatment in detention

45. Torture was especially common in the first days or weeks of detention, but in some cases continued for months or years leading to trial. (For further detail see Vol. III, Part 7.4.: Detention, Torture, and Ill-treatment). In many cases there was no other evidence apart from confessions given while being subjected to torture and intimidation in custody and from other persons who had also been detained by the military and themselves faced trial.

46. Abilio Tilman was one of the first clandestine members to be tried. He told the Commission that on 12 September 1983 he was taken to East Dili Sub-district Military Command (Komando Rayon Militer, Koramil) in Becora by the head of aldeia Mota Ulun in Becora, Dili, who was then given money as payment for handing him in. From there he was taken to the Kodim where soldiers punched and kicked him in the nose and forehead until his skin was torn and bleeding. The next day he was interrogated by soldiers, who beat him if he did not give the answers they wanted until he passed out. This procedure was repeated every day. He was fed once each day and his injuries were left untreated.

47. According to Abilio Tilman, on 12 November, after 30 days of this treatment, he and his cellmates were moved to the Comarca prison, where the men were stripped and tortured by military police. A visit from the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) stopped the torture, and he was taken to Sospol for interrogation. He was not tortured there but the beatings resumed after he returned to the Comarca. After his trial he was sentenced to seven years imprisonment and was sent to Cipinang prison in Jakarta to serve his sentence.[16]

48. A clandestine member arrested in the same group as Aquelino Fraga Guterres remembers:

> First they destroyed my body, for example, they reduced the food ration for one year. After this difficult time, they interrogated me: "How many times have you met with Falintil? What kind of assistance have you given to Falintil?" During interrogation they beat me with their guns, crushed my toes with chairs and electrocuted me. In the interrogation they couldn't care less about what I did wrong. Instead they told me what my crimes were and forced me to admit to them. This included sending ammunition, instant noodles, batteries…if you admitted all of these, you could be put on trial and released quickly (Kopassus insisted on these crimes). This went against my beliefs, so I refused to obey their wishes.

Only Kopassus [members] interrogated me. In SGI detention only certain people (ABRI) could come and conduct the interrogation. I only saw one intelligence officer, Antonio (Manatuto) from Timor-Leste. Kopassus formed two groups to conduct interrogation and torture. The interrogations usually took place at night and each person would be in their cell. During the interrogation, the questions they asked had to be answered and admitted to, otherwise they beat and electrocuted me until I [felt like] dying. When I regained consciousness, they continued the torture.[17]

49. Amadeo da Silva Carvalho told the Commission that his father Luis, a clandestine member, was arrested on 20 June 1980 in Lecoto (Balibar, Dili) and detained at the East Dili Koramil in Becora. There, he was tied to the upper branches of a tree each day. He was then moved to the former Colmera village office (Dili) and tortured. He was placed in water tanks with sharp-toothed lizards. The Commission has received similar evidence of the use of lizards during torture from a number of victims (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-treatment). Luis was also forced to fight another detainee. He was sent from Dili to be detained on Ataúro on 4 August 1980. In 1983, Luis was one of eight detainees brought from Ataúro to be tried.[18]

50. Antonio Tomas Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak) reported being hung upside down from a tree until his leg joints broke, as a form of torture:

The justice procedure was: they would [bring us for] interrogation as far as Kupang, then back to Dili Korem, then they tied me to the banyan tree (at the former Military Police headquarters), my head below, feet above, I broke my legs this way and to this day I cannot walk straight.[19]

51. Indonesian officials claimed that prison conditions were adequate, indeed better than during Portuguese times. A security official told a visiting Indonesian parliamentarian in 1985 that for arrests and interrogations, a humanitarian approach was always adopted. An Indonesian reporter who visited Dili that same year wrote:

In Balide prison, which has 129 criminals and 29 detainees including three women, there is no impression of a prison. The door is always open, supervision isn't strict, and with the humanitarian approach, there is mutual trust between prison officials and criminals. When this correspondent asked: "Aren't you afraid of escapes?" Major Mustari answered: "Even less so now. They're more secure here, and there are even some who don't want to go home."[20]

Record of Interrogation (RoI)

52. Following interrogation, a RoI would be drawn up to be signed by the suspect. The Commission has received testimony, discussed below, that in many cases the RoI did not reflect what was said by the accused during interrogation. Not one of the cases examined indicates the presence of a lawyer representing the suspect during interrogation and at the signing of the RoI.

53. In addition to the torture during detention described above, there are reports of intimidation and coercion at the stage where suspects were required to sign a RoI. This ranged from the withholding of family visits to threats of lifelong imprisonment. Aitahan Matak was brought back from Kupang on 24 August 1984 but his trial was delayed because he refused to cooperate. After months of pressure, he agreed to sign an RoI and appear as a witness:

> And they said gently that you, Antonio Aitahan Matak, have to accept it so that you can see your family, you are still young, so you can marry. If you refuse the trials you will die in prison; you cannot escape prison.[21]

54. This account is consistent with contemporaneous reports by international human rights organisations. In 1988, Amnesty International noted:

> Many of the released prisoners appear to have been tried on the basis of false or coerced testimony after long periods of incommunicado detention during which some were reportedly told that signing a confession and being brought before a court would enable them to receive visits from their families.[22]

55. Some detainees signed an RoI willingly as a way of maintaining secrecy about other clandestine operations. Aquelino Fraga Guterres agreed to sign the RoI when he saw that it included mostly minor offences, and did not refer to leadership of Dili's clandestine networks or the sending of sensitive information overseas. Similarly, Marito Reis voluntarily signed his RoI so that he could go to trial, rather than being held secretly in detention for an indefinite period. At least being brought to trial meant that the public could become aware of the whereabouts of the suspect.

56. Some prisoners refused to cooperate or sign false confessions despite threats and the uncertainty of what might happen to them. After nearly two years in detention, 50 detainees, including 19 from Baucau, were released on 27 April 1985 in a public ceremony. One member of this group, Cristiano da Costa, told the UN Human Rights Commission:

> Many political prisoners were made to sign false confessions which were then used to stage sham trials...I myself and 49 others refused to sign these false confessions so we were never tried. On 27 April 1985 after 20 months in prison, those of us who had refused to take part in the trials were released. We then had to report every week to the Indonesian military command.[23]

57. Translation was an issue in many of the trials. Defendants were interrogated without interpreters and signed documents containing admissions of guilt, which were written in a language they did not understand.

58. In one example, the court file reveals that the RoI of Domingos Seixas, written in Indonesian, was admitted as evidence in his trial even though no interpreter had been present at the time he was interrogated and signed the RoI. The court transcript in the same file reveals that at trial, the judges determined that his Indonesian was inadequate and that he required the assistance of a translator, who served throughout his trial. Despite the fact that they ordered that Domingos needed a translator during this trial, neither judges nor defence counsel questioned the legitimacy of the signed RoI, which was the basis of the evidence against him, although it was written in Indonesian without the assistance of an interpreter.

Trial

59. While most trials took place in Dili, there are reports of trials being held in Baucau, Suai, and Bali.[24]

60. In political trials held during the period 1983-85, defendants ranged from rural farmers to urban clandestine leaders. The youngest defendant in the cases examined by the Commission was 14-year-old Sabino Barreto, and the oldest was 72-year-old Caetano Ximenes, but most defendants were males in their twenties or thirties. The average sentence declined slightly over the period, from seven years and eight months in 1983, to two years and nine months in 1985.[*]

61. The average age fell slightly from 37.8 in 1983 to 31.4 in 1985. This trend may indicate that towards the end of this period, prosecutors were focusing on rank and file members of the clandestine movement, rather than leaders.

Indictment

62. Those tried for political crimes during 1983-85 were almost universally charged with treason, based on Articles 106, 108 and 110 of KUHP.[25] Fifty one of the cases carried a similar primary charge. Several defendants faced subsidiary charges under provisions such as Article 169 (membership of an illegal group).[†] The only defendant not charged with any of the treason provisions was João Soares.[26] He was charged under Article 134 for insulting the President.[‡] The court often did not consider subsidiary charges if the primary charge was proved.[27]

63. Most charges stemmed from one or two incidents, usually meetings at which the alleged crime of treason had occurred. In most cases the prosecution acknowledged that the arrest had prevented the planned acts of violence, and even planned non-violent

* Calculations are based on the spreadsheet of trials prepared by CAVR from files found in court archives. Figures for 1986 are similar to 1985.

† Calculations are based on the spreadsheet of trials prepared by CAVR from files found in court archives. In one other exception, Amnesty notes that the defendant was charged with violating the duties of a civil servant, another with slandering the President.

‡ Section 134 reads: "Deliberate insult against the President or Vice President shall be punished by a maximum imprisonment of six years, or a maximum fine of four thousand five hundred Rupiah."

acts, from taking place.[28] Consequently, it was not necessary to show that the planned acts had taken place in order for the crime to be made out.

64. In some cases the court noted that it was common knowledge that Timor-Leste had already been integrated into Indonesia and that Fretilin's purpose was to separate Timor-Leste from Indonesia.[29] Therefore any action in support of Fretilin amounted to an act of treason.

65. Some persons arrested and tried were in fact directly involved in organising the clandestine movement supporting independence. Others were only peripherally involved, having given food or other minor support to pro-independence fighters. Some others had in fact not participated in supporting the independence movement in any material way. The manner of conducting the interrogations and fabrication of evidence during the trials meant that it was impossible for the court to ascertain exactly what participation the various defendants had actually played. Their decisions were based on the picture formed during the distorted interrogations and trial preparation and conduct.

66. Many of the suspects were charged for holding secret meetings and supporting independence, as well as for providing direct assistance to an emerging urban guerrilla movement. Others were charged for past activities such as David Ximenes and Mariano Bonaparte, who were charged in connection with the 1980s Marabia attack. The very first political trials in December 1983 involved several defendants charged for recruiting company commanders with plans to obtain weapons and mount attacks in the cities, although they were arrested before they made much progress. Defendants were accused of planning for the arrival of the UN or even seeking foreign soldiers who would help Fretilin attack Dili.

67. Clandestine activity was taking place mainly in urban areas during this period. According to Aitahan Matak, when Falintil fighters were prevented from returning to the mountains after visiting families in the towns during the ceasefire, the underground moved to rebuild clandestine structures in case Xanana Gusmão was captured.[30] Examples of trials connected to urban clandestine networks include:

- Marito Reis, recently freed from detention on Ataúro and working as a driver for the Korem intelligence section head (Kasi I Korem) Willem da Costa. He was also working to revive Dili's clandestine network after the Marabia attack in 1980. According to Marito Reis, the authorities became suspicious after an underground newspaper began to circulate and arrested him together with other clandestine members. They were taken to Bali but were later returned to Dili and put on trial.[31]

- Henrique Belmiro, charged with treason for his involvement in a meeting in 1982 that led to an agreement to look for new members sympathetic to Fretilin, to create groups to support Fretilin activities, and to send logistical support to the mountains, with the final goal of separating Timor-Leste from Indonesia and creating an independent Timor-Leste.[32]

- Armindo Florindo, charged with treason for meeting Albino Lourdes on 15 December 1982, and being named leader of a clandestine group with the task of looking for additional members.[33]
- Caetano Guterres, a Fretilin leader who surrendered in 1979 and was then given the task of setting up clandestine activities in Dili. He spent several years smuggling documents out of the country to the Frente Diplomatica. He received a letter in mid-1983 telling him to take a break from his clandestine activities. However, three days later he was arrested. The primary charge was treason; specifically that Guterres had met with Albino Lourdes at his house together with José Conceicão, and had separately had discussions with Jacinto Alves in their office. A witness testified that Guterres was given the job of couriering letters from the Resistance in the mountains to destinations abroad, through Monsignor Martinho Lopes. He was accused of sending letters to Portugal, Australia, Mozambique, and the UN. He was also accused of sending notebooks, envelopes and blank cassettes to a clandestine leader in Baucau.[34]
- David Dias Ximenes, whose primary charge was derived from meetings with Mariano Bonaparte Soares, Januario Ximenes, Danilo da Silva, João Cristo Rei, and Mateus Amaral, between July 1979 and June 1980 at the house of Januario Ximenes and Mariano Bonaparte. The participants were accused of treason for planning to gather fighters for an attack on Dili, with the ultimate goal of separating Timor-Leste from Indonesia.[35]
- Domingos Seixas,[35] accused of chairing two clandestine meetings in November and December 1982 at which he reported the killing of 15 members of ABRI in the east of the territory, discussed Radio Australia broadcasts about Australian and Portuguese assistance arriving by Christmas time, and reported on a possible referendum for which people should prepare. Those present agreed to help Fretilin in its struggle. According to the authorities: "The accused, Domingos Seixas, eagerly agreed to carry out the assignment hoping that, should Fretilin win, he could work again in the hospital with a good salary."

68. Many of the more than 200 people tried between 1983 and 1985 were not clandestine leaders and had only limited, if any, contact with the guerrillas. Defendants included those who allegedly supported Falintil by their attendance at rural meetings. In many other cases the evidence alleged that the defendants had supported the independence movement through provision of items such as cigarettes, palm wine, or rice.* Trials of local supporters of the Resistance include those of:

- Francisco Mendes, alleged to have perpetrated treason on or about 15 July 1983 in Kolorau (Same, Manufahi) by meeting with members of the Resistance and agreeing to support them, and that to show his support, the suspect gave items consisting of one packet of Ribbon brand cigarettes and Timorese tobacco and or tobacco of another kind.[37] He was also accused of agreeing to support "GPK" efforts, while knowing with certainty that Timor-Leste had integrated with the Republic of Indonesian in 1976.[38] A witness testified at the trial that the defendant gave material support to the Resistance but never said anything about supporting independence.

* Case file No. 99/Pid/B/85/PN.DIL. Maria Amelia Sousa was charged with participating in an illegal meeting and providing GPK with sago, corn, cassava, and notebooks (see Indictment against Maria Amelia Sousa and Bill of Charges against Maria Amelia Sousa in Case File No. 30/PK/1985); Joki de Sousa was charged with providing cassava and palm wine (tuak putih), as well as information on ABRI strength in the area (Case file No. 25/PID/B/1985/PN.DIL).

- Gil Fernandes, accused of meeting with Fretilin members four times between March 1984 and April 1985 in Maupitene (Lospalos, Lautém) to provide information on military strength in the area and the locations of posts and patrols, as well as providing several kilograms of corn and rice, items of clothing and a notebook. The assistance was considered particularly serious because in May 1984 Falintil attacked an ABRI post, resulting in the deaths of nine Indonesian soldiers.[39]
- Maria Immaculada Araújo was charged with treason on the basis of a meeting in May 1980 in Lecoto, East Dili, where, according to the indictment, she, along with three other women, was "formally inaugurated as a member of OPMT [Organização Popular da Mulher Timor, Popular Women's Organisation of Timor]…with the task of gathering information on ABRI strength in Dili, looking for food, drink and medicine…the defendant understands that the OPMT organisation is an illegal movement with the goal of supporting the struggle of GPK/Fretilin through violence/war into the Fretilin women's organisation, the OPMT. According to Maria Immaculada she was arrested "because at that time we together formed a clandestine structure in order to assist the armed Resistance. But we only helped them with information, guidance and logistics".[40]
- Zé Roberto Seixas Miranda Jeronimo, the sub-district administrator of Iliomar (Lautém), was charged with being a threat to national security and conspiracy to commit a crime. The subsidiary charge was violation of Article 108 of the KUHP.[41] It was alleged that, as a civil servant, he had been in contact with the Resistance during the ceasefire, attempting to persuade them to surrender. But after the breakdown of the ceasefire he remained in contact with and assisted the Resistance, for example by sending them cigarettes and medicine. He was accused of plotting to kill the local Hansip (Pertahanan Sipil, Civil Defence) commander and his deputy, and of acting as a conduit between the Resistance in the Lospalos jungle and those in Dili.

Courtroom conditions

69. The trials were first held at the former Portuguese high school building (the Liceu), across from the former Benfica sports club, where the prosecutor's office was located. The court was later moved to the current Dili District Court building in Mandarin. Trials might be concluded in one day, or held over three or four sessions several weeks apart. Different cases involving the same witnesses were often held on the same day.

70. Each trial began with an announcement from the judge that the court was open to the public. In practice the presence of military and intelligence created an intimidating atmosphere that prevented people from attending. Caetano Guterres told the Commission that at his 1984 trial everyone close to him was too afraid to attend except his wife and children. Aitahan Matak reported that even family members were intimidated from attending his trial by the military police guarding the courtroom.

71. The government rejected Amnesty International's request to send observers in 1984, declaring the trials essentially a matter of domestic jurisdiction.[42]

72. During the first years after the invasion, defendants spoke little or no Indonesian and required interpreters. Interpreters were typically Timorese members of the police department.

Witness testimony

73. KUHAP requires a minimum of two pieces of evidence in order for a conviction to be recorded. The authorities adhered to this rule in form, if not in substance. In all the cases examined, there were two items of evidence, usually in the form of statements by witnesses and sometimes in the form of physical evidence.

74. However, evidence provided to the Commission shows that many witnesses were coerced into testifying, and in doing so many were forced to provide incriminating evidence in relation to their own trials. Many detainees had been held for months or years, subjected to torture and deprived of access to family and lawyers. As a result, they were vulnerable to coercion to sign false confessions in their own case, and also to bear witness against others.

75. The Commission accepts, on the basis of strongly corroborated evidence, that there was a consistently followed discipline among those involved in the clandestine movement for independence which included using code names at all times. This discipline was designed to ensure that people in fact did not know each other if they had never met. They had heard about different persons but always referred to by the code name, and so could not, in reality, say who these persons were.

76. Many defendants stated at trial that they knew co-defendants, thus incriminating them, although in fact they had never met them and could not in reality say whether the others were those persons referred to by code names. This false evidence, which was the basis of numerous convictions, was the result of torture and intimidation. Aitahan Matak, who said he did not know the witnesses against him, described how the detainers were grouped:

> When we went to court, between nine and 12 people were tried in one day. Those tried were put into groups of three, sitting side by side, and each gave testimony against the other [two]…But how could I know your name? Because we had taken an oath in the jungle to never say anyone's [real] names. I am just I, you are just you. But [ABRI] had a way to counter our strategy, they put us in groups of three. Say one brother had never met me. After being beaten and tortured, he knew me and he was part of the first trial and got sentenced to five years imprisonment. The following day I came for my trial, two friends were witnesses and all were incriminated at once. The day after, another friend was put on trial and the two of us were the incriminating witnesses…I got five years in prison, while my two friends got four years, and another friend got three years.[43]

77. Under pressure, Aitahan Matak agreed to testify against the other two in his group of three, even though he did not know them:

> I also was forced by them to admit that the two of them had done wrong. I did not know Agusto of Dili, I did not know José Agusto of Quelicai [Baucau], I was in Viqueque working with Daniel João Batista. But they forced the three of us.[44]

78. Clandestine leaders Caetano Guterres, Marito Reis and Albino Lourdes all testified at each other's trials. In one of the earliest cases, José Simoes's witnesses were defendants in other trials in which he was a witness: those of Antonio José Eduardo (Simoes's brother-in-law), Abilio Tilman, and Fernando Pinto Baptista.

79. Amnesty International received reports of these practices at the time and made specific reference to them at the United Nations Committee on Decolonisation. The Amnesty International report focused on the case of Agapito da Silva who was sentenced to six years in August 1984 after having spent four years in detention.[45] The only witnesses were two other accused, who had also been detained and tortured during their four years imprisonment. They were told to sign statements or there would be no trial, and their imprisonment and torture would continue indefinitely. If they were tried their cases were at least brought into the open, there was a public record of their imprisonment and an end date to their detention.

The right to defence counsel of choice, and to an effective defence

80. In a 1984 letter to Amnesty International, Indonesia's Foreign Minister Ali Alatas wrote:

> In accordance with Indonesian civil and criminal procedural law, each defendant may retain on his own legal counsel (attorney-at-law), or in case of inability to pay lawyers' fees, the defendant is provided free counsel by established legal consultant groups.[46]

81. In practice defendants were not advised of their right to have a lawyer, let alone allowed the lawyer of their choice. In fact, there were no independent lawyers practicing in Timor at the time. The lawyers provided by the state were selected from the Trisula Legal Aid Institute in Kupang, West Timor. Court documents reveal that the accused was not given an opportunity to select his or her own counsel.

82. For example, in the case of Domingos Seixas, the Court appointed Merry S Doko and Saartje Seubelan as defence counsel on 9 March 1984 of its own initiative and without any consultation with the accused. On 13 March 1984, the court appointed Merry S Doko and Saartje Seubelan as defence counsel for David Ximenes, again of its own initiative and without consulting the accused. Francisco Mendes's file notes that he was officially detained on 10 December 1984, but was not appointed a lawyer until a judge's decision on 3 January 1985.[47] José Simoes, in detention since August 1983 and under interrogation since October of that year, was not appointed a lawyer until 7 January 1984.[48] Nearly every defendant was represented by any one of two of the same three lawyers – Merry S Doko, Asmah Achmad, and Saartje Seubelan – despite the fact that not one of the persons whom they defended had been acquitted of all charges. When Marito Reis refused to accept his lawyer, Merry S Doko attended but did not participate in the proceedings and no alternative was offered.[49]

83. In many cases the defendants met their lawyers for the first time at trial.[50] A review of the court proceedings, while not necessarily accurate or complete, confirms that there was little effort to cross-examine witnesses or otherwise disprove the elements of the prosecution. Some defence statements are remarkably similar to statements produced by the prosecution.

84. For example, the defence statement for Henrique Belmiro reviewed the witness statements, many of which had negative implications for the defendant, and appear to be arguments that the defendant should be found guilty, rather than not guilty. These include statements on behalf of the defence such as: "The ultimate goal of this covert meeting was to secede Timor-Leste from the Unitary State of the Republic of Indonesia and form a separate State of Democratic Republic of Timor-Leste." The only argument actually made in defence of the accused was that he was merely a disappointed job-seeker, who did not have a strong reason to demand separation from Indonesia.[51]

85. The defence statement filed by David Ximenes's lawyers began with profuse expressions of respect for the court. This is in sharp contradiction to the evidence to the Commission that the defendant did not recognise the sovereignty of the court or their right to try him. Counsel then read through the evidence and the charges, only to conclude that the prosecutor had successfully proven all of the elements of the crime against his client.[52] The only issue left, therefore, was possible mitigation of the sentence. Counsel made no mention of the fact that the accused had been held in arbitrary detention for over three years, nor did counsel complain that David Ximenes had not been advised of his absolute right to be assisted by a lawyer or about the nature of the evidence being brought against the accused.

86. Exactly the same situation arose in the defence of Zé Roberto Seixas Miranda Jeronimo. Defence counsel agreed with the prosecution case and then raised mitigating factors on behalf of his client. Nothing was said about arbitrary detention, the treatment of the accused or witnesses, or that the client had been interviewed without a lawyer being present.

87. The court transcript of the trial of Domingos Seixas summarised the efforts of his defence counsel in the following terms: "The Defence Team basically states that they agree with the charges from the General Prosecutor, that is that it is proven that there was a violation of Article 110(1) and Article 106 of KUHP and submit the accused and the future of the accused into the hands of the Court."[53]

88. Unlike later trials, many of the files and the records of proceedings from this period do not include the second round of statements normally made by the prosecutor and the defence team in Indonesian trials (the replik and duplik). One of the few prosecutorial replies on the record contains a revealing evaluation of the quality of the defence. The one page statement notes:

> After listening to and then assessing the plea of the Defence, we are now of the opinion and conclude, that because the Defence is of the same view as us and in principle has only pleaded for a reduced sentence for the accused so we as the General Prosecutor in the case of Abilio Tilman consider that there is no need for further response.[54]

89. The enormous caseload taken on by defence lawyers would also have compromised the quality of representation. The three Kupang lawyers represented all 232 political defendants from 1983 to 1985, as well as taking on many ordinary criminal cases during the same period. Given that they reportedly divided their time between Dili and Kupang, there would have been little time to familiarise themselves with the details of each case, and this may explain why their submissions are virtually identical in the many cases in which they acted. In 1985, the Far Eastern Economic Review (FEER) reported that defence lawyers practicing in Timor-Leste claimed that guilty pleas saved time.[55] Furthermore, there were obvious conflicts of interests for these three lawyers, who between them were dealing with cases where their clients were appearing as the accused in one case and as a witness in other cases, including as a witness against other clients.

90. It appears that the control of the military over the process leading to trial, including torture, intimidation and fabrication of evidence extended to the courtroom itself, in ensuring that in fact defence counsel never produced a real defence of their clients, thus guaranteeing convictions. Caetano Guterres remembers being told by his court appointed defence counsel, Merry S Doko:

> We can just help you, but we've already received direction from the military. We just follow the military's wishes. This means if they say A, it's A, they say B, it's B…We just followed the direction from the military. We can't do anything but just sit there.[56]

91. In addition to the evidence received by the Commission of an overwhelming inability or lack of will of defence counsel to properly defend their clients, some defendants claimed that their lawyers did try to help them despite the difficulties of overcoming the fabricated evidence and influence of the military in the trial process. Caetano Guterres, who ultimately received a sentence of six years, remembers:

> The defence lawyer was provided by them. My defence lawyer was Merry from Kupang. She was very nice and did all she could to defend my case, because the judge(s) wanted life imprisonment.[57]

92. Cristiano da Costa, who refused to confess and was freed after 20 months in detention, told the UN Human Rights Commission about those who were not so lucky:

> Two Indonesian lawyers from Kupang were appointed by the court to defend them, but they had no contact with the prisoners. In fact, they worked closely with the prosecutor and the judge to produce guilty verdicts and sentences that had already been decided upon by the military.[58]

93. The evidence provided to the Commission that defendants were not free to choose their own defence counsel, that the court appointed counsel despite their objections and that these lawyers in most cases worked with the military and prosecutors to ensure prosecutions, rather than acquittals, is strongly supported by the objective facts which are drawn from an examination of the court files. Of the 232 political prisoners tried between 1983 and 1985 not one entered a plea of not guilty to the serious charges against them, and not one was acquitted.

94. The Commission's examination of the files reveals that the defence case was generally limited to raising mitigating circumstances. A Far Eastern Economic Review article from the time notes that the prosecutor simply establishes the circumstances of the alleged crime and the defence seeks only to lighten the sentence.[59] Arguments based on mitigating factors were repeated almost verbatim in all defence statements. Defence lawyers would invariably argue that the defendant was a polite, honest, remorseful, family man with no prior record.[60] One 1985 case took a somewhat different tack. As described by the judges' panel in their decision, the defence was of the opinion that:

> After studying the witnesses' testimonies and the defendant's own statements, it has been juridically established that the defendant is proven guilty. However, there were non-juridical issues that influenced and pushed the defendant into committing the crime(s), or at least [made him] susceptible to GPK/Fretilin influence, with whom the defendant, who is a farmer, met in the forest while searching for food.[61]

95. The non-juridical factors referred to included the defendant's low level of education, which meant that he was incapable of telling the difference between freedom/independence in GPK/Fretilin propaganda and independence with Indonesia; his low social standing made him vulnerable to high-sounding promises and psychological pressure because of frequent encounters with GPK.[62] Another defence used in several cases was that the defendant was disappointed that he or she could not find a job or other government promises of support.[63] David Ximenes was one said to have been embittered by the failure to advance professionally through the Indonesian army, despite what he felt to have been substantial personal sacrifice.[64]

96. There was some degree of flexibility in sentencing. There may have been negotiation on what the prosecutor asked for in the list of charges and defendants were also given the opportunity to accept or reject the sentence. Caetano Guterres says he was initially sentenced to 20 years, but rejected this sentence, arguing that he was an only child and his parents were getting old. The sentence was subsequently lowered to 15 years, then ten, and finally six. Even Marito Reis, who had no lawyer, saw his sentence reduced from 20 to 17 years (eventually serving 12).

The presumption of innocence

97. As stated above, review of court documents relating to the 232 cases examined by the Commission found no acquittals. Despite this, the 1984 US Department of State Human Rights Report noted that in addition to those sentenced to prison sentences that year, several dozen other persons were tried and acquitted, while prosecutors released still others for lack of evidence.[65] The Commission has not been able to identify any of these acquittals from its investigations of the surviving files and records of the District Court of Dili. It therefore doubts the truth of the material contained in the US State Department report, which was probably compiled without the benefit of being able to refer to court records. The Commission found evidence that in one November 1984 case, Markus Assis was accused of meeting with the Railakan company commander where some charges were dropped but others proceeded with. Prosecutors dropped the primary charge because it could not be proved. However the subsidiary charges were pursued and Assis was sentenced to one and a half months in prison.[66]

98. In addition to the outcomes of these trials, there are further indications that the presumption of innocence was routinely flouted. As noted above, those accused were not advised of their rights on arrest, including the right not to self-incriminate (Article 66 of KUHAP). There is no express right to silence guaranteed under KUHAP, but it clearly forms an element of the right not to incriminate oneself, and the right to a presumption of innocence. The prosecution bears the burden of proving guilt, and cannot prove guilt by coercing the accused into an admission.

99. Most defendants did not have an opportunity to assert their right not to self-incriminate at trial, having already confessed to the alleged offences in their RoIs made before the trial. Many of these confessions were made under duress or threat.

100. The few public comments made by judges during this period indicate that the presumption of innocence was not upheld in trials in Timor-Leste. The head of the Dili District Court, Judge LP Siregar, told a reporter in 1984 that defendants acknowledged their guilt because they were honest, and for the same reasons they declined to appeal: "When they're asked if the accusation of the prosecutor is correct, they always say yes."[67] The article continues:

> If all trials could be like those in East Timor, the task of the legal profession would be easy, he said. Those who come before the green baize [those who are tried] are all honest. If they've done something, they readily admit it. And they never deny anything in their interrogation depositions, so the whole process goes smoothly.[68]

101. These facts led Amnesty International to express concern in December 1985 that the presumption of innocence was not maintained and that there was pressure on defendants to plead guilty.[69]

Independence and impartiality of the tribunal

102. There were no East Timorese judges or prosecutors during the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste. Judges from other Indonesian courts spent time on rotation in Timor-Leste (usually for several years) and then were moved elsewhere.

103. Indonesian judges in Timor-Leste were civil servants, employed by the Ministry of Justice and therefore lacked true independence. The results of the judgments in the trials were an overwhelming demonstration of support for the political goal of suppressing the movement for independence. The Commission is satisfied that the judges involved in these cases colluded and collaborated, directly or indirectly, with those who manipulated the trial process for a preferred political goal. Not one finding of "not guilty" was handed down in over two hundred cases despite the legal presumption of innocence. There was almost a total absence of rigorous judicial scrutiny in the face of evidence, which indicated that witnesses and defendants had been subjected to torture and ill-treatment, and that evidence had been fabricated. An Indonesian lawyer active in Timor-Leste in the 1990s gave his opinion that factors such as bribery may also have affected whether and how a case went to trial.[70]

104. In the Indonesian civil law system, the judge controls proceedings, taking an active role in questioning witnesses. However, the court records indicate passivity by the court in these political trials, and a reluctance to interrogate the prosecution case. When they did take an active role, judges tended to ask questions of a political nature, inquiring as to the defendant's attitude towards integration and independence and asking if the accused knew that Timor-Leste was lawfully part of Indonesia and that what he did was against Indonesian law because it sought to separate the territory.

105. Defendants and their lawyers consistently describe the trials as operating under military control, with judges unable to exercise any independence. The governor of Timor-Leste during this period, Mario Carrascalão, described the trials as set up by the military.[71] According to Marito Reis:

> They came to the Comarca prison after the sentence was handed down... They told me that it had all been set up by the army, and they could not do much. [The judges and prosecutors] have been set up by the military, they had been ordered to ensure that this person be punished this way, that person that way, so it had all been set up by the military.[72]

Right to appeal

106. In his 1984 letter to Amnesty International, the Foreign Minister of Indonesia, Ali Alatas, asserted:

> Each defendant is entitled to appeal the sentence to a higher court (appellate court) and all the way up to the Supreme Court. So far none > of those already convicted have opted to take a recourse to such an appeal, although this right has been made explicitly clear to them by the panel of judges at each sentencing.[73]

107. The Commission is not aware of any appeals in the 232 trials it has examined, which took place from 1983 to 1985.[74] A contemporary press account corroborates the views expressed by Judge Siregar. These views are totally opposed to the information which the Commission has received from those defendants who were tried and sentenced:

> If they are sentenced, they never make an appeal, even if their defence counsel urges them to do so. The reason, they say, is that everything they are accused of is true, and they admit their error. After the sentence is announced, these criminals even express their thanks and ask for a joint photograph![75]

108. Once sentenced, defendants were pressured to sign a document indicating that they accepted the judgment of the court and did not wish to appeal. Some, such as Marito Reis, said that they acceded to this, and declined to appeal because they did not believe any of the proceedings to be legitimate in any sense. More often, defendants stated that they did not appeal against their conviction and sentence because they received threats that if they did not accept the results harm would come to their families or they would continue to be tortured and kept in terrible conditions with no access to family or friends and no hope of ever being released:

> If we don't accept it, we don't see our families, we stay in the darkened cells, and at night we're threatened with death. If you agree you will go free.[76]

109. Amnesty International concluded that many defendants apparently did not understand that they had the right to appeal their sentences and in some cases were told that if they did not accept their sentences without appeal, it would be increased.[77]

Conclusions

110. Before 1983, East Timorese suspected of involvement in the pro-independence movement were routinely arbitrarily detained, tortured and killed (see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Killings and Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-treatment). In 1983, a policy decision was made to use the courts as well as the military in the fight against the opposition to the occupation.

111. Although this could have resulted in a change in the Indonesian government's approach to the Resistance towards one based on justice and the rule of law, in fact the approach was manipulated so that there was little justice involved. The trials during this period were not an opportunity for a fair hearing before an independent decision maker. They were instead a tool that the Indonesian authorities manipulated to achieve a political goal.

112. The conditions of detention and interrogation, the manner in which the prosecution and defence cases proceeded, and the judgments delivered were part of a combined strategy intended to provide an illusion of justice being done and also ensuring that all defendants would be found guilty of political offences.

113. The bare facts relating to the political trials of East Timorese conducted by the Indonesian government between 1983 and 1985 which were examined by the Commission produce a startling summary which reflects the degree to which the trials were fair and conformed with the requirements of due process. The Commission examined 232 political trials. These resulted in:

- 232 convictions on charges involving treason and subversion
- 232 defendants being represented by government appointed defence counsel
- 0 defence witnesses being called
- 0 cases of acquittal of all charges being recorded
- 0 appeals against conviction being lodged.

114. The trials violated not only international human rights standards but also the applicable provisions of Indonesian law in relation to many of the most fundamental requirements for a fair trial. These included the following:

- Individuals were arbitrarily detained by the military before trial for up to seven years before trial.
- Members of the Indonesian military forces systematically tortured and abused suspects in order to produce false confessions and seek information.
- Accused persons were not informed of the right to counsel, nor provided with an opportunity to have a lawyer of his or her choice present during trial.
- Government appointed lawyers represented hundreds of defendants accused of similar charges in many cases related to the same facts, creating a serious conflict of interest. Defence lawyers failed to vigorously defend their clients. They did not raise the issues of arbitrary detention nor physical abuse and torture during trial proceedings, generally remained passive, did not call witnesses to support the defence case, and often agreed with submissions made by the prosecution.
- Judges did not act impartially and independently. They participated in or acquiesced to, the manipulation of the trial process to guarantee verdicts of guilty for all defendants.
- Due to direct and indirect intimidation by members of the Indonesian security forces, members of the public were not able to freely observe trial proceedings.
- Penalties imposed in general ranged from between five and seven years. Judges failed to take into account prior periods of military detention when determining sentences, which in some cases were periods up to seven years.

The Santa Cruz trials, 1992

115. The killings at the Santa Cruz cemetery (Dili) on 12 November 1991 provoked an international outcry, largely stimulated by film footage showing soldiers shooting unarmed civilians, which was smuggled out of the territory. In response the Indonesian government conducted a number of inquiries related to the events. An internal military investigation and National Commission of Inquiry were conducted. An Honorary Military Council heard misconduct allegations against 6 senior officers. Ten lower ranking officers faced court martial.

116. However, the strongest response of the Indonesian government was not focused on disciplining those Indonesian military officers who were responsible for shooting hundreds of unarmed demonstrators, killing many. Rather it focused on bringing to trial and imprisoning the East Timorese who had organised the demonstration that had brought the protesters to the Santa Cruz cemetery.

117. After the National Commission of Inquiry submitted its preliminary report, President Soeharto instructed the Attorney General to take all necessary steps against those who planned and took part in the riot. What resulted were trials against eight individuals, two of whom were charged with subversion, the others with treason. A total of twelve trials were conducted, commencing on 12 March 1992, with eleven trials conducted in the Dili District Court, and one taking place in the Baucau District Court.

118. The following section analyses the trials of Gregorio da Cunha Saldanha, Francisco Miranda Branco, Jacinto das Neves Raimundo Alves, Carlos dos Santos Lemos, Juvencio de Jesus Martins, Bonifacio Magno and Filomeno da Silva Ferreira. The analysis is based on case files from the Dili District Court, witness statements, secondary sources and interviews conducted by the Commission. For the purposes of this Report the Commission has focused on the major trials, those of Francisco Branco and Gregorio Saldanha, although it has researched and analysed the other relevant trials and reference is made to them where relevant. The analysis of the judicial processes related to the Santa Cruz incident is based on material relating to all trials.

Factual overview

Background

119. In late 1991, a Portuguese government delegation was due to visit Timor-Leste. Human rights and pro-independence activists intended to use the visit as a means of notifying the world about the massive human rights abuses that were being committed against the East Timorese people.

120. The executive committee of the resistance network, called the National Council of Maubere Resistance (Conçelho Nacional da Resistencia Maubere, CNRM), disseminated political information about the visit and were planning to deliver a petition to the delegation.[79] All but one of the Santa Cruz defendants were members of this Executive Committee.

121. In the lead up to the planned Portuguese visit there was an increase in anti-government political activity. The Indonesian military responded to this activity by seeking out, arresting an imprisoning an increasing number of young men in Dili, during October and November 1991. As a result around 20 young activists took refuge in the Motael Church, in Dili.

122. Members of the Indonesian military responded forcefully to the action of taking shelter in the church, and during a clash with the activists on 28 October 1991, one of the young East Timorese men, Sebastião Gomes Rangel, was killed.[80] Afonso Henriques, an intelligence agent, reportedly sustained fatal injuries from a sharp implement.[81]

123. Five East Timorese were tried and convicted of acts of violence leading to the death of Afonso Henriques.* No official action was taken against security forces involved in the killing of Sebastião Gomes Rangel.

124. The Executive Committee of the Resistance planned a peaceful demonstration to draw attention to the killing of Sebastião two weeks after his death. This plan included a peaceful march from the Motael Church to the Santa Cruz cemetery, where he was buried.

Findings of fact as determined by the court during the trials

125. The following briefly summarises the facts of the Santa Cruz massacre as determined at trial. Plans for the Santa Cruz demonstration commenced on 8 November 1991, and the preparations included the creation of pro-independence banners and determining the route the demonstration would take. On the morning of 12 November 1991, a procession led by Gregorio da Cunha Saldanha left from the Motael Church. Pro-independence chants were shouted along the way and participants carried pro-independence banners.

126. Major Andi Gerhan Lantara and Private Domingos da Costa were attacked by protesters on the way to the Santa Cruz cemetery. The following extract from the Gregorio da Cunha Saldanha decision details the court's version of what later occurred at the cemetery:

> [T]here were gunshots coming from the direction of the protesters, followed by warning shots from the Security Agents, then from the direction of the protesters came a scream: "Forward. Attack", and the protesters attacked the security agents, and a riot ensued between protesters and security agents, followed by gunshots from security agents; the riot claimed victims on the part of protesters.[82]

* The defendants in the Motael trials received the following sentences: Aleizo da Silva Gama 2 years, 3 months; Boby Xavier 3 years; Jacob da Silva 2 years; João dos Santos 1 year 8 month; Bonifacio Barreto 1 year, 8 months.

127. The quotation above contains the only discussion by the court concerning the events at the Santa Cruz cemetery. The facts in issue at trial focus on clandestine meetings and preparations leading up to the demonstration. The killings at the cemetery, and in particular the actions of Indonesian soldiers, are not detailed.

128. The fact that the demonstration did increase tensions, and by implication justified the massacre that followed, however, was at issue before the court. To justify this position, much weight is given to the official statements of Brigadier General Theo Syafei, Kolakops Commander of Timor-Leste, written on 31 January 1991 and Drs A B Saridjo, Vice-Governor of Timor-Leste, written on 25 February 1992. The contents of both these statements are exactly the same:

> That the demonstration on 12 November 1991 in Dili caused:
>
> a. damage or undermining of State authority or the authority of the legal Government or State Agents;
>
> b. animosity or enmity, division, conflict, chaos, shock or restlessness in the community on a large-scale.[83]

Facts according to independent sources

129. After careful consideration of the material produced by agents of the Indonesian government and independent witnesses, the Commission finds the following account of what actually occurred to be more credible than that accepted by the court. Around 3,000-4,000 people, mainly students, took part in the demonstration from the Motael Church to the Santa Cruz cemetery.[84] The procession was generally peaceful, with protestors carrying pro-independence banners and shouting pro-independence chants along the way. Approximately 1km from the cemetery a major and a private in civilian dress were injured by demonstrators.[85] Some five to ten minutes after the protestors arrived at the Santa Cruz cemetery, hundreds of soldiers armed with M-16 automatic weapons arrived.[86] Eyewitnesses report that soldiers marched to the entrance of the cemetery and opened fire without warning or provocation. The shooting reportedly lasted for 10-15 minutes. Independent estimates put the number killed as high as 271. [See Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforce Disappearances]

Arrest

130. Immediately after the massacre, the Indonesian security forces began arresting those suspected of involvement in the demonstration. The Commission has found that on 13 November 1991, 308 people were arrested and 49 were detained. Of those arrested or detained, 259 were subsequently released. According to the Indonesian Government, however, by January 1992, just 32 people had been detained in Dili in connection with the incident. Gregorio Saldanha, after being shot and wounded at the cemetery, was taken into custody from the military hospital:

> On the second day I was visited by an Indonesian Army officer called Captain Made from Kopassus. He said to me, "Are you Gregorio?" I said,

"Yes." He said, "We have been looking for you for a long time." He then took a photograph of me. The next day two other Indonesian Army officers came to see me. They were from Kopassus also. One of them was called Lieutenant Eddy. He questioned me and wanted to know the names of the organisers of the demonstration. I told him I was the organiser.[88]

131. Intelligence agents uncovered the names of the other organisers of the demonstration and they were issued with warrants to appear at the Polwil police station, some as witnesses for the investigation of Gregorio Saldanha.[89] From this moment on, the defendants were officially detained as suspects, with some allowed to return home on the condition they reported to the Polwil every day. During this period the defendants were subjected to intense interrogation. Francisco Miranda Branco describes what occurred:

At that time, after the 12 November tragedy, the military arrested many people for interrogation. During investigation they found out our names… During that interrogation the Police concluded that the 12 November incident was not spontaneous, instead it was organised, and planned from the beginning.[90]

They suspected us so they told us to report daily to Polwil. They found out that we were to be suspected, because they already had information [on us], but not evidence. So while we reported daily, they wanted to confirm that we were members of the Executive Committee, Komisaun Eksecutivu, and as soon as they got the confirmation needed, they arrested us.[91]

132. The defendants were then issued with what appear to have been valid arrest warrants by police in early December 1991. Detention orders and extensions appear to have been issued in accordance with the correct procedure.

133. The arrest procedure was generally similar for all defendants, with the exception of Bonifacio Magno. He was detained late on 11 November 1991, around midnight, before the massacre occurring. He was then released at 6am but could not leave his house as it was surrounded by the military. Bonifacio Magno was taken into custody again about one hour after the massacre occurred.[92]

Pre-trial

Conditions at the Comoro Police Headquarters (Polda)*

134. After approximately one week at Polwil, in early December 1991, the defendants were moved to the Regional Police (Polda) headquarters in Comoro, Dili. They remained at Polda until after the trials were completed. Here, conditions for detainees did not meet acceptable standards, including overcrowded cells, poor hygiene, and sub-standard food. Francisco Miranda Branco describes the situation:

* The defendants were imprisoned post-trial in Comarca Balide, Becora prison, and Semarang prison.

Talking about the environment, it was definitely not humane. Friends, who slept in the hall that was actually for exercise, had no mat. They suspected that my other friends and myself were planning to escape, so they put us in an isolation room, but it was not humane.[93]

135. Some defendants stated that physical torture was used. In a statement to the SCU (Serious Crime Unit), Bonifacio Magno said: "I was also brutally tortured by police officers whose name I do not know."[94] Gregorio Saldanha, also in a statement to the SCU, said: "I was also beaten many times by Sergeant Martinus Wae and one other person whose name I cannot remember."[95]

136. It appears, however, that physical abuse of those detained in relation to the Santa Cruz demonstration, who were eventually tried, was not widespread.* However, treatment intended to create psychological distress, including threats to family members and intimidation, were used to extract information. According to Francisco Miranda Branco, the relative lack of physical torture was due to international scrutiny of the Santa Cruz massacre:

I was not tortured then. Because they were aware that the world already knew about the Santa Cruz, and that the eyes of the world focused on Timor-Leste at that time.[96]

137. While at the Regional Police (Polda), the defendants were subjected to constant, psychologically damaging, interrogation sessions. These occurred in the absence of a lawyer, the right to which is guaranteed under Art. 54 of KUHAP.

138. The usual practice of the Indonesian authorities was to carry out interrogations when detainees were sleep-deprived:

As they said that a prisoner needed no mattress, bare, this was their way. At other times they interrogated for hours, even for a full day or 24 hours, this was against international standards.[97]

They started the interrogation from 7 am…ended at 12 midnight, 1 or 2 am and only then let us sleep. At 7 am they opened the door and called me again for interrogation. This was the daily routine, no time to rest for a prisoner…[98]

139. Jacinto Alves describes how his family was intimidated and harassed while he was detained:

During trials, were there threats from the Police? No, but [there were threats] against my family.[99]

* Other detainees, who did not eventually go to trial, reported beatings and torture. See Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Ill-treatment and Torture.

Investigation

140. The investigation combined three distinct approaches: information seeking, confession seeking and the falsification of evidence.

Information seeking

141. The primary investigation strategy of the Indonesian authorities consisted of constant interrogation of the suspects by investigators, prosecutors and various members of the security forces, including Kopassus. Francisco Branco specifically remembers being interrogated by members of the State Intelligence Coordination Agency (Badan Koordinasi Intelijen Negara, known as BAKIN, which was Indonesia's civilian intelligence agency from 1967-2000) from Jakarta, who used intimidation tactics aimed at extracting information:

> A group of intelligence officers from BAKIN, Jakarta, was assigned to investigate my case.[100]
>
> Like putting the guns on the table and displaying the guns in the holster, and it was not just one person but one to four people conducting the interrogation simultaneously… for hours.[101]

142. It should be noted that KUHAP provides no legal basis for the interrogation of the defendants by intelligence agents or any members of the security forces. Jacinto Alves further describes the stressful environment during interrogation:

> [T]here were five or six interrogators at one time, one person asked, and before we could answer, two others cut in with more questions, and this was a way to confuse us and drain us and I thought, daily interrogation from November, December, January, February until March and April, that was a very long time.[102]

143. These oppressive investigation techniques resulted in untruthful statements being recorded in records of interview. Gregorio Saldanha describes this in relation to what appeared in his RoI:

> The truths I told, I said it with an open heart. The lies, I was forced to say. I tried to say things which sometimes were unecessary, just to help my case, and I told lies to protect people outside, so that our network survived.[103]

144. Intimidation and psychological torture were not only used to produce fabricated evidence in the words of the defendants. It also extended to produce false evidence by witnesses which was used against the defendants at their trials.

145. In the trial of Gregorio Saldanha a witness, Agusto Felipe Gama Xavier (Teky), informed the court of the manner in which he had come to produce his evidence against the defendant.

Judge I: Do you verify all statements in the Proceedings?

Witness V: In general yes, but there are some parts that I did not know anything about, because they were forced on me by the investigator[s], who said: "Help me (investigator) so that all the crimes committed by the defendant could be verified, to wrap this case quickly."[104]

146. In the same trial, beatings of witnesses during the investigation period were alleged in the written closing statement of the defence:

> [T[he testimonies of witnesses in the Investigation Proceedings prepared by the Investigators were not voluntary, they involved coercion and the beating of witnesses.[105]

Illegal methods of seeking confessions

147. Under Article 54 of KUHAP, suspects have the right to legal representation during interrogation, while there is no such provision for witnesses. This is in accordance with the basic rights of all persons not to be forced to incriminate themselves.

148. A method used by the Indonesian authorities in relation to all of the Santa Cruz defendants was to interview them as witnesses in the cases of their co-accused, for example on the structure and strategies of the clandestine network. The material gained from those interviewed was intended to be used against that person in their own trial. By pretending that the defendant was only a witness, ignoring the fact that each was intended to be tried in his own right, the Indonesian authorities sought to illegitimately subvert the provisions of the Indonesian criminal code and commonly accepted human rights standards. The fact is that those interviewed were to be defendants. They were therefore entitled to only be questioned in the presence of a lawyer.

149. Lawyers were not present during any of these witness interrogations. For example, six out of the eight defendants were interviewed as prosecution witnesses for the case of Francisco Branco. This is consistent with an Amnesty International report at the time which claimed that some defendants were asked to sign statements that amounted to confessions without being advised by a lawyer, or with the benefit of a lawyer's presence to help to avoid possible pressure, force or intimidation related to confessions.[106]

Fabrication of evidence

150. There are numerous allegations of investigators attempting to falsely obtain statements and fabricate evidence. Jacinto Alves describes techniques used in an attempt to force the suspects to sign statements:

There were times when we did not like what they wrote in the proceedings and I would often refuse to sign the proceedings and they usually pulled up their shirt to show their handguns or they opened the drawer to show the gun inside.[107]

151. Gregorio Saldanha was quoted by Amnesty International as having given false names due to the pressure applied by interrogators:

> [B]ecause I could no longer bear this inhumane treatment, and because I was weakened by a gunshot wound, I carelessly gave names of high officials, priests and business owners who knew nothing and had no link with me, following the saying "as long as the boss is happy.'[108]

152. Another example of illegitimate investigation techniques is the fabrication of evidence. Jacinto Alves describes being forced to choose Gregorio's gun – as a piece of evidence – in front of a judge:

> Then they tried to reconstruct the 12 November incident. They [Police and intelligence officers] said that the protesters used guns. There was a long box with guns inside.... Some of these guns were rusted from not being used for a long time. There were Police, and intelligence officers, and they said: "Let's go and check the guns used by the protesters". The way they asked was like this, "come on, choose, which guns they used there." The odd thing was that this theatre proceeded in front of the judges, and they believed it. Some of these guns were presented at the trials, so the judges were convinced.[109]

153. Jacinto Alves describes two further examples of fabricating evidence:

> They took several photographs during the Santa Cruz protest. The photos contained images of wood, people with banners, and we were forced to acknowledge that the wood was a weapon. Or they came to your house just like what happened to Saturnino from Baucau, they grabbed a knife and machete from the kitchen, confiscated them and used them as evidence.[110]

Access to a lawyer

154. In the pre-trial investigation period, the defendants were prevented from appointing their own defence counsel and were effectively forced to accept the appointment of a lawyer chosen by the Indonesian Government. The defendants were initially represented by Ponco Atmono, a Dili based Indonesian lawyer.[*] Letters signed by defendants in December 1991 can be found on court files and these provide official authorisation for Ponco Atmono to act on their behalf.

* At trial Francisco Branco and Gregorio Saldanha were represented by a collaborative team from Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation (Yayasan Lembaga Bantuan Hukum Indonesia, YLBHI) and Indonesian Bar Association (Ikatan Advokat Indonesia, Ikadin). The team was led by Luhut M.P. Pangaribuan and Artidjo Alkostar. Juvencio Martins and Filomeno Perreira were represented at trial by Nur Ismato from the Legal Aid Institution (LBH) Yogyakarta. Carlos Lemos and Bonifacio Magno were represented by Ponco Atmono from the beginning to the end of their trials.

155. It appears, however, that at least some defendants did not wish Ponco Atmono to represent them and may have been forced to sign these letters. Accordingly, Ponco Atmono was effectively appointed by the Indonesian authorities as the defendants' counsel against their wishes. This is in clear breach of Articles 54 and 55 of KUHAP,* which provide that defendants be represented by lawyers of their own choosing from the very first stages of investigation.† The investigation period is a crucial time to have independent lawyers protecting a suspect's rights and interests. Without an independent lawyer present, suspects can be forced to sign statements and evidence can be falsified, as occurred in the Santa Cruz trials.

> From the very outset, Gregorio da Cunha did not accept Ponco Atmono as his counsel and was dissatisfied with not being able to choose an independent lawyer:
>
> He always played the role of a defence lawyer, no not like the defence lawyer we chose, but one working for the authorities. Normally, he would not be present during investigation, unlike other lawyers who would have been present during investigation, and although they may not have been physically present but at least they defended us.[111]

156. Some defendants, dissatisfied with having a lawyer imposed on them by the government, had family members contact legal aid lawyers. According to Francisco Branco:

> We were forced to choose one of the government's lawyers, but I flatly refused. His name was Ponco and I told my family to choose a truly independent team of lawyers who could take on a big case. They came from the Jakarta Legal Aid Institute (LBH Jakarta), but they were obstructed by the intelligence officers and the judges. The intelligence agents terrorised them and the judges were told by BAKIN to refuse them.[112]

157. As referred to earlier in this chapter, the records of interrogation of defendants were routinely fabricated. There is a direct contradiction between the words of Francisco Branco, above, stating that he did not agree to a court appointed lawyer, and his record of interrogation, which stated the following:

> Investigator: Do you need a legal advisor for this interrogation?

* Article 54 KUHAP: In the interest of defence, a suspect or defendant has the right to get legal assistance from one or more legal advisors during the period and at every level of examination… Art 55 KUHAP: [T]he defendant has the right to choose his legal advisor.

† Article 56(1) KUHAP requires that officials appoint a lawyer at all levels of examination for crimes which attract the death penalty or a sentence of more than 15 years or for those who cannot afford a legal adviser with crimes punishable for more than 5 years, when they have no legal advisers of their own. It could therefore be argued that the appointment of Ponco Atmono was justified as there were no lawyers selected by the defendants at the time Ponco Atmono was appointed. However, this does not recognise the pressure placed on defendants and goes against the intention of Article 56(1) which is to ensure that those in serious cases that cannot otherwise receive legal representation, have lawyers appointed for them.

Francisco Branco: For this interrogation, I do not need a defence counsel, but later in court I may need to be represented by a legal advisor.[113]

158. As a result of the complaints by defendants over having a lawyer effectively forced on them, a team of lawyers drawn from both the Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation (YLBHI) and the Indonesian National Bar Association (Ikadin) came from Jakarta to represent the lead defendants. At the commencement of the first trial (that of Francisco Miranda Branco), Luhut M. P. Pangaribuan, a lawyer with YLBHI, appeared before the Court but was refused permission to represent the defendant. According to the presiding judge:

> When a lawyer from Jakarta or elsewhere wants to defend a case in another jurisdiction, he/she is required to seek permission from the Chief Justice of the High Court in the jurisdiction where the lawyer wants to defend.[114]

159. According to YLBHI the lawyers who had been sent were authorised to practice in any Indonesian province, including Timor-Leste. Although the defence team had also sent a letter of request to the High Court in Kupang two days before the trial commenced and had not yet received a reply, they were refused permission to act. In light of this, the judge reappointed Ponco Atmono to represent the defendant in court. The YLBHI newsletter from the time summarises what occurred:

> All lawyers on the legal team hold the position of senior advocate, which allows them each to practice in any Indonesian province. Despite the legitimacy of the legal team to represent the eight East Timorese charged with subversion in a Dili court, the Dili judge claimed the YLBHI-Ikadin team did not have authority, based on their procedural failure to secure permission from the High Court of the Eastern Provinces in Kupang, West Timor, to practice in Dili…The Dili judge refused to allow the team to represent the defendants on grounds of procedural flaws and instead appointed a Dili lawyer…to represent the defendants. Under the Indonesian Criminal Procedural Code, a defendant has the right to choose his representation. However, given that the Dili judge refused to allow the YLBHI-Ikadin team to practice, the judge claimed that by law a substitute lawyer must be appointed whether or not the defendants agreed with the appointed lawyer…In protest at the decision of the judge which violated the rights of the defendants, the director of YLBHI requested that the Indonesian Supreme Court correct the error of the Dili judge. The Supreme Court received the request of YLBHI and sent a telegram directing the judge of the Dili Court to honour the YLBHI-Ikadin team and allow them to represent the defendants in Dili court of Timor-Leste.[115]

160. The telegram referred to above was read out at trial:

> The refusal by Dili Court to grant permission for the lawyers from Jakarta to represent the defendant: Francisco Miranda Branco in the Dili Court; the refusal read among other things, that the judges in the Dili Court shall withdraw the appointment of legal counsel for the defendants in this case.[116]

161. The intervention of the Supreme Court in sending this telegram was instrumental in ensuring that some defendants received independent legal assistance.[117] A large amount of direct lobbying from YLBHI to representatives of the Supreme Court, drawing their attention to the fact that what was occurring was contrary to the rules governing the court and the rights of defendants, led to this intervention

162. Amnesty International reported that relatives of the defendants felt pressured by Indonesian authorities to withdraw applications to obtain independent legal counsel and that on arrival the legal aid lawyers were subject to surveillance by intelligence officials.[118] Thus although the defendants were eventually allowed to appoint their own lawyers, their defence suffered due to the lack of independent legal counsel from the beginning of their cases and the intimidation of the legal aid lawyers once they arrived in Dili.

Trial

Indictment

163. The indictments were, in general, well drafted and logically set out, detailing a long list of factual allegations. The indictments of Francisco Branco and Gregorio Saldanha contained primary charges under Indonesia's Anti-Subversion legislation, Law 11/1963. The maximum penalty for these offences was the death sentence carried out by firing squad. Subsidiary charges based on KUHP were also included against the two main defendants, such as treason and publicly expressing hostility towards the Indonesian Government. Indictments against the other six solely contained KUHP charges.

164. The defendants not charged with subversion were prosecuted under the treason provision, Art. 106 KUHP, generally first as a principal who perpetrated or caused others to perpetrate the act,[119] and then under a subsidiary charge of involvement in a conspiracy to commit treason.[120]

Courtroom conditions

165. All defendants were tried individually, with all but one trial held in the Dili District Court. The main deficiency of the courtroom was a lack of transparency, with court proceedings theoretically open but in practice closed. Gregorio Saldanha describes the situation:

> [It was both] open and closed, meaning the door was open but guarded. But evidently it was a closed session and no one was granted entry, and my friends were brave but they waited in the street.[121]

166. Members of the public who did want to enter were prevented from doing so. According to Francisco Branco:

> Friends who wanted to follow the trial were terrorised and obstructed so it was not open. During the trial, all intelligence officers were present, in civilian clothes, but we could see that there were more of these officers than other people; most of them were Police intelligence officers in civilian clothes.[122]
>
> The trial was always closed and most attendees were intelligence officers or their collaborators.[123]

167. International monitors were allowed to view court proceedings. The International Commission of Jurists (ICJ) attempted to send two observers, but found it difficult to obtain visas. One observer's attempts to monitor the cases were thwarted by a lengthy visa application process.[124] In the end, the ICJ had one trial monitor present in court.[125] Asia Watch also had a trial observer present. The monitors were critical of the trials, and conveyed this message to the UN Commission on Human Rights.[126] Despite the presence of these monitors there was insufficient transparency of process, as members of the public were not free to attend the proceedings. To that extent, the process breached Art. 153(3) of KUHAP, which requires that trials should be open to the public. Accordingly, decisions made by the court in these circumstances should arguably have been annulled under Art. 153(4).

Witnesses

168. The information considered by the Commission leads it to an inescapable conclusion that much of the evidence given by witnesses in the trials was the result of intimidation and force applied to pro-independence supporters, (many of whom were in custody at the time they gave evidence), or collaboration and collusion by members of the Indonesian security forces. Many prosecution witnesses were intimidated, through threats to them and their families, into providing false evidence. Defence witnesses, on the other hand were intimidated not to appear in court or to provide any evidence that might assist the defendants.

169. The lack of capacity for the defendants to call witnesses to support their cases is reflected in the fact that in all but two trials no defence witnesses appeared. The cases in which defendants did call witnesses to support their cases were those of Jacinto Alves, where two defence witnesses appeared, while the prosecution called 10 witnesses, and Gregorio Saldanha's case, where two defence witnesses appeared, and the prosecution produced 24 witnesses.

170. Almost all prosecution witnesses were serving members of the Indonesian security forces who, it should be remembered, were centrally implicated in the shootings of the civilians at the Santa Cruz cemetery, and East Timorese civilians who were held in custody and subjected to threats, intimidation and psychological or physical torture. The serious conflict of interest raised by the security force witnesses giving evidence was not recognised, explored or considered in any real way by the trial judges. Statements of different witnesses for the prosecution often included evidence which was exactly the same, word for word, or so strikingly similar as to lead to the inevitable conclusion that they were not independent testimonies but the result of collusion and collaboration.

171. There are also serious doubts that the few prosecution witnesses who were not detained by, or working for, the Indonesian security forces gave independent and reliable testimony. Rather, they appear to have been coerced into supporting the version of events put forward by the prosecution.

172. In some cases, where a witness strayed from this predetermined concocted story during the trial, steps were taken to ensure that this was remedied. For example, a prosecution witness in the Gregorio Saldanha trial was Agusto Xavier who later claimed in a related trial that he was forced to give false information by interrogators. When the evidence given by this witness differed from that included in the prepared record of interview, the judge did not allow him to continue giving the testimony he was relating, which was his own personal account of what had taken place, to the best of his recollection, or to refer him to his prior statement, which is normal practice. Instead the judge automatically adjourned the hearing.

173. Article 163 of the KUHAP required that judges investigate a discrepancy between written and oral testimony.* These duties are directed at inquiring into the circumstances in which a written statement may have been concocted, fabricated or been the result of force or intimidation, or any other reason why the oral testimony may be different from the statement. However, the judges considered that the previous documentary evidence should be the basis of the evidence, not the words of the witness. They ordered adjournments and during the adjournments steps were taken to ensure that the witnesses gave evidence that accorded with the previously written testimony.

174. In addition to the fact that witnesses were interrogated concerning issues of their own guilt, and their purported answers recorded without being informed of their rights, nor provided with the opportunity for a lawyer to be present, witnesses also were asked incriminating questions during trials without being warned of their rights. Every single defendant gave evidence in the trials of other co-accused and each of them was asked and answered questions in a way that incriminated them. An examination of the court files in each of the cases does not reveal any notation or evidence that the suspects were informed of their right not to answer questions which might incriminate them, as required under Article 66 of KUHAP.†

175. One major obstacle faced by the defence was the difficulty in finding people willing to testify in court to their experiences, which differed markedly from the version of

* Article 163 of KUHAP: If the testimony given by a witness during a session is different from his recorded information, the judge/chairman of the session shall remind the witness about this fact and ask him to explain the difference which shall be noted down in the record of the session.

† See for example Article 14(3)(g) of the ICCPR: In the determination of any criminal charge against him, everyone shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality: (g) Not to be compelled to testify against himself or to confess guilt.

events that was officially endorsed by the Indonesian government. Potential witnesses were either threatened, or were unwilling, to testify because appearing in court would attract the attention of intelligence officials and raise the possibility of intimidation and reprisals from the Indonesian authorities.

176. A common practice in relation to prosecution witnesses who were unable to appear before the court was to accept written statements as evidence. This did not occur with defence witnesses, who, despite the difficulties, were expected to attend.

177. With defence witnesses either too afraid to speak the truth or even appear before the Court, there was little to balance the evidence provided by members of the Indonesian security forces who were themselves implicated in the massacre. For example, in the Gregorio Saldanha trial, PT3, a member of Mobile Police Brigade (Brimob) 5846, was questioned by the Presiding Judge and provided evidence which is totally contradicted by the facts which the Commission has found to be true. Yet this witness account was not seriously questioned during the trial:

> Judge I: Did the protesters panic after the initial warning shots?
>
> Witness XII: No, they became more ferocious and brutal.[127]

178. The Commission has received many reliable eyewitness accounts that contradict PT3 testimony, stating that the crowd at the Santa Cruz cemetery was generally peaceful and the Indonesian soldiers opened fire without provocation (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict for a more detailed account of the demonstration). There were hundreds of survivors of the actual attack who could have attested to this before the court, many of who have given such evidence to the Commission. However it appears they were too afraid to do so. Article 65 of KUHAP grants defendants the right to seek and put forward witnesses. The Commission has found that in the cases examined many potential defence witnesses were intimidated into not giving evidence or pressured into providing false evidence, in violation of this right.

Evidence

179. The Commission has found that in addition to the witness testimony material evidence was fabricated and manipulated to support the prosecution case. It is interesting to note that the prosecution introduced a range of material evidence, such as guns and knives, which were allegedly used by the demonstrators. The available film footage of the demonstration, taken by Max Stahl, which showed the demonstration to be generally peaceful and the massacre unprovoked was not sought by the prosecution to be used in evidence, despite the fact that it was freely available and being shown on television around the world. This footage included Indonesian military officers firing directly at unarmed men and women who were not threatening in any way, and in fact running away in some cases.

180. The improper practices regarding evidence are best illustrated in relation to weapons. According to the prosecution case the defendants either owned or condoned the use of powerful weapons. According to Gregorio Saldanha:

There, [they] prepared various guns and 8 grenades, and there were boxes of knives. They said I carried all those weapons myself. This is one example of their lies.[128]

181. The defence counsel in Gregorio Saldanha's trial pointed out that the prosecution had produced guns and alleged that they belonged to the defendants, but had not provided witnesses who could state where they had found those guns and knives, and therefore they were only objects with no link to the defendants. The defence also relied on the argument that any use of guns during the demonstration was the work of Indonesian military intelligence agents who had dressed as young male civilians and pretended to be part of the demonstration, in order to give an excuse for other military officers to respond against the demonstrators with force.

182. The evidence relating to guns or knives or gunshots from the direction of the protesters establishes that it was planned and was the work of Intel agents who infiltrated among the protesters.[129]

183. There was no valid and convincing evidence presented to the Dili District Court, because there were no statements or witnesses that could verify without any doubt from whom those guns and knives came and when they were confiscated.[130]

184. Much of the evidence produced by the prosecution in the trials had been fabricated to support a claim that the demonstrators had been heavily armed and violent, that they had attacked members of the security forces, who had been forced to respond by firing at them. The Commission has examined the film footage taken of the incidents, which clearly shows Indonesian military officers firing at unarmed boys and girls, who were cowering and trying to escape. It has also interviewed and taken statements from many witnesses to the incidents. It is clear to the Commission that the evidence produced by military and police witnesses and delivered to the court by the prosecution in relation to this version of events had been fabricated.

Prosecution

185. The work of the prosecutors during the formal aspects of the trial appears to have been satisfactorily carried out. Indictments were drafted comprehensively and questions at trial, although few, pursued arguments established in the indictments. However, the evidence which was produced at the trials was not a compilation of independent sources which the prosecution presented to the court in order to ascertain the truth of what had occurred. It appears to the Commission that the result of the trials had been decided before they were in fact conducted. The duty of the prosecution was to provide sufficient material to substantiate the predetermined guilty verdicts.

186. Under the civil law system practiced in Indonesia it is the duty of the prosecution to present both incriminatory and exculpatory material to the court. However, in the Santa Cruz trials the prosecution did not seek to introduce exculpatory material, despite the fact that there were abundant witnesses who had seen what in fact had taken place, and it had been captured on film by Max Stahl, who was not contacted to give evidence for the prosecution concerning the circumstances surrounding the filming of the events. Little effort was made to ensure that those witnesses who were available could give evidence in an environment free from intimidation, or that there was a balanced view presented at trial.

187. The evidence was in general a collection of materials and witness testimony which was strongly controlled and manipulated in order to produce the predetermined outcome of a guilty verdict against the accused. This guilty verdict was an important political goal, viewed as necessary to answer the international outcry over the massacre and to suppress any future will to demonstrate against human rights abuses in Timor-Leste, or to support the right to self-determination. The process of justice for the individuals charged was a tool used to achieve this goal. The evidence on which the desired outcome was reliant was therefore manipulated to remove any possibility that the political goal might not be achieved.

Defence

188. Members of the Indonesian legal aid team who assisted in the trials stated that for Indonesian human rights lawyers defending Timorese prisoners, their point of reference was the Indonesian Constitution, in which the right of self determination is enshrined. They also noted that international human rights law is also formally part of the Indonesian legal system, and that they struggled to uphold these values. However, they were faced with intense opposition in pursuing the ideals of justice by officials who were pursuing the New Order political objectives without regard for the requirements of the Indonesian Constitution or the legal protections over the rights of suspects. This was particularly so for those suspected of political opposition, who were kept in much worse conditions than common criminals:

> It was shocking, when I was in Dili, how impossible the Indonesian officials were at this time … when we requested to meet with the Chief of the Sub-district Police (Kapolwil) in Dili…he asked a straightforward question…"Are you Indonesian?"…It was as if those of us who defended (prisoners) were not Indonesian. It should be clear that our commitment was to the law and human rights…we did not see nationality, the problems behind a case, political or otherwise. We see that everyone who is arrested, detained, tried has the right to be defended. Every person on trial has the right to a lawyer to be present.[131]

189. The Commission recognises the courage and dedication of the Indonesian defence counsel who risked their safety and careers by defending the East Timorese defendants in the Santa Cruz trials. Domi Yos Atok, Artidjo Alkostar, Luhut M. P. Pangaribuan and Nur Ismanto are commended for their demonstrated commitment to the ideals of justice and human rights in the face of threats, intimidation and obstruction. The Commission also recognises that reform and improvement of the judicial systems of both Indonesia and Timor-Leste is dependent on the contribution of individuals such as these, who hold to their commitment, principles and integrity no matter what the political context, threats or cost. There can be little hope for reform or improvement unless these qualities and the individuals who demonstrate them are extended the high respect that they deserve, and are able to provide an example for others to follow. According to the defendant Jacinto Alves:

> Our lawyers from LBH received threats, so their hotel was closely watched and so on, but threats also came from the Prosecutors, ie the title of defence lawyers' argument was "coercion" and the Prosecutor demanded that the defence lawyers dropped that title. If they didn't, they would be taken to court. So threats like that were common.[132]

190. According to defendant Francisco Branco:

> The lawyers were really kind to the family, kind because they visited the family for moral support. The military were suspicious of them; they were followed wherever they went.[133]

191. The defence lawyers appearing for the defendants were accused of being unpatriotic during the proceedings in the courtroom. Prosecutors were allowed by judges to be diverted away from the issues before the court, such as whether the defendants had committed the alleged offences, to attack the integrity of defence counsel and suggest that their work in defending the charges was contrary to the goals of their shared nation. The following quote from the transcript of the trial of Gregorio Saldanha provides a clear indication of a belief on the part of the prosecution that the efforts of both prosecution and defence counsel were directed to ensure the political goal of integration, rather than ascertaining the truth in relation to the charges.

> It is unfortunate that the defence lawyer's argument did not benefit the security and stability in East Timor, [it] could lead to loss of confidence about the history of integration of East Timor into The Unitary State of the Republic of Indonesia.[134]

192. Not only do such remarks deny the importance and independence of the judicial process, they also reflect a clear failure to recognise that the exercise of every defendant's right to rigorously defend allegations brought against them is the foundation of the justice system within which they were working. It is important to note that political attacks on defence counsel, such as the above, were frequently allowed, with no intervention from the presiding judge.

193. A small number of Indonesian citizens also assisted the political prisoners during the terms of their imprisonment, visiting and monitoring their conditions. The Commission highly commends the contribution to humanity of these individuals who placed universal values of fairness, justice and compassion over threats to their own safety. Ade Sitompul was one person who provided an outstanding example of how these universal values produced individual, selfless action:

> Our conversations opened my heart and mind about why these people were fighting for independence, for their country and nation, and how they feel occupied by Indonesia. Their stories were similar to my experience when I was young and fighting for independence from the Dutch.

194. In response to attacks on their integrity, defence counsel sought to explain that they were motivated by universal principles, and a patriotism for their nation, Indonesia, and as civil servants had a duty to try to improve the performance and status of the government of Indonesia.

> [W]e love truth and freedom...[S]o the people of Timor-Leste be given the freedom to stand on their own feet like other nations and be given the universal right to self-determination, as prescribed in the United Nations principles and Resolution 1514 (XV), 14 December 1960.[135]

> As civil servants for the Indonesian Government, we are obliged morally to contribute in improving the image of the Republic of Indonesia, which has plummeted in the international Community since the TNI invasion of Timor-Leste.[136]

195. The defence team generally had to work to unreasonable deadlines and were often not given even basic access to their clients. For example in Francisco Branco's case, the defence was granted only three days to draft the written defence response to the indictment after they were officially allowed to act. Also

> As their prisoner (their client), they tried to visit me, but were always denied…they were not given permission to see the detainees.[137]

196. Legal argument by defence teams were based on the claim that Timor-Leste's integration into Indonesia was illegal, and would continue to be so until the East Timorese were given an opportunity to participate in a free and fair choice concerning their political status. This was argued in a number of ways, for example through detailed accounts of East Timorese history from the pre-colonial period up until the Indonesian invasion and occupation; by disputing the validity of the Balibó declaration; by arguing that self-determination was supported by the 1945 Indonesian Constitution; as well as arguments based on international law and UN Security Council resolutions. If the Indonesian claim over Timor-Leste was illegal then there could be no substance to charges that East Timorese had committed treason by not supporting the sovereignty of Indonesia in Timor-Leste.

> The core of their defence, they [the defence lawyers] said that: "The right to self-determination, the Timor-Leste issue, is an ongoing process. The Indonesian government's presence in Timor-Leste is a breach of international law, because the people of Timor-Leste were denied the opportunity for self-determination and the Indonesian presence was imposed on the people of Timor-Leste."[138]

197. In the trial of Gregorio Saldanha defence counsel provided written submissions which argued:

1. That the Balibó Declaration, followed by the joint Petition for Integration by four political parties: UDT, Apodeti, KOTA and Trabalhista, was illegal because it represented a minority of Timorese who fled to Atambua [Nusa Tenggara Timur, Indonesia];

2. That the East Timor issue was an international issue, not a domestic Indonesian issue.[139]

198. Political arguments were also taken up by some defendants. The statement by Jacinto Alves, entitled "Struggle is the Discovery of a Nation that has never Died", drew parallels between the struggles for East Timorese independence and Indonesia's own struggle for freedom.

> History is a constant and irreversible march, it continues to move forward, never backward, and shapes the human self across generations of people who tune into its rhythm. From this point of view, we revisit the history of Timor-Leste and draw parallels with the history of the Indonesian Nation.[140]

199. Statements written by defendants also raised arguments based on international law:

> All international laws and agreements passed by the UN regarding Timor-Leste are valid and apply to Indonesia because they are based on the international law which is the basis for the Indonesian law.[141]

Judges

200. The Commission is satisfied that the panels of three judges did not act independently and impartially. It appears the judges were in close collaboration, either directly or indirectly, with intelligence agencies and police investigators for the purpose of securing the politically motivated conviction of the defendants. All of the defendants and many other witnesses interviewed by the Commission were strongly convinced of the guiding role of the military in the conduct of the trial. Francisco Branco told the Commission in his interview:

> [B]ecause the judges were on the side of the military authority the trial which should have been fair and independent, was manipulated by the military and they just waited for BAKIN's instructions, closely watched in whichever direction it went.
>
> They were not independent, but manipulated by the authorities. Their competence, they waited for instruction from BAKIN even regarding the Articles, they looked for Articles to incriminate the defendant. How did they give instruction? Within the police, the interrogation was controlled by BAKIN. The judges, too, could do their work but not independently.
>
> CAVR: Do you believe that all judges were controlled from the Centre or by the military?

FB: Yes, that was obvious, even the judges did not know the decision, the decision was handed down by the intelligence to be read by the judges.

CAVR: What about the judges' decision?

FB: As I said, the intelligence officers who were present at the trial(s) gave them the decision just before the judges read those decisions.

CAVR: What did the intelligence officers give them?

FB: One note to the Prosecutor, then the decision was given to the judges.

CAVR: You saw it with your own eyes?

FB: Yes I saw it with my own eyes.[142]

201. In the trial of Francisco Branco, there was the following exchange which reveals how judge's sought to reinforce the legitimacy of the occupation through the trial:

Judge 1: Witness named Catherina. Who gave you that name?

Witness 2: My parents gave me that name.

Judge 1: Why don't you change your name now?

Witness 2: I can't, that is my baptismal name according to the Catholic religion.

Judge 1: I explain to the witness that the name is a fact, just like the integration of Timor-Leste is a fact. [143]

202. Under Art. 188 (3) of KUHAP, the evaluation of evidence by judges shall be wise and prudent, after he or she has accurately and carefully conducted an examination on the basis of his conscience. In relation to witness testimony, according to Art. 185(6) of KUHAP, judges must take into account its reliability, motivation and possible influencing factors.* There is no indication that judges weighed up the reliability of testimony and evidence. Rather, in general the judges did not question the evidence put forward by the prosecution, nor did they give reasons why they found it to be compelling.

203. By inhibiting defence cross-examination, encouraging pro-Indonesia political testimony and not questioning the reliability of evidence, the judges in effect supported the prosecution case and restricted the possibility of evidence favourable to the defence being raised at trial.

204. It appears that because of the political motivation to convict the defendants the judges, in several instances, required the defendants to prove that they had not broken

* Article 185(6) KUHAP: In judging the truth of a testimony by a witness, a judge must seriously take into account: … c. the reason which might have motivated a witness to give a certain testimony; d. the way of life and morality of a witness and any other things which can be of influence for determining whether or not the information he has given can be trusted.

the law. The fact that the defence could not produce sufficient evidence to prove their innocence was a reason given for conviction. This is a fundamental misunderstanding of the basic principle of the presumption of innocence.

205. In the Jacinto Alves decision, the judges convicted the defendant despite the following statement in the judgment: "During trial, the Panel of Judges could not find evidence to support the indictment that the defendant broke the law."

Decisions

206. Most defendants were found guilty of the primary charges on their indictments (see Vol. V, Annexe 3: Indictments Summaries). The exceptions were Juvencio Martins, Bonifacio Magno and Filomeno da Silva Ferreira who were acquitted of the treason charge as a principal but convicted of the subsidiary charge of conspiring to commit treason.[144]

207. The sentences handed down to the defendants were severe. They ranged from five years and eight months for Filomeno da Silva Ferreira to life imprisonment for Gregorio Saldanha (see Annexe I: Tables and Convictions on Indictments). Those acquitted of the primary charges and convicted of conspiracy to commit treason received the shortest sentences.

208. The judges based their decisions on pages of justifications of Timor-Leste's supposed integration into Indonesia, providing further evidence that the role of the trials was partly to legitimise the Indonesian occupation.

209. The general reasoning in the decisions was as follows: Timor-Leste was legally a part of Indonesia; Indonesia had contributed to the development of Timor-Leste; and as the Santa Cruz demonstration went against Pancasila and failed to appreciate the development brought about by Indonesia, the actions taken at Santa Cruz could therefore be justified by the need to uphold Pancasila ideals.

210. An initial premise of all decisions was that Timor-Leste has been legally integrated into Indonesia. The Jacinto Alves decision illustrates this:

> The integration of Timor-Leste into the Republic of Indonesia was not the initiative of the Indonesian Government or the Indonesian People. The basis was the will of the East Timorese themselves…the will of the people of Timor-Leste has been reflected as a whole in the Balibó Proclamation.[145]

211. At trial, defence counsel argued that the Anti-Subversion Law breached Indonesia's 1945 Constitution and that accordingly, the Law must be repealed and that any indictments based on this law were unlawful.[146] This argument was rejected in both trials involving charges of subversion.

212. The form of the indictments and the judgments were not overly problematic. It is only on a deeper consideration of the totality of factors relevant to the trial that it becomes obvious that witnesses who could have given true evidence concerning the events were prevented from doing so, others were threatened and intimidated into supporting the prosecution case, material evidence was fabricated, exculpatory material was ignored, and military officers and police colluded and fabricated their evidence. The seeming rationality of the indictments and the judgments provided a veneer of fairness, which covered a deeply flawed process.

213. The decisions generally imply that the defendants were not only guilty of subversion by organising the demonstration, but also bear some degree of responsibility for the killing of the East Timorese protestors at the Santa Cruz cemetery, even though the victims were the friends and colleagues of the defendants who had been shot by Indonesian military officers. According to the Francisco Branco decision:

> [T]he demonstration had:
>
> 1. Claimed victims, which according to KPN (the National Investigation Commission) totalled 50 deaths and more than 91 injuries.
> 2. Caused anxiety in the community.[147]

214. Gregorio Saldanha's life sentence was considered appropriate due to aggravating circumstances, including the fact that his actions were designed to draw the attention of the United Nations Human Rights Commission to what was taking place in Timor-Leste:

> The defendant's actions that confronted the government, by leading and directing a demonstration on 12 November 1991 during a visit by UN Human Rights Commission, clearly aimed at undermining the government's credibility in the international community and may provide a false picture of the integration process.[148]

215. For the majority of the defendants, their positions as Indonesian civil servants were considered aggravating circumstances.[149] Mitigating circumstances were included, however these were generally formulaic, with factors such as the defendants' behaviour in the courtroom and the needs of their families apparently taken into consideration.

216. The decisions are remarkable for the high level of detail included. In this respect, they reflect efforts throughout the trial to give an appearance of due process and legality, which covered the manipulation, torture, intimidation and fabrication which characterised the interrogation and prosecution of the defendant.

Appeal

217. Most defendants appealed their cases to the High Court in Kupang.[150]

> My lawyer(s) and I rejected the judges' decision, then we appealed to the High Court, then Supreme Court, until we got a final decision.[151]

218. They therefore exercised their right under Article 67 of KUHAP to have their case reviewed by a higher tribunal.[152] However it is doubtful that the appeal added any value to what had been a flawed trial. The appeals appear to have been a "rubber stamping exercise" of the decisions of the lower court and were generally dismissed without reasons being given.

219. All of the appeal decisions from the High Court in Kupang opened with a lengthy procedural history of the case. In all but one decision, the court then affirmed the entirety of the decision made by the Dili District Court without any reasons or justification. In the case of the exception the appeal court only modified the wording of the Dili court's judgment in relation to the charges.

220. The following example from the Gregorio Saldanha case is typical of how the High Court justified its decisions:

> [T]he considerations and reasons given by the judges in the district court were deemed accurate and correct, and the High Court, therefore, will apply the same decision for this case.[153]

221. Thus there was no description of prosecution or defence submissions and no written analysis, merely an affirmation of the trial court's decision. This cannot be considered a genuine appeal. The prosecution and defence presented lengthy appeal submissions, primarily mirroring the arguments raised at trial, and these were not even referred to in the appeal decisions.

222. All defendants who appealed to the Kupang High Court then applied for cassation to the Supreme Court, to have their cases reviewed once again. All applications were refused without reasons, with the Court merely stating that the request for a Supreme Court appeal was refused.

223. The only defendants tried in Dili who did not appeal were those represented by the Indonesian-appointed lawyer Ponco Atmono. Rather than file for appeal, Carlos Lemos and Bonifacio Magno, made applications to President Soeharto to grant clemency.[154] In both cases, the defendants requested and were granted a two year reduction in their sentences. The decision, dated 10 August 1993, was personally signed by President Soeharto. No similar applications appear on the files of the other defendants, and it appears that the appeal for clemency was a successful strategy employed by Ponco Atmono.

Imprisonment

224. Following the handing down of their sentences the defendants were sent to Comarca Balide in August 1992. From there all defendants were moved to Becora prison (Dili) around the time of a visit from a UN delegation led by Amos Wako. After two weeks in Becora, Carlos Lemos and Bonifacio Magno were sent to serve their sentences in Kupang. Gregorio Saldanha, Francisco Branco, Jacinto Alves, Juvencio Martins, Filomeno Ferreira, and Saturnino Belo were flown to Semarang (Central Java, Indonesia) after two years in Becora. In September 1999, Gregorio Saldanha and Francisco Branco were transferred to Cipinang Prison in Jakarta and remained there until they were both released on 10 December 1999.

Trials and punishment of Indonesian security personnel involved in the Santa Cruz massacre

225. A useful illustration of the injustice of the Santa Cruz trials is found in a brief comparison with the court martial in Bali of ten low-ranking Indonesian officers in 1992. All but one were charged with minor disciplinary offences in relation to the Santa Cruz massacre. No officers were charged with criminal offences such as murder or torture, despite the existence of extremely strong evidence to show these crimes were committed.[155] The sentences handed down ranged from 8-18 months. Thus the East Timorese defendants received up to life imprisonment for their role in organising the demonstration, while the many soldiers and officers who were involved in the mass murder of over 200 non-violent protestors effectively received impunity. According to the International Commission of Jurists, who monitored both sets of trials:

> [T]he charges brought against the military officers and personnel subsequent to the 12 November incident are patently inappropriate to the crimes involved…It may fairly be said that "justice" has been turned on its head in this case.[156]

Conclusions

226. The Commission has examined the court file for each of the defendants tried in relation to the events surrounding the Santa Cruz massacre, interviews with those who participated in the trials as witnesses, defendants and lawyers, statements of scores of individuals who were present during the events at Santa Cruz, and secondary material such as reports of organisations such as the International Commission of Jurists, who monitored the trials, and Amnesty International.

227. Elsewhere in this Report the Commission provides an in-depth account of the demonstration and the subsequent massacre at the cemetery. It has found incontrovertible evidence that the demonstration was intended to be peaceful, that an unplanned incident took place during the march which involved an attack and wounding of a member of the Indonesian security forces, and that the angry response to this incident led to heavily armed Indonesian military officers randomly shooting into the crowd of demonstrators, killing over 200 persons and wounding many others (for further detail about the victims see Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Forced Disappearences). In addition to scores of corroborating witness statements the Commission has viewed video film clearly showing the Indonesian troops at the cemetery shooting unarmed young men and women without provocation.

228. Before the incident at Santa Cruz journalists were banned from entering Timor-Leste and information concerning the massive human rights abuses committed by security personnel was suppressed. The film footage of the massacre was secretly shot and smuggled out of Timor-Leste. It was released internationally and provoked world-wide outrage and calls for justice for those involved. The response of the high-ranking Indonesian government and military officials to this international outcry was to formulate a sophisticated strategy aimed at creating the impression that:

- The demonstrators were violent and had attacked the security forces
- The demonstrators were led by subversive elements who intended the violence
- The security forces had been forced to defend themselves and during this defence a small number of officers had committed disciplinary offences
- The Indonesian government was intent on complying with international principles of human rights and had therefore given each of the East Timorese defendants a fair trial
- The Indonesian government was even-handed and had therefore not only tried and punished the East Timorese but had also targeted members of its security forces who had been involved in the massacre.

229. The strategy included using trials to support these claims, although not one of them is true. The trial process was manipulated to ensure an outcome that both confirmed the claims and created a veneer of respectability, which could be defended against allegations of inaction. There was no real intention of uncovering the truth, punishing those responsible or providing a fair trial for those charged. In this way the Santa Cruz trials were typical of "show-trials" conducted by other dictators under authoritarian regimes.

230. The Commission, by investigating the conduct of the trials more deeply, has found that the military officers most centrally involved in the massacre were not punished, and those who had ordered the attack on unarmed civilians enjoyed total impunity. A few junior officers were charged with non-criminal offences and given light penalties. Once again the strategy behind this step is to provide an illusion that a serious attempt had been made as a basis for answering critics, which in fact hid rather than revealed the truth.

231. In the same way, the trials of the East Timorese defendants held a veneer of superficial respectability. Although the written indictments and judgments might indicate that the process had been respectable, almost every step in between was fundamentally defective. Evidence was fabricated, witnesses intimidated into lying or not appearing, defendants tortured into signing confessions. If the evidence before the court is biased, selected only to favour one side, then the court must "legitimately" come to a decision that is in accordance with the material that it has considered. The Commission finds that the strategy employed in the Santa Cruz trials was to ensure that the evidence produced to the court supported only one possible conclusion. To ensure the desired outcome, evidence was manipulated and fabricated, which required the participation and compliance of everyone involved in the trials.

232. The Commission finds that the investigating police, military personnel, prosecutors, government appointed defence counsel and judges involved in the trials colluded, both directly and indirectly, to subvert the cause of justice in order to produce a predetermined political result.

233. The police and military officers who carried out the investigations tortured and intimidated witnesses so that they gave a version of events that suited the political goals of the trials. They threatened and intimidated other witnesses and their family members so that they would be too frightened to give evidence of the truth. The courtroom was effectively closed to the public to avoid scrutiny, including the intimidating effect of large numbers of military in attendance at the trials. They also collected false evidence, such as guns and knives, and intimidated witnesses into falsely declaring that they had used them.

234. Prosecutors did not look behind this evidence, although it was obvious that much of it had been fabricated or obtained through coercion, nor did they pursue or provide to the court freely available information that controverted the evidence that they presented to the court. Judges accepted this evidence at face value, despite obvious discrepancies, and did not give any weight to material produced by the defence. They did not fulfil their duty to enquire into discrepancies between written and oral statements. The government appointed defence counsel failed to present evidence that could have acquitted their clients and presented arguments that in fact supported the prosecution case.

235. Of all persons officially involved in the trial process only the independently appointed Indonesian defence counsel demonstrated integrity, honesty and commitment to principles of justice. They alone should be proud of their contribution to the ideals contained in the Indonesian Constitution to which they referred, and their contribution towards achieving these ideals. The other officials, police and military involved, demonstrated the tendencies of corruption and collusion which undermine any hope of establishing a legal system which can provide justice to the citizens it serves.

236. The political motivation for conducting these "show-trials" included three distinct objectives. First, the trials offered a means of punishing those who organised the Santa Cruz demonstration, through the mechanism of the criminal law. Second, the trials paraded the captured leaders of the clandestine network, thereby demonstrating and potentially deterring others from becoming involved in clandestine activities. Third, the trials supported the defensive version of the Santa Cruz massacre that the killing of civilians was provoked by protestors and that the inappropriate reaction involved only a small number of ill-disciplined officers.

237. By holding individual trials, instead of a single joint trial, the Indonesian Government was able to re-assert in each case that anti-government action would be punished. By holding repetitive separate trials, the threat presented by the defendants appeared greater, thereby further justifying the extreme actions of the military. Finally, the trials created the impression that the Indonesian court was lawfully established, embodied the judicial arm of a legitimate sovereign government, and was fully authorised to convict and punish those who participated in anti-government activities. All of these factors contribute to an attempt on the part of Indonesian authorities to legitimise the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste.

238. It is clear that the cost of achieving this political goal was great injustice suffered by each of the eight defendants. They did not receive a fair trial or due process, and were given extremely severe punishments.

239. The penalties which were handed out for actions relating to the events at Santa Cruz included harsh sentences of up to life imprisonment for East Timorese defendants for actions which basically involved organising a peaceful demonstration against the government sponsored killing of a colleague. The harshest penalty handed out to a member of the Indonesian security forces, which were implicated in the killing of over 200 unarmed civilians, was 18 months imprisonment.

240. The major procedural flaws in the Santa Cruz trials include the following:

- The pre-trial detention conditions at Polda Comoro, which included the torture of civilians, prolonged interrogation with minimal time for rest and psychologically damaging techniques such as the harassment of defendants' families.
- Investigation techniques, which included violence and threats of violence when taking defendant and witness statements, seeking incriminating testimony, as well as the fabrication of evidence.
- The initial failure to uphold the right to an independent lawyer. Although the defendants were eventually allowed to appoint their own counsel, this occurred after the commencement of trial and meant that independent lawyers were not present during the crucial investigation and interrogation period.
- Failure to guarantee a fully public trial. Although the court sessions were theoretically open to the public, the fact that Indonesian intelligence officers and sympathisers filled the courtroom as well as an atmosphere of fear perpetuated by the Indonesian authorities meant that many East Timorese were too afraid to observe trial proceedings.
- The failure to guarantee the safety of potential witnesses. This prevented potential defence witnesses from testifying and resulted in vast inequality in the number of prosecution as opposed to defence witnesses. Further, the manner in which the trials were conducted prohibited defence counsel from asking effective questions to prosecution witnesses and the few defence witnesses who testified.
- Intimidation and interference in the defence team's work, both inside and outside the courtroom, combined with minimal access to clients and inadequate time to prepare the defence. Despite the oppressive conditions, legal aid lawyers generally performed admirably, providing solid submissions and well-reasoned arguments. Yet, on balance, there was not a level playing field between the defence and prosecution from the very outset of the trials.
- A lack of impartiality and independence on the part of judges. Judges appeared to be in collaboration with intelligence officials, conducted courtroom proceedings to favour the prosecution, and cut short any statements criticising integration that were elicited from witnesses by defence counsel. Witness testimony and evidence were not considered impartially and the judges often appeared to be promoting the official Indonesian government position, rather than acting as impartial arbiters.
- A lack of a meaningful appeal process. Although appeals were granted to the High Court in Kupang, the High Court's rejection of appeals cannot be considered to constitute a meaningful appeal process, due to a lack of transparency and failure to give reasons,. The decisions of the High Court in Kupang appear to have been a rubber stamp, approving the decisions of the Dili Court without detailed examination of the many procedural and substantive flaws in the trials. Further, given that the Supreme Court rejected all applications for cassation without reasons in all but one case, it appears that these applications may not have been treated on their merits.

- Disproportionate sentences. The sentences were overly harsh, particularly when compared with the treatment handed down to military officers found to have breached their duties at the site of the massacre.

The Jakarta trials, 1992

241. The massacre of civilians at the Santa Cruz cemetery on 12 November 1991 and the repercussions of that incident were of great concern to East Timorese students studying in Indonesian cities. As a protest against the massacre, student leaders organised a demonstration in Jakarta on 19 November 1991, to raise awareness about the actions of the Indonesian military and to demonstrate to the international community that intervention was crucial to resolving the conflict in Timor-Leste.

242. The Jakarta protest was the first major political demonstration held by East Timorese students in the Indonesian capital.* It followed increased political activity in Timor-Leste, for example the protest in Tacitolu, Dili, during Pope John Paul II's visit on 12 October 1989 and the demonstration at the Turismo Hotel during the visit of John Monjo, the US Ambassador to Indonesia, between 17 and 19 January 1990.

243. On 19 November 1991, at around 10.30am, two groups of East Timorese students gathered in Jakarta to hold a peaceful and orderly demonstration. Protestors chanted pro-independence slogans, displayed political banners and delivered a petition to UN representatives and to the Australian and Japanese embassies. The contents of the posters and petition, aside from referring to the Santa Cruz massacre, also addressed issues regarding the initial invasion and forced integration of Timor-Leste into Indonesia, for which the protestors sought immediate UN intervention. One of the posters was directed at the Indonesian Foreign Minister:

> Mr. Alatas! The question is not Development but Invasion and Self-Determination.[157]

244. The petition stated that:

> Indonesia's invasion of East Timor is a despicable action and…the Indonesian invasion and occupation of East Timor is comparable to the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait in 1991.[158]

245. Following the demonstration, five student leaders were arrested and faced trial for their roles in the demonstration: João Freitas da Camara, Fernando de Araujo (Lasama), Virgilio da Silva Guterres, Domingos Barreto, and Agapito Cardoso.

* One prior, although unsuccessful, action in Jakarta was the attempt by several East Timorese students to gain asylum in 1987.

They faced charges of either subversion or treason for opposing integration and rebelling against the Indonesian Government. The following analysis is based on trial documents,[159] interviews with defendants[160] and lawyers[161] as well as a number of secondary sources.

Arrest

Arrests in Jakarta

246. Approximately 100 people, mostly East Timorese students, participated in the demonstration on 19 November 1991 in Jakarta. The students were studying in universities in large cities such as Denpasar, Surabaya, Malang, Yogyakarta, Semarang, Solo, Salatiga, Bandung and Jakarta. Police arrested 71 protesters.

247. The protesters were arrested by police officers from Regional Police of Greater Jakarta Metropolitan (Kepolisian Daerah Metropolitan Jakarta Raya, Polda Metro Jaya). Domingos Barreto described the lead up to the arrest:

> We showed our solidarity that the shootings by the Indonesian army in Dili on 12 November was a violation [of human rights] so we launched an action to protest the 12 November incident…We the students in Java, that is, in all large cities in Indonesia, held an emergency meeting to launch a protest against the events in Dili. We held a series of meetings on 14,15 and 16 November. Finally on 19 November 1991 we took to the streets and submitted our petition to the UN representative in Jakarta. After our first demonstration in front of the UN Representative Office, we met a delegate from the UN and he said that the time of our demonstration had been approved. So at that time we felt that what we wanted to say would come true, but the approval of the UN delegate was not given in writing, only verbally. After that we held a demonstration at the Australian and Japanese embassies. We were going to continue on to the British embassy, but were arrested by the Jakarta police. It was not only the police, there was also a joint team of Special Forces Command (Komando Khusus, Kopassus), Mobile Police Brigade (Brigade Mobil, Brimob), and Regional Police of Greater Jakarta Metropolitan (Polda Metro Jaya), so these three components arrested us.[162]

248. One of the defendants, João da Camara, said about the arrest:

> The police arrested us, I don't know which team, but it was the police for sure. We were arrested in front of Hotel Indonesia (HI) and were taken to Central Jakarta TNI near St. Carolus [hospital], there was a police precinct there.[163]

249. Following the arrests some of the defendants were beaten. They were not informed where they were being taken and were subjected to sleep deprivation and continuous interrogation. Domingos Barreto stated the following:

After our arrest we were immediately beaten, and a few friends had lesions on their faces…Then for three days we were kept in a secret place, we were questioned, or investigated at all sorts of times–at midnight, 3.00am, so they did things their own way.[164]

250. According to an investigation by the Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation (YLBHI), the arrest of the defendants occurred in the context of a widespread round up:

> In the Jakarta demonstration, of the 71 people arrested only four became suspects. The rest were released after a period of detention at Polda Metro Jaya. Following intensive examination, one week later the detention of 49 people was suspended. Then after nearly 120 days of detention, 18 more people were released. After the second phase of suspension of detention only four people remained detained, namely: João Freitas da Camara, Virgilio da Silva Guterres, Agapito Cardoso and Domingos Barreto.[165]

The arrest in Denpasar, Bali

251. As arrests were occurring in Jakarta, suspects were also being detained in Bali. On 24 November 1991 at around 6:00am, security forces raided a house in Denpasar. The security forces, wearing traditional Balinese clothes and without any official warrant, arrested six students: Fernando de Araujo, José Pompeia, Anito Matos, Clemente Soares, Aniceto Guterres Lopes and José Paulo.[166] On the following day, Aniceto Guterres Lopes and José Paulo were released as the two students' presence at the place of arrest was considered coincidental.

252. Fernando de Araujo elaborates on the background and reason for his arrest and that of his friends in Denpasar:

> I was arrested because I was the Secretary General of Renetil (Resistentia Nacional Estudantes Timor-Leste), actually because of the Renetil problem, it was directly related to the Santa Cruz Massacre on 12 November 1991, after the massacre on 12 November, I coordinated my friends to hold a demonstration in Jakarta, in front of embassies to oppose and to protest the 12 November massacre. At that time of all the friends participating in the demonstration 72 were arrested; also all our friends of the clandestine front executive in Dili were arrested. I was arrested on 24 November 1991 in Denpasar, Bali at my boarding house with five others.[167]

253. The following, written by defendant Fernando de Araujo in his defence pleadings, describes how during the arrest process, the police apparently fabricated evidence:

> Once they returned to Clemente Soares' room they immediately produced two grenades and two sticks of explosives and confiscated all my documents and personal letters. None of the people involved in the search understood Portuguese, so all writings in Portuguese were taken > because they thought they were [incriminating] documents, even books in Portuguese were all taken.

>
> During the arrest and house search the officers did not produce either an Arrest or Search Warrant from the police. When we were all in the living room, they threatened to handcuff us and said that they would shoot anyone who moved.
>
> At that time my friends and I argued with them that we would admit ownership of all our possessions but not the grenades and explosives, because we had never seen them before and we never even contemplated the possession of those things. This was slander. The officers intentionally tried to compromise us by alleging that we possessed forbidden material in the house. During the argument the officers just said that we would settle it at the police station. We were taken to Polda Nusra in three separate cars and on arrival we were interrogated separately. There too we continued to deny ownership of the grenades and explosives.[168]

254. The arrests conducted in Denpasar appear to constitute breaches of Indonesian law. Arrests were conducted by the military and without first obtaining a warrant. This is in breach of Articles 16 and 18 of KUHAP. In relation to the Jakarta arrests, it is arguable that warrants were not required at the time of arrest as the suspects were caught in the act.

255. In a report issued after the incident, the Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation supports the view that the arrest in Bali did not follow the procedural rules established by KUHAP:

> For example in Fernando's arrest, the [arresting] officer was not from the police. First of all, the arresting officers proceeded without showing any identity or Arrest Warrant, and they also didn't leave a copy of the Arrest Warrant for the family or [house] occupants of the arrested person nor [any information on] the place of detention.
>
> The fact was, officers that were not from the police arrived at Fernando's house and immediately proceeded to search the house looking for reasons to make things appear as if he was in possession of grenades and other forbidden material without ever giving him a chance to explain. In short, he was taken away with the documents found during the search, which were not known because no Record of Interview was made at the time.[169]

Pre-trial detention

256. After the police conducted an initial investigation of the 71 detainees, three categories emerged: organisers of the demonstration, coordinators, and those who had just participated. A few days after the arrest some demonstrators from the second and third categories were released, while those considered to be responsible for organising the event, João da Camara, Virgilio Guterres, Domingos Barreto, Agapito Cardoso and Fernando de Araujo,* remained in custody in Jakarta and awaited trial.

Conditions of detention in Jakarta

257. The defendants were detained for approximately three months in Jakarta before being brought to trial. They spent only three days in Polri headquarters, spending most of the three months in Polda Metro Jaya. The defendants were not subjected to physical torture but had to endure psychological pressure. During their detention, the police interrogated them in turns from night until the afternoon. João da Camara, the demonstration leader, described the situation:

> In Polda Metro Jaya and, Polri, I was kept up all night...I was so tired, I just sat there in the chair until around 3.00 in the morning. They would take me outside for a walk while asking where my house was, and I would say I didn't know because I was too tired. They always took me outside at night: "We want to go to your house" [they would say]. "What for?", "We just want to." I wouldn't tell them.[170]

258. Domingos Barreto experienced similar treatment:

> I was tortured, not beaten; it was a form of indirect torture, like being interrogated from midnight till morning, I think that was torture, not physical but psychological, then we were awakened at three in the morning when people are supposedly sound asleep, but we would be called up one by one and taken outside.[171]

259. João da Camara further elaborates on the conditions:

> In Polri I endured not physical torture but mental torture, because they didn't let me rest. I was so tired, two nights they didn't let me sleep. The first night they kept asking me the same questions. I was upset [as] they kept repeating the same questions I had already answered, they kept asking, then they would grow tired because there were questions I refused to answer. I just kept silent. Then they would get bored and just let me be. There were desks around, so they would all sit around at their desks playing cards but making noises as well…to keep me from resting…I wasn't tortured physically but mentally like I said before, they didn't give me a chance to rest. So when they came back to ask again we were not given the time to rest, to think and answer coherently, so it was mental torture…they fed me, but only a little.[172]

Conditions of detention in Denpasar, Bali

260. Fernando de Araujo, one of the defendants detained in Denpasar, Bali, was treated differently. During interrogation, he experienced the following:

* Fernando Araujo who was the only defendant to have been arrested in Bali.

I was detained in a dark, large and filthy room. I was detained alone away from the others and before I was put in that filthy place, full of mosquitoes, I was stripped naked. They took all my clothes and I slept only in my underwear, for almost a month in Nusa Tenggara Regional Police (Polda Nusra) headquarters. Every night I would be interrogated until midnight by several people. People in the first two weeks, it wasn't clear where they were from, they were intelligence or military, [they] threatened to shoot me, held a pistol to my head and I was interrogated [in a room] with electric cables used to give electrical shocks and to torture people. After I was sent back to my cell, some more people would come like thugs and yell and curse, that dog, stupid, idiot, East Timor will never be independent. So it was a dreadful situation, although I was never tortured physically but the psychological and mental torture was plentiful. I said that they tried to break us.[173]

261. During detention in Denpasar no one had access to the detainees, as is made clear in Fernando's defence statement:

During my detention in Denpasar from 24 November to 22 December 1991, officers never allowed my friends to visit me in my cell although they had requested permission through the formal channels. I was forbidden to keep reading and writing material. At nights people in civilian clothes came to my cell to threaten me. Throughout my detention I wasn't treated as a political prisoner. We were taken to Jakarta handcuffed. The handcuffs were only opened after we arrived in the Serse room at Polda Metro Jaya.[174]

262. These forms of psychological abuse endured by the prisoners, both in Jakarta and in Denpasar, constitute breaches of fundamental human rights guarantees, including the right not to be tortured. Further, although Indonesian criminal procedure does not guarantee proper standards of detention, interrogation in the absence of legal counsel and restrictions on visits to detainees, constitute breaches of KUHAP.

Access to a lawyer

263. In Polda Metro Jaya, the defendants were not allowed access to legal counsel. Although they requested legal representation, the police rejected their request. No counsel were present during the investigation and interrogation processes, which is a breach of the duties under KUHAP.

Often I asked the prosecutor to call LBHI to request legal representation, but the response was always negative, citing as a reason: "I want to speed up the examination process so you can be released faster. If we wait for a legal counsel it would take too long". So, as many of my friends were becoming ill, I reluctantly accepted the situation.[175]

264. The record of interview of João da Camara stated that he had declined to request a lawyer whilst being interrogated when in fact he had not. The following is an extract from his RoI:

> In this interrogation do you need the presence of a legal counsel/ lawyer?…For this examination, I do not need the presence of a lawyer.[176]

265. In his defence statement, João da Camara said:

> The statement "I do not need the presence of a lawyer" was the prosecutor's statement and not my own. Before the interrogation started I had refused to be interrogated if my lawyer wasn't contacted to be present at the interrogation. This happened on 22 February 1992, Saturday, around 5:00pm: the prosecutor prevented my legal counsel from attending by using as an excuse: "Your friends are waiting in a room upstairs, [they are] waiting to be released. If you act like this, next week things could change, it could prevent or slow down their release."[177]

266. Fernando de Araujo stated:

> One investigator even said that cases of subversion do not necessarily require the presence of a legal counsel. He said it [a lawyer] was not guaranteed by law…The examination must be concluded quickly so there would be "hope" for you [the defendant]…Legal counsel will be present at the trial.[178]

267. Indonesian law, under Articles 54 and 55 of KUHAP, stipulates that suspects have the right to legal representation of their own choosing from the very first stages of investigation. It is clear that these fundamental guarantees were not upheld in relation to the defendants. Further, under Article 56 if a suspect or defendant does not have a lawyer of his or her own, a legal adviser must be appointed.

Investigation

268. It appears that the Records of Interrogation during pre-trial interrogation contained false allegations. According to João da Camara:

> I looked at the list of accusations. It was all there, like, for example, my relationship with Xanana. I never had any direct contact with Xanana, we had many people coming here, but they insisted I had contacts with Xanana Gusmão in the forest to do this, do that, and they said I was the leader of Renetil, which I wasn't, and they made up things to incriminate me.[179]

269. Defendants were then forced to sign inaccurate records of interrogation, as Fernando de Araujo explains:

[T]hey forced us to sign it, by saying the trial was about to commence so in frustration I signed it, hoping that the case would be tried in an open court so we could turn it into a political campaign.[180]

270. Fernando de Araujo raised the issue in his demurrer defence plea:

> On 27 April 1992, I was examined (defendant examination). I said before the Panel of Judges that what was written in the Record of Interrogation was mostly untrue, and because I had no legal representation I was forced to answer all questions although I never knew about or did what they asked.[181]

271. The approach by investigators and interrogators in forcing and coercing defendants to sign false statements clearly breaches Article 117 of KUHAP which guarantees that information by a suspect and/or witness to an investigator shall be given without pressure from whomsoever and/or in any form whatsoever. It also violated Article 52 of KUHAP which gives defendants the right to give statements freely to the investigators or the judges. Apart from being grossly unethical, from the very outset this greatly reduced the possibility of a fair trial. RoIs play a large part in an Indonesian trial as they provide the factual basis for the indictment. Any difference between oral testimony given in court and a statement recorded in a RoI should be investigated by judges and recorded. The original false statements obtained during interrogation remained the factual foundation of the trials.

Trial

Indictment

272. The main defendants, João da Camara and Fernando de Araujo, were indicted for subversion under the Anti-Subversion Law, and for subsidiary charges under KUHP. Three others faced charges under Article 154 KUHP for crimes against public order.

The charges against João Freitas da Camara[182]

273. The primary charge against João da Camara was that he violated Article 1(1)(1)(b) and Article 13(1) of the Anti-Subversion Law (UU No. 11/PNPS/1963) in that he engaged in actions aimed at or which could be expected to overthrow, destroy or undermine the power of the State, the authority of the lawful government, or the machinery of the State. It accused him of unspecified criminal activities in the clandestine movement from 1983 until 19 November 1991 or at any other times where day, date and month cannot be exactly determined and of having conducted unidentified illicit activities in at least five locations in Jakarta and in the form of meetings, forums, public displays and demonstrations using banners, posters and declarations. João da Camara was accused of having committed or having been involved in committing continuing crimes. Thus the prosecution attempted to link the most recent occurrence (the demonstration on 19 November 1991) to the accused's activities in the clandestine movement that appear to have begun in 1983 or 1984.

274. A number of factual allegations are made against João da Camara. These include that he agreed to receive information from Timor-Leste and send it abroad, to organisations such as ACFOA (Australian Council for Overseas Aid) in Melbourne and Amnesty International in London. He also allegedly received funding from these and similar organisations. The information he disseminated allegedly spread feelings of hostility, opposition and concern and originated from sources that were anti-government and the facts of which he failed to check with competent authorities. It was also alleged that on 20 June 1988, an underground organisation called Renetil (Resistencia Nacional Estudantes de Timor-Leste) was formed in Denpasar, Bali, led by Fernando de Araujo, with the defendant as the leader of the Jakarta chapter. Also, the defendant took every opportunity to demonstrate and distribute declarations and petitions to foreign visitors in Indonesia. Finally, as president of Renetil in Jakarta and as leader of the Movimento Nacional dos Estudantes de Timor-Leste, João da Camara allegedly used the excuse of human solidarity for the events of 12 November 1991 to shield his true intent of gaining world sympathy for his political campaign to see Timor-Leste released from Indonesia. The indictment further lists the inception, planning and execution of the demonstration on 19 November 1991.

275. The first subsidiary charge against João da Camara was the dissemination of feelings of hostility or aroused hostility, or causing splits, conflicts, chaos, disturbances or anxiety among the population or broad sections of society or between Indonesia and a friendly state. The second subsidiary charge was that the defendant publicly declared his feelings of hostility, hatred or contempt towards the government of Indonesia in violation of Article 154 of the KUHP.

The charges against Fernando de Araujo[183]

276. Fernando de Araujo was accused of being the president of Renetil and faced primary and subsidiary charges that mirrored those of João da Camara. He was also charged with committing a continuing criminal act based on factual allegations, commencing in 1986.

277. A summary of the factual allegations against Fernando de Araujo are as follows. In 1986 in Denpasar, Bali, Fernando de Araujo received instructions from Xanana Gusmão calling on the Catholic youth of Timor-Leste in Indonesia to organise and form associations aimed at furthering the struggle to free Timor-Leste from Indonesia. In connection with this, the accused received a telephone call from José Ramos-Horta in Australia. On 20 June 1988, in Bali, the defendant was present at a meeting which established Renetil, and was subsequently elected its leader at its first congress. From 1988 to 1991, he established many branches of Renetil across Java and was the point of contact for information about Timor-Leste, whether provided by Constancio Pinto or Xanana Gusmão, to the outside world and Renetil branches. The indictment details numerous Renetil meetings and communications. Also, the defendant allegedly received funds and medicines from abroad and chanelled them through the clandestine network.

278. On 12 November 1993, Constancio Pinto informed Fernando de Araujo of the killings at Santa Cruz Cemetery and instructed him to organise a demonstration in Jakarta. At 1.00pm, Fernando de Araujo telephoned João da Camara, leader of the Renetil branch in Jakarta and instructed him, among other things, to notify foreign media and embassies in Jakarta, ACFOA and Amnesty International about what had happened in Dili. His further instructions were to carry out a demonstration using banners and posters at the UN Representative Office, and the Embassies of Japan and Australia, and contact other Renetil branches so they would send demonstrators.

279. Fernando de Araujo alleges that his indictment contained false allegations. His said that he had never received the open letter from Xanana Gusmão, nor acted in furtherance of it.

280. Like other political trials conducted under the Indonesian occupation, the Jakarta trials were based on inherently unjust charges under the Anti-Subversion Law and KUHP. The charges against the defendants in the Jakarta trials further illustrate the wide range of options available to prosecutors when seeking to prosecute and punish not only peaceful public protests, but also gatherings of East Timorese students to discuss the situation in their homeland. Also notable was the lack of detail in relation to allegations about the long-term clandestine activities of the defendants, which remained vague and unsubstantiated. Allegations spanned as much as a ten year period and often did not contain specific detail as to dates, places and persons involved.

Courtroom conditions

281. All defendants were tried individually in the South Jakarta District Court. The trials took between two and six months. Before trial, the defendants were detained in prisons in Salemba and Cipinang in Jakarta and were taken to the courthouse under heavy guard. The judge stated at the beginning of the hearings that the trials were open to the public. The only spectators who were allowed into the courtroom, however, were intelligence agents, police, or military, all of whom were part of the Indonesian security forces. Thus, the trial had the appearance of being open, but in practice it was not.

282. According to Fernando de Araujo, the presence of the Indonesian security forces was partly to intimidate the defendants:

> The situation during the trial, full of police, military in uniform and in civilian clothes, they were there too. They showed up before the trial. During the trial and at the end of it they sat at the back of the courtroom, and until the end they sat at the back of the courtroom for security reasons, but [they were there] to terrorise and intimidate us, like I said, they [said they] would crush our heads and we should get heavy sentences and all that.[184]

283. Under Article 153(3) of KUHAP, trial proceedings should be open to the public. This was clearly not the case in relation to the Jakarta trials, and accordingly, the decision issued by the court should arguably have been annulled under Article 153(4).

Witnesses

284. Similar to previous trials, the number of witnesses was weighted strongly in favour of the prosecution. In fact, the Commission is unaware of any defence witnesses who testified. Further, a large number of prosecution witnesses were also current or former detainees, who were either about to face trial or who had been held on suspicion of having committed a crime related to the Jakarta demonstration. According to João da Camara:

> [T]hose witnesses came from the 70 friends who were arrested, most of whom were released, leaving the 22 of us. Then most [of those] were released, leaving 5 of us. At the trial 17 people returned as witnesses and we testified against each other." [185]

285. Article 65 of KUHAP grants defendants the right to seek and put forward witnesses. Given the complete lack of defence witnesses, there are strong indications that this provision was breached.

Evidence

286. Physical evidence obtained both during and after the demonstration was submitted to the court. Among these were:

> Banners and petitions, carried by the defendants during the demonstration, [evidence of] financial aid and [of] meetings held by the defendants. Evidence was submitted regarding their role as leaders of student clandestine organisations like Renetil and of their relationship with Timor-Leste struggle figures.[186]

287. Other examples of the physical evidence tendered by the prosecution come from the Virgilio da Silva Guterres trial:

> [O]ne copy of the petition/declaration dated 18 November 1991, titled Declaracão Do Movimento Nacional dos Estudantes de Timor-Leste Na Indonesia; posters written on yellow-coloured manila paper, saying "We are testament to 16 years of Indonesia brutality!"; "Integration is the total extermination of our people!"; "Mr Alatas! The question is not development but invasion and self determination!"; "Where are our Martyrs? We want them to be buried according to our tradition!"; "Better death than integration!"[187]

Performance of defence counsel

288. After initially being refused legal representation, at trial the defendants were represented by a team of lawyers from YLBHI-Ikadin, Jakarta. Those two institutions formed a team called the Joint Committee for East Timor, the purpose of which was to provide legal assistance to the East Timorese defendants in Dili and Jakarta. Similar to other political trials, the lawyers were obstructed and prevented from representing their clients without interference. Given the political situation in Indonesia at the time, it was highly controversial and possibly dangerous to defend East Timorese defendants. Nevertheless, despite these impediments to their work and unfair treatment by the Indonesian military, the defence team continued to represent the East Timorese defendants.

289. According to Fernando de Araujo:

> Towards the end of February 1992, the lawyers from LBH-Jakarta, they usually visited us in prison. Their coordinator was Mr Luhut Pangaribuan, SH, LLM. I really admire him, he was so kind although at the time he was afraid himself because the military government decided everything, but they fought for their clients' rights to speak and write their defence plea.[188]

290. According to João da Camara:

> The lawyers attempted to defend us, to defend our position as students, as young students who should be given consideration to return to campus and continue their studies, not give them harsh punishment, but the prosecutors demanded harsh punishment.[189]

291. The Commission commends the integrity and courage demonstrated by the Indonesian legal aid lawyers who defended their clients rigorously despite extremely adverse conditions. In particular Mr Luhut Pangaribuan should be commended for his commitment to the ideals of justice and the principles of the Indonesian Constitution when faced with actions orchestrated by members of the military forces which were illegal, immoral and intimidating.

Substance of the defence

292. The arguments raised by defendants in their defence statements were generally that human rights issues and international law must be upheld without discrimination. They claimed that they had the right to organise a peaceful protest and should not be punished for this. They also relied on international legal principles which demonstrated that the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste was illegal, the questionable legality of trying East Timorese in an Indonesian court and Portugal's rights over the territory of Timor-Leste.[190]

Decisions and sentences[*]

293. Both João da Camara and Fernando de Araujo were found guilty of subversion as a continued action. They were sentenced to 10 and 9 years imprisonment respectively. The other defendants, Virgilio Guterres and Domingos Barreto were convicted of crimes against the public order under Art. 154 KUHP for publicly expressing feelings of hostility, hatred or contempt against the Indonesian Government. Virgilio da Silva Guterres was sentenced to 2 years and 6 months imprisonment, Agapito Cardoso to 10 months and Domingos Barreto to 6 months.

* No documentation on judgments could be obtained by the CAVR.

Appeal

294. João da Camara, Fernando de Araujo, Virgilio Guterres and Agapito Cardoso appealed to the Jakarta High Court to review the decisions of the Central Jakarta District Court.

295. João da Camara's appeal was based on a number of grounds: first, that Indonesian Courts did not have the authority to determine his case; and second, that the ruling of the Central Jakarta District Court had violated the prevailing law because the court had ignored essence and purpose of the KUHAP, which was to seek the material truth and uphold the appellant's rights. Specifically, João da Camara's lawyers alleged that:

1. All indictments against the appellant were groundless, unproven and illegitimate, because all appellant's actions were within his rights as an East Timorese protesting against the perpetration of major human rights violations in Timor-Leste by its government and apparatus including ABRI, that [his actions were deemed] legitimate and legal by UN resolutions issued between 1975 and 1982;
2. Law 7, 1976 on the Integration of Timor-Leste into Indonesia was illegal because it did not reflect the wishes of the East Timorese people and that therefore it was more of an annexation than an integration and that Law 7, 1976 resulted from the Indonesian government's political manipulation after Timor-Leste's annexation into Indonesia. With this action the Indonesian government violated those basic principles clearly stated in the preamble [of the Indonesian 1945 Constitution] and violated the second and fifth tenets of Pancasila by terrorising and oppressing the people of Timor-Leste.[191]

296. On 30 July 1992, the Court of Appeal in Jakarta rejected João Freitas da Camara's appeal.[192] On 29 October 1992, João da Camara proposed filing an appeal to the Indonesian Supreme Court. On 27 February 1993, the Supreme Court rejected this application, holding that the objections to the Court of Appeal ruling had not been proven. No justification or reasons for this decision were given.

297. The appeal application by Fernando de Araujo to the High Court was based on the following grounds: first, the defendant was denied access to legal assistance during the investigation even though legal assistance is required by law in serious cases of this nature; second, although some of the witnesses were not present at trial, nonetheless their RoIs were submitted as evidence by the prosecutor in violation of Article 185 (1) of KUHAP, and finally the indictment was based on the Anti-Subversion Law, which he claimed was unconstitutional. His appeal was rejected without reasons.

298. Virgilio da Silva Guterres similarly appealed to the High Court and the appeal was rejected without justification. On 30 January 1993, his appeal to the Supreme Court was also rejected. In his application, the defendant asked that the court's ruling be in accordance with the values enshrined in Pancasila, while it should also comply with the principles stated in the UN Charter. The Supreme Court rejected all objections filed by the appellant.

299. Agapito Cardoso specifically appealed the 10 month prison sentence handed down by the Central Jakarta District Court. He considered it unfair, disproportionate and lacking objectivity. In his appeal, he further claimed that the Central Jakarta District Court preferred the presumption of guilt over the the presumption of innocence and that the District Court was more interested in knowing whether the defendants were the recipients of government scholarships rather than whether they were connected with the demonstration. The appeal also claimed the judges ignored the reasons why the demonstration was held, preferring to compare the level of development during Portuguese times to development under Indonesian occupation. Like all other appeals, it was rejected.

Conclusion

300. There are many similarities between the trials of those prosecuted for demonstrating in Jakarta and those tried in relation to the demonstration in Dili. The major procedural flaws and violations of the requirements of both international legal standards and the particular applicable sections of KUHAP were present during both sets of trials. In both situations it is clear from the inquiries conducted by the Commission that the trials were organised and conducted not because of a real desire to pursue justice but in order to achieve political goals. The fabrication of evidence, distortion of answers recorded in the records of interview, false evidence given by members of the security forces, forceful prevention of other defence witnesses from appearing were all tools designed to achieve the foregone conclusion of the conviction and severe punishment of the defendants.

301. The following procedural violations took place during the Jakarta trials:

- Pre-trial conditions did not include physical torture, although all defendants complained about the use of sleep deprivation as a means of interrogation. It should be clearly understood that this may constitute a form of torture. Keeping subjects of interrogation awake for prolongued periods of time is an extremely traumatic experience, the effect of which should not be underestimated because it leaves no residual physical markings. The treatment was more severe in the case of Fernando de Araujo, who was placed naked in a darkened cell and interrogated in the presence of machinery used to deliver electric shocks and was threatened by loaded guns being placed to his head. All of these actions are outrageous distortions of the legal process which destroyed any hope of a legitimate trial process based on evidence and testimony recorded under these conditions.

- Interviews conducted using these illegitimate and illegal pre-trial practices led defendants to give certain information to their interrogators. Because these responses are the result of improper practices they should not have been relied on at trial. Moreover a large proportion of the Records of Interview was not information that the defendants had supplied but was fabricated by their interrogators.
- The trials were held in conditions that were not open to the public, thus violating not only international human rights standards but also the provisions of KUHAP.
- Defence counsels were not able to conduct their work freely and professionally due to intimidation by agents of the Indonesian military. They were blocked from pursuing certain lines of inquiry which were relevant to the defence of their clients. Despite this the independent defence counsel should be commended for their dedication and commitment to the ideals of justice.
- No defence witnesses were called in any of the trials. The intimidation of potential witnesses distorted the trial process to such a degree that it cannot be said that what ensued was free and fair, as there is no way of knowing what evidence would have been led from those witnesses had they not been forcefully dissuaded from appearing at trial.
- Members of the security forces fabricated evidence and colluded in giving false evidence to the court.
- The defendants right to appeal was denied to them in a practical sense as the arguments and evidence which the defendants raised during the appeal process were not considered on their merits. In this manner, similar to the Santa Cruz trials, the appeal process was merely a "rubber-stamping" of the trial court decision, designed to achieve a political goal.

The trial of Xanana Gusmão, 1993

302. The Indonesian authorities regarded the capture of the Falintil commander, Xanana Gusmão, in November 1992 as an historic moment in its campaign to subjugate Timor-Leste. From the arrest, to his detention in Bali and Dili, through to the trial and its aftermath they sought to control and manipulate the process for maximum propaganda effect. The Indonesian military had a cameraman on hand to film the arrest, which was then broadcast throughout Indonesia. While in detention, Xanana Gusmão was forced to give several interviews. The Indonesian media followed the trial from start to finish, providing highly selective coverage.[193]

303. The Commission was unable to gain access to the court documents for Xanana Gusmão's trial. As a result, this case analysis relies heavily on secondary accounts, in particular a trial report by Asia Watch, as well as other reports and newspaper articles. The Commission conducted an interview with Xanana Gusmão himself, and analysed those documents that were available to it, such as Xanana's defence plea and a letter he wrote to the International Commission of Jurists (ICJ). These sources form the basis of the analysis below.

Pre-trial

Arrest

304. Xanana Gusmão was arrested on the morning of 20 November 1992 by members of the Indonesian armed forces. He was hiding in a specially built room, only accessible through a trap door concealed under a wardrobe, at the house of Augusto Pereira in Lahane, Dili.[194] According to Gusmão, intelligence officials arrived at 4.00am:

> And I had three alternatives: surrender, commit suicide, or offer resistance. If I surrendered, as the person in command of the struggle, I would have an opportunity to speak; if I had been a thief, suicide would have meant the end to my problems; if I had resisted, all the innocent people around me would have become victims. So when they came to to arrest me, I said: "Here I am."[195]

305. From the house, Xanana Gusmão was immediately taken to the home of Brigadier General Theo Syafei, commander of Kolakops.[196] Later on the same day, he was flown to Bali where he was detained at the Regional Military Command (Kodam) headquarters for three days and three nights.[197]

306. Xanana Gusmão describes his arrest:

> The arrest warrant, let's not make an issue of it, because this was an operation and I was the guerrilla commander, but when they arrested me, they did it with respect. If they had done it violently, then it would have been different, because they were afraid I would have made a run for it.[198]

307. Gusmão appears to have been arrested as a civilian rather than as a prisoner of war. There were no procedural formalities such as the production of a valid arrest warrant. The filming of the arrest and evidence that the Xanana's whereabouts had been disclosed by a civilian informant both suggest that the military had had time to plan the arrest, and if they wished to do so, to have gone through the prescribed legal formalities.[199]

308. Gusmão's arrest was followed by the arrest of several of his relatives and associates. By 4 December 1992, some two weeks after his arrest, at least 20 of his close associates and relatives were reported to be in detention.[200] Nine family members, including his sister, her husband, and two of their children, were among those detained.[201] Amnesty International alleged that several of those detained in Dili were subject to serious maltreatment and torture.[202] These arrests increased the leverage the Indonesian authorities were able to apply against Xanana Gusmão when they pressured him to make statements and cooperate with their investigation.

Pre-trial detention

309. For the first 17 days in detention, Xanana Gusmão was not allowed contact with the outside world. His place of detention was unknown, there were great fears for his safety and the lack of information led to much speculation about his treatment.[203] During this period Gusmão was not allowed contact with family or lawyers.[204] This ended on 7 December 1992 when the ICRC was given permission to see him after considerable international pressure and high-level negotiation between the UN, the Indonesian Minister for Foreign Affairs and the ICRC.[205] The visit occurred at the National Police Headquarters (Mabes Polri) in Jakarta.[206]

310. Following the visit, it became apparent that Xanana Gusmão had in the meantime been transferred from Bali to the custody of Kopassus in Jakarta[207] before being taken to the Mabes Polri. He told the Commission that that he received the worst treatment during his three days in Bali. Sleep deprivation was commonly employed:

> The first method they used, when I was in Bali, was not to let me sleep. If I was sleepy during the day, they screamed at me. If I was sleepy, at night, they screamed at me some more. They would talk to me at 2 in the morning. One I remember is PT4, because I knew him from 1983 when he was a major. So he spoke about this and that. He banged the table and I banged the table. We each banged the table![208]

311. It appears that during this initial period of detention, sleep deprivation was used to gain information and force Gusmão to make positive statements about the Indonesian presence in Timor-Leste:

> I was in there for three days and three nights, and was not given a chance to sleep. I was afraid that I would pass out, and I conceded that integration was better, I [thought] better to move to a better place where I could regain my strength.[209]

312. This type of treatment during pre-trial detention constitutes a serious breach of Indonesian law. Under Article 59 of the KUHAP, the family of a suspect has the right to be informed about his detention at each stage of investigation leading to trial. Clearly this did not occur as no one was aware of Xanana Gusmão's place of detention for 17 days. Suspects also have the right to be visited by family members (Articles 60 and 61); a doctor (Article 58); and a spiritual counselor (Article 63). By holding Gusmão incommunicado for an extended period, the Indonesian authorities breached these fundamental guarantees.

313. In a statement that was video-taped in Jakarta and broadcast widely, Xanana Gusmão renounced Timor-Leste's struggle for independence and encouraged other East Timorese to do the same.[210] The tape was made five days after his arrest. In the defence statement he prepared, Xanana Gusmão stated that he had not made the video-taped statement of his own free will:

> [I]n Jakarta I stated, in conformity with specific instructions from Abilio Osorio, the puppet governor of Timor-Leste, that I was prepared to surrender.[211]

314. Xanana Gusmão explained his reasons for making this statement:

> I forget a lot of what I said. I was a guerilla fighter. And a guerilla wants – he refuses to give up. That's just me. If I die, it's just me. They wanted me to make a lot of statements. I felt like passing out and that I couldn't continue. Everything I said made them happy.... But after half an hour I said to them "I can't accept this" ... and so I said in my defence statement, "General, we have said a few things that they believed. What happened to their powers of analysis."[212]

315. In his defence statement, Xanana Gusmão opened by saying that the video-taped statement was elicited under coercion:

> I wish firstly to take this opportunity to express myself with complete freedom – that is, without coercion of any kind…I have always affirmed that the circumstances under which my earlier statements in Jakarta were made were such that they could not be viewed as credible.[213]

316. Xanana Gusmão was also forced to make a statement to the government of Portugal:

> I said Portugal doesn't need to bother. Indonesia has a large military force that encircles the Island of Timor. If you (Portugal) want to come, you'd better come fully equipped just like the Indonesians are.[214]

317. At the 50th session of the UN Commission on Human Rights, the Portuguese government referred to these statements, claiming that Xanana Gusmão was:

> [E]xhibited a number of times in televised "conversations" and "interviews", carefully watched and censored, in which he reneged on his long-standing convictions and expressed "repentance", appealing to his companions in Timor-Leste to surrender.[215]

318. These statements seemed to be part of an Indonesian strategy designed to use the capture of Xanana Gusmão to demoralise his supporters in Timor-Leste and to demonstrate to the Portuguese Government that Timor-Leste was now firmly under Indonesian control. In that sense they are at one with the underlying objective of the trial. The trial was more than just the prosecution of the commander of a separatist rebellion; it was also intended to be a carefully orchestrated attempt to bolster Indonesia's claim that it had gained full control over the territory and that with its leader broken, pro-independence forces should accept that further resistance was futile.

319. Just before the trial began, Xanana Gusmão was returned to Dili where he was subjected to new forms of intimidation:

> At night I could see from their attitude that they were becoming threatening, so I called the ones that were being threatening – some of them spoke Tetum – and I told them that if they wanted to kill me, they were welcome – my voice was raised with emotion – "because you have killed so many people". Then I went to sleep and no one bothered me anymore.[216]

320. During the period between Xanana Gusmão's incommunicado detention and his trial, he did not experience ill-treatment other than isolation, sleep deprivation and psychological pressure. In his defence statement Xanana states that this comparatively mild treatment had a sinister purpose:

> I have been getting all sorts of flattering treatment aimed at making me into a docile Indonesian and as such I had to appear, just as the witnesses brought to this court had to appear, that way.[217]

Investigation

321. Following his arrest, Xanana Gusmão was subjected to intense interrogation from Strategic Intelligence Agency (Badan Intelejen Strategis, known as BAIS, Indonesia's military intelligence agency created in 1983), Bakin and Kopassus. In Bali he was interrogated by Brigadier General PT4, the head of BAIS at that time:

> PT4 was in Bali, the head of BAIS. I forget his name, he was a general. Hendropriyono went to Bais later. Then they ordered me to go to Bakin to make a statement, and then Bakin asked a Kopassus soldier to keep an eye on me.[218]

322. During interrogation, because of Gusmão's limited knowledge of Indonesian, an interpreter was present.[219] It appears that interrogation was not restricted to gathering information that might form the basis of charges against Xanana Gusmão, but also had the broader purpose of obtaining intelligence about Falintil's troop strength, deployment and plans.[220] This unfocused approach strengthens the impression that at this stage of his detention, Gusmão was not treated as a civilian.

323. A central theme throughout the interrogation process was to make Xanana Gusmão acknowledge his responsibility for the actions of Falintil guerrillas:

> The most important thing was that I admitted responsibility, that it was all my responsibility as I opposed Indonesia, my men killed them, it was all my responsibility, because I was the supreme commander. Once I admitted responsibility, they were happy, and then they moved me to Mabes Polri (police headquarter).[221]

324. This attempt to extract a confession from Gusmão probably amounted to a breach of his right not to provide evidence under Article 66 of KUHAP.

325. Throughout his interrogation, Xanana Gusmão was not offered or provided with legal representation as required under Article 54 of KUHAP. According to Asia Watch, an official from BAIS stated that Xanana was interrogated without a lawyer present because he was a prisoner of war.[222] This is partly supported by the fact that he was interrogated about military topics.* Yet from the time Gusmão was moved to Mabes Polri in Jakarta and allowed contact with the outside world, the Indonesian authorities appeared to be treating Xanana as a civilian subject to criminal law, rather than as a soldier. Xanana ultimately appeared before a civilian court, facing civilian charges.

Access to a lawyer

326. As stated above, for 17 days after his arrest Xanana Gusmão was denied contact with the outside world, including with a lawyer. Only in mid-January, some two months after his arrest, did he receive legal representation. However, he was not allowed to appoint counsel freely, but was provided with a lawyer who had strong ties to the Indonesian military and intelligence agencies. Before the appointment of this lawyer, the Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation (YLBHI) attempted to represent Gusmão. Xanana's wife and parents had obtained power of attorney and requested YLBHI to act as his lawyer.[223] From this point on, however, the Indonesian authorities repeatedly interfered with efforts by Xanana Gusmão to communicate with YLBHI in apparent breach of Gusmão's right under Indonesian law to appoint an independent lawyer.

327. While detained at police headquarters in Jakarta, Xanana Gusmão received a letter from YLBHI offering to take up his family's request that its lawyers represent him.[224] Around this time the legal aid lawyers also sent a letter to General Try Sutrisno, the commander of the Indonesian Armed Forces, requesting him to allow Gusmão to appoint counsel of his own choosing in accordance with KUHAP.[225] In clear violation of KUHAP provisions, on 17 December, Police Colonel Ahwil Lutan, the head of the General Sub-directorate of Police of the Republic of Indonesia (Kepala Sub Direktorat Umum, Kasubdit Umum Polri), refused the YLBHI lawyers permission to meet their prospective client.[226] The justification given was that the legal aid lawyers had not produced a document demonstrating that their interest in the case was because they had been approached by Xanana Gusmão's family.[227]

328. Despite being refused permission to meet him face to face, YLBHI sent a letter to Gusmão offering to represent him. In his defence statement Xanana Gusmão described what happened:

> On 22 December last I was given a letter sent to me by the LBH. On 23 December I replied to them, accepting a lawyer. But I was forced to withdraw my acceptance, and on 30 December I had to write a letter to

* It should be noted that interrogation by military and intelligence was commonplace throughout trials during the Indonesian occupation.

the LBH, rejecting their offer. My first letter, which had been intercepted, was returned to me.[228]

329. The only explanation given in Xanana Gusmão's letter refusing the assistance of the YLBHI lawyers was that he would not require their services.[229] Indonesian officials interviewed by Asia Watch claimed that he had decided himself that he did not want the assistance of the legal aid lawyers. They claimed that by following his instructions in this matter, they had been upholding his rights.[230] Xanana denied this, claiming instead that he had been pressured to reject the legal aid lawyers:

> [The Indonesian authorities] tried to convince me to be careful about my choice [of lawyer] and used many arguments to this effect.[231]

330. Xanana Gusmão was also informed that no one could trust the LBH.[232] This criticism was based on the way in which YLBHI had represented defendants in the trials arising from the demonstration in Jakarta on 19 November 1991 after the Santa Cruz massacre (see section on Jakarta Trials, para 241-301). In the event, under pressure from the Indonesian authorities, Gusmão turned down the legal aid lawyers' offer: "What choice did I have?"[233]

331. After Xanana Gusmão was forced to reject the assistance of YLBHI in late December 1993, the Indonesian authorities attempted to appoint Sudjono, an Indonesian lawyer, as his counsel. In a letter to the International Commission of Jurists (ICJ), Xanana described what occurred:

> In the second half of January, (when I was) already in the custody of the Attorney-General, (Major-) General Hendro came to seem me, accompanied by Sudjono. I had no choice but to sign the declaration acknowledging him as my counsel.[234]

332. Accordingly, Sudjono was officially appointed Xanana Gusmão's lawyer on 26 January 1993.[235] Xanana discusses the situation:

> They tried to find a way to communicate with me to urge me to drop LBH, then they sent a police lawyer, a military lawyer. LBH sent a letter and the military also sent a letter to show that they could undertake my defence. Fortunately, they (the military) was rather stupid, they did not send the data on time. I saw all this and they called me. I said: "Ethically speaking, if I don't know you, then, I don't know any of you, if I don't want you, then I don't want any of you." Others said: "I can defend you." With this, they made me go all over the place. When Hendropriyono told Sudjono that I did not want him, they wanted to make a Record of Interrogation and all that. Then they said if I didn't have a lawyer, then I wouldn't go [to court]. But I wanted to go to court. That's why I agreed to get on the plane and go through all that to-ing and fro-ing. So I accepted Sudjono as my lawyer.[236]

333. It appears then that Gusmão resigned himself to being represented by Sudjono to ensure that his case went to court. Nevertheless, it is clear that he was not happy with this outcome. Just before the two of them left for Dili to prepare for trial, he told Sudjono: "I do not really want you, but it's all right I'll sign."[237]

334. From the very beginning, it was clear that Sudjono was not an independent lawyer. Major-General Hendropriyono of BAIS was present when Xanana Gusmão signed the letter appointing Sudjono as his counsel. Sudjono was a personal friend of Colonel Ahwil and it was common knowledge in the Indonesian legal community that Sudjono was friendly with the police and prosecutors.[238] Members of the Indonesian Association of Advocates (Ikatan Advokat Indonesia, Ikadin) reportedly voiced concerns about the ethics of Sudjono's selection.[239] The Asia Watch report on the Gusmão trial summarises an interview with Sudjono conducted by the Jakarta Jakarta magazine, in which the lawyer explained how he became involved in the case:

> Colonel Ahwil had been Sudjono's student at Pancasila University in Jakarta and they were close friends. When Sudjono saw Colonel Ahwil on television, accompanying the ICRC to see Xanana, he rang him up, and Colonel Ahwil said: How would you like to handle the Xanana case? Sudjono said it would be difficult, but Ahwil pressed him. Sudjono wavered, but he ran into a prosecutor who also urged him to take the case, and then Colonel Ahwil rang him again. He finally agreed to take it. (This was all presumably done without consultation with Xanana.) When the interviewer said: "You're known as a lawyer famous for being close to the police and bureaucracy", Sudjono responded: "What's wrong with that? Why should they be the enemy? Hey, that's how I make my living." Sudjono later said the magazine was factually correct but he was unhappy with the way he was portrayed.[240]

335. Indonesian Criminal Code Procedure (KUHAP) provides that suspects have the right to legal representation at every stage of the investigation process (Article 54 KUHAP), the right to choose their own legal adviser (Article 55 KUHAP) and the right to contact their lawyer (Art 57 KUHAP). By intervening to make sure that Xanana Gusmão was not able to have a lawyer of his own choosing and by foisting on him one who was widely seen as being close to the military, the Indonesian authorities were clearly violating the rules laid down in the KUHAP. This aspect distinguishes the Gusmão trial from others, such as the Santa Cruz trials in both Dili and Jakarta, where legal aid lawyers were eventually able to represent East Timorese political prisoners (see the discussion of the Santa Cruz trials par. 115 ff above). The determination of the Indonesian authorities to engage a defence lawyer sympathetic to their interests was just one of several indications of their determination to control the Gusmão trial to an even greater extent than it had controlled some of the earlier trials. It is likely that the Indonesian authorities were aware that the Gusmão trial would receive international scrutiny. As a result it felt the need to ensure that he had a lawyer appointed by the state rather than one of his own choosing.

Trial

Indictment

336. Xanana Gusmão's indictment was drafted on 25 January 1993. He was charged under the treason provision, Article 106 of the Indonesian Criminal Code (KUHP). Interestingly, this charge was made in conjunction with a charge of conspiracy to commit treason under Article 110 of the KUHP. It is likely that the prosecutor thought this was necessary because Xanana was not present at most of the events which formed the basis of the charges against him. In any event, both treason and conspiracy to commit treason attract a maximum sentence of life imprisonment. Gusmão was also charged with illegally owning and storing two firearms,[241] which carried a maximum penalty of death under Law No 12/1951.

337. It is noteworthy that prosecutors did not charge Xanana Gusmão with subversion. The Anti-Subversion Law had been employed in previous political trials (see e.g. the trials of Gregorio Saldanha and Francisco Branco, par. 163 ff above), and it arguably has greater political impact than conspiracy to commit treason and the illegal possession of firearms. The official reason given to the Asia Watch trial observer for the decision was that subversion could only be charged in cases where underground activities were alleged. Because Xanana Gusmão was leading open military attacks, subversion was not applicable.[242] The indictment, however, does allege clandestine activities, including the establishment of an underground communication network.[243] This seems to undermine the official explanation of why subversion was not charged. It is possible that the Indonesian Government did not want such a high-profile case to attract attention to the controversial Anti-Subversion Law or that it was responding to international criticism of the law.[244] Xanana Gusmão himself adds weight to this possibility. He told the Commission:

> Initially it was subversion, but we talked. I let him because I was preparing my letter. I was preparing my letter that I wrote for discussion, they discussed with me…they could not say subversion because before they invaded UDT and Fretilin had already taken up arms…so I just let him and I agreed because what I was concerned about was that I would be able to speak...I was the one defending my case, wasn't I? I let everything be prepared so that I could win. So they did not present another indictment, apart from unlawful possession of firearms. They withdrew the subversion charge.[245]

338. As the indictment did not in the end include subversion charges, it appears that the Indonesian position must have changed.

339. The indictment contains a number of factual allegations relating to both Xanana Gusmão's military and organisational activities. The allegations start from 17 July 1976, the day that the Indonesian parliament formally approved the annexation of Timor-Leste.[246] The indictment alleges that Xanana Gusmão was appointed commander of Falintil at the National Fretilin Conference on 3 March 1981 in Viqueque, and was responsible for approximately 25 attacks conducted against Indonesian soldiers and civilians between 1981 and the date of his arrest.[247] These attacks included Falintil ambushes and the Kraras massacre. Gusmão was accused of direct involvement in only one attack – an ambush of Indonesian soldiers at the Laclo River between Alas and Fatuberliu in Manufahi in December 1988.[248] The role he played in the other attacks is not explained but there is implied responsibility due to his position as overall commander of Falintil. His organisational activities were alleged to include forming the National Council of Maubere Resistance (Concelho Nacional da Resistencia Maubere, CNRM) on 31 December 1988, with the Steering Committee as the political front, Falintil as the military front, and the Executive Committee as the clandestine front.[249] Under CNRM, Xanana Gusmão also allegedly established the clandestine network, the National Student Resistance of East Timor (Resistencia Nacional Estudantes Timor-Leste, Renetil) and the Catholic Students Organisation of East Timor (Organização da Juventude Catolica Timor-Leste, Ojectil).[250] Among the specific charges was one alleging that he instructed Constancio Pinto to organise the Santa Cruz demonstration on 12 November 1991.[251]

Court-room conditions

340. The trial began on 1 February 1993. Although the trial was attended by observers from Asia Watch, the International Commission of Jurists (ICJ), members of the diplomatic community and local and international journalists, it was not freely open to the general public.[252] Amnesty International was refused permission to send an observer and delays in granting the observer from Asia Watch a visa meant that he attended only one session of the trial. During his stay in Dili, the Asia Watch observer was under military intelligence surveillance and was always accompanied by a representative of the Indonesian Ministry of Foreign Affairs. Journalists were warned not to report on an incident where a witness shouted pro-independence slogans in the courtroom (see par. 350 ff, below).[253]

341. The restrictions on members of the public were even more stringent. All people who attended the trial had to have prior approval, have their name checked against a list and pass through two checkpoints before they could enter the courtroom.[254] Members of Xanana's family were not allowed to attend, and the court was mainly filled with Indonesian intelligence agents.[255] Xanana describes his impressions of the courtroom:

> In the rooms of this building which they call a court, I see only Indonesians, and above all Indonesian military personnel from Kopassus or BAIS...In Indonesian law trials of this kind are, or should be, held in public. But when I come into the room the only public I see are military authorities, some of whom are the ones who conceived this trial.[256]

342. According to one trial observer, his taxi driver was so intimidated by the atmosphere around the courthouse that he did not wish to drive near the building.[257]

343. It should be noted that a public speaker system was set up outside the courtroom to enable the public to listen to trial proceedings.[258] The speaker, however, was reportedly turned off on perhaps the most controversial day of the trial, when Xanana was due to read his defence statement.[258] This incident was just one example of how public access to the proceedings was most restricted when they were expected to be potentially unfavourable to Indonesian interests. According to an aide-memoire that the Government of Portugal presented to the UN Secretary-General:

> It is curious to note how the access [to the courtroom] was facilitated at the beginning of the trial and how it was obstructed in its final phase, when Xanana Gusmão had given clear signals that he was going to denounce the political manipulation of the entire trial and recant his initial declarations of repentance which he considered he had been forced to make.[260]

344. The fact that towards the end of the trial, a representative of the UN, Mr Tamrat Samuel was prevented from attending two trial sessions and foreign diplomats were prevented from listening to proceedings lends further weight to the Government of Portugal's proposition.[261] It appears that the trial was orchestrated to such an extent that some observers were allowed to be present at stages in the proceedings that were expected to show the Indonesian government in a favourable light and excluded when there was a danger that it might be embarrassed.

345. There were clear deficiencies in relation to the openness of the trial. Articles 64 and 153(3) of KUHAP require that court sessions be open to the public. If this requirement is not fulfilled, as appears to have been the case in the Gusmão trial, according to Article 153(4) of the code the decision of the court should be annulled.

Language

346. Unlike some of the defendants in other political trials, Xanana Gusmão had a limited understanding of the Indonesian language. Accordingly effective translation was crucial if he was to be able to follow the proceedings. At trial there were two court-appointed interpreters who translated between Indonesian, Portuguese, and Tetum.[262] Not all proceedings were translated, and the translations provided were not always accurate.[263] In one session, the Asia Watch trial observer noted, testimony of one witness was not translated at all.[264] The general pattern was that communications between the judges and the defendant were translated, while the rest of the proceedings were not.[265] The inadequacies of translation are supported by Xanana Gusmão's account: "I listened through the translation which was often wrong."[266]

347. Xanana observed that rather than ensure the translation was to an acceptable standard or simply appoint a more proficient interpreter, the judges made fun of the interpreter:

> He would ask them something and they would tease him. I understood that they were teasing him because they were laughing.[267]

348. Indonesian law requires that the judges appoint an interpreter if a defendant or a witness cannot understand Indonesian (Article 177 of KUHAP). Although an interpreter was appointed, his proficiency was not sufficient to ensure that the defendant could fully understand the proceedings.

Witnesses

349. In an apt indication of the unbalanced nature of the trial, 20 witnesses testified for the prosecution while no witnesses testified for the defence.[268] Serious questions must be asked about the independence of many of the prosecution witnesses. Four of the witnesses scheduled to appear were on the Indonesian official list of detainees, and Asia Watch reported that other witnesses were also in detention but their names were not on the official list.[269] These witnesses who were not on the official list were not entitled to have a lawyer present during interrogation. This is of particular concern given the reliance placed on RoIs at the trial.[270] At trial, witnesses' RoIs were read out and appeared to be given equal weighting to oral testimony provided in court. As interrogation occurred without lawyers being present, this reliance on RoIs gives rise to a concern that the court accepted testimony that could have been elicited by intimidation or that simply did not reflect what witnesses had actually said during interrogation. Concern about this latter possibility is given further weight by at least one witness's evident ignorance of Indonesian. Mariano da Silva, an illiterate witness, was questioned on his RoI, but his knowledge of Indonesian was insufficient to understand the contents of his statement, although he had signed it.[271] The fact that some prosecution witnesses were detained, interrogated without lawyers present, and could not understand the contents of their RoI, raises questions as to whether prosecution witnesses felt free to give truthful testimony during interrogation and at trial. According to Xanana Gusmão: "There were witnesses but they were all manipulated. The witnesses were there just to facilitate the process."[272]

350. The prosecution witness, Saturnino da Costa Belo, illustrates this point. Saturnino was convicted of treason for his involvement in the Santa Cruz demonstration and at the time of the Gusmão trial was serving a nine-year sentence. He was called as a witness on 4 March 1993. When he entered the courtroom, he shouted:

> Viva independencia! Viva Timor-Leste! Viva Xanana! ....
>
> I ask the government of Indonesia to respect human rights in Timor-Leste![273]

351. He was then hastily removed from the courtroom, the hearing was suspended, and a doctor was called to examine him. Forty five minutes later the doctor informed the court that the witness had a mental disorder and was unfit to give testimony.[274] Following this episode, Saturnino's RoI was read to the court.* Amnesty International reported that after his outburst Saturnino was told by the military that should he try

* Suara Timor Timur newspaper reported the incident as although Saturnino was unable to attend, and that with the permission of the (Court), his statement from the interrogation report was read out. See International Commission of Jurists "Report on the Trial of José Alexandre Gusmão" reprinted in ETRA, A Travesty of Justice, East Timor's Defence, May 1996, p. 43.

something of that kind again, he would be shot on the spot.[275] Further, after the incident, access to Saturnino and the other Santa Cruz detainees was restricted.[276]

352. Amnesty International, in a statement to the UN Decolonisation Committee, referred to a letter written by a confidential source inside Becora Prison about the treatment of Saturnino:

> Recent information confirms earlier fears that he was subjected to threats and ill-treatment in retaliation for his remarks. According to the letter from prison cited above:
>
> "Because of the demand he made to the Indonesian Government while at the court to respect human rights in Timor-Leste he was severely beaten and interrogated by the military police. They threatened him by placing the barrel of a pistol in his ear and he was put in a cell and left there in total darkness...Since he continued to refuse to apologise to the judge and did not admit to any wrongdoing, he was never again brought to the court as a witness on the grounds that he was ill, when in fact he was not ill at all." [277]

353. In his defence statement, Xanana Gusmão referred to the incident:

> The witness Saturnino da Costa Belo is a crystal-clear example of the heroism of this people. The farce of the hastily drafted medical document stating that Saturnino was ill should make you gentlemen ashamed because you know full well that this case rests here with you.[278]

354. Although Saturnino's behaviour was unruly, it clearly did not preclude him from giving evidence, and efforts could have been made to calm him down and allow him to give testimony. Further it was in the court's interest to do so, as Saturnino was a witness who might have shed light on Gusmão's involvement in planning the Santa Cruz demonstration.

355. As already mentioned, no witnesses appeared for the defence. Although it is not known whether Gusmão's lawyer, Sudjono, tried to find any defence witnesses, it is quite possible that the reason none appeared was that prospective witnesses were too afraid to testify. The atmosphere of fear generated by the actions of the authorities before and during the trial, from the treatment of Xanana, and his family and associates, after arrest to the tightly controlled proceedings themselves could well have been sufficient to deter any potential defence witnesses. In addition specific steps were taken to ensure that no defence witnesses appeared. The Governor of Timor-Leste, Abilio José Osorio Soares, said that he himself would not appear as a defence witness and announced a prohibition on any other public servants testifying for the defence.[279]

356. Article 65 of KUHAP guarantees the right of defendants to seek out and call witnesses. It could be argued that this right was not breached, as it is possible that no witnesses were willing to testify. The prohibition on civil servants testifying and the atmosphere in which the trial was held all served to produce this outcome. Without defence witnesses present, the defendant's lawyer could not raise fundamental issues such as the legality of Indonesia's occupation of Timor-Leste and whether the court had jurisdiction in this matter. The trial appeared one-sided and there seemed to be little concern with establishing a truthful account of events.

Performance of defence counsel

357. As stated previously, there were serious reservations about Sudjono's professionalism and independence from the moment he was appointed as Xanana Gusmão's lawyer. These concerns were not lessened by his performance during the trial. The Asia Watch report lists a number of instances where Sudjono failed to exercise due diligence in his representation of Gusmão. First, he appears not to have inquired into the circumstances of his client's arrest, detention and interrogation, even though there were strong suggestions of impropriety.[280] Second, six weeks after the beginning of the trial Sudjono stated he had not discussed his strategy with Xanana Gusmão.[281] Third, Sudjono stated that his lack of a common language with his client was not important because Xanana's ability to understand Indonesian was improving.[282] This is despite Xanana Gusmão's constant requests for interpreters throughout the trial process. Finally, as will be described in more detail below, it appears that Sudjono made false representations about his client's appeal for clemency.

358. In his defence statement Xanana Gusmão gave an example of Sudjono's political viewpoint: "Mr Sudjono claims that Timor-Leste has always accepted that it is a part of Indonesian territory."[283] This belief raises serious doubts about Sudjono's impartiality and independence. Further, in his letter to the International Commission of Jurists, Xanana discussed the relationship between Sudjono and military intelligence officials:

> During the whole process, it was noticeable that there was close cooperation between Sudjono and BAIS. He told me that he had a duty to report to the authorities the details of each session.[284]

359. An example which illustrates both Sudjono's lack of professionalism and lack of independence is the defence response to the indictment, known as the eksepsi (exception). According to the Asia Watch observer, the judges suggested that Sudjono should have a week to prepare the eksepsi. Sudjono responded saying he would need only five days, and then both parties settled on three days.[285] This was an extraordinarily short time, especially in view of the fact that Sudjono was officially recognised as Xanana's lawyer only six days before the trial opened.[286] Further, the eksepsi he submitted was perfunctory and relatively short at nine pages.[287]

360. The eksepsi failed to raise the issue of the violations of KUHAP that had occurred during Xanana's arrest and detention or to make substantive legal arguments.[288] No arguments based on the status of Timor-Leste under international law were made. Instead Sudjono argued that because Fretilin was a pro-independence group that did not recognise the authority of Indonesia or its legal system, the court had no authority to try defendants.[289] The illegality of Indonesia's occupation under international law appears not to have been raised. When the eksepsi was rejected, Sudjono reportedly wanted to appeal the decision and told the press:

> I am appealing to the High Court over the Judge's decision because integration is not valid juridically and is still an issue at the United Nations. [290]

361. However, as far as the Commission is aware, no such appeal was submitted. Sudjono made this statement not in court, but to the media. This suggests perhaps that Sudjono was intent on impressing the press by presenting himself as an ethical and professional lawyer, but was not prepared to follow through on these words in the courtroom by acting in his client's best interests.

362. It should be noted that not all reports of Sudjono were negative. He was praised for his willingness to take on the case pro bono and to pay his own expenses.[291] There were almost certainly real difficulties in finding defence witnesses to testify, as he himself claimed. During the trial he managed to discredit some prosecution witnesses by establishing that their testimony was second-hand.[292] Finally, Sudjono raised in mitigation his client's general cooperativeness and his readiness to accept responsibility for the actions of Falintil guerrillas.[293]

363. However, Xanana Gusmão was dissatisfied with the performance of his lawyer. In his letter to the International Commission of Jurists, he wrote:

> The only thing on which he helped me, at my insistent request, was to convince the Judges to avoid confrontation with me during the session in which I was cross-examined.[294]

364. The inadequacy of Sudjono's performance was most apparent in his failure to intervene when Xanana Gusmão was prevented from reading his defence statement. Xanana was initially prevented from reading his defence plea on 13 May 1993 because it had not been translated into Indonesian.[295] The decision prompted him to announce that Sudjono was no longer his counsel.[296] Proceedings were then adjourned so the two could discuss the problem and the defendant laid down the conditions under which Sudjono could continue to act as his lawyer. According to Xanana Gusmão, faced with these conditions, Sudjono agreed that Xanana would be given the opportunity to read his statement.[297]

365. When Xanana Gusmão began reading out his defence plea, the prosecution objected after he had read only three pages, arguing that the statement was irrelevant to the charges.[298] The judges agreed.[299] Despite his earlier guarantee and the fact that the right to state a defence is provided for in Article 182(1)(b) of the KUHAP, Sudjono did not intervene on his client's behalf. Instead, he took Xanana's document from him and handed it to the judge.[300] In the words of Gusmão:

> The judges interrupted [my defence], and then they did not give me any chance to ask [why they were doing this], Sudjono took [my statement from me] and gave me no chance [to read it].[301]

366. In his letter to the International Commission of Jurists, Gusmão elaborated on this incident:

> We had arranged that in the final session I would have the opportunity to express my opinion on the verdict which would be pronounced that day. Since the prosecutor and the judge described me as an Indonesian citizen, I pointed out to Sudjono during the break that he should object to this and that, at the end, I would clarify this point as well. I was just about to start speaking when the Judge declared the trial was finished, without any reaction from Mr. Sudjono.[302]

367. Regardless of the relevance of Xanana Gusmão's defence statement, Sudjono should at the very least have objected to the judges forcing his client to stop reading it after such a short period and should have ensured that the defendant's rights under the KUHAP were upheld. Sudjono did protest to reporters afterwards that the decision was unfair and against Indonesian law, but it appears he failed to do so in the courtroom.[303]

368. Incensed by the actions of Sudjono during the trial, after being sentenced Xanana Gusmão wrote to the International Commission of Jurists on 1 December 1993 from Cipinang prison in Jakarta telling them that he wanted another lawyer.

> I appeal to the ICJ and all international bodies connected with international law to launch a protest, including through using this document, and to campaign for the annulment of the previous trial process. As a foreigner, as a Timorese citizen before my own conscience, and as a Portuguese citizen under international law, I request the intervention of a Portuguese counsel, in order to facilitate communication, who will be assisted by lawyers of LBH.[304]

Xanana Gusmão's defence plea

369. Even though Xanana Gusmão was allowed to read out only three pages of his defence plea in court, the document was smuggled out of prison and published abroad gaining widespread publicity.[305] The document was handwritten in pencil in Portuguese by Xanana and was drafted in difficult conditions:

> At that time, they did not let me sleep. They kept me busy to deny me time to think, playing cards from early morning to late at night. Even after I was fed up with it, they forced me to go on playing. I suggested that from now on perhaps we could play some other game like basketball. Often we played cards until midnight, then I said to them that it was time to sleep. Some of them slept in the room while others slept on the floor, and I used such moments to drink coffee and write. Towards dawn I hid my writing. I made two copies of my defence.[306]

370. In his defence statement, Xanana Gusmão relied heavily on appeals to international law, arguing that Timor-Leste's status as a non-self-governing territory and the illegality of the Indonesian invasion entailed that an Indonesian court had no jurisdiction to try him:

> The case of Timor-Leste is the responsibility of the international community, a question of international law. It is a case in which universal principles are at stake, a case in which the UN provisions on decolonisation have been manipulated, a case in which Indonesia has flaunted its disrespect for the resolutions of the UN and which therefore constitutes a flagrant violation by Indonesia of the principles of the Non-Aligned Movement and of the universal standards of law, peace and justice.[307]

> The UN continues to this moment to refuse to legitimise Indonesian sovereignty over Timor-Leste, a sovereignty won by the use of force and violence, and through the systematic violation of the most fundamental human rights.[308]

371. Xanana Gusmão also argued that the process through which Timor-Leste had been integrated into Indonesia was plainly invalid. He based his argument on a detailed account of the process itself, from the Balibó Declaration to the Popular Assembly's petition to the Indonesian government, and on the refusal of the international community to recognise that process. But he also appealed to his audience's common sense:

> Could it possibly have been this people who suffered in the bush, who saw their homes and possessions destroyed by the Indonesians, against whom they carried out a scorched earth policy, was it really this people who "of their own free will" requested integration with Indonesia, without a referendum?[309]

> Thousands and thousands of citizens of Timor-Leste were slaughtered by the forces of occupation throughout virtually the entire territory. The only politics has been the law of terror, imposed to scare the Timorese into saying that they're happy about integration.[310]

372. In keeping with the logic of these arguments, at the end of his plea he appealed over the heads of the court to a variety of bodies and individuals, including the international community, the governments of Indonesia, Portugal and the US, and all friends of Timor-Leste that could play a part in bringing about a just resolution. He also appealed several times to the sense of justice of the Indonesian people, in particular to its younger generation:

> It is my hope that the new generation in Indonesia, or rather, the youth of Indonesia, will appreciate the significance of law and liberty, two fundamental components of human life today and of the society in which we live.[311]

> I appeal to the Indonesian people to understand that in conformity with universal principles and international law Timor-Leste should be considered a non-self-governing territory in accordance with the provisions governing the process of decolonisation.[312]

> I appeal to the new generation of Indonesians to understand that the People of Timor-Leste attach much more value to freedom, justice and peace than to so-called development.[313]

373. At the same time he accepted the logic of the situation he described where his fate depended not on the merits of his arguments to the court, but on whether he was willing to submit to the political demands of those who, in his words, had staged his trial. He told the Commission: "Everything was engineered. The trial followed a strategy, and so it became political theatre."[314] His response to this situation was as much one of political defiance as of legal rebuttal:

> Never could I legitimise the criminal annexation of Timor-Leste, just so as to be able to live a few more years of life. My struggle is of greater value than my own life. The People of Timor-Leste have sacrificed their lives and continue to suffer.[315]
>
> As from today I am starting a hunger strike as a practical way of appealing to the EC and the governments of the United States and Australia. No agreement can be reached between a prisoner and his gaoler…[316]
>
> As a political prisoner in the hands of occupiers of my country it is no consequence to me whatever if I am sentenced to death today in this court. They have killed more than a third of the defenceless population of Timor-Leste; they are killing my people and I am worth no more than the heroic struggle of my People.[317]

374. Xanana Gusmão's defence statement is a significant document in the history of the Timorese struggle for independence. From a prison cell, Xanana Gusmão crafted a range of arguments that were legally, politically and emotionally powerful. The judges, however, considered this statement to be irrelevant before they had even heard its contents.

Judges

375. There are many indications to suggest the judges were not independent or impartial. This is most apparent in their refusal to allow the defendant to read the entirety of his defence plea. As described above, after three pages, the presiding judge considered the statement irrelevant. In fact, although controversial and passionately worded, Xanana's defence statement raised legal issues that went to the very heart of the fairness of the trial.

376. It appears the judges may have considered that the arguments raised by Xanana Gusmão, rather than being irrelevant, broached matters that were too sensitive to be allowed a public airing. When defendants in previous political trials had made similar arguments (though in less forthright terms), their relevance was not questioned (see e.g. the trials of Gregorio Saldanha and Francisco Branco in the Santa Cruz trials, paras 115-240). When it became apparent that controversial arguments would be raised in his defence statement, however, Xanana Gusmão was silenced. His own standing and the publicity surrounding the trial may well have been factors in this decision. Whataver the reason for their decision, the judges breached the defendant's right to state a defence under Article 182(1)(b) of the KUHAP.*

377. Interviews conducted by Asia Watch suggest that there were other areas in which the judges displayed a lack of professionalism. The judges were apparently unaware that some of the witnesses were in detention and might face face trial themselves.[318] They further stated that it was beyond their role to investigate allegations that witnesses had been ill-treated, maintaining that the treatment of witnesses had no bearing on the weight to be given to their testimony.[319] Witness testimony and RoIs are the foundation of an Indonesian criminal trial. By failing to consider that coercion may have influenced witness statements, the judges not only breached Indonesian law, but also greatly reduced the possibility of statements favourable to Xanana Gusmão being raised in court. Article 153(2)(b) of KUHAP requires that the judge shall see to it that nothing shall be done or that no question shall be asked that will cause the defendant or witness not to give his answers freely. If this Article was breached, the decision should have been annulled under Article 153(4) of the KUHAP. As there are doubts as to whether witness testimony was given voluntarily, the judges appear not to have fulfilled their obligations under the KUHAP.

378. Xanana Gusmão's impression was that his trial was staged and that the judges were heavily influenced by the military, intelligence and the Indonesian Government:

> In my case both the BAIS and the Indonesian Government decided to take the least possible risks by manipulating the whole process of my trial.[320]
>
> I know that the Bais made the arrangements necessary to spare me the death penalty and that if I were to praise integration I would be acquitted.[321]

379. Xanana Gusmão told the Commission that in his impression the judges were heavily influenced by the military:

> I saw their faces [the judges]. They seemed afraid of the Kopassus.[322]

380. The judges found Xanana Gusmão guilty of all charges on 21 May 1993, and sentenced him to life imprisonment. Given the extensive indications of military and government influence throughout the process from arrest to sentencing, questions must be asked about the independence and impartiality of this decision.

* Article 182(1)(b) KUHAP: The defendant and/or his legal advisor shall state their defence which can be replied by the public prosecutor with the stipulation that the defendant or his legal advisor shall always be given the last turn.

Application for clemency

381. Xanana Gusmão has accused his lawyer, Sudjono, of deceit by acting against his wishes in pursuing an application for clemency (grasi). Sudjono visited his client in June 1993 to discuss clemency, and once Sudjono explained the nature of an appeal to the president for clemency, Xanana rejected the proposal: "I refused straight away and told him I did not accept any sentence from the Indonesian Court."[323]

382. Xanana Gusmão explains the situation further:

> Then Sudjono came and talked to me. He talked about executive clemency, I asked what it was, he explained it to me. We did not agree. I said that I did not acknowledge him [as my lawyer], because I had wanted LBH and I did not get them. Then we talked again. I asked him to defend my political crime(s). Then he said that we would appeal, and would go back to court to present an appeal, and would not ask for clemency.[324]

383. In the end Sudjono seems to have convinced Xanana Gusmão to lodge an appeal for clemency, after assuring him that there would be no publicity, that Xanana's political views would not be twisted and that Sudjono was acting on his own initiative rather than at the prompting of the military. On the basis of these assurances, Xanana Gusmão said that he was persuaded to sign a letter drawn up by Sudjono that gave the latter the authority to apply for clemency. Since the letter was written in Indonesian, there is a strong presumption that Xanana Gusmão did not fully appreciate its implications and may not have wished to apply for clemency. Nevertheless on 4 June 1993, Sudjono breached his agreement with his client by publicly announcing that he had lodged an application for clemency.

384. In August 1993, President Soeharto granted clemency to Xanana Gusmão by reducing his sentence to 20 years imprisonment.[325] Gusmão was entirely dissatisfied that he had been granted clemency: "I was annoyed with the executive clemency, I didn't care if I didn't get it."[326] In a letter to YLBHI later that year, he reiterated his rejection of clemency: "I reject that clemency because it contradicts my principles since it implies that I accepted my sentence."[327]

385. Reports of the incident in the Indonesian media shed light on the motives of Sudjono and the Indonesian authorities. On 5 June 1993, the newspaper Kompas ran an Article entitled "Xanana: I beg forgiveness", which stated that Xanana Gusmão wrote a private plea for clemency of his own volition.[328] On 6 June, the Surya and Surabaya Pos newspaper ran articles entitled "Xanana admits the benefits of East Timorese integration." In a letter to YLBHI on 30 November 1993, Xanana denied the media version of events:

> I have found out about the manoeuvres/tricks surrounding this clemency which resulted in an intensive, widespread propaganda campaign through the radio and the press.[330]

386. The media's portrayal of the clemency application as an admission by Xanana Gusmão of the defeat of the Resistance and acceptance of the Indonesian occupation is consistent with earlier efforts to use his arrest and trial for a similar purpose. The application for clemency may well have been contrived to embarrass the East Timorese leader and demoralise East Timorese still struggling for independence. Towards the end of the trial, the Indonesian authorities appear to have lost control over the proceedings, especially when Gusmão began to read out his defiant defence statement. By characterising the clemency application as an admission of defeat by Xanana, it appears the Indonesian authorities were attempting to regain control over the trial process.

Judicial review

387. After clemency was granted, Xanana Gusmão once again tried to obtain independent legal counsel with a view to applying for judicial review of his case. Yet again, the Indonesian authorities attempted to prevent this from occurring. When LBH lawyers were restricted from visiting Xanana in prison, Indonesia's director-general of corrections reportedly said:

> What is Xanana's interest in meeting lawyers of the LBH? If all people who want to [are allowed to] visit him, his cell will be full.[331]

388. The minister for justice took a similar position stating that anyone except lawyers from LBH could visit the prisoner. The reason given was that the purpose of their visits was not clear.[332] Gusmão was finally allowed to meet LBH lawyers in March 1994. At this time he signed a letter authorising LBH lawyers to act on his behalf and instructed them to seek judicial review.[333] Subsequently, the lawyers filed an application for judicial review. The minister for justice justified the rejection of the application by stating that the legal process against Xanana had been completed and that in granting a retrial, the Indonesian Government would set a bad precedent.

The sentence

389. After the trial, Xanana Gusmão was taken to Semarang, where he was held for about two and a half months.[335] Amnesty International reported on 27 May 1993 that Xanana was on a hunger strike and had been allowed no visitors except Sudjono since he was taken from court six days earlier.[336] According to Xanana:

> I went on a hunger strike. After 12 days I almost couldn't bear it anymore. Then they got scared that I was getting ill, so they took me to Cipinang [prison in Jakarta].[337]

390. In August 1993, Xanana was moved to Cipinang. On 9 April 1994, he wrote to Amnesty International complaining of being humiliated, vexed and threatened every day from morning until night.[338] He further stated that criminal prisoners in Cipinang were encouraged to insult and harass him constantly:

> If I avoid speaking it's because "I'm frightened"; if I leave the cell and then return it's "from fear". If they speak to me and I respond it's because "I'm frightened'; and then there's the distortions of my words and phrases, the manipulation of what I say to provoke and make fun of me, etc. They invent "stories" to tell the guards who laugh at my expense.[339]

391. In his interview with the Commission, Xanana Gusmão confirmed that he was persistently harassed after his transfer to Cipinang:

> They told other prisoners in my block to provoke, threaten and insult me by calling me a murderer…They continuously provoked me. In the end I asked the prison authorities to move me close to my friends, but they took no notice. Only after I hit two people did they move me to another block, I was put in a steel cage and not allowed out for five days. Then they gave us a little bit of freedom to move around the prison.[340]

Conclusion

392. The trial of Xanana Gusmão involved extensive breaches of due process.

- The pre-trial detention conditions in Bali and Jakarta, which included no contact with the outside world for 17 days, and the use of sleep deprivation and psychological pressure to extract information and force Xanana to make a televised statement renouncing his commitment to the independence cause and calling on his comrades-in-arms to surrender.
- Being denied a lawyer during the first 17 days of detention and interrogation. Xanana was then prevented from appointing independent counsel and was forced to accept an Indonesian lawyer known to have close ties to the military and the police.
- During this period of pre-trial detention Xanana's status as a prisoner was undefined, He did not enjoy the protections available to either a civilian detainee or a prisoner of war, and was placed in a juridical no-man's land where he was denied the status of being either.
- East Timorese were denied free access to the trial in Dili. Some international observers were denied permission to monitor the trial; those that were allowed in as observers were given only limited access to the trial.
- The interpretation provided was inadequate.
- As a result of the failure to create an environment where potential defence witnesses felt secure in testifying not a single witness appeared for the defence. There is reason to believe that the fact that several of the witnesses for the prosecution were in detention when they testified may have coloured their testimony.
- The counsel who was appointed to defend Xanana showed a lack of professionalism and independence at several crucial points in the trial, which often, such as in his handling of Xanana's application for clemency, was indistinguishable from unethical conduct.

- The judges displayed a lack of independence and impartiality, which as in their ruling that Xanana's defence statement was irrelevant, resulted in the infringement of the rights of the accused. As the defendant was facing the death penalty, it was particularly crucial that he be granted the full protection of the law.

393. By virtue of the defendant's eminence and his symbolic status as the leader of the Resistance, the trial of Xanana Gusmão was the most politically significant trial to be run during the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste. The Commission concludes that because of this, the Indonesian authorities conducted it in such a way as to derive the maximum political capital from it. That this outcome was not always achieved does not detract from the fact that in staging the trial the authorities comprehensively failed to carry out their obligations to the defendant under Indonesian law.

The Mahkota trial, 1997

394. In March 1997, the UN Secretary General sent his personal representative, Mr. Jamsheed Marker, to Timor-Leste. When they learned of the coming visit, the resistance commander-in-chief, Xanana Gusmão, who was serving a prison sentence in Cipinang prison in Jakarta, asked David Ximenes (Mandati) to deliver a letter to all clandestine organisations. The letter instructed Vasco da Gama (Criado) and Andre da Costa (L-4) to organise a public demonstration and to lobby the UN through the Secretary General's representative.[341] Indonesian security agents in Timor-Leste found out about the plan and on 22 March 1997 assigned a military police unit to seal off the Hotel Mahkota (Dili), where the envoy was staying, in anticipation of the demonstration.*

395. According to Celina Pires da Costa, the demonstration's objective was to "lobby Jamsheed Marker, for a peaceful solution to the issue of Timor-Leste."[342] Vasco da Gama said that Xanana Gusmão had sent a letter through a courier network calling for a demonstration:

> [T]o show the world that regardless of the murders and arrests of resistance and or clandestine leaders by the Indonesian military, the people of Timor-Leste would never accept Indonesian rule. That was the objective, national independence.[343]

396. Pro-independence supporters held preparatory meetings on 17 and 22 March 1997 at Andre da Costa's house to plan the 23 March demonstration.[344] Olga Amaral, Celina da Costa, Thomas A Correia and others were present at the meeting. Between 5.00 and 8.00 on the morning of 23 March, a demonstration took place in front of the Mahkota Hotel, East Dili. Between 50 and 100 protesters displayed banners and Fretilin flags,

* Proceedings of Witness Investigation, Suhaedar, 29 March 1997, p. 3: Tight security measures at Mahkota Hotel; Proceedings of Witness Investigation, Soliquin, 29 March 1997, p. 3: Tight security measures 22 March 1997 while shouting: "Viva Xanana Gusmão, Viva Ramos Horta, Viva Timor-Leste, Viva Povo Maubere!"[345] The demonstration was intended to peacefully convey the people's hopes to the UN representative. But when the Indonesian security forces came they fired shots, beat protesters and then arrested a number of people. After the protest 33 people faced trial, primarily for treason. Unfortunately many of the documents from the trials of the 33 defendants were destroyed and the Commission has been unable to obtain sufficient information to analyse all of the trials and verdicts in detail. The focus of the following analysis will therefore be the joint trial of 16 of the 33 defendants.

Arrest

397. The presence of between 50 and 100 protesters at the Hotel Mahkota prompted the arrival of the Indonesian police, the mobile police brigade, intelligence agents (in civilian clothes) and the anti-riot unit. They attempted to deter people from participating in the demonstration. As the demonstration continued, the mobile police brigade and intelligence agents began firing revolvers in the direction of the protesters and several protesters were wounded.

398. The security forces arrested between 43 and 60 people.[346] These were mostly students, youths and farmers. All were taken to the Dili District police headquarters (Polres) at Mercado Lama (Dili) and detained in prison cells.[347] Some of the injured protesters, like José Sarmento Boavida, were arrested. Some managed to escape and sought refuge in the Motael church. Others ran to the convent of the Canossian sisters in Balide (Dili) and to Manuel Carrascalão's house. Abel José Ximenes and other protesters who hid in the Motael church were later arrested and taken to the Mercado Lama Polres.

399. Some of the protesters were beaten by police and intelligence agents at the site of the protest, like Miguel Alves and Celina Pires da Costa, who were beaten with wooden rods and kicked unconscious.[349] Anacleto da Silva was brutally assaulted by being beaten with an iron rod until he bled profusely from his head and was kicked in the mouth until his mouth was torn and bleeding. He was subsequently locked up in a toilet of the Mahkota Hotel. While there, he saw an Indonesian police officer shoot José da Silva in the buttocks. He also witnessed the police stripping victims, throwing them into a truck and taking them to the Dili Polres.[350]

400. Indonesian security agents used brutal tactics to counter what they considered to be a criminal act against the Indonesian government. All of the arrests were made without an official arrest warrant. Under KUHAP this may have been lawful as the detainees were allegedly in the act of committing a crime. The police issued arrest warrants after the protesters had been taken to the Dili Polres on 23 and 24 March 1997.[351]

401. In July 1997, a few months after the Mahkota Hotel demonstration, the Garuda Task Force, made up of members of Rajawali (codename for the Army Strategic Reserve Command, Komando Cadangan Strategis Angkatan Darat, Kostrad), Kopassus, police and the Koramil, arrested Vasco da Gama (alias Criado) at his house in Becora. Captain PT5 from Kupang, head of the police operational unit, and his deputy, PT6, made the arrest.[352] Vasco da Gama described his arrest:

From the time of my capture at home in Becora till the Polres, my feet and hands were tied, the then I was beaten until I fell and lost consciousness rolling over on the ground. They asked [me questions] but I did not know anything, so in the end they pushed me into a drum full of water, and I swallowed some of it.[353]

402. According to Vasco da Gama (Criado), the police did not produce an official arrest warrant at the time of his arrest, however he was informed of the following reasons for his arrest: [354]

First, because I was clandestine in Dili. Second, because I organised the masses and contributed Rp9,000,000 towards the demonstration at the Mahkota Hotel. Third, I attacked the Mobile Police Unit with a M-16 rifle and three grenades. Fourth, I continuously sent news or information overseas. Fifth, I always contact rebels such as Konis Santana, David Alex, and Matan Ruak. And finally, that all the demonstrations are under my leadership.[355]

403. On the day of the demonstration, protesters who suffered serious gunshot wounds and beatings at the demonstration or injuries from torture and ill-treatment when they were detained, were taken to the Wirahusada Hospital (Lahane, West Dili) for medical treatment. Some of the uninjured protesters were interrogated while others were taken to Polda. Some were subsequently released because their participation was considered marginal while others were released after their families intervened on their behalf. After their discharge, those treated at the Wirahusada Hospital were taken to Polres and interrogated along with the other detainees.

Pre-trial detention

404. The arrested demonstrators were taken by police, intelligence agents, and the Mobile Police Brigade to the Dili Polres. Here, more officers from the police and the Police Mobile Brigade were waiting. It is alleged that these officers started beating and kicking the protesters as soon as they alighted from the truck and then put them into cells. Celina Pires da Costa recalls:

We were put into the cells and after one hour or two we were taken out for interrogation. We were beaten, kicked and burned with cigarettes.[356]

405. Sixty people were detained at Polres. The police stripped them of their clothes before handing them over to the intelligence agents for interrogation in their cells. The names of the agents were not given. The agents interrogated and beat Amaro Pereira from 1.00am until daybreak.[357] After that, Amaro was moved to Polda at Comoro, and from there to Becora Prison some weeks later. The prison warden refused an earlier transfer for Amaro as he was seriously injured and needed intensive medical care. Amaro therefore spent three days at the Wirahusada Hospital in Lahane and when discharged, returned to Polres, where he spent a week in detention before being moved to Becora Prison.[358]

406. Thomas Correia's account illustrates the extent of the violence detainees were subject to:

> Eleven [colleagues] were injured and taken to Wira Husada. On 23 March 1997, we were arrested and taken to Polres where, on the same day, we were tortured and then taken to Wira Husada. The ICRC came immediately after we arrived at the hospital, and recorded our names. Three days later, when they noticed that our condition had improved, we were taken back to the Polres. Actually I was not one of the 11 detainees who were taken to Wira Husada [immediately after the demonstration] because I was not wounded when they opened fire. However, when I was taken to Polres I was tortured and beaten with an iron rod. Because of the injuries I sustained I was sent with them to Wira Husada.[359]

407. After three days of treatment, Thomas Correia and others were taken back to the Dili Polres for interrogation. According to Thomas Correia, during interrogation, detainees were tortured:

> They continued the interrogation. They also used torture, such as electrocution, burning our skin with cigarette butts and beatings.[360]

408. Vasco da Gama (Criado) was arrested and taken to the Polda headquarters. Here he was subject to physical and psychological torture. He also saw others tied up:

> They dragged me into a prison cell. As I stood in front of it, I saw Agustinho Carvalho from Hatolia (Ermera), his hands and legs were tied up separately. I entered the cell, and the police interrogated me. Soon after they tied my hands behind my back. They put me into a 50 kg rice bag, tied my legs to the chair, and kicked and beat me.[361]

409. Vasco da Gama described additional torture techniques such as where the interrogators spun detainees around while saying "feel this" until they almost collapsed. He added:

> There, a man standing next to me hit me and I fell. I do not know how long I stayed on the floor. I was unconscious. [As I came to] they were untying my hands and told me to sit on a chair. Then they spun me again until I fainted. When I regained consciousness, they put me in cell number five at the Polda.[362]

410. The suspects were held in police custody for 15-20 days. During this time, detainees were tortured physically and mentally, especially during interrogation. After 15-20 days, between ten and 17 detainees were released and 33* were transferred to the Becora prison to await trial.[363] In Becora Prison the detainees were kept in a dark cell for a week.[364] Clementino Dos Reis Amaral and a colleague, in their capacity as members of the Indonesian National Commission on Human Rights (Komisi Nasional Hak Asasi Manusia, known as Komnas HAM), visited the detainees at Becora Prison.[365] Thomas Correia said:

> Mr Clementino dos Reis Amaral came but he did not say anything. He looked at our physical condition, and at the time some of us still had wounds not fully healed and bloody. They photographed us.[366]

411. Thus before the trial commenced the 33 defendants had been detained at three different locations – the Polres, the Polda and Becora Prison – and had spent between three and four months in pre-trial detention.

Access to a lawyer

412. At the Dili Polres detainees were not granted access to an independent lawyer. The Indonesian authorities offered Abdul Hakim from Trisula Legal Aid Institute (LBH) in Kupang to defend Olga Amaral and Celina Pires da Costa but both refused the offer.[367] Abdul Hakim from LBH Trisula was often appointed by the Indonesian government and many defendants and independent lawyers did not trust him. Thomas Correia said:

> The military offered a lawyer, but we did not want him. We only accepted Aniceto Guterres because he was a good lawyer and independent.[368]

413. After their transfer to Becora Prison, the detainees had access to independent lawyers through the Rights Foundation (Yayasan Hak). Lawyers from Yayasan Hak approached the detainees and offered their assistance.[369] Yet even though Aniceto Guterres Lopes had a power of attorney from families of the defendants, he was often refused access to his clients:

> [T]hey made it difficult for me to see my clients. This was particularly true of the police. They said that the defendants already had a lawyer, but I had to do my job as a lawyer who had been given a power of attorney from the defendants and their families. So I said, "Today, as a representative of the defendants' families, I want to see the defendants." I intended to go inside, meet the defendants and ask them whether they accepted the government-appointed lawyer voluntarily or whether they had been forced to accept and sign the power of attorney or whether a lawyer had simply been assigned to them. I became aware that they had signed a power of attorney following some sort of psychological pressure, pressure by the police or simply through ignorance [of the law]. In the end, the defendants revoked the power of attorney and appointed me instead as their lawyer. So I went to the police, the magistrate and the judge and showed them the power of attorney. They accepted it fully.[370]

* The 33 detainees were: Thomas A. Correia (Baucau/Laga), Mateus da Costa Belo (Baucau/Venilale), Olga Amaral (Turiscai), Celina Pires da Costa (Baucau/Laga), Hermenegildo da Costa (Baucau/Laga), Cancio A. Henrique Guterres (Baucau/Venilale), Bendito Amaral (Liquiçá), Miguel Alves (Viqueque/Uatolari), Mariano da Silva (Baucau / Laga), José Sarmento Boavida (Baucau/Quelicai), Abel José Ximenes Baucau/Laga), Rafael de Almeida (Baucau/Laga), Moises Felisano Soares (Baucau/Venilale), Alipio Soares (Viqueque / Uatolari), Anacleto da Silva (Viqueque/Ossu), Mositu Fraga Soares Viqueque/Uatolari), Crispin da Silva (Anino) (Viqueque/Ossu), Alberto da Costa (Viqueque/Ossu), Amaro Pereira (Aileu), João Henrique (Aileu), Celestino Manuel Pereira (Baucau/Laga), Nelson Pereira Dili), Luis Bonanca (Dili), Constancio G. Leite (Maliana), Carlos Gusmão (Baucau/Laga), Aleixo da Silva Ximenes (Baucau/Laga), Domingos da Costa (Baucau/Laga), José Gabriel (Baucau/Laga), Agusto Raimundo (Baucau/Laga), Jito Borges (Aileu), Mateus Ignacio da Costa (Baucau/Laga), Domingos Sarmento (Viqueque), Romaldo Brazil Januario (Lospalos).

414. Once the Indonesian authorities accepted him as the defendants' legal representative, Aniceto Guterres Lopes was allowed weekly access to his clients in Becora Prison: "[Our] lawyer [Aniceto Guterres]…visited us to assess our condition once a week."[371] Aniceto Guterres Lopes confirmed that "this was a scheduled regular visit".[372]

415. For those detained at Polda, however, obtaining access to an independent lawyer was far more difficult. Aniceto Guterres Lopes, who also represented Vasco da Gama, went to the Polda to meet his client, but was refused access. Similarly, Johnson Panjaitan, a lawyer from Jakarta, was refused access to his clients.[373]

416. Articles 54 and 55 of KUHAP clearly provide for the provision of a lawyer of a suspect's own choosing from the very beginning of legal proceedings. Similar to previous political trials, this provision was breached.

Investigation

417. The police investigator's record of interrogation, or RoI, appears to have involved a degree of coercion. If questions were not answered to the satisfaction of the interrogators, defendants were threatened with being shot. According to Celina da Costa:

I said, I don't know, I don't know, but they continued to hit me and threatened to hang and shoot me if I did not give honest answers.[374]

418. Further, detainees were forced to sign untruthful and inaccurate RoIs, which were principally prepared by the police investigators, with some involvement of special forces personnel. Vasco da Gama, the leader of the Mahkota Hotel demonstration, elaborated:

*Regarding all the information we gave during the interrogation, we were forced to speak (obrigatorio) although none of us wanted to say anything. We told them what they forced us to say. We were forced to accept all the things written in the RoI already in their hands. In other words, the statements contained in the document were not our statements...They planned it all and when the time came for us to sign the document, we* just signed it. During interrogation at the police station, I did not know why some special forces personnel were there to investigate and interrogate us.[375]

419. This is in breach of the right to silence, which is guaranteed under Article 66 of KUHAP.

420. Thomas Correia told the Commission that his RoI was false, with the investigators adding their own opinions and torturing him to illicit favourable answers:

> I answered their questions, but my answers were not included in the RoI. Instead, they added their own opinions. In the end, they handed the document to me and I signed it without reading it. Besides, there was a police officer standing next to me [name not given], and he hit and burned me with a lit cigarette every time I gave the wrong answer.[376]

421. Indeed, he claimed that his RoI was prepared before the interrogation:

> [T]hey had already written it and I just signed. I did not refuse, I immediately accepted, its content I forget. The RoI was made when the Soeharto regime was still in place so they prepared everything. We signed in June 1997.[377]

422. The blatant disregard for human dignity in torturing detainees and doing so in order to obtain particular information, as well as the preparation of RoIs before interrogation, clearly breaches the guarantees in KUHAP that suspects be allowed to give information freely without pressure of any kind. Thus the actions of interrogators were not only brutal, but they also set the tone for the proceedings that followed: a trial process where the factual basis for conviction was inherently flawed.

The trial

423. The joint trial of 16 of the 33 detainees commenced on 24 July 1997 and, after numerous postponements, concluded on 20 September 1997.

Indictment

424. The primary charge was that the defendants committed treason:

> [T]he [16] defendants together with other defendants whose cases were submitted separately or who remained at large, on Sunday 23 March 1997 between 6.30 and 7.30 in the morning at the Mahkota Hotel, in Colmera, West Dili, district of Dili or in another place still under the jurisdiction of the Dili District Court, committed an act of rebellion (aanslag) with the objective to either subjugate all or part of Indonesia's territory (i.e. Timor-Leste) and to surrender it to a foreign country with > the intention to secede from Indonesia, or to establish an independent and sovereign state.[378]

425. Subsidiary charges of expressing hostility towards the Government of Indonesia were also included under Articles 154 and 155 of KUHP.[379]

426. The indictment listed a number of meetings that took place to prepare for the demonstration in front of the Mahkota Hotel on 23 March 1997. The alleged purpose of the demonstration was:

> [T]o show the UN envoy and the foreign press staying at the Mahkota Hotel that anti-integration groups remained active in Timor-Leste and that the people of Timor-Leste wanted independence from Indonesia.[380]

427. The indictment alleged that during the demonstration the defendants shouted chants such as: "Viva Xanana Gusmão, Viva Timor-Leste, Viva Ramos-Horta, Viva Fretilin, Viva Maubere." This was done with great zest with people enthusiastically raising their fists and accordingly disturbed the public order. Olga Amaral, José Gabriel, Agusto Raimundo Matos and others allegedly displayed Fretilin flags and 19 banners. These banners contained anti-Indonesian slogans, including demands for independence from Indonesia.

428. The 17 other defendants who were tried separately were indicted with similar charges. Vasco da Gama (Criado) was charged with treason while three defendants, Marito Brafas Soares, Cancio Henrique Guterres and Alberto da Costa (Barreto) were charged with publicly expressing feelings of hostility towards the Indonesian Government under Article 154 of KUHP.

429. The other defendants, including Luis de Fatima Pereira, Domingos da Costa, Nelson Pereira, Anaro Pereira, Mateus da Costa Belo, Mariano da Silva, Muises Feliciano Soares, Alipio Soares, Hermenegildo da Costa and Thomas Correia faced a primary charge under Article 154 and a subsidiary charge under Article 155 of KUHP.[381]

430. The policy shift from individual to joint trials should be noted. In the Santa Cruz and Jakarta trials, large groups of defendants were tried individually, despite it being far more efficient to try them jointly. In the Mahkota trial, however, it appears that as the majority of defendants were mainly ordinary people (students and farmers) rather than senior clandestine members, there was little benefit in trying them individually. This would also explain why Vasco da Gama, the main organiser of the demonstration, was tried individually. Thus it appears that the Indonesian authorities preferred individual trials for the defendants who represented the greatest threat.* The lenient sentences that the defendants later received lends further weight to this notion.

* The Commission is aware of another political trial where East Timorese defendants were tried jointly – the 1997 trial for an attempted bombing in Semarang. The fact that the four co-defendants in this case were all ordinary students and were all acquitted of the illegal possession of explosives lends weight to the theory that individual trials were preferred for the defendants considered most dangerous by the Indonesian authorities.

The openness of the trial

431. On 24 July 1997, the presiding judge declared the trial open to the public stating that tight security measures had been put in place for the duration of the trial. The heavy presence of police, Kopassus, Korem, military personnel and other government agents meant that many Timorese were too afraid to attend. Thus although the trial was not closed, the tense environment due to the prevalence of members of security forces effectively prevented members of the public from observing trial proceedings.[382] The failure to guarantee a trial open to the public in a meaningful sense breaches Article 153(3) of the KUHAP.

Witnesses

432. Out of 15 witnesses interrogated during investigation, only five gave oral testimony at trial. They all testified for the prosecution, with no witnesses appearing for the defence. Most prosecution witnesses were members of the police or military who were present at the demonstration. The quality of the evidence given by the witnesses was very general and unspecific. In particular witnesses could not provide detail on the specific actions of the accused. An example of a witness account is that of Suhaedar, a military police officer:

> At the time of the incident, I was in the Mahkota Hotel, in security room no 246 on the second floor. A friend told me a demonstration was taking place. After I came down, I witnessed the demonstration from a distance of about two metres. There were around 50 people. I also saw some colleagues from the navy and the intelligence unit there. I heard the protesters shouting, "Viva Timor-Leste, Viva Xanana Gusmão, Viva Maubere, Viva David Alex." I also saw four banners, one of them a big white banner about two by one metres in size. I could not see it clearly because I was behind it. There was also a piece of cloth resembling a yellow, red and black flag with a star on it.[383]

433. Another witness, police officer Soliquin, testified that:

> In general he recognised the faces of the protesters…. except those whose faces were covered with material.[384]

434. Other witnesses claimed that Falintil fighters were among the protesters.[385]

435. The five prosecution witnesses were Dede Kuswandi, I Ketut Sudarma Wiasa, Muhamad Saleh, Suhaedar and I Gede Redama.[386] Explaining why only five witnesses were called, Aniceto Guterres Lopes said:

> [A]t the trial the presiding judge told the prosecutor he was satisfied with the witnesses called [thus far] and that the prosecutor did not need to call other witnesses.[387]

Evidence

436. A large amount of physical evidence was confiscated from the defendants at the time of the demonstration:

> During the 23 March 1997 demonstration, the authorities confiscated 19 banners of various dimensions with messages [written] in a foreign language, 2 Fretilin flags, 15 multi-coloured items of clothing, 10 multi-coloured pants.[388]

437. The messages written on the 19 confiscated banners were in Portuguese and at trial Carlos Boromeu translated them under oath into Indonesian. Below are a few examples of the banners submitted as evidence:

> Free Xanana Gusmão and all East Timorese political prisoners. Long live Xanana Gusmão the defender of the young Maubere generation.
>
> A Tri-Partite dialogue under the auspices of the United Nations: Include Xanana Gusmão for a peaceful Timor-Leste solution.
>
> A permanent UN Human Rights Commission Delegation in Timor-Leste.[389]

Performance of defence lawyers

438. The defence team from Yayasan Hak faced serious obstacles in its attempts to defend its clients. One significant issue, according to Aniceto Guterres Lopes, was that he did not have a strong relationship with the military:

> As a lawyer, I had a good rapport with the police, but not with the military and the intelligence.[390]

439. Aniceto Guterres Lopes mentioned other impediments he faced while representing the defendants:

> I had to deal with continuous attempts by the court (judges and prosecutors) and the police to refuse or obstruct independent lawyers. They always appointed the defence lawyer
>
> They always politicised my defence…my clients did not understand this so they twisted the arguments a little bit and my clients accepted the lawyer(s) they appointed. The judges and the prosecutors even asked the police to urge the defendants to refuse independent lawyer(s) or they said something like "Mr Aniceto Guterres Lopes is not good enough. You may get heavy sentences.'
>
> I dealt with an unfair process, filled with violence and disrespect of the defendants' rights and when the independent lawyers intervened on behalf of the defendants or their families, they created obstacles, such as > threatening or imposing a more complicated procedure. For example, I had a power of attorney from the defendants and their families and that should have been sufficient, but they (the police) prepared a separate power of attorney appointing the lawyer that the police recommended, visited the defendants in jail and asked them to sign the document.[391]

440. Aniceto Guterres Lopes added that the lawyers did all they could to ensure the defendants' rights were upheld but that many of the defendants' rights were ignored:

> They had already coached "witnesses" who had not seen the incident, but who, in the RoI testified that they had seen the Mahkota Hotel incident. The law prohibits such practices, yet they happened.[392]

441. Thus when independent lawyers were allowed to act, after numerous interrogations had taken place, there were constant attempts by the Indonesian authorities to disrupt and undermine their work. Such intimidation undoubtedly impacted on the ability of the defence lawyers to represent their clients and accordingly impacted on the fairness of the trial.

The defence case

442. The substance of the defence case focused on both procedural aspects as well as broad historical arguments. The procedural flaws and breaches of rights included:

> [T]he violence that the defendants experienced during the preliminary investigation, and on the defendants' rights to obtain the RoI.[393]

443. In addition, it was argued that the arrest, the detention and the judicial process were illegal, as they did not comply with the applicable laws at the time. In regard to this, the defendants' lawyer, Aniceto Guterres Lopes, states:

> Those involved in clandestine movements were known to the security forces. Subsequently they were arrested. The process of arrest, detention and [ultimately] justice was unfair as it did not comply with the stipulations of the Criminal Procedure Code (KUHAP) on arrest and detention of suspects. In the defence, their clandestine activities and demonstrations had a legitimate justification because they did not recognise Indonesia's annexation of Timor-Leste. Therefore their struggle was legitimate based on the right of self-determination, recognised by the international community.[394]

444. As highlighted in the previous quote, international legal issues were also raised to argue the defence case:

> That international law stipulates that recognition is but one requirement in a nation's claim of sovereignty. In this case the integration of Timor-

> Leste into Indonesia became legitimate with the recognition of at least one sovereign country. Therefore all objections submitted by the lawyers about Timor-Leste's integration into Indonesia need to be dealt with by the United Nations, and therefore should not need to be considered in this court.[395]

445. Despite the validity of many of the defence arguments raised, they were rejected and by and large not even directly responded to.

Performance of judges

446. It appears that the independence and impartiality of the judges in the Mahkota trial should be questioned. There is evidence to suggest that there was communication between the judges and Indonesian security officials which may potentially have influenced the outcome of the trial. Rui Pereira, a lawyer, revealed that:

> Before the case went to trial, the judges received phone calls from the Korem, Kodim, and the intelligence task force. These calls certainly impacted on the judges' performance.[396]

447. This statement was confirmed by Aniceto Guterres Lopes who stated that intelligence agents:

> …made contact with the judges outside or before the trial to sway the judges' judgment.[397]

448. Furthermore, Aniceto Guterres Lopes questioned why intelligence officials needed to be present at court sessions every day:

> Why were intelligence officers in court every day? To monitor the trial, to signal or to remind the judges to watch out, this is an important case! We will watch closely. Your decision must comply. Intelligence officers from the police, the Kodim and the SGI attended the hearings almost daily. What business did intelligence have at the trial? None! They were there to intimidate and manipulate the Court's decision.[398]

449. The conduct of the judges at trial lends further weight to their lack of impartiality. According to Aniceto Guterres Lopes:

> Usually, we submitted our objections during or outside of the hearings but the judges never even considered them. For example, the prosecutor read the charges during the trial and, as a defence lawyer, I responded to the charges by saying that I did not understand them, but the presiding judge continued the trial.[399]

450. Other aspects of the judges' performance that suggest a lack of impartiality include a failure to ensure that the trial was completely open to the public and a failure to take into account the impact that the absence of lawyers at the time of interrogation may have had on the reliability of the RoIs. This may have breached the judges' obligation under Article 185(6) of KUHAP to weigh up the reliability of evidence.

451. Further, according to Vasco da Gama (Criado), there was never any prospect of an impartial trial as the judges were the enemy of those on trial:

> [F]rankly, we were enemies, and enemies never forgive each other unless there is a process undertaken [of forgiveness]…only then would things change. I saw myself that the court was under the control of the pro-integrationists. In other words, no mouse would dare put up a defence against a cat and seeing a defenceless mouse, obviously the cat would eat it. This is a fundamental problem.[400]

Decision and sentences

452. On 20 September 1997, the presiding judge Agustinus Loto Runggum handed down a verdict for the sixteen co-defendants. All were found guilty of the primary charges in the indictment, namely treason:[401]

> Based on evidence and the above considerations, this panel of judges believes that the primary charge has been proven beyond reasonable doubt.[402]

453. Due to the primary charge being satisfied, the judges saw no need to consider the subsidiary charges.[403]

454. The following 16 defendants were sentenced to one year imprisonment for rebellion and attempts to secede from Indonesia:

1. Celina Pires da Costa
2. Olga Amaral
3. José Gabriel
4. João Henrique (Elias)
5. Costancio G. Leite
6. José Sarmento Boavida
7. Mateus da Costa Inacio
8. Bendito Amaral
9. Crispin da Silva (Anino da Silva)
10. Agusto Raimundo Matos
11. Domingos Sarmento
12. Rafael de Almeida
13. Zito Borges
14. Aleixo da Silva Ximenes
15. Anacleto da silva
16. Abel Ximenes.[404]

455. The following 17 defendants who faced separate trials were also found guilty and received a one-year jail term:

17. Masitu Fraga Soares
18. Cancio A. Henrique Guterres
19. Alberto da Costa (Barreto)
20. Luis Bonanca
21. Domingos da Costa
22. Nelson Pereira
23. Amaro Pereira
24. Miguel Alves
25. Ronaldo Brazil Januario
26. Carlos Gusmão
27. Celestino Manuel Pereira
28. Mateus da Costa Belo
29. Mariano da Silva
30. Moises Feliciano Soares
31. Alipio Soares
32. Hermenegildo da Costa
33. Thomas A Correia.[405]

456. Vasco da Gama (Criado) was also convicted on his primary charge and received a one-year jail sentence. For all defendants, time already served in detention was subtracted from the one year sentence.

Appeal

457. All defendants accepted the verdict of the Dili District Court and expressed no intention to appeal. [406] Vasco da Gama elaborated:

> We accepted the court's decision. My friends and I accepted the decision immediately. I told the judges that I would accept any decision even if it involved years of jail, because it [what I did] was my right. So we did not say much, we just accepted it. What we did was our right. Then they asked me whether on my release I would continue with clandestine activities. I replied that it would depend on their attitudes, which were merely a reflection of the New Order.[407]

Conclusion

458. The trial of those involved in the Mahkota Hotel demonstration in March 1997 represents the most extensive trial of ordinary civilians (as opposed to clandestine leaders) during the Indonesian occupation. In previous sets of trials, the Indonesian authorities focused on the organisers or instigators of pro-independence activity, who were usually senior pro-independence leaders. The intention was to make an example of the leaders in an attempt to deter future action. The Mahkota trials, however, demonstrate a shift in policy. The trials targeted ordinary participants in a non-violent protest and tried them jointly. There appear to have been serious instances of maltreatment and torture during pre-trial detention, yet defendants received a comparatively lenient sentence of one year.

459. The reasons for this change in policy are not entirely clear, however it may signify an acceptance that the previous approach of targeting leaders was ineffectual. Despite the harsh sentences for the organisers of the Santa Cruz and Jakarta demonstrations, political protests still took place. To repeat that approach in relation to the Mahkota demonstration, for example by prosecuting only Vasco da Gama and a number of other senior clandestine members, would be likely to be similarly ineffectual. By putting a large number of participants on trial and subjecting them to torture, the objective may have been to attack the rank and file clandestine members, and send a message that anyone, not only leaders, who expressed anti-Indonesia sentiment, would face trial. The relatively low sentences handed down also illustrate that despite the brutal treatment of detainees, the Indonesian Government wished to appear lenient, perhaps in response to the international criticism of the extremely harsh sentences previously handed down to people such as Gregorio Saldanha. This could therefore be characterised as a double-edged approach: on the one hand, to put ordinary people on trial for political crimes and thereby demonstrate the increased reach and legitimacy of Indonesian law and courts; on the other, to grant lenient sentences to maintain an appearance of a fair administration governed by the rule of law.

460. The most significant breaches of due process in the Mahkota trials include the use of torture, especially in relation to Vasco da Gama and Thomas A Correia; the falsification of RoIs by interrogators; the failure to let lawyers be present during interrogation; deficiencies in the openness of the trial; and a lack of impartiality on behalf of the judges. The 33 defendants therefore faced a process in which their rights to a fair trial were systematically abused. In the Mahkota trials, for the first time, the Indonesian authorities convicted a large number of ordinary citizens of political crimes, for participating in a non-violent protest. The expression of their fundamental rights to freedom of expression and association resulted in a one-year prison sentence on the basis of an unfair process, and in some cases, physical torture.

Findings

461. The Commission finds that:

1. Although the Indonesian legal system was functioning to some degree in Timor-Leste from 1977, political opponents of the occupation only began to be prosecuted in 1983. At this time the Indonesian security apparatus developed a policy of using the criminal law and the courts as tools to crush resistance to Indonesian rule in Timor-Leste.
2. The implementation of this policy did not mean that previous methods, such as killing, arbitrary detention and torture of political opponents were discontinued.

Rather the courts were used as a complementary tool, added to other means already employed, in order to achieve the political goal of crushing resistance.

3. The new role of the criminal law and courts did not mean that there was a movement towards respect for human rights and the rule of law. The trials were not fair trials. They were in general "show trials" similar in many ways to those which had occurred under other military dictatorships in other countries. The verdicts of those who were accused were never in doubt. The function of the trial was largely as a propaganda tool, calculated to provide the illusion of justice which would cover a vicious victimisation of political opponents.
4. The major method used for guaranteeing that the court found defendants guilty but ensuring that the proceedings did not appear to be totally corrupt was to fabricate and limit the evidence that the court was able to consider. To fabricate the evidence, interrogators tortured and intimidated defendants into making confessions, military and police witnesses concocted their evidence and created false material evidence, defence witnesses were prevented from appearing, and defence counsel who would not strongly contest a prosecution case were appointed.
5. The degree to which the trial process was corrupted in order to paint a veneer of legitimacy over predetermined guilty verdicts dictated by political goals is demonstrated by the following summary in relation to the first wave of political trials, from 1983-85. Two hundred and thirty two (232) political trials were examined by the Commission. These resulted in:
    - 232 convictions on charges involving treason and subversion
    - 232 defendants were represented by government appointed defence counsel
    - 0 defence witnesses were called
    - 0 cases of acquittal of all charges were recorded
    - 0 appeals against conviction were lodged.
6. The intelligence services of the Indonesian military forces were involved in guiding the outcome of the political trials at every stage of the interrogation and trial process.
7. The military officers who used terror and torture in interrogating prisoners, the police who prepared the cases, the prosecutors who presented the cases in court, the court appointed defence counsel who failed to rigorously defend their clients and the judges who acquiesced in allowing profound and repeated travesties of justice to take place were involved in a collaboration and collusion designed to ensure that defendants did not receive a fair trial.
8. Indonesian military officers arbitrarily detained political opponents of the occupation and held them for long periods of custody, often years, before trial, even though in many cases there was little or no evidence against them.
9. Indonesian military officers routinely used torture and intimidation as tools during interrogation in order to obtain confessions and other information. The results of the torture and intimidation were used as evidence at trial.

10. Many of those who were tortured were also threatened that if they did not cooperate and admit their guilt they would be detained indefinitely and continue to be tortured and mistreated. As a result they signed confessions of their involvement in the pro-independence movement, whether that was the truth or not. They also provided evidence against other persons, many of whom were actually unknown to them.

11. Members of the Indonesian security forces routinely signed false statements that provided evidence against persons accused of political crimes, and perjured themselves in the trials of those persons.

12. Members of the Indonesian security forces also routinely fabricated material evidence, for example producing weapons with no connection to the particular case, to substantiate the evidence relied on for prosecution.

13. Members of the Indonesian security forces failed to inform suspects that the information they provided would be used against them at trial, and that they were entitled to the presence of a lawyer, according to Indonesian law and international law.

14. Members of the Indonesian security forces routinely interrogated suspects and forced them to sign Records of Interview that had been fabricated and produced without interpretation in Indonesian, a language that the suspects did not fully understand.

15. Defendants were regularly refused the right to appoint lawyers of their choice to defend them at trial. The defence counsel appointed in most cases supported the prosecution case, did not call any defence witnesses and did not in reality provide a defence for their clients.

16. In a small number of cases independent defence counsel, from Indonesian legal aid non-government organisations and East Timorese lawyers, courageously provided a professional defence of their clients. They did this in pursuance of the principles of justice, despite intimidation and allegations of a lack of patriotism levelled at them both inside and outside the court, and other hindrances such as a lack of time to prepare cases.

17. During trials of political opponents prosecutors routinely ignored ethical issues that arose in relation to the evidence they presented to the court. This included confessional evidence obtained through torture and obviously fabricated evidence.

18. Judges presiding over the political trials failed in their duties to provide an independent and objective adjudication. These judges significantly contributed to the overall corruption of the legal system by allowing their positions of authority to be manipulated as a political tool of the military intelligence services.

19. The judges who presided over the political trials allowed obviously fabricated evidence to be admitted without objection. They did not consider allegations of torture and intimidation of witnesses to be a serious issue. They routinely based their verdicts of guilty on Records of Interview that had been signed as a result of torture, under illegal conditions. The judges also ignored defendants' requests to be represented by counsel of their choice.

20. Judges handed down sentences to persons convicted of political crimes that were disproportionate to the degree of criminality of the acts allegedly perpetrated. In some cases this involved sentences of years of imprisonment for actions such as supplying cigarettes or small quantities of food to persons suspected of being opponents to the occupation. Time served in military detention, up to seven years in the most extreme case, was generally not taken into account when determining sentences.

21. There was no meaningful appeal process available for persons who were convicted of political crimes.

Endnotes

1. Article 64, Geneva Convention IV
2. See eg Article 68 Geneva Convention IV
3. Article 106 of the Indonesian Criminal Code (KUHP).
4. CAVR interview with Mário Viegas Carrascalão, Dili, 30 June 2004.
5. Amnesty International, Unfair trials and possible torture in East Timor, December 1985.
6. Country Reports on Human rights Practices for 1984, Report submitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, February 1985.
7. Case file of Zé Roberto S.M.J: No: 57/Pid/B/B4/PN.DIL.
8. Case file of Zé Roberto S.M.J: No: 57/Pid/B/B4/PN.DIL. The documents indicate that this was through the Warrant of Chief of Nusa Tenggara Regional Police No. Pol. Sprin/33/II/84 dated 14 February 1984 regarding assignment of a member of the Indonesian National Police (Polri) on the Polri Task Force in the Sub-district police of East Timor (Polwil Tim-Tim).
9. Case file of Zé Roberto S.M.J: No: 57/Pid/B/B4/PN.DIL.
10. See Record of Interrogation dated 9 April 1984 in Case file of Henrique Belmiro, No. 83/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL.
11. Case file of David Dias Ximenes, No. 22/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL.
12. See for example Article 9(3) of the International Convention on Civil and Political Rights, which reflects customary international law; and Article 71 Geneva Convention IV.
13. Wanseslan G.Carvalo, Balenti Nunes and Salestino Dalosesat. See case file of David Dias Ximenes, No. 22/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL.
14. Letter of the Kolakops Intelligence Task Force of East Timor (Satgas Intel Kolakops Timor Timur) No: R/463/III/1984, 24 March 1984.
15. CAVR interview with Caetano de Sousa Guterres, Dili, 22 May 2004.
16. HRVD Statement 8055.
17. CAVR interview with Aquelino Fraga Guterres, Dili, 17 May 2004.
18. HRVD Statement 6983.
19. CAVR interview with Antonio Tomas Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004.
20. "Is it Wrong for a Child to Return to the Mother who Gave it Birth?" Sinar Harapan Newspaper, 3 September 1985, excerpted and translated in Amnesty International, Unfair trials and possible torture in East Timor, December 1985.
21. CAVR interview with Antonio Tomas Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004.
22. Amnesty International, East Timor: Unfair Trials and Further Releases of Political Prisoners, (summary) April 1988.

23. Cristiano da Costa, Statement to the Human Rights Commission, 44th Session (item 12), 1988.
24. Neil Barrett, interview with David da Conçeicão, The Neil Barrett Comarca Video Project, Submission to CAVR, August 2002
25. For example, see case file of Abilio Tilman, No. 72/Pid.B/1983/PN.DIL, and case file of Martinho Soares, No. 119/Pid/85/PN.DIL
26. Case file of João Soares, 24/Pid/B/84/P.N.DIL.
27. Bill of Charges José Simoes, No:01/PK-23/1984, 23 January 1984.
28. For example Case File of Henrique Belmiro, No. 83/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL and Notification of Decision of Dili Court in relation to Armindo Florindo, No. 43/Pid.B/1984/PN.DIL.
29. Case file of Henrique Belmiro, No. 83/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL.
30. CAVR interview with Antonio Tomas Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004.
31. CAVR interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 17 November 2002.
32. Case file of Henrique Belmiro, No. 83/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL.
33. Case file of Armindo Florindo, No. 43/Pid.B/1984/PN.DIL. See especially Bill of Charges No. 41/PK/1984, 12 May 1984.
34. Notification of Decision of Dili District Court in relation to Caetano de Sousa Gutteres, No. 51/Pid/B/1984/PN.DIL, 29 May 1984.
35. Notification of Decision of Dili District Court in relation to David Dias Ximenes, No. 22//Pid/B/1984/PN.DIL.30 March 1984.
36. Notification of Decision of Dili District Court about Domingos Seixas, No. 18/Pid/B/84/PN/DIL. pp.3-5, 31 March 1984.
37. Case file of Francisco Mendez No. 170/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL., see especially Indictment No. 49/B/12/1984, p.1; Bill of Charges No. 49/B/2/1985, p.1; and the Notification of Decision No. 170/PID/B/1984/PN.DILi.p.2.
38. Notification of Decision of Dili District Court about Francisco Mendez, No. 170/PID/B/1984/PN.DIL. p.2.
39. Case File Jil [sic] Fernandes, No. 179/Pid/B/85/PN.DIL.
40. "Hau hakarak hatoo, too ohin loron, hau tama iha komarka, tamba iha tempo ida nee hau, ami hamutuk forma duni ami nia estrutura ida hanesan klandestina atu fo ajuda ba resistencia armada. Maibe apoio nebe mak hanesan ami fo ba sira hanesan informacao, estafeta no mos logistico." Neil Barrett, interview with Maria Immaculada, Comarca Video Project, Submission to the CAVR, Dili, August 2002.
41. Notification of Decision of Dili District Court in relation to Zé Roberto Seixas Miranda Jeronimo. No: 57/Pid/B/1984/PN.DIL.
42. Letter dated 30 April 1984 from Ali Alatas to Thomas Hammarberg, Secretary-General of Amnesty International.
43. CAVR interview with Antonio Tomas Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004.p.12
44. CAVR interview with Antonio Tomas Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004.p.16.
45. Amnesty International Statement to the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization (summary) August 1990.
46. Letter dated 30 April 1984 from Ali Alatas to Thomas Hammarberg, Secretary-General of Amnesty International.
47. Case file No. 170/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL.
48. Stipulation of Dili District Court No. DC.UM 08.04.02, dated 7 January 1984.
49. CAVR interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 27 May 2004.p.9.
50. CAVR interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 27 May 2004, p.5; CAVR interview with Antonio Tomas Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004, p.13.
51. Defence Pleadings, Case file of Henrique Belmiro, No. 83/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL.
52. Defence Pleadings in Criminal Case No. 22/Pid/B/1984/PN.DIL, 23 March 1984.
53. Transcript of Proceedings in the trial of Domingos Seixas, Dili, 19 March 1984, p.10.
54. The Reply of the Public Prosecutor regarding the Legal Councel Plea in the case No 64/PK/1983 on the accused Abilio Tilman. 14 December 1983.
55. FEER, 8 August 1985, in Amnesty International, Unfair trials and possible torture in East Timor, December 1985

56. CAVR, interviewers notes of interview with Caetano Guterres, Dili, 22 May 2004.
57. CAVR interview with Caetano Guterres, Dili, 22 May 2004.
58. Statement by Cristiano da Costa, Commission on Human Rights, 44th Session (item 12), 1988.
59. FEER, 8 August 1985, in Amnesty International, Unfair trials and possible torture in East Timor, December 1985.
60. See case files for Abilio Tilman (No. 72/Pid/B/83/PN.DIL), Caetano Guterres (No. 51/Pid/B/1984/PN.DIL), José Simoes (No. 03/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL).
61. Notification of Decision of Dili District Court about Martinho Soares, No. 119/Pid/85/PN.DIL, 1 August 1985. The three-page defence statement was submitted on 27 July 1985 by Merry Doko and Asmah Achmad.
62. Case file of Martinho Soares, No. 119/Pid/85/PN.DIL, 1 August 1985.
63. Case file of Henrique Belmiro, No. 83/Pid/B/84/PN.DIL.
64. Ibid
65. Country Reports on Human rights Practices for 1984, Report submitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate, February 1985.
66. Notification of Decision of Dili District Court about Markus Assis, 115/Pid/B/1984/PN.DIL, 10 November 1984.
67. "Is it Wrong for a Child to Return to the Mother who Gave it Birth?" Sinar Harapan newspaper, 3 September 1985, excerpted and translated in Amnesty International, Unfair trials and possible torture in East Timor, December 1985.
68. Ibid.
69. Amnesty International, East Timor: Unfair Trials and Further Releases of Political Prisoners, (summary) April 1988.
70. CAVR interview with Johnson Panjaitan, Dili, Dili, 14 May 2004.
71. CAVR interview with Mário Carrasacalão, Dili, 30 May 2004.p.3.
72. CAVR interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 27 May 2004.p.10.
73. Letter dated April 30 1984 from Ali Alatas to Thomas Hammarberg.
74. Amnesty International, East Timor: Unfair Trials and Further Releases of Political Prisoners, (summary) April 1988.
75. "Is it Wrong for a Child to Return to the Mother who Gave it Birth?" Sinar Harapan newspaper,.
76. CAVR interview with Antonio Tomas Amaral da Costa (Aitahan Matak), Dili, 28 April 2004.
77. Amnesty International, East Timor: Unfair Trials and Further Releases of Political Prisoners, (summary) April 1988.
78. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor: Santa Cruz: The Government Response, 6 February 1992, p. 9.
79. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor: In Accordance with the Law: Statement to the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization, July 1992, p. 5.
80. Francisco Branco, Statement to the Serious Crimes Unit, Dili, 15 May 2001.
81. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor: In Accordance with the Law, p. 2.
82. Case file of Gregorio da Cunha Saldanha 13/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Notification of Decision of Dili District Court, p. 153.
83. Ibid, p. 156.
84. Commission on Human Rights, Fifty-first Session, Report by the Special Rapporteur, Mr. Bacre Waly Ndiaye, on his mission to Indonesia and East Timor from 3 to 13 July 1994, 1 November 1994, p. 5.
85. Ibid.
86. Amnesty International, East Timor: The Santa Cruz Massacre, [date unknown], p. 2.
87. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor: Fernando Lasama de Araujo Prisoner of Conscience, May 1993, p. 2.
88. Gregorio Saldanha, Statement to the Serious Crimes Unit, 31 March 2001.
89. Jacinto Alves, Statement to the Serious Crimes Unit, 11 June 2001.
90. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 24 November 2002.
91. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 30 July 2004.
92. Bonifacio Magno Statement to the Serious Crimes Unit, Dili, 21June 2001.

93. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 30 July 2004.
94. Bonifacio Magno, Statement to the Serious Crimes Unit, Dili, 21 June 2001.
95. Gregorio Saldanha, Statement to the Serious Crimes Unit, Dili, 31 March 2001.
96. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 24 November 2002.
97. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 1 August 2004.
98. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 May 2004.
99. Ibid.
100. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 24 November 2002.
101. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 1 August 2004.
102. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 May 2004.
103. CAVR interview with Gregorio Saldanha, Dili, 4 June 2004.
104. Case File of Gregorio Saldanha 13/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Transcript of proceeding, p. 99.
105. Case File of Gregorio Saldanha 13/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Notification of Decision of Dili District Court, p. 169.
106. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor: In Accordance with the Law: Statement to the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization, July 1992, p. 3.
107. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 May 2004.
108. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor: Political Prisoners and the "Rule of Law', January 1995, p. 10.
109. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 August 2004.
110. Ibid.
111. CAVR interview with Gregorio Saldanha, Dili, 4 June 2004.
112. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 1 August 2004.
113. Case file of Francisco Branco, 14/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Record of Interrogation of Francisco Branco on 13-15 January 1992, p. 1.
114. Case file of Francisco Branco, 14/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL,Transcript of Proceeding, p. 3.
115. Yayasan Lembaga Bantuan Hukum Indonesia (YLBHI), "Indonesian Human Rights Forum", YLBHI Newsletter, No. 4/1992 of April-June 1992, p. 16.
116. Case File of Francisco Branco, 14/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Transcript of Proceeding, p. 7.
117. The telegram was referred to in Gregorio Saldanha's trial, see Case File of Gregorio Saldanha 13/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Transcript of Proceeding, p. 18.
118. Amnesty International, Indonesia / East Timor: In Accordance with the Law: Statement to the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization, July 1992, p. 3.
119. See Article 55(1) KUHP.
120. See Article 110(1) KUHP.
121. CAVR interview with Gregorio Saldanha, Dili, 4 June 2004.
122. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 1 August 2004.
123. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 May 2004.
124. Commission on Human Rights, Forty-Ninth Session, Situation in East Timor: Report of the Secretary-General, 10 February 1993, p. 15.
125. International Commission of Jurists, "Tragedy in East Timor", October 1992, as summarised in Commission on Human Rights, Forty-Ninth Session, Situation in East Timor: Report of the Secretary-General, 10 February 1993, pp. 14-15.
126. Commission on Human Rights, Forty-Ninth Session, Situation in East Timor: Report of the Secretary-General, 10 February 1993, pp. 14-15.
127. Case file of Gregorio Saldanha 13/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Transcript of Proceeding, p. 218.
128. CAVR interview with Gregorio Saldanha, Dili, 4 June 2004, p. 3.
129. Case file of Gregorio Saldanha 13/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Notification of Decision of Dili District Court, p. 159.
130. Case file of Gregorio Saldanha 13/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Defence submissions summarised in Counter Appeal Memo, p. 4.
131. Luhut M.P Pangaribuan, testimony to the CAVR Public Hearing on Political Prisoners, Dili, 18 February 2003.

132. CAVR interview with Jacinto Alves, Dili, 5 May 2004.
133. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 1 August 2004.
134. Case file of Gregorio Saldanha No. 13/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Prosecution response to the defence exception, p. 8.
135. Case file of Francisco Branco, No. 14/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Defence statement, p. 1.
136. Ibid, p. 2.
137. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 1 August 2004.
138. Ibid.
139. Case file of Gregorio Saldanha No. 13/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Defence written response to the prosecution indictment.
140. Case file of Jacinto Das Neves Raimundo Alves, No. 15/PID/B/1992/PN.DIL., Defence statement, p. 9.
141. Ibid, p. 28.
142. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Dili, 1 August 2004.
143. Case File of Gregorio Saldanha 13/PID.B/1992/PD.Dili, Trial transcript, p. 67.
144. Case file of Jacinto Alves, No. 15/PID/B/1992/PN.DIL, Decision of Dili District Court, p. 235.
145. Ibid, p. 218.
146. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor: In Accordance with the Law: Statement to the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization, July 1992, p. 4.
147. Case file of Francisco Branco, No. 14/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Decision of Dili District Court, p. 116.
148. Case file of Gregorio Saldanha No. 13/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Notification of Decision of Dili District Court of Instance, p. 217.
149. See for example Case File of Francisco Branco No. 14/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL, Decision of Dili District Court of Instance, p. 155, Case file of Jacinto Alves, No. 15/PID/B/1992/PN.DIL , Decision of Dili District Court of Instance, p. 236.
150. In court files there are appeal decisions from the Kupang High Court for Francisco Branco, Gregorio Saldanha, Jacinto Alves, Filomeno da Silva Ferreira and Juvencio Martins.
151. CAVR interview with Francisco Branco, Parliament House, 1 August 2004, p. 6.
152. Article 14(5) of the ICCPR: Everyone convicted of a crime shall have the right to his conviction and sentence being reviewed by a higher tribunal according to law.
153. Kupang High Court Decision No. 56/PID/1992/PTK, p. 63. in Case file of Gregorio Saldanha No. 13/PID.B/1992/PD.DIL,
154. Case file of Bonifacio Magno, No. 97/PID/B/84/PN.DIL., Applications and Decision re Clemency.
155. Amnesty International, Indonesia/East Timor: In Accordance with the Law: Statement to the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization, July 1992, p. 2.
156. International Commission of Jurists, Tragedy in East Timor, October 1992, p. 15.
157. YLBHI, East Timor case: Case Handling Report, Jakarta, 1992.
158. Ibid.
159. Case Files of Fernando Lasama de Araujo, Virgilio da Silva Guterres, Agapito Cardoso and Domingos Barreto.
160. CAVR interviews with João Freitas da Camara, Dili, 5 June 2004; Fernando de Araujo, DIli, 5 May 2004; Virgilio da Silva Guterres, Dili, 5 May 2004; Domingos de Jesus Barreto, Dili, 6 May 2004.
161. CAVR interviews with Asmara Nababan, Jakarta Pusat, 8 June 2004; Luhut M.P. Pangaribuan, Jakarta Pusat, 9 June 2004; Munir, S.H, Jakarta Pusat, 9 June 2004; Artidjo Alkostar, S.H., LL.M, Jakarta Pusat; June 2004; Hendardi, Jakarta Pusat, 10 June 2004.
162. CAVR interview with Domingos de Jesus Barreto, Dili, 6 May 2004
163. CAVR interview with João Freitas da Camara, Dili, 5 June 2004.
164. Ibid.
165. YLBHI, East Timor case: Case handling report, 1991, p. 4.
166. LBH Surabaya, Field Investigation Report on East Timorese Students, Denpasar, 15-17 December 1991.
167. CAVR interview with Fernando Lasama de Araujo, Dili, 5 May 2004.
168. Eksepsi, Fernando Lasama de Araujo, Jakarta 23 March 1992, pp. 4-5.
169. YLBHI, East Timor case: Case Handling Report, Jakarta, 1991, p. 6
170. CAVR interview with João Freitas da Camara, Dili, 5 June 2004.

171. CAVR interview with Domingos de Jesus Barreto, Dili, 6 May 2004.
172. CAVR interview with João da Camara, Dili, 5 June 2004.
173. CAVR interview with Fernando de Araujo, Dili, 5 May 2004.
174. Fernando Lasama de Araujo, "Pleadings", p. 7
175. Duplik in the case of João Freitas da Camara, read in Central Jakarta District Court, 13 May 1992, p. 7.
176. Record of Interrogation João Freitas da Camara, 10 December 1991.
177. Duplik in the case of João Freitas da Camara, p. 8.
178. Fernando de Araujo, Consideration on the reply of the prosecutor regarding our plea and that of our legal counsel. Jakarta, 18 May 1992, p. 9.
179. CAVR interview with João Freitas da Camara, Dili, 2004.
180. CAVR interview with Fernando de Araujo, Dili, 5 May 2004.
181. CAVR interview with Fernando de Araujo, Dili, 5 May 2004.
182. Central Jakarta Office of General Prosecutor, Letter of Indictment Subversion Case, Defendant João Freitas da Camara, Jakarta, 3 March 1992, p.23.
183. Central Jakarta Office of General Prosecutor, Letter of Indictment of Subversion Case, Defendant Fernando de Araujo, Jakarta, 2 March 1992.
184. CAVR interview with Fernando de Araujo, Dili, 5 May 2004.
185. CAVR interview with João da Camara, Dili, 5 June 2004
186. See Letters of Indictment for the Defendants.
187. Criminal Charge (Requisitor) on the Defendant Virgilio da Silva Guterres, Jakarta, 25 April 1992, pp. 36-37.
188. CAVR interview with Fernando de Araujo, Dili, 5 May 2004.
189. CAVR interview with João Freitas da Camara, Dili, 5 June 2004.
190. Pleadings in the case of João Freitas da Camara, dated 2 May 1992, Central Jakarta District Court, pp. 7, 25 and 35.
191. Jakarta High Court, Decision in the case of João Freitas da Camara No: 01/SUBV/PID/1992/PT.DKI, 30 July 1992.
192. Ibid
193. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor: The Trial of Xanana Gusmão and a Follow-up to the Dili Massacre, Vol. 5 No. 8, April 1993, p. 8.
194. Ibid.
195. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004, p. 3.
196. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 8
197. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004, p. 2.
198. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004, p.3.
199. Ibid.
200. Commission on Human Rights, Forty-Ninth Session, Situation in East Timor: Report of the Secretary-General, 10 February 1993, p. 14.
201. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 9.
202. Commission on Human Rights, Forty-Ninth Session, Situation in East Timor: Report of the Secretary-General, 10 February 1993, p. 14.
203. Ibid.
204. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 9.
205. Ibid, p. 9.
206. Ibid.
207. Ibid, p. 8.
208. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, 10 August 2004.
209. Ibid, p. 1-2.
210. Ibid, p. 9.
211. Xanana Gusmão, "Defence Statement", Jakarta, May 1993, printed in Peter Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, East Timor Relief Association, Sydney, 1996, p. 15.
212. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.

213. Xanana Gusmão, "Defence Statement", in Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 13.
214. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.
215. Commission on Human Rights, Fiftieth Session, Situation in East Timor: Report of the Secretary-General, 20 January 1994, p. 12.
216. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.
217. Xanana Gusmão, "Defence Statement", in Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 27.
218. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.
219. Ibid, p. 1.
220. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor: The Trial of Xanana Gusmão and a Follow-up to the Dili Massacre, Vol. 5 No. 8, April 1993, p 8.
221. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.
222. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 8.
223. Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation, The Attitude and Measures Taken by the Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation (YLBHI) regarding Xanana Gusmão, Kay Rala, 17 January 1994, p. 2.
224. Letter from Xanana Gusmão to the International Commission of Jurists, Cipinang Prison, 1 December 1993, reprinted in Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 31.
225. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 12.
226. Ibid, p. 13.
227. Letter from Xanana Gusmão to the International Commission of Jurists dated 1 December 1993, reprinted in Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 31.
228. Ibid. p. 23.
229. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 13.
230. Ibid.
231. Letter from Xanana Gusmão to the International Commission of Jurists dated 1 December 1993, reprinted in Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 31.
232. Ibid, p. 32.
233. Ibid, p. 32.
234. Ibid, p. 32.
235. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 13.
236. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004, p. 6.
237. Ibid.
238. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 13.
239. Ibid.
240. Ibid, p 30-35.
241. Ibid, p. 7.
242. Ibid, p. 11.
243. Ibid, p.12
244. Ibid, p. 11
245. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004, p. 7.
246. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 3.
247. Ibid, p. 5
248. Ibid, p.7.
249. Ibid.
250. Ibid.
251. Ibid.
252. Ibid, p. 20.
253. Ibid.
254. Ibid.
255. Ibid.
256. Xanana Gusmão, "Defence Statement", in Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 13.
257. Ibid, p. 46

258. Ibid, p. 45
259. Ibid, p. 37.
260. Commission on Human Rights, Fiftieth Session, Situation in East Timor: Report of the Secretary-General, 20 January 1994, p. 10.
261. Ibid.
262. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 16.
263. Ibid, p. 27
264. Ibid, p. 17
265. Ibid, p. 16.
266. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004, p. 9.
267. Ibid.
268. International Commission of Jurists, Australian Section, "Report on the Trial of José Alexandre Gusmão" reprinted in Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 43.
269. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor: The Trial of Xanana Gusmão and a Follow-up to the Dili Massacre, Vol. 5 No. 8, April 1993, p. 17.
270. Ibid.
271. Ibid, p. 16.
272. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004, p. 11.
273. International Commission of Jurists, Australian Section, "Report on the Trial of José Alexandre Gusmão" reprinted in Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 43.
274. Ibid.
275. Amnesty International, State of Fear, Statement before the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization, [undated], p. 3.
276. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 18.
277. Amnesty International, East Timor: Who is to Blame?, Statement before the United Nations Special Committee on Decolonization, July 1994, p. 12.
278. Xanana Gusmão, "Defence Statement", in Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 25.
279. "Xanana Gusmão's Legal Advisor: Saksi a de charge sulit!", Suara Timor Timur Newspaper (Timor-Leste), 24 February 1993, p.27
280. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor: The Trial of Xanana Gusmão and a Follow-up to the Dili Massacre, Vol. 5 No. 8, April 1993, p. 14.
281. Ibid, p. 14.
282. Ibid, p. 14.
283. Xanana Gusmão, "Defence Statement", in Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 23.
284. Letter from Xanana Gusmão to the International Commission of Jurists dated 1 December 1993, reprinted in Slezak (ed), A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 32.
285. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor: The Trial of Xanana Gusmão and a Follow-up to the Dili Massacre, Vol. 5 No. 8, April 1993, p. 15.
286. Amnesty International, Unfair Political Trial of Xanana Gusmão, July 1993, p. 2.
287. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 15.
288. Ibid, p. 14.
289. International Commission of Jurists, Report on the Trial of José Alexandre Gusmão, p. 42.
290. Ibid, p. 42.
291. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 15.
292. Ibid.
293. Ibid.
294. Letter from Xanana Gusmão to the International Commission of Jurists dated 1 December 1993, p. 34.
295. International Commission of Jurists, Report on the Trial of José Alexandre Gusmão, p. 47.
296. Letter from Xanana Gusmão to the International Commission of Jurists dated 1 December 1993, p. 32.
297. Ibid, p. 33.
298. Ibid, p. 47.
299. Ibid, p. 7.

300. Ibid, p. 33.
301. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.
302. Xanana Gusmão, "Defence Statement", pp. 33-34.
303. Mark Baker, "Lawyers condemn Gusmão decision' in East Timor Relief Association, A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, May 1996, p. 37.
304. "Carta à Comissão Internacional de Juristas" in Xanana Gusmão, Timor-Leste: Um Povo, Uma Patria, p.320; Letter from Xanana Gusmão to the International Commission of Jurists dated 1 December 1993 in A Travesty of Justice: Xanana's Defence, p. 36.
305. Ibid, p. 7.
306. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004, p. 8.
307. Xanana Gusmão, "Defence Statement", p. 14.
308. Ibid, p. 17.
309. Ibid, p. 19.
310. Ibid, p. 20.
311. Ibid, p. 12.
312. Ibid, p. 28.
313. Ibid, p. 28.
314. Ibid, p. 11.
315. Ibid, p. 27.
316. Ibid, p. 29.
317. Ibid, p. 29.
318. Asia Watch, Remembering History in East Timor, p. 18.
319. Ibid, p. 18.
320. Xanana Gusmão, "Defence Statement", p. 24.
321. Ibid, p. 26.
322. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004, p. 9.
323. Letter from Xanana Gusmão to the International Commission of Jurists dated 1 December 1993, p. 34.
324. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.
325. Amnesty International, Xanana Gusmão – A Briefing [undated], p. 4. Further, in August 1997, the Indonesian Government granted Xanana a three month remission to his prison term.
326. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004, p. 10.
327. Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation, The Attitude and Measures Taken by the Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation (YLBHI) regarding Xanana Gusmão, Kay Rala, 17 January 1994, p. 2.
328. D.K. Jana, Media put words in Xanana's Mouth, Green Left Weekly <http://www.greenleft.org.au>, p. 1.
329. Ibid.
330. Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation, The Attitude and Measures Taken by the Indonesian Legal Aid Foundation (YLBHI) regarding Xanana Gusmão, Kay Rala, 17 January 1994, p. 3.
331. Associated press, 20 Feb 1994, cited in Amnesty International, Xanana Gusmão – A Briefing [undated], p. 3
332. Editor 17, February 94 in Amnesty International, Xanana Gusmão – A Briefing, p. 3.
333. Amnesty International, Xanana Gusmão – A Briefing [undated], p. 3.
334. Radio Australia, 24 March 94, cited in Amnesty International, Xanana Gusmão – A Briefing, p. 4.
335. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.
336. D.K. Jana, "Media put words in Xanana's Mouth", Green Left Weekly (Australia) <http://www.greenleft.org.au>, p. 1.
337. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.
338. Amnesty International, Xanana Gusmão – A Briefing, p. 4.
339. Ibid.
340. CAVR interview with Xanana Gusmão, Dili, 10 August 2004.
341. Tomas A. Correia, The Chronology of the Mahkota Hotel Tragedy, 23 March 1997, Submission to the CAVR dated 21 May 2004; CAVR interview with Thomas Correia, Dili, 29 May 2004.

342. CAVR interview with Celina Pires da Costa, Dili, 12 March 2004.
343. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.
344. Tomas A. Correia, The Chronology of Mahkota Hotel Tragedy: 23 March 1997; HRVD Statements 0555, 3761, 6963, 9189; Records of Interrogation of Olga Amaral and Celina Pires da Costa, 24 March 1997 in police Case File of Olga Amaral et.al. No, LP/81/III/97/PMT.
345. CAVR interview with Thomas A. Correia, Dili, 29 May 2004; CAVR interview with Celina P. da Costa, Dili, 12 May 2004; Record of Interrogation of Olga Amaral, 24 March 1997 and Record of Interrogation of Celina P. da Costa, 24 March 1997, both in police Case File of Olga Amaral et.al. No, LP/81/III/97/PMT.
346. CAVR interview with Thomas A. Correia, Dili, 29 May 2004; CAVR interview with Celina Pires da Costa, Dili, 12 March 2004; HRVD Statement 6963.
347. Dili District Court, Decision in the case of Olga Amaral et al, 20 September 1997, Case File No. 70/PID.B/1997/PN.DIL; CAVR interview with Thomas A. Correia, Dili, 29 May 2004; HRVD Statement 6964.
348. HRVD Statement 0106.
349. CAVR interview with Celina P. da Costa, Dili, 12 May 2004.
350. HRVD Statement 3761.
351. Warrant of Arrest of Olga Amaral, 23 March 1997, Case File of Olga Amaral et.al. No, LP/81/III/97/PMT.
352. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.
353. Ibid
354. Ibid
355. Ibid
356. CAVR interview with Celina Pires da Costa, Dili, 12 May 2004.
357. HRVD Statement 6963.
358. Ibid
359. CAVR interview with Thomas A. Correia, Dili, 29 May 2004.
360. Ibid
361. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004
362. Ibid
363. CAVR interview with Thomas A. Correia, Dili, 29 May 2004; HRVD Statement no. 0555; HRVD Statement no. 6963.
364. CAVR interview with Celina Pires da Costa, Dili, 12 March 2004
365. CAVR interview with Thomas A. Correia, Dili, 29 May 2004.
366. Ibid
367. Record of Interrogation of Olga Amaral, 23 March 1997, and Record of Interrogation of Celina P. da Costa, 23 March 1997 both in Police File No. LP/81/III/97/PMT.
368. CAVR interview with Thomas A. Correia, Dili, 29 May 2004.
369. CAVR interview with Celina P. da Costa, Dili, 12 March 2004
370. CAVR interview with Aniceto Guterres Lopes, Dili, 27 September 2004.
371. CAVR interview with Thomas Correia, Dili, 29 May 2004.
372. CAVR interview with Aniceto Guterres Lopes, Dili, 9 July 2004.
373. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.
374. CAVR interview with Celina Pires da Costa, Dili, 12 May 2004.
375. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 1997.
376. CAVR interview with Thomas A. Correia, Dili, 8 September 2004.
377. Ibid
378. Dili District Court, Decision in the case of Olga Amaral et al, 20 September 1997, pp. 12-13, in Case File No. 70/PID.B/1997/PN.DIL.
379. Ibid.
380. Ibid.
381. Amnesty International, East Timor: The Hotel Mahkota Demonstration Trial, June 1997.
382. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.
383. Record of Interrogation, witness Suhaedar, 29 March 1997, pp. 1-2, in police file of Olga Amaral et.al. Polce File No. LP/81/III/97/PMT

384. Dili District Police, Record of interrogation, Soliquin, 29 March 1997, p. 2, in Case File of Olga Amaral et.al., No. LP/81/III/97/PMT
385. Dili District Police, Records of Interrogation of: Joanico da Costa, Johanes Dima, Muhamad Saleh, I Ketut Suteja, Subiyanto, Slamet, I Ketut Sudarma Wiasa, Deda Kuswandi, Ramlin, I Gede Redama, Joko Sucipto A, Suradi, Suhaedar, Djoni Frans Lapaisaly and Soliqin, 24-29 March 1997, in Case File of Olga Amaral et.al., No. LP/81/III/97/PMT
386. Dili District Court, Decision in the case of Olga Amaral et al, 20 September 1997, p. 16.
387. CAVR second interview with Aniceto Guterres Lopes, 27 September 2004.
388. Dili District Court, Decision in the case of Olga Amaral et al, 20 September 1997, p. 11; See also the 16 Records of Arrest of the 16 suspects all dated 23 March 1997 in Police Case File No. LP/81/III/97/PMT.
389. Dili District Court, Decision in the case of Olga Amaral et al, 20 September 1997, p. 22-2
390. CAVR interview with Aniceto Guterres Lopes, Dili, 9 July 2004.
391. CAVR second interview with Aniceto Guterres Lopes, 27 September 2004.
392. Ibid.
393. Dili District Court, Decision in the case of Olga Amaral et al, 20 September 1997, p. 29.
394. CAVR interview with Aniceto Guterres Lopes, Dili, 9 July 2004.
395. Dili District Court, Decision in the case of Olga Amaral et al, 20 September 1997, pp. 30 – 31.
396. CAVR interview with Rui Perreira, Dili, 5 July 2004.
397. CAVR interview with Aniceto Guterres Lopes, Dili, 27 September 2004.
398. Ibid.
399. Ibid.
400. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.
401. Copy of the decision of the Court in relation to 16 defendants, 20 September 1997; sp. 32; Amnesty International, East Timor: Fear of Torture/Ill-Treatment/Possible Prisoners of Conscience, 24 March 1997
402. Copy of the court decision, quoted from the prosecutor's indictments, 20 September 1997, pp. 32-33.
403. Ibid
404. CAVR interview with Thomas A. Correia, Dili, 29 May 2004; Copy of the court decision: Olga Amaral, Celina P. da Costa, José Gabriel, Constantino G. Leite, José Sarmento Boavida, Mateus da Costa Inacio, Bendito Amaral, Crispin da Silva, Agusto Raimundo Matos, Domingos Sarmento, Rafael de Almeida, Abel Ximenes, Zito Borges, Aleixo da Silva Ximenes, Anacleto da Silva, 20 September 1997; Case file no. 70/PID.B/1997/PIN.DIL, pp. 2 and 37: names of defendants and one year imprisonment for each defendant.
405. Amnesty International, East Timor: The Hotel Mahkota Demonstration Trials, June 1997.
406. CAVR interview with Thomas A. Correia, Dili, 29 May 2004; Celina P. da Costa, 12 March 2004; Certificate of Refusal to Appeal, Document No. 70/Akta Pid/1997/PN. DIL, 20 September 1997, in Case File No. 70/PID.B/1997/PIN.DIL.
407. CAVR interview with Vasco da Gama, Dili, 18 May 2004.

Chega!

Part 7.7.

Rape, Sexual Slavery and Other Forms of Sexual Violence

Part 7.7. Rape, Sexual Slavery and Other Forms of Sexual Violence

Tables:

Graphics:

7.7. Rape, Sexual Slavery and Other Forms of Sexual Violence

Introduction

1. As required by its legal mandate (Article 3.4c), the Commission developed a gender-sensitive approach in seeking the truth about human rights violations during the political conflict from 25 April 1974 to 25 October 1999. Men and women have different social roles and status in their communities, and the Commission needed to understand how this might have affected their experience of violations and the impact these violations had on them. Although women were the victims of the same range of human rights violations as men, almost all cases of sexual violence – rape, sexual slavery and other forms of sexual violence – were committed against women.

2. The Commission found that women became the victims of specific forms of violations, which related to their low status and the sexual stereotypes imposed on them. These violations, which include rape, sexual slavery, sexual torture and harassment, can be classified as sexual violence. Although some men were victims of sexual violence, such as those who experienced sexual torture in detention, the majority of victims were women.

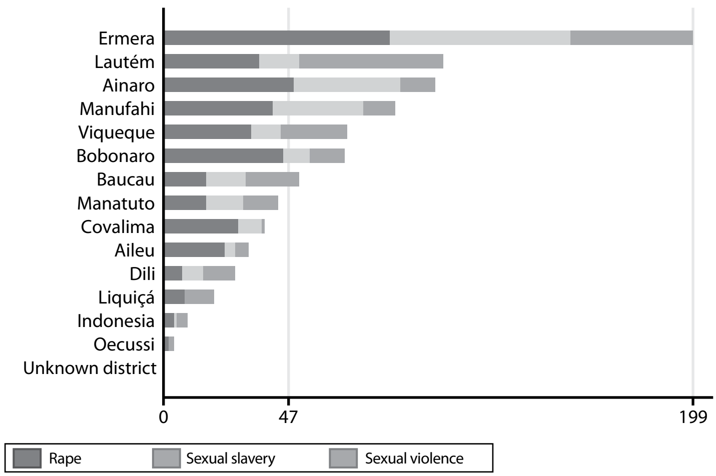
3. In Timor-Leste, as in other countries, victims of sexual violation are often unwilling to talk about their experiences. Despite the cultural and personal reasons for such decisions, the Commission received hundreds of direct testimonies of witnesses who were subjected to severe sexual violations by members of the Indonesian security forces during the period of the mandate. There were also accounts of victims being violated by members of União Democrática Timorense (UDT), Associação Popular Democrática Timorense (Apodeti), Frente Revolucionário de Timor-Leste Independente (Fretilin) and Forças Armadas de Libertação Nacional de Timor-Leste (Falintil).

4. These personal testimonies are supported by a larger body of evidence which provides the Commission with a clear and consistent picture of the nature of sexual violations that occurred during the period of political conflict. This part attempts to tell the story of these violations, and the context in which they were committed, largely through the most authentic voice, that of the victims.

5. The vast majority of these victims were young women at the time they were violated. They were middle-aged at the time of giving their evidence to the Commission. Many said that they had harboured their darkest memories in silence during the long intervening years. The process of bringing this evidence to the Commission often involved a difficult emotional process for them and also to a lesser degree for the staff of the Commission who interviewed them.

6. The women who told their stories to the Commission came from different regions and belonged to different communities, yet the details of their accounts were strikingly similar. There was no apparent reason why they would be motivated to mislead the Commission. The fact that they came from such disparate groups would have made any form of collaboration impossible.

7. From its statement-taking process, the Commission documented 853 reported counts of sexual violations. Rape was the most commonly reported sexual violation, at 46.1% (393 out of 853) of all sexual violations documented by the Commission. Rape was followed by sexual harassment and other acts of sexual violence at 27.1% (231/853) and sexual slavery at 26.8% (229/853) of all reported acts of sexual violence. Out of the total violations documented from the statement-taking process 93.3% (796/853) were attributed to Indonesian security forces and auxiliaries, 2.5% to Fretilin (21/853), 1.2% to Falintil (10/853), 0.6% to UDT forces (5/853), 0.1% to Apodeti forces (1/853), and 0.9% to others (8/853).



Number of reported acts of sexually-based violations, 1974–1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

8. Additionally, the Commission interviewed more than 200 victims and witnesses of sexual violence. These in-depth interviews and the statements reporting incidences of sexual violence depicted an overwhelming picture of impunity for sexual abuse. After careful consideration of the evidence before it, the Commission has no doubt that the patterns of widespread sexual violations that the women described represent the truth.

Count of reported sexual violations, by district

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

9. By any standards, the contents of this part portray a shameful and disgraceful account of the abuse of power. It became clear that the physically weakest and most vulnerable members of communities were targeted for reasons that have no legitimate connection to either military or political objectives.

10. The voices of the victims in this part provide a clear picture of the widespread and systematic nature in which members of the Indonesian security forces openly engaged in rape, sexual torture, sexual slavery and other forms of sexual violence throughout the entire period of the invasion and occupation. Members of Fretilin, UDT and Falintil also committed violations, although these were isolated incidents and occurred on a far smaller scale. They were neither widespread nor systematic.

11. The evidence also demonstrates how acceptance of abhorrent practices by commanders and officials encourages those under their command and control to continue and expand the use of such practices. The victims' testimonies clearly show that there was a widely accepted practice for members of the security forces to rape and sexually torture women while on official duty, in military installations and other official buildings. These practices were covered by almost total impunity.

12. Acts that commonly and openly took place in these official places included prolonged sexual torture of women, followed by individual or gang rape by members of the Indonesian security forces. This sexual torture often included mutilation of women's sexual organs, inserting of objects into vaginas, burning nipples and genitals with cigarettes, use of electric shocks applied to the genitals, breasts and mouths, forcing detainees to engage in sexual acts, rape of pregnant women, rape of women while blindfolded with their hands and feet bound, and the use of snakes to instil terror in victims.

13. Victim testimony also demonstrates that women were often raped during military operations and that it was commonly accepted practice for military officers to force young women, by threats of direct violence to themselves, their families and their communities, to live in situations of sexual slavery. In these situations, which often continued for years, the officers raped the women under their control at will, day after day. In some cases women were "passed on" by officers to their replacements or to other officers. All of this was not only tolerated by senior officers and officials, but even encouraged. Commanders and officials also participated.

14. Despite the heavy cultural taboos and personal difficulties, a number of women gave detailed accounts of their suffering at public hearings, which were broadcast live by national radio and television services. The Commission recognises the extraordinary courage of these women and all of the victims who provided statements and agreed to be interviewed. It applauds their determination that the story of their abuse should be known, no matter what the personal cost. It also draws the inescapable conclusion that the hundreds of women who gave direct evidence represent only a portion of the total number of victims who did not give statements, because of social or personal pressures or an inability to talk about their experiences due to on-going trauma connected to the violations.

15. Given the prevalence of rape as a form of sexual abuse from 1974 to 1999, the first section of this part is specifically devoted to a discussion of the testimonies related to that crime. It is also important however to understand that there were forms of sexual abuse that involved rape along with other forms of exploitation and violence, where the victim was forced into an on-going relationship with the perpetrator over extended periods of time. To understand this form of violence, the second section of the part concentrates on forms of sexual slavery. This will be followed by a discussion of other forms of sexual abuse that may have occurred in isolation or alongside rape and sexual slavery. The part then considers the long-term impact of sexual violence upon victims and concludes with a summary of the Commission's findings on sexual violence.

Definition and methodology

16. The Commission has employed a working definition of sexual violence as "any violence, physical or psychological, carried out through sexual means or by targeting sexuality."[1] This definition of sexual violence includes rape, sexual slavery and other forms of sexual violence such as sexual torture, public sexual humiliation and sexual harassment.

17. Rape and other serious sexual assaults that occurred during the 25-year mandate of the Commission violated both the international law and domestic law applicable at the time of the offences.

18. These acts were prohibited by the domestic legislation of both of the regimes that ruled in Timor-Leste during the years 1974-99. The Portuguese Penal Code and the Indonesian Penal Code (Kitab Undang-undang Hukum Pidana, KUHP) both prohibited rape. The KUHP also criminalised making someone "tolerate obscene acts". Rape or other serious sexual assaults were prohibited by the provisions of international human rights law that safeguard each person's fundamental right to physical integrity and protection against torture or cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment.

19. In armed conflict, protection from rape and sexual violence is more precisely regulated. The International Law of Armed Conflict specifically prohibits rape and contains general prohibitions against maltreatment, including provisions that refer to "honour".* Sexual violence of sufficient severity, such as rape, sexual torture and sexual enslavement, may amount to crimes against humanity if committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population.

20. The Commission developed a number of methods to try to overcome the cultural barrier that makes it difficult for women to speak about the human rights violations they experienced. These included gender-balance in the recruitment of statement-takers and victim support staff for each district team; the involvement of women in community-based group discussions on the collective experience of human rights violations; the implementation of a special six-month research project on the violation of women's human rights in cooperation with an East Timorese women's non-government organisation (NGO); a public hearing on women and conflict that included a testimony and submission from women's NGOs; the inclusion of women survivors to testify in other thematic public hearings; a household survey which included separate interviews with adult women to question them about their experiences of human rights violations; and healing workshops conducted in small groups, including one workshop only for women survivors, with the assistance of an East Timorese women's NGO.

21. The Commission collected 1,642 from a total of 7,669 statements from women who were witnesses or victims of human rights violations. This is 21.4% of all statements gathered during the 18 months of operations. Additionally, 260 statements regarding violations reported by women were received as a submission from a women's NGO. A total of 3,482 men and 1,384 women were involved in village-level participatory discussions on human rights violations held in 284 villages in more than 60 sub-districts. Sessions held specifically for women were conducted in 22 of these villages. The Commission's research team conducted more than 200 interviews, mostly with women victims of human rights violations.

22. The Commission's National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, 28-29 April 2003, provided an opportunity for 14 women survivors of violations to tell their stories. Also during this hearing, four expert witnesses provided background information on these violations. A total of 18 women gave testimonies in other thematic public hearings. In its survey on mortality and human rights violations of 1,322 randomly selected households, the Commission interviewed at least one adult woman in each family on her experience of human rights violations, including questions related to possible sexual violations. In total, 1,718 women were interviewed as part of this survey.*

* See Article 46 of the Regulations Annexed to Hague Convention IV to protect "family honour and rights". Sexual violence constitutes a violation of personal dignity under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions. See also Furundzija Trial Judgment, paragraph 137 which traces the evolution of international law to include the prohibition of rape and serious sexual assaults in armed conflict with reference to the Tokyo International Military Tribunal and the prohibition of "outrages upon personal dignity" as stated in customary international law.

23. This part gives priority to many previously unknown cases rather than well-known cases. Although most cases of sexual violence towards minors (aged 17 years and under) will be found in the children's part, several cases have also been included here.

Culture of silence

24. "It is a secret between me and God. There is no need to dig any deeper."[2] These are the words of a woman who was detained and tortured in Hotel Flamboyan, Baucau, when asked whether she experienced rape.

25. Many East Timorese women find it difficult to reveal that they were victims of violence, especially sexual violence. In a culture that values a woman's virginity above all, women who have experienced sexual violence, rape and particularly sexual slavery, are vulnerable to discrimination and isolation. Society tends to blame women for the sexual violence they experienced, to see them as "used goods" and stigmatise their children. There is very little social compensation to motivate women who experienced sexual violence to reveal it to others.

26. Some women talked to the Commission of their difficulties in admitting their experiences of rape to their husbands for fear of being rejected. A husband might abandon his wife if she admits to having been raped. A girl might not find a man willing to marry her. A woman raped by the military might become "fair game" for sexual abuse by other men because she has already been dishonoured.

27. Many of the accounts in this part express the shame and humiliation these women experienced once they were known as "military wives" or feto nona.† In some cases, even children born from situations of rape and sexual slavery and then abandoned by their fathers were ostracised by their community.

28. Perpetrators took advantage of the stigma of rape as they often relied on the victim's sense of shame to protect their identity as perpetrators. Even in cases where the victim had the courage to speak up, there was usually no punishment for the offender/s. These factors reinforce the culture of silence.

29. The Commission recognises that cases of both sexual and non-sexual violence experienced by women were under-reported. Because of the social and cultural stigma attached to sexual violence, individuals, family and community members were often reluctant to speak about it in a public forum.‡

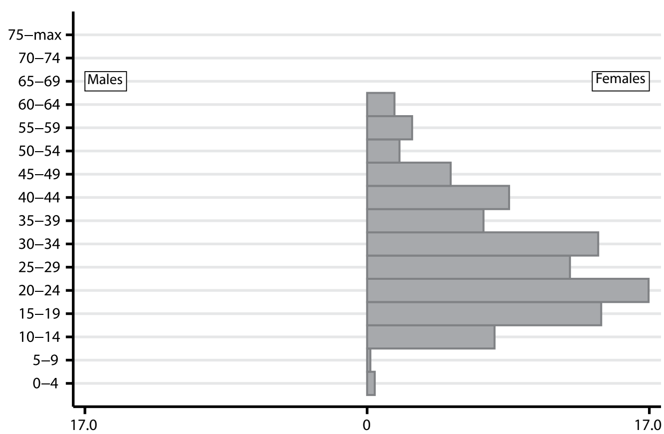
* All of these sources were drawn on for a discussion of findings in this part. However, the statistical analysis in this part, including graphs, includes only the 1,642 official statements and not the data from community profiles, the mortality survey or the in-depth interviews of the research team.

† Feto nona is a hybrid euphemism unique to Timor-Leste: feto is Tetum for woman and nona is Indonesian for a young, unmarried woman. For an East Timorese woman to become an Indonesian "nona" points to the identity of the perpetrator.

‡ For more detailed information regarding the problem of under-reporting, see Vol. I, Part 6: Profile of Human Rights Violations.

30. The Commission further recognises the extraordinary courage shown by the women who voluntarily came forward to tell their stories of sexual violence by offering their statements and by testifying in public hearings.*

Rape



31. In accordance with recent international jurisprudence, the Commission adopted a definition of rape as a physical invasion of a sexual nature, committed on a person under circumstances that are coercive.[3] The elements of rape according to this definition are:

> [T]he sexual penetration, however slight: (a) of the vagina or anus of the victim by the penis of the perpetrator or any other object used by the perpetrator; or (b) of the mouth of the victim by the penis of the perpetrator; by coercion or force or threat of force against the victim or a third person.[4]

32. Rape arises where sexual penetration occurs without the consent of the victim. Such consent must be given voluntarily, as a result of the victim's free will, and is assessed in the context of the surrounding circumstances.[5] In situations in which the perpetrator uses threats, force or captivity a victim is unable to give consent, according to international law. The manifestly coercive circumstances that exist in all armed conflict situations establish a presumption of non-consent.†

33. The above definition of rape applies to both male and female victims. However, the Commission received only three reports of the rape of males. As shown in the following graph, the vast majority of victims were females, particularly those aged 15-24.

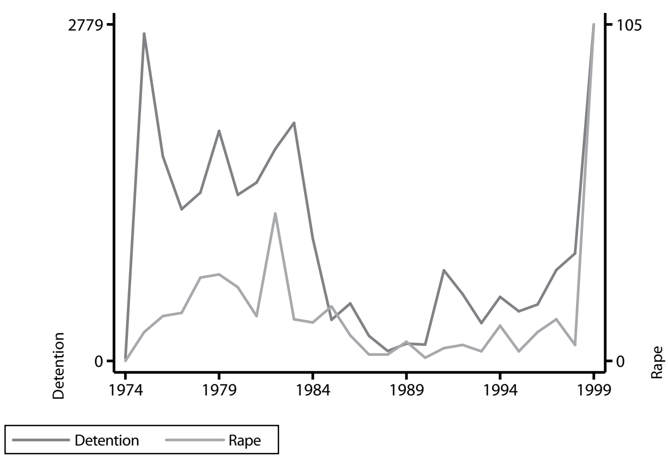
Number of reported acts of rape, by age and sex, 1974–1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR
Note: 34.9% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

* The Commission has created false initials to protect the identity of victims of sexual violence as well as those individuals who are closely linked to them in the accounts.

† In this regard the Commission relies on the principles reflected in the International Criminal Tribunal on the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY) Rules of Evidence, Rule 96.

34. Data gathered through statements, interviews and submissions reveal clear patterns of consistent and widespread rape. Rape occurred every year of the Indonesian occupation (1975–1999) and covered all 13 districts. The Commission also received reports of East Timorese who had been raped in West Timor. Districts with high numbers of rapes also tended to have relatively high numbers of sexual slavery and other forms of sexual violence.



35. Like torture, rape is a violation of personal dignity that was used to intimidate, degrade, humiliate, discriminate against, punish or control the victim. In certain circumstances rape amounted to torture, as when, for example, rape was used to obtain information or to extract a confession from the victim. Another strategy was to inculcate fear in other prisoners who witnessed or heard the victim being tortured. This confirmed and reinforced the perpetrator's position of unregulated power and the victim's helplessness.

36. The data collected by the Commission indicates that there was a consistent pattern of torture and rape of women in detention throughout the period of the conflict. The numbers of women arbitrarily detained varied at times, but the practice of torturing a proportion of those detained remained consistent. This clearly shows that the torture of detained women was not random.

37. Rape was also a form of proxy violence. In other words, the rape victim was a substitute when the main target of violence could not be captured. In many cases members of the security forces raped the wife of a pro-independence figure whom they were unable to detain. The Commission received evidence of similar proxy violence conducted by parties to the inter-party conflict, although on a much smaller scale than that perpetrated by the Indonesian forces.

38. The graph below compares cases of arbitrary detention and rape, showing that these two violations also tend to increase and decrease together over time.

Violations over time, 1974-1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

39. For analytical purposes this section describes cases of single and multiple rape, including repeated rape in detention, where the perpetrator did not create a condition of ownership.

Rape in the context of inter-party conflict (1975)

40. The Commission received seven statements describing acts of rape in the context of inter-party conflict in 1975, perpetrated by armed members of parties to the conflict. The Commission recognises that this result may reflect the reality that rape simply did not occur in large numbers during this period. However, the small number of incidents reported might also be due to other factors, such as the long period of time since that conflict, the possibility that witnesses and victims may have died in the interim, or a reluctance to raise issues involving individuals and political parties still present in Timor-Leste.

Rape by UDT party members

41. The Commission received three statements from victims of rape by members of UDT in the context of inter-party conflict. AA, a teacher and member of the Fretilin organisation, the Popular Organisation of Timorese Women (Organização Popular da Mulher Timor, OPMT), testified at a public hearing on her capture by members of UDT on 20 August 1975 in Liquiçá:

> [T]hey captured me and took me by car to their headquarters [in the town of Maubara]. During the journey they verbally abused and hit me, they spat on my face, saying, "Fretilin is useless. They cannot even make a match, but they want independence." They tied my hands behind my back, gagged me with a piece of cloth, blindfolded me and tied my legs. Then they lifted me up and threw me inside the car, trussed like a pig. They hit me, kicked me and burned my knees and thighs with cigarette butts, then made cuts on my thighs with a razor blade.
>
> When we got to a river one of the men said to the others, "Let's rape her before we take her to the commander." They laid me down on the bank of the river and a man held me down so that I remained flat on my back, then I felt a man raping me. When they finished I was dizzy and still. Seeing me like that they slapped me. They thought I had fainted and could not feel anything, but at that time I was still conscious.[6]

Rape by members of Fretilin and Falintil

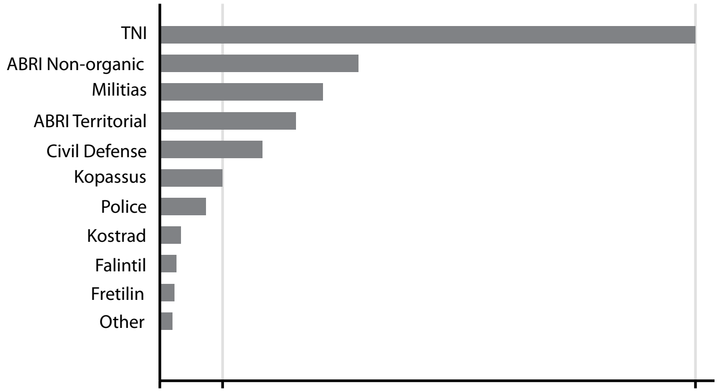
42. The Commission has evidence of three cases of rape by members of Fretilin that were committed in the context of inter-party conflict.

43. In his testimony to the commission, BA1 gave evidence of the rape of his two sisters, BA and CA from the village of Purogoa (Cailaco, Bobonaro) in 1975. An armed Fretilin party member named PS4 forced BA1 and his two sisters, at gunpoint, to go to Aileu. According to BA1:

Because at the time we were members of UDT, PS4, carrying a Mauser [rifle], threatened my two sisters, forced them to sleep with him. Because they feared for their lives, they surrendered themselves to PS4. He raped them from evening to dawn.[7]

44. After the rape, the two women were set free.

45. Rape also took place in the midst of killing those thought to be traitors. Tito Soares da Araujó told the Commission that in November 1975 Fretilin troops established a post in the aldeia of Poerema, Miligo (Cailaco, Bobonaro). According to his testimony, villagers were made to provide them with food and young girls were forced to participate in a dance party. After four days in Poerema, Fretilin troops killed three people they suspected of being spies for the Indonesian army. Later on, the Fretilin commander known as PS5 killed another man and raped his wife.[8]



46. In 1976, A1 and her family fled from their house in the village of Leber (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) when attacked by the Indonesian army and wandered from village to village in the neighbouring sub-district of Lolotoe (Bobonaro). Eventually they were caught by Indonesian soldiers and returned to their village. During this time two members of the family died due to food shortages. A1 told the Commission about her older sister, A, who fled back into the forest:

In 1976 my sister, A, ran back to the forest because we had no food. She ran into Falintil forces in the village of Opa [Lolotoe, Bobonaro]. Commander PS6 and his men said that my sister was a spy for the Indonesian forces. They captured her and raped her. After that they beat her to death somewhere in the Tapo area [Bobonaro, Bobonaro].[9]

Rape during the Indonesian occupation (1975–1999)

47. All but a few of the cases of rape documented by the Commission were committed during the Indonesian occupation of Timor-Leste. Of these, 51% (198/393) of rapes were committed during the invasion and the initial years of the occupation, and 23% occurred between 1985 and 1998. The remaining 26% of rapes were committed during the ballot-related violence in 1999. This coincides with data that shows Indonesian soldiers and paramilitary support personnel, such as members of Hansip (Pertahanan Sipil/Civil Defence, Hansip) and militia, were the perpetrators in almost all cases of reported rape. In a number of cases of individual and collective rape, perpetrators were identified by name or by the army or militia unit to which they belonged.

Count of rate by perpetrator, 1974–1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR
Note: Some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators

Rape by members of Falintil

48. The Commission received six statements relating acts of rape by members of Falintil that occurred from 1975 to 1999.[10] In the armed conflict, women were at risk of sexual violence from all sides. However, the Commission noted that the number of rapes conducted by Falintil was much smaller than those committed by Indonesian military personnel. DA1 told the Commission about the rape of his aunt, DA, in 1978 by a Falintil soldier in Fatuk Makerek (Soibada, Manatuto). PS7, an armed member of Falintil, came to DA's house to force her to have sexual intercourse with him. She relented because she was scared. Although he then promised to marry her, PS7 left the area to be based elsewhere.[11]

49. During the consolidation of Indonesia's occupation from 1985 to 1998, women continued to be in danger of rape from armed men on all sides. For instance, Falintil soldiers continued to rape women in Ermera from time to time up till 1998. EA from Railaco Kraik (Railaco, Ermera) was raped on 16 March 1995 by a Falintil soldier known to her as PS8. She believed she was a target because she had opened a kiosk in her village with capital received from an Indonesian government assistance scheme. One night when her husband was guarding the kiosk, PS8, carrying a knife, entered EA's bedroom and raped her. She reported the case to the local village official (Kepala Rukun Kampung), but her report was not heeded. She became pregnant as a result of the rape.[12]

50. Another Falintil soldier named PS9 was a repeat offender of rape. In 1997, PS9 raped FA in the aldeia of Donbati, Lisapat (Hatolia, Ermera). In a tragic statement to the Commission, FA recounted her experience as a vulnerable woman confronted by armed men from both sides of the conflict. PS9 and another Falintil soldier named PS10 raped FA when she brought food for them in the forest. One month later, she was captured and raped by an ABRI soldier from the Rajawali combat unit * for her involvement in supporting Falintil.

> On 16 February 1997, I was taking food to Falintil soldiers in Donbati, Lisapat. Two Falintil soldiers, named PS9 and PS10, put a rope around my throat, laid me down on the river bed, and held a knife to me, threatening to kill me. They took off my clothes and took turns raping me, while still choking me with the rope around my neck. They did this for four hours. Then they sent me home, threatening me not to tell anyone if I wanted to live. I went home feeling scared and with a searing headache. I could barely walk. I still took food to Falintil and on 20 March 1997, while taking food to the aldeia of Raihatu, I was captured by Rajawali troops. Their commander PS374, who led 10 soldiers, slapped me four times and pulled me into a house. In the house, holding an AR-16 gun, he stripped and raped me. After this he and his troops left.[13]

51. PS9 was also named by a woman raped in her own home. On 6 December 1998, GA harboured and fed PS9 at her home in Uruhau (Hatolia, Ermera). The following morning her parents left her at home with PS9 while they went to the market to buy food.

> Suddenly PS9 threatened me with a knife and twisted my arm behind my back. I begged for mercy three times to stop him, but he continued to pull me into the bedroom, took off all my clothes and raped me for one hour. I couldn't scream because he had shut the door and covered my mouth with his hand. I was a virgin at the time, still innocent. After he raped me, I fainted. I did not know myself until he brought a glass of water for me to drink. I saw I was covered in blood. I cried because I was still a virgin. PS9 tried to give me Rp80,000 to go to the hospital for treatment, but I refused.[14]

52. In March 1997, a member of Falintil named PS11 was staying at the house of HA in Atara (Atsabe, Ermera). Suddenly PS11 threatened her with a knife and raped her. Like EA, HA became pregnant as a result of the rape.[15]

Rape by members of the Indonesian armed forces and their auxiliaries: during the invasion and large-scale operations (1975–1984)

53. Eyewitness and victim reports during the period 1975–1984 describe several patterns of rape practices: rape when those who had fled to the mountains surrendered

* Rajawali was the code name for the Army Strategic and Reserve Command (Komando Strategi dan Cadangan Angkatan Darat, Kostrad) deployed to Timor-Leste in the mid-1990s. Prior to that it was a term that referred to Special Forces Command (Kopassus). All cases in this part in which Rajawali is mentioned as a perpetrator refer to member(s) of the Army Strategic Reserve.

and were taken captive (1975–1979); gang rape during armed attacks; organised rape in military posts or compounds, including the active involvement of local commanders; rape of female detainees; and rape perpetrated by the paramilitary and others who considered themselves protected from the law by their affiliation with Indonesian security forces.

54. Rape, along with other forms of repression, was particularly associated with periods of heightened military operations as led by ABRI/TNI.* As Indonesian military operations escalated, so did cases of rape.

A. Rape at the time of surrender (1975–1979)

55. As described in Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine, a large portion of the civilian population fled to the mountains at the time of the Indonesian invasion in 1975. Many of them eventually surrendered or were captured by Indonesian troops between 1975 and 1979. Upon surrender, many were housed in transit camps or in temporary resettlement camps close to military posts. Women thought to have strategic information about the location of Falintil troops, or who were thought to have links to those in the mountains, became targets of rape. However, there were also cases of random rape of women who had surrendered but who otherwise had no immediate connection to the Resistance.

56. IA was only 17 years old in 1975 when her family surrendered to the Indonesian forces. Her family was allowed to return to their house in the aldeia of Kolibau, Rairobo (Atabae, Bobonaro). An Indonesian soldier, identified by the victim as PS12, armed and in uniform, forced his way into IA's house to rape her. At first IA resisted, so he dragged her out of her parents' bedroom, pushed her against a wall of the house and raped her.[16]

57. JA1 of Samaleten (Railaco, Ermera) told the Commission about the rape of her sister, JA, by four Indonesian soldiers from Battalion 512. In December 1975 JA1 and her family fled to an aldeia called Fatumaenhun, returning to Samaleten in August 1976 to escape an ABRI advance. Eventually JA1, her husband and sister were captured and taken to a temporary resettlement camp in the aldeia of Aitoi, Malere (Aileu Town, Aileu):

> In April 1977, four members of Yonif [Infantry Battalion] 512 entered the barracks where my sister JA was staying and took turns raping her. Before they raped her, they tore off her clothes. At that time my sister was sick and could not stand up. I just stood there and witnessed the rape of my sister. I did nothing because I was too scared. My sister JA died two days after she was raped by the ABRI [soldiers].[17]

* The period covered by the Commission's mandate, between 25 April 1974 and 25 October 1999, includes a point of major transition within the Indonesian military when ABRI (Angkatan Bersenjata Republik Indonesia, Armed Forces of the Republic of Indonesia) was separated into two distinct institutions – one the military and one the police. On 1 April 1999, ABRI was replaced by TNI (Tentara Nasional Indonesia, the Indonesian National Army) and Polri (Polisi Republik Indonesia, Police of the Republic of Indonesia). [see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation.]

58. Civilians who surrendered were defenceless not only against Indonesian soldiers but also against East Timorese members of the army and its auxiliary groups, such as members of the Hansip. KA and her husband, KA1, told the Commission about KA's rape in 1977. KA, her husband and two children surrendered in a village called Fahinehan (Fatuberliu, Manufahi). From Fahinehan they were taken to Turiscai (Manufahi) then to the resettlement camp in Edi (Maubisse, Ainaro) where they were forced to dig up taro and sweet potatoes for a member of Hansip, PS13. After a few days PS13 summoned KA1 and asked him: "Now that your wife has become my wife, what are you going to do about it?" PS13 proceeded to beat KA1 repeatedly with a wooden club on his legs, arms and thighs for about one hour until he was covered in blood. KA1 managed to run away to Dili after being beaten. KA also testified about the attempted rape and murder of a woman named B by PS13 who then, in turn, raped KA at gunpoint. The rapes continued for one month.[18]

59. Rape took place during interrogation or when women were forced to join in military operations to find the enemy. LA spoke to the Commission about her rape after she surrendered in Uma Metan (Alas, Manufahi) in 1978. LA and two friends, MA and LA1, were first taken to Betano (Same, Manufahi) by four members of the Hansip – PS14, PS15, PS16 and PS17 – and then handed over to Commander PS20 and two of his soldiers, PS18 and PS19 [Indonesian], at the Battalion 327 Yonif post in Fatukuak, a location in the village of Fatukahi (Fatuberliu, Manufahi). LA and the two other women were interrogated at the post for two weeks. At one point the three of them were tied together and made to stand in the sun. LA1 was sent home with Hansip member PS17 because she was sick, but LA and MA were forced to participate in a military operation in the mountains to find family members. At a place called Wekhau, both women were raped by PS18 and PS19. They were then forced to participate in the search operation for three days and three nights.[19]

60. Sometimes a woman was raped after she was released from detention by men able to take advantage of the situation, as reported to the Commission by NA. When NA surrendered in Dili in 1978, the village head, PS21, took her to the Nanggala* post in Colmera (Dili) because her two brothers were still in the forest. She was detained there for eight months. Days after her release, two men who knew her from her time in detention – PS22, an East Timorese ABRI interpreter, and PS23, who worked as an informer – waylaid NA in her garden. When she resisted she was slapped, held by the throat and finally raped by PS22 in the garden.[20]

61. Women clearly identified as members or supporters of Falintil were also targets of sexual violence. OA was detained, tortured and subjected to repeated rape because she was suspected of providing food to Falintil. In her testimony to the Commission, she describes how she and others surrendered in a place named Aifu (Ermera, Ermera) to members of Battalion 721 in April 1976. At that time OA and six friends were taken to the Ermera Kodim. Accused of providing food to Falintil, the seven women were tortured, stripped naked, beaten, kicked and burned with cigarettes all over their bodies. Afterwards OA and two of her friends were held in a dark cell and repeatedly raped for a week. Eventually they were released from the dark cell and made to work in the Kodim yard. Two weeks later they were released.[21]

* Nanggala was the code name for a Special Warfare Command (Kopassandha) unit deployed in Timor-Leste for combat operations from about October 1975 to April 1983. Commission research suggests that three companies were sent to Timor-Leste for a period of six months before they returned to their respective bases [see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation].

B. Gang rape as part of military attacks

62. Rapes occurred not only during the time of surrender but also during military attacks. Several reported cases of gang rape, where two or more perpetrators raped a single victim at the same time and place, took place during or immediately after a military attack.

63. PA testified to the Commission about how ten Indonesian soldiers ambushed her family in Lauana (Letefoho, Ermera) in 1976. The soldiers abducted her sister, C, and took her to an area called Katrai Leten (Letefoho, Ermera). There, 10 ABRI soldiers raped her in turns. PA was scared but managed to run back into the forest, leaving behind her mother and sister. Two years later she too was captured and forced into a situation of sexual slavery by an Indonesian soldier, as described in the Sexual Slavery section of this part.[22]

64. QA was not raped on the battlefield, but at a military post after an attack. In 1978, she and a group of villagers were foraging for food near Uatolari Town (Uatolari, Viqueque) where she lived. Suddenly Battalion (Yonif) 732 and Hansip members attacked them. Three villagers were killed during this attack. QA and 11 women were taken to the Battalion 732 post where QA was raped. She told the Commission:

> In 1978 two Hansip named PS24 and PS25 and soldiers from Yonif 732 captured me and 11 other women in a place called Bubulita. They took us to the military post where they interrogated us. While the interrogation was underway, PS24 and PS25 ordered me to enter the 732 commander's place. They said I was to be interrogated, but that was a lie. They took me there to rape me. The commander raped me for 24 hours. They took turns raping me, all 15 of them. I had to endure this to make sure that they did not kill the 11 women who were captured with me.[23]

65. RA and her friend were gang-raped by members of Airborne Battalion 100 (Batalion Infantri Lintas Udara, Yonif Linud) on duty in Leulobo, a place in the village of Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) in 1977. The repeated rapes had serious repercussions on their health and led to sustained bleeding over the following weeks.[24]

66. SA1 told the Commission about an attack on 24 December 1979 by Indonesian soldiers in a place called Kiarbokmauk (Alas, Manufahi) when she and her cousin, SA, were bringing food and medicine to Falintil. Indonesian soldiers repeatedly raped SA. Afterwards she was unable to walk and had to be carried home by horseback.[25]

67. TA was a well-known Fretilin figure and friends with Falintil commander, TA1. In 1979, she and TA1 together with two Falintil guards TA2 and TA3 were attacked by

ABRI. TA1 was fatally shot, but TA and the two men guarding her managed to escape. Later Hansip and ABRI forces in Alas (Manufahi) captured her. The soldiers cut off the ears of her two Falintil guards, TA2 and TA3. TA was held at gunpoint and raped for two nights.[26]

C. Rape at military installations

68. Rapes were committed not only by soldiers during battle, but also took place at military installations. The Commission has documented cases where military personnel summoned women for the purpose of rape. In some cases, local commanders not only failed to prevent rapes or to punish the perpetrators, but also were themselves the perpetrators of the crime.

69. UA3 told the Commission about the detention of her husband and father, UA2 and UA4 in the aldeia of Maulakoulo, Humboe (Ermera, Ermera) by Infantry Battalion 726 soldiers in February 1976. After their capture, UA2 and UA4 were detained and tortured at Kodim in Ermera. In August that year, the father and sister of her husband, UA1 and UA, were also summoned to the district military headquarters. UA was forcibly taken to a room and raped by the Head of Intelligence, Section 1 (Kepala Seksi I Intelijen, Kasi I Intel) known as PS26. Not yet satisfied, he then instructed a member of the Hansip to arrest UA's sister, VA. Forcibly taken to the Ermera Kodim, VA was then moved to a house of a local teacher where she was raped by PS26. Only after the two incidents of rape were UA, VA and the two detainees – UA4 and UA1 – released. PS26 took UA2 to become an Operations Support Worker (Tenaga Bantuan Operasi, TBO).[27]

70. In her testimony, WA, from the village of Afaloicai (Uatolari, Viqueque) was detained, tortured and repeatedly raped following her surrender in Uatolari in April 1979:

> PS27 [an East Timorese member of the Partisans] came to my house to tell me that the soldiers wanted me to go to the Koramil [Sub-district command post] and that I would have to hurry. I was scared so I just followed him to the Koramil. I took my youngest child who was just one and a half years old and left the older child with an aunt. When I arrived PS27 left me waiting in a room and went outside. Suddenly a soldier entered and asked me to have sexual intercourse with him. I refused. He became angry, grabbed the child from me and put him on the ground. Then he raped me in front of my child who was crying and screaming because he was scared.[28]

Rape at the Uatolari Koramil (Sub-district Military Command Post) 1979–1981

WA's rape at the Uatolari Sub-district Military Command Post (Komando Rayon Militer, Koramil) was not an isolated case. On the contrary, the Commission has gathered evidence that shows a high incidence of rape at the Koramil in Uatolari, Viqueque. XA, YA (see Sexual Violence section in Vol. III, Part 7.8: The Rights of the Child) and ZA gave mutually supporting testimonies about their rape during detention at the Uatolari Koramil from 1979 to 1981 that involved at least nine offenders.

- PS28: member of Hansip and ABRI intelligence; PS29, now dead
- PS30: East Timorese member of the district parliament (DPRD II)
- PS31: village head of Babulu Village
- PS379: East Timorese First Corporal, police
- PS32, PS33, PS34, PS35: members of Hansip.

Around 1979, XA came down from the mountains to Uatolari Town where she was caught by PS30 and a member of ABRI whose name is not known. She was tortured for refusing to provide information on Falintil's whereabouts in the forest. She was stripped naked, burned with cigarettes, poked in the vagina with a wooden stick, beaten, punched and kicked. PS30 then took XA and eight other people, including XA1, XA2, XA3, ZA and YA, to a house the sub-district command soldiers used for detention. There, two Hansip members, PS36 and PS33, tortured all detainees and raped XA in front of the other detainees. The following day, three Hansip members, PS37, PS31 and PS38 came to the detention site. They stripped XA naked and beat, kicked and punched her until she bled. Then the three took turns raping her again in front of the other detainees. XA was detained for 16 days and throughout that period the five Hansip members took turns raping her until her genitals were injured and swollen and she could no longer walk. When the offenders had enough, they forced male detainees to rape XA and her friends. When XA was released, she could not walk because her hip had been broken, so a soldier carried her back to her house. When she arrived home, her family treated her with traditional medicine. From then on XA was always closely monitored by ABRI intelligence and eventually she fled to Dili.[29]

In 1979, YA was arrested with her husband, XA2, and taken to the Uatolari Koramil. On arrival, members of Hansip took off her clothes, and then threw her on the ground. A member of ABRI urinated on her clothes and Hansip members took turns raping YA in front of her husband. Those who raped her included Hansip members PS39, PS32, PS33 and PS34. During her detention at the Uatolari Koramil, members of the Hansip would come and take her every night to rape and threaten her. Afterwards they returned her to the jail at the Koramil.[30]

ZA, whose husband was a member of Falintil fighting in the forest, was arrested in the middle of the night sometime in November 1979 by a group of soldiers. She was forced to take her seven-year-old child with her to the Koramil.

When I arrived at night they gathered us women into a room. Not long afterwards a Hansip member named PS35 came to open the door for the soldiers to take the women to be raped. Every night the soldiers came to take the women. They also came for me but I tricked them by chewing betel nut and smearing the red juice on my inner thighs so that when they came and took off my sarong and looked at my genitals, they thought I was menstruating, but I was not. One night a Hansip member, PS41, forcibly took me to an interrogation room. He hit me, kicked me and burned my body with cigarette butts. Then he tore off my clothes and raped me. At that time my seven-year-old child was left inside the jail.[31]

According to the testimonies of these three women, many other women detained at the Uatolari Koramil had similar experiences of sexual violence, but since they came from other villages their names are unknown. Although AB was arrested several years after XA, YA and ZA, her testimony corroborates evidence about the pattern of sexual violence at the Uatolari Koramil. In 1981, AB was taken from her home by four Hansip members known to her as PS41, PS42, PS43, PS44.[32] They took her to the Uatolari Koramil where she was held for one week and raped in turns by four Indonesian soldiers whose names she did not know. Eventually she was released after being detained for two months in Viqueque.

71. BB's experience was similar to WA's. BB and her daughter-in-law, CB, were arrested in 1981 and detained at an ABRI post in Rotutu (Same, Manufahi) because their husbands were members of Falintil and still in the forest.

They took us both to the ABRI post. Then a commander PS393 raped me and one of his subordinates raped my daughter-in-law who was pregnant at the time. They put us in together with two other women from Hato Udo. They detained my daughter-in-law because her husband was still in the forest…we were continually raped for seven months although I was already old and my daughter-in-law was pregnant. Then we were transferred to jail at Kodim [District Military Command headquarters] 1634 in Manufahi for seven months and there we were not raped again. I was sent to Ataúro with my children, aged four and six. We remained in Ataúro for four years, seven months and seven days.[33]

72. In 1981 in Tutuala (Tutuala, Lautém), a man identified as Koramil commander PS45 raped a woman named DB. On 17 July 1981, during the commemoration of "Integration Day" in Tutuala, DB had to cook with members of the government women's organisation, Guidance for Family Welfare (Pembinaan Kesejahteraan Keluarga, PKK). According to the testimony of her brother, DB1, while DB was busy cooking, Koramil Commander PS45 called her out of the kitchen but "because she did not want to go, he dragged [her] into a room and raped her…her clothes were all torn."[34]

73. EB was the only woman out of eight people captured in 1979 in Seloi Malere (Aileu, Aileu) by an ABRI platoon from the Remexio (Aileu) Koramil. All eight were taken to the Aileu Kodim (District Military Command headquarters), then moved to the Remexio Koramil about a week later. From there they were forced to search for EB1, EB's husband, who had fled into the forest when the others were captured. Eventually, all the men were released but EB continued to be held at the Aileu Kodim. One day she was moved from the Kodim in Aileu and taken to the Aileu base-camp military housing by a second lieutenant. She was raped repeatedly for two days before being returned to Remexio.[35]

74. CB told the Commission about her abduction, detention, rape and forced involvement in ABRI search operations for Fretilin. In 1979, CB was caught in Manulesi by a Hansip member and the head of Rotutu Village (Same, Manufahi) PS237. CB was forcibly taken to the Same Kodim where she told the Commission: "I was repeatedly raped for one month". CB was forced to go into the forest to look for her husband. When she was unsuccessful she was beaten with the butt of a weapon. An Indonesian Sergeant-Major known as PS47 decided to have sexual intercourse with CB. He said if she refused it meant she "still loved her husband who was in the forest". The rapes continued for one month. CB was transferred to Aissirimou (Aileu Town, Aileu) where she was forced to work in the rice fields for six months with another group of people. Eventually the International Committee of the Red Cross intervened and she was able to return to her village.[36]

75. FB1 told about the violations that members of her family experienced in 1981 at the Kodim in Manatuto. FB1 and four members of her family were arrested by ABRI soldiers and taken to the Territorial Combat Battalion (Batalion Tempur Teritorial, BTT) post in Mota Hasoru-Malu, Manatuto. There they were detained and interrogated about Falintil activities. They were then moved to the post in Raemean and finally taken in an ABRI vehicle to the Kodim in Manatuto. At the Kodim the male detainees were tortured while FB's sister was raped every night by PS48, an ABRI soldier.[37]

Rape of male detainees

In accordance with international tribunal case law, men can also experience rape. Some male detainees were raped during the Indonesian occupation. Usually, male rapes took place in the context of torture.

Dulce Vitor, a detainee in the military police compound in Baucau in 1978, gave evidence of the rape of male detainees:

> When I was detained at the PM [Polisi Militer, Military Police] office in Baucau, sometime around November-December 1978, I saw male detainees who were sexually harassed and raped. Male detainees were tied and stripped, then ABRI soldiers and partisans stuck pieces of wood into their anuses. They screamed because they couldn't stand the pain, but the soldiers ignored them. The more they screamed the harder and faster the soldiers thrust the wood in and out of their anuses. The women detainees were forced out of their cells to watch the rape of the men. Women detainees were also forced by ABRI to hold and massage the sexual organs of male detainees. I know this happened in other detention sites in Baucau, yet what I witnessed with my own eyes happened to five men, whose names I don't know, at the Baucau PM office.[38]

In 1984, two brothers, GB and HB, were captured by ABRI soldiers from their village in Lore I, (Lospalos, Lautém) and taken to ABRI Command Post 4 in Maluro, Lore I (Lospalos, Lautém). GB, the younger brother, was detained and beaten first. He was forced to confess that his brother, HB, was providing food for Falintil. HB was detained and tortured. He was beaten and made to eat chilli, salt, and human faeces. He told the Commission about the torture and rape he experienced:

> Several days later they separated my brother, GB, from me and the other detainees. He was taken to a forest close to the command post in Maluro. When GB came back he told me that an Indonesian soldier PS49 had [made him perform] oral sex with him, till he almost vomited. Suddenly PS49 appeared and asked me directly: "Do you want to live or die?" I replied that I wanted to live, so PS49 took me to an old abandoned garden and made me sit on a heap of stones and made me perform oral sex on him. He made me swallow his sperm. [On another occasion] I was still feeling dazed from torture till I [almost] passed out. An East Timorese ABRI commander [sic, rank unclear] named PS50 stuck his penis in my mouth, pissed in my mouth and made me swallow his urine. I was scared so I swallowed.[39]

76. IB1 gave the Commission a statement about his sister, IB, who was gang-raped by ABRI soldiers at the Ainaro Kodim in 1981. Previously that same year, six soldiers went to IB's house in the aldeia of Poelau, Soro (Ainaro, Ainaro). They arrested her and her brother IB2 and took them to Kodim in Ainaro. On arrival, five other women were already there. They were all beaten and burned with cigarette butts by their interrogators. According to her brother's testimony, several ABRI soldiers raped IB because her husband was an active member of Falintil.[40]

77. Information gathered by the Commission indicates that a high incidence of rape occurred along with a rise in mass detentions from 1982 to 1984. For example, detentions related to the Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) and Kraras, Bibileo (Viqueque, Viqueque) incidents. A number of these rape cases took place in military headquarters or posts.

78. JB1 related to the Commission the violations experienced by her and her family in the aftermath of the Mau Chiga uprising. Her daughter JB was captured on 5 September 1982 from their home in Dare (Hato Builico, Ainaro) by ABRI soldiers and three members of Hansip – PS51, PS52, PS53 – and was taken to the Kodim in Ainaro. Her husband, JB2, who was arrested on 30 August 1982, and her son, JB3, arrested on 3 September 1982, were also taken to the Ainaro Kodim where they were tortured. At the Kodim in Ainaro, JB was beaten, kicked, electrocuted, burned with cigarettes on her legs and finally raped by the Kodim commander known as PS394. She was also raped by a Hansip named PS53 and an ABRI soldier whose name she didn't know. Later the same day she was arrested, JB and her brother were moved to Balide Prison in Dili (their father was already there). Two days later she, her father, brother and other detainees were put on a boat to the island of Ataúro.[41]

79. In the Mau Chiga incident, not only Hansip and low-ranking soldiers raped women, but also military commanders as evident in the testimony of KB. On 20 August 1982, KB, KB's sister, LB, and five others were detained in the aldeia of Surhati, Mau Chiga (Hatu Builico, Ainaro) by Hansip members PS54, PS55, PS56, PS57 and PS58. They were taken to the Koramil in Dare where they were beaten with rifle butts, belts and stabbed all over their bodies with sharp rocks until they bled. On the day following their release, the same Hansip members assaulted KB at her home. They beat her with a crowbar and clubs, cut her hand with a knife and then jabbed her breasts with the muzzle of a rifle. Two days later, a high-ranking Indonesian commander from the Ainaro Kodim known as PS59 forcibly transported the seven people by minibus to the Kodim in Ainaro. At the Kodim they were detained in the same cell and PS395 participated in electrocuting their cheeks and genitals. PS59 raped KB, who was two months pregnant at the time, and her sister LB in their cell at the Ainaro Kodim.[42]

80. During this same year, Hansip members PS54 and PS380 detained MB and NB in Surhati Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) because their husbands were suspected of being Falintil commanders involved in the Mau Chiga uprising. The two women were taken to Koramil in Dare where the Koramil commander and PS54 raped MB all night long. She was released the following day, but two days after she got home PS60, a member of Hansip, went to MB's house. He threatened her with a weapon and raped her. The rapes continued for one month.[43]

81. OB and PB of Lifau (Laleia, Manatuto) were detained and raped in the Kodim in 1982. As her brother was a Falintil fighter, OB, along with her friend PB, were taken by two members of Hansip named PS62 and PS63, to the Kodim in Manatuto. There they were interrogated by the Kodim chief-of-staff (Kepala Staf Kodim, Kasdim) whose name is not known. After two days in detention, OB was taken into a room and raped by the chief-of-staff. At first OB resisted and so was beaten. In the end she "could do nothing but cry". One week later the two women were released. Not long after that, OB was almost raped by a Hansip named PS64, who accosted her with a gun when she was on the way to work in the fields. Because a TBO unexpectedly walked by, OB managed to escape. However, her mother and sister, OB1 and OB2, were detained and exiled to Ataúro soon after this.[44]

82. As her husband was a Hansip member who defected and fled to the forest to join Falintil, QB was arrested by two TBOs in March 1984 in her village of Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém). She knew the two TBO from Infantry Battalion 641 as PS65 and PS66. She was taken to post 641 in Herana-Poros (Lautém) together with another woman. On arrival at the Koramil, QB was told to go into a room full of weapons and, in darkness, she was interrogated about her husband. A soldier named PS67 [Indonesian] "started to touch my body, kiss my lips, burn me with a cigarette…[He] hit and squeezed my swollen belly – I was pregnant at the time – to make me have a miscarriage." Then she was raped by PS67.[45]

83. RB told the Commission about her experience at this same military post, Infantry Battalion 641, in October 1984. At that time ABRI had already detained her husband in Lospalos (Lautém). RB and another woman were summoned from a list made by ABRI to the Koramil by a TBO. The commander and deputy commander of the post raped both of them. RB told the Commission:

> The ABRI did not consider the status of the women they wanted to rape – whether they were married women or still virgins. They targeted East Timorese women. I do not know why they only sought East Timorese women. Usually they instructed their TBO to collect women whose names were on a list – Who knows why? Maybe for being involved in clandestine activities or because their families ran to the forest – to be interrogated and then raped. It is as if these posts which were set up for security reasons, became in fact places where women were raped. I saw many women taken there to be raped but unfortunately I do not know all the names, I only know a few. [12 names listed.][46]

Rape of female detainees in the Flamboyan Hotel

The Flamboyan Hotel, in Bahú (Baucau Town, Baucau), was one of the most feared places of torture in the eastern district of Baucau. In addition to the Hotel there were nine other detention centres in Baucau Town, namely the Kodim and Koramil posts, Uma Lima (Five Houses), Rumah Merah (Red House), Municipal Club (Clubo Municipal), the Regimental Combat Teams (Resimen Tim Pertempuran, RTP) RTP 12, RTP 15 and RTP 18, and the District Police station (Polisi Resort, Polres). Male and female detainees were verbally abused, beaten, kicked with military boots, burned with cigarette butts, the fingers of their hands and toes were pressed under the legs of chairs and they were kept in solitary confinement for long periods of time. The sexual assault of women detainees was the main difference between men's and women's experiences in detention. When women were burned with cigarette butts, their breasts and genitals were often targeted. When they were stripped naked during interrogation, the threat of rape was an added burden to female detainees. At least 30 female detainees known to be held in Hotel Flamboyan and other detention centres in the town of Baucau from December 1975-84 were tortured. Nearly one-third of them were also raped.

For those whose loved ones were detained, lack of information about their location and condition became a daily preoccupation. SB1 was only ten years old when her sister SB, two brothers, her uncle and aunt were taken from their homes in July 1976:

> They were chained together and made to walk in a line. My cousins and I, all of us aged seven to ten, ran to follow the truck, shouting: "Where are you taking them?" After two days of looking for them at Flamboyan, a soldier told us to look for them at Rumah [Uma] Lima. When we arrived there a TBO from Baucau whispered to us that they were there. We were so relieved and immediately brought food for them. The next day they were no longer there. Only the empty food containers remained at the military post. I asked where they had been taken, but everyone just said they did not know. That day I saw many corpses being loaded onto a vehicle. They were stuffed into rice sacks, but the sacks were too short for the bodies. I saw heads jutting out, hair coming out. They threw the corpses into the vehicle like they were throwing firewood. I also heard screams of detainees being tortured. We went to Flamboyan to look for our family there. The next day, my sister was released and came home. She had changed. She was quiet and kept to herself. She told me that she and the others were interrogated, beaten and put in a room so crowded with other male and female detainees that no one could lie down to sleep. She said she was tied up, face-to-face, with another male detainee. She was also raped by an ABRI soldier. When she told me this she cried hysterically and then started laughing to herself. She was shocked and traumatised. After this, many ABRI soldiers came to our house asking her to marry them, but my parents refused. They only stopped coming after SB got married. She died a few years later, leaving behind two young boys.[47]

TB was abducted when she was two months pregnant and detained in the Flamboyan Hotel for six months. She was stripped naked, electrocuted and raped in a standing position. The torture and rape she endured were so brutal that in the end she agreed to become the "wife" of a member of Infantry Battalion 744 in order to secure her release.[48]

Sometimes detention, torture and rape of women in Flamboyan Hotel were clearly forms of proxy violence. UB1, daughter of a Baucau Fretilin leader, VB1 and VB2, daughters of another Baucau Fretilin leader, were among the first women to be detained at Flamboyan Hotel. UB1 told the Commission about the repeated rapes of UB whose husband was a Falintil Commander. UB1 took care of UB's three children, aged five, four and two years old, while she was held separately in a room on the second floor of the hotel where ABRI soldiers tortured and raped her. UB1 recalled how the women and children detained on the floor below would hear UB scream whenever she was tortured.[49]

VB1 told the Commission about her aunt who was among those tortured and raped. Her aunt never talked about it until, on her deathbed, she showed VB1 and her family the scars all over her body from the torture she experienced.[50]

According to Zeferino Armando Ximenes, in 1979 soldiers from Battalion 330 raped a woman by the name of WB in her home while her husband was in detention.[51]

Witnesses named the following ABRI units as perpetrators: Battalion 330, Battalion 745, a special forces unit known as Secret Warfare Command Force (Komando Pasukan Sandhi Yudha, Kopassandha), Nanggala (code name for a Kopassandha unit deployed in Timor-Leste from 1975-83), Umi (one of four Nanggala units deployed in Timor-Leste named for its radio call sign), Field Artillery Unit 13 (Batalion Infantri Artileri Medan, Yon Armed), Military Police (Polisi Militer, Pom), Mobile Police Brigade (Brigade Mobil, Brimob), Infantry Brigade (consisting of three battalions) and Hansip members. The units deployed in detention centres were mixed. The first ABRI commander at Flamboyan Hotel was a Kopassandha commander named Major PS68, while the troops stationed there were from Battalion 330. Additionally, members of the Military Police, the Umi team, and Hansip were also at the Flamboyan Hotel. Infantry Battalion 330 and members of the Secret Warfare Command Force were reported to have been present at Red House (Rumah Merah). Members of the Secret Warfare Command, Kodim and Koramil, and the Hansip were seen at the Municipal Club. Infantry Battalion 745 (from Lospalos) and Field Artillery Unit 13 (from Malang) were deployed at RTP-12. Only members of Field Artillery Unit 13 were deployed at RTP-15 and RTP-18 and they did not mix with other troops.

The following ABRI and police officers were identified by victims and witnesses as perpetrators of torture and rape in Baucau (those named were witnesses, not victims of sexual violence themselves):

- Major PS68, Kopassandha commander, perpetrator of four listed torture and rape victims: XB, YB, ZB and UB (named by RJ, Marcelina Guterres, Florencia Martins Freitas, Santina de Jesus Soares Li);
- Captain PS69, a subordinate of Major PS68 [Indonesian], perpetrator of one listed torture victim (named by Florencia Martins Freitas);
- Private Second Class PS70, Battalion 330 [Indonesian], perpetrator of two listed torture and rape victims: YB and D (named by RJ);
- Private Second Class PS71, Infantry Battalion 330 [Indonesian], named as perpetrator of the same two torture and rape victims: YB and D and as perpetrator of listed torture and rape victim: UB (named by RJ, named as a member of Umi by Marcelina Guterres, Florencia Martins Freitas);
- First Sergeant PS72, Battalion 330 [Indonesian], perpetrator of two listed torture and rape victims: AC and UB, and as perpetrator of two listed torture victims: DC and DS (named by Marcelina Guterres, RoRJ, Florencia Martins Freitas, Terezinha de Sa);
- Mobile Police Brigade members PS73 and PS74 [East Timorese], perpetrators of one listed torture victim who named them: VB2
- Chief Warrant Officer PS75 [Indonesian] of the Military Police, perpetrator of one listed torture victim: BR, and perpetrator of one listed rape victim: BC (named by Terezinha de Sa, Miguel António da Costa);
- First Sergeant PS76 [Indonesian] of the Military Police (now deceased), perpetrator of two listed torture victims: BR and DC, and perpetrator of one listed rape victim: CC (named by Terezinha de Sa, Miguel António da Costa);
- First Lieutenant PS77 [Indonesian] and members of Field Artillery Unit 18, perpetrators of three listed torture victims: JG, LMG, and T (named by Zeferino Armando Ximenes);
- PS78 [East Timorese], an informer and staff member of the Flamboyan Hotel (named by Florencia Martins Freitas).

The effects of torture experienced by female detainees in Baucau continued throughout their lives. RJ, Terezinha De Sa and FMDC still suffer from back problems as a result of being beaten with wooden blocks when tortured. Rosa is unable to walk normally. The deaths of at least five women – UB, AC, Ana Maria Gusmão, Mafalda Lemos Soares, and Palmira Peloi – may be related to their torture while in detention.

D. Other rapes

84. As the Indonesian military expanded its control of the territory, rape did not only happen behind military walls by Indonesian soldiers. Many East Timorese who worked with the Indonesian military, such as members of the Hansip and government officials, are also named as perpetrators of rape.

85. This increase in rapes by non-military personnel may be interpreted in different ways. It may point to the expansion of Hansip forces as well as to their increased role in aiding the military. It may also point to the impunity enjoyed by military perpetrators of rape in previous years – that the military could get away with rape may have prompted other men to do it. Testimonies of some victims of repeated rape indicate that the first offender not only enjoyed impunity, but also encouraged others to commit the same crime. The following cases show a pattern of rape where women were handed over from one perpetrator to another.

86. DC said that in 1976 she was raped by PS79, the Sub-district civilian administrator (camat) of Lequidoe (Aileu), who went to her house and threatened to kill her father and brothers if she did not comply. Because DC was a virgin, she bled when she was raped and was very sore for a week. Several months later, PS79 sent four Indonesian soldiers – PS80, PS81, PS82 and PS83 – to DC's house and they raped her. According to her testimony, this Sub-district administrator raped many others.[52]

87. EC told of her capture and rape in 1976 by Hato Builico (Ainaro) Koramil Commander PS84 (see section on Sexual Violence in Vol. III, Part 7.8: The Rights of the Child). After EC was seized by the military commander and a village head in Mulo, Hato Builico (Ainaro), PS85, she was taken to the tactical command post (Komando Taktis, Kotis) where she was interrogated by Hansip member PS86 and commander PS84. EC was then stripped naked and raped, first by the head of the village, PS85, and then by Commander PS84. Still naked following the rape, she was ordered to return to her house. She was so ashamed that she had to hide on her way home. Several days later, Hansip member PS87 came to her house. He had just returned from an operation in the forest, so he was carrying a Mauser rifle. PS87 threw down EC, stripped her naked and then called all of his Hansip friends who were with him to come look at EC. When they saw her they laughed and whooped. Then PS87 raped her. He continued coming to EC and raping her until she became pregnant and gave birth to a child. In this case the behaviour of the local Koramil commander gave the "green light" to his subordinate, a Hansip member, to imitate him in his violation of both the law and local cultural mores. The case also shows that offenders who were not legally punished for their violations could become repeat offenders (see section on Sexual Violence in Vol. III, Part 7.8: The Rights of the Child).[53]

88. After Hansip members PS88 and PS89 killed FC's husband in 1979, other Hansip repeatedly raped FC in Aiduk, Leolima (Hato Udo, Ainaro). First, an East Timorese member of the regional parliament (DPRD I) named PS90 raped her. Then PS90 brought two Indonesian members of ABRI, PS381 and PS382, from Battalion 323 and 125, to rape FC again. Later on, PS90 invited his four sons – PS91, PS92, PS93 and PS94 – to take turns raping FC.[54]

89. GC was raped by the Ainaro Koramil commander when she surrendered in Bunaria (Ainaro, Ainaro) in 1979. After she returned to her house in the village of Soro (Ainaro, Ainaro), Hansip members and the Indonesian Village Guidance Officer (Bintara Pembinaan Desa, Babinsa, a non-commissioned military position) of Soro named PS95 often went there and raped her. GC was raped at least twice by PS95 and became pregnant as a result of the rape. Due to her situation, a priest and a Catholic nun took GC to live at the church. The rapes only stopped when she moved to live and work in the church.[55]

90. HC from Guruça (Quelicai, Baucau) gave evidence to the Commission about the repeated rapes she experienced. Fearing Indonesian military attacks, HC and her adopted mother ran to the forest in 1977. In 1978, HC, along with other refugees, was captured by members of ABRI and Hansip and brought to the village of Abafala (Quelicai, Baucau). HC's mother had died in the forest and her brother was a Falintil soldier. In December 1979 two Hansip members took HC from Uaitame (Quelicai, Baucau) to the Abafala Village office, which also served as an ABRI post. On arrival at the post, Hansip PS96 pushed HC towards sleeping soldiers and members of Hansip while shouting: "This woman is a member of Fretilin. Just fuck her!" They gagged her with a hand and said: "If you resist we'll fuck you dead". HC was raped by PS96 in front of the soldiers and Hansip members at the post. She was released after the rape but the following day Hansip PS96 brought her back to the post and raped her again. The rapes continued for four nights until another Hansip member reprimanded PS96.[56]

91. In 1991, a group called Volunteers (Sukarelawan),* which included PS97, PS98, PS99 and PS100 [East Timorese], arrived at the house of IC in Cassa (Ainaro, Ainaro). They came to capture IC's husband, but because he had already fled to Dili, they took IC instead. They brought her to PS98's house and tortured her. Her hands were tied with a cable together with another woman victim whose identity she did not know. They were interrogated about Fretilin activities, especially about providing food to Fretilin. During the interrogation the Sukarelawan members held a machete to IC's chest, beat her repeatedly with a rifle butt and punched her in the face. After two days and two nights the women were finally released. However, two members of the Sukarelawan, PS99 and PS100, followed IC to her house and raped her there.[57]

92. The rape of a detainee's wife, aside from being a violation experienced by the woman herself, was an added strain on the detainee, something that could eventually break his resistance to his interrogators. JC1 told the Commission about his detention and torture as well as the rape of his wife, JC. On 4 October 1984 about 20 soldiers and 10 members of Hansip from the Dili Kodim detained JC1 and his two brothers, who were suspected of providing food to Falintil. Another five men were also detained at this time. They were interrogated and tortured at the Dili Kodim and later moved to the government's Social Political (Sospol) office in Dili. In the end, JC1 and his brothers were held in the Balide jail for three and a half years. JC1's wife told him that while he was in detention she had been raped four times by a soldier whose name she did not know.

* Sukarelawan was a pro-integration group started in Ainaro about 1991 by Cancio Lopes de Carvalho that later received support from ABRI. Members of Sukarelawan later formed the core of the Mahidi militia.

I had a jail sentence of three years and six months. I spent three months of the sentence at the [Dili] Kodim [District Military Command] and on 4 January 1985 they moved me to the Balide prison in Dili. While I was in Balide Prison, my wife visited me and told me that she had been threatened by TNI [ABRI] soldiers and had been raped four times. She didn't know their names.[58]

Rape during consolidation of the occupation (1985–1998)

93. Given the many compelling reasons why people do not speak publicly of their experiences of rape, the Commission has assumed that the under-reporting of sexual violence was relatively consistent across all periods of the conflict. This assumption has allowed the Commission to make some broad observations on the patterns of rape that occurred over the whole period of the political conflict.

94. The number of rape cases reported from the first few years of the occupation ranged between 10 and 47 per year. However, following a sharp increase in 1982 of reported rape cases (48 individual acts of rape from statements collected), there was a significant decrease in the number of cases reported – only 2 to 17 cases a year between 1985 and 1988. Two factors may have contributed to this decrease: the Indonesian military was decreasing its large-scale operations and the civilian government was increasingly in charge of day-to-day life in Timor-Leste. During this same period, victims named police officers as perpetrators of rape. This suggests an increased role of the police in maintaining security. Also during this period, victims' families began to seek legal redress for rape although, as perpetrators were seldom prosecuted to conviction, the judicial processes offered no real justice to victims. Rapes continued throughout the late 1980s and on through 1998, but at lower levels than during the first years of the occupation.

A. Rape in detention

95. Although daily life during this period became increasingly normal, the military still detained and tortured individuals suspected of supporting independence at will. Women were detained either on suspicion of being pro-independence, or because their husbands, brothers or other family members were suspected of being involved in the Resistance. Almost 10% of all women detained during this period were raped on at least one occasion during their detention; many were repeatedly raped.

96. KC1 gave evidence to the Commission about the forced recruitment and rape of his wife, KC, in 1989 in Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém). As KC1 was a Fretilin/Falintil fighter living in the bush, Halilintar paramilitary troops forced KC to join military operations for two months. During this time she was raped by the troops and became pregnant as a result. PS101, a TBO with the troops during this time, later told KC1 that on 30 September 1989 he had personally witnessed soldiers from Infantry Battalion

744, under the command of Captain PS102 [Indonesian],* stab KC in the chest with a bayonet, causing her death.[59]

97. Two sisters, LC and MC, were abducted together with their father in Ermera in 1994. 15 ABRI soldiers, only four of whom the sisters recognised, took them to the Koramil in Atsabe (Ermera). MC told the Commission:

> In 1984 [East Timorese] soldiers named PS103, PS104, PS105 and PS106, together with 11 Indonesian soldiers, detained me, my father…and my younger sister, LC, at Lasaun [Atsabe, Ermera]. They took us to the Atsabe Koramil, where they separated us. My father was in one room and my sister and I were in another. Both Timorese and Indonesian soldiers hit and kicked us. They immersed their boots in water and kicked us. They put a gun into our mouths, asking for information. They stripped my sister and me naked, blindfolded us, and put us in a tank of water from 8.00am until 12.00 midday. They did this again from midnight until 2.00am. After this they put us in a hole in the ground to kill us that night, but this did not happen and we were brought back to our place of detention. The soldiers, both Indonesian and Timorese, raped my sister in pairs. I could not keep track how many [soldiers raped her] because there were so many. This continued for four days.[60]

98. NC was detained on 24 January 1996 at the Maliana Kodim 1636. There, she was threatened with a weapon, electrocuted and left to sleep on the wet floor. Members of Joint Intelligence Unit (Satuan Gabungan Intelijen, SGI) raped NC while she was blindfolded and her hands and feet were in handcuffs. After several weeks she was released, but had to report to the Kodim every day for a year.[61]

99. On 10 February 1996, 10 East Timorese soldiers arrested OC and PC in their village of Raiheu (Cailaco, Bobonaro), and took them to the Bobonaro Koramil. They were held in separate cells in the Bobonaro Koramil where they were tortured, interrogated and suffered repeated rape:

> On 10 February 1996 at about 6.00am in the sub-village of Bada Lesumali, Raiheu [Cailaco, Bobonaro], ten Timorese soldiers carrying guns arrested me and my friend, PC. I knew the name of only one of them - PS107. At the time of our arrest we weren't tortured, but taken to the Bobonaro Koramil where we were put in separate cells. After that a soldier interrogated me about my relationship with Falintil. Because I wasn't honest, five Timorese soldiers slapped me twice and kicked me with their boots four times. They placed a chair on the toes of my left foot and then sat on the chair until my toes bled. Then I was put into a small room until the next morning.
>
> On 12 February 1996 at about 7.00pm, five Indonesian soldiers entered my cell. They threatened me, threw me on the floor, stripped me and raped me. While it was dark, the five of them took turns raping me, one after the other, for three hours. I was 20 years old when ABRI raped me. That same night, ABRI also raped my friend PC but I didn't know it at the time. PC told me afterwards.

* In this case, Halilintar in Lautém in 1989 refers to a particular group of ABRI soldiers rather than to the militia group active in Bobonaro District.

On 13 February 1996, the Bobonaro Koramil commander delivered the two of us to the Bobonaro Kodim 1637 [in Maliana] where we were handed over to the Kodim commander. Again we were separated and placed in dark cells. I was interrogated by two ABRI soldiers on duty at the Kodim. During this interrogation they took off all my clothes except my underpants, gave me electric shocks and burned my nipples with a cigarette butt. They were kissing me and flirting with me after they'd pushed me up against the wall to rape me, but it didn't happen because they saw [menstrual] blood in my underpants.

On 12 February 1998, three Rajawali soldiers came to my cell and tied my two hands together. [They took me outside], threatened me and forced me against a tree near the detention building. They lifted up my skirt and raped me in a standing position. That same day they released me and ordered me to go home.[62]

100. During this period, perpetrators of rape in detention were not only members of ABRI, but also members of the police. Although cases of rape by police were fewer compared to rape cases by ABRI, the treatment of female detainees by police was similar to the way ABRI treated women detainees, especially women suspected of involvement with pro-independence organisations.

101. In 1993, three women named QC1, QC2 and QC were returning from a meeting with members of Falintil in Atsabe (Ermera). Two East Timorese intelligence officers, PS108 and PS109, ambushed them and attempted to sexually assault them on their way home. A member of Falintil, PS325, was able to prevent the assault by stabbing PS108. The three women ran away but a week later they were picked up again and taken to the police station in Atsabe where they were tortured. An East Timorese police officer, PS110, took QC to an empty room, stripped her and raped her. QC experienced severe pain for three days. After three days they were moved to the district-level police station in Gleno (Ermera) where they were held for one week. They were then sent back to the Atsabe police station where they were held for one month. QC was just 15 years old at the time.[63]

B. Rape without legal recourse

102. Indonesian courts were functioning in Timor-Leste as early as 1977. However, by the 1990s the formal justice system was still not serving rape victims and their families who attempted to use it to obtain some form of justice. Most victims thought it useless or even dangerous to report the fact that they had been violated. Those who did seek legal redress for the violations they suffered received little help.

103. On 4 April 1992, RC of Fatuletu (Zumalai, Covalima) was raped by a member of Hansip named PS111. As described by her sister, RC1, RC's family reported the case to the Koramil commander in Zumalai, but to no avail:

> PS111 came and threatened us with a gun. He shot in the air three times. We were all scared…He came to force my younger sister RC to have sexual relations with him. Because she was afraid, he raped her. Even though PS111 was a Hansip member and a village official whom we knew was married, he wanted to force my sister to become his mistress, but because she refused he threatened her with a gun and raped her. We reported the case to the Koramil commander, but he just kept quiet. Then he told us just to settle this through 'adat' [traditional customs]. But this did not happen. PS111 just said in a threatening manner: "This is the rule of the gun. We are free to rape Fretilin supporters." My sister RC died in 1999.[64]

104. SC was raped in 1995 by a police officer known to her as PS396 in Soibada (Manatuto). The police officer entered her house in the middle of the night and fled the scene when SC's parents entered the room. Although clearly a crime under Indonesian law, the police commander who investigated the case beat the officer who had raped her, shaved his head and forced him to pay a small compensation instead of carrying out his duty to arrest him. The treatment of the perpetrator by his commander clearly demonstrates that the police commander accepted that his subordinate had committed a violation. However, he did not arrest him. According to the evidence of SC:

> He covered my mouth so I could not scream, then he stripped and raped me. I cried at the time and my parents heard me. PS396 fled and jumped the front fence, running towards the police station. My parents beat me up and then reported the incident to the Kapolsek [Kepala Polisi Sektor, Sub-district Police Chief]. The Kapolsek came to my house with his subordinates and beat PS396 in front of my parents. Then he shaved his head and ordered him to pay Rp200,000 in compensation. After that he was transferred to Manatuto.[65]

105. On 5 November 1996, TC from Lisapat Village (Hatolia, Ermera) was arrested along with seven members of her family in Atabae (Bobonaro) on suspicion of harbouring Falintil. They were brought to the Ermera Koramil where they were detained for about two weeks. They were then held for another two weeks at the Army Strategic Reserve (Rajawali II) military post in Lulirema (Ermera). While TC was in detention, soldiers repeatedly raped her and made her do domestic chores. This case became known to local church workers who successfully advocated for TC's release. The case also was reported to human rights workers in Dili and Jakarta. In a submission to the Indonesian

Human Rights Commission (Komnas HAM) on 22 January 1997, a coalition of Jakarta-based NGOs gave details of the case:

> At about midnight, TC was released from the flagpole and brought to the Koramil headquarters with her hands still in handcuffs. She was put in a separate room by herself…All the time she was there, she was kept in handcuffs except when she ate and went to the toilet. One day (date unknown to the victim) at about midnight, when it was very quiet, suddenly the lights in her room were turned off from the outside. In the darkness, a soldier she could not recognise entered the room. He embraced her while threatening her not to scream. "If you scream it's your own fault. I will take you out tonight and kill you in the forest. If tomorrow you tell my commander, I will kill you the following night," he said. With her hands in handcuffs, TC resigned herself to being raped until she fell unconscious....
>
> In mid-November 1996, the detainees were brought to Rajawali II command post in Lulirema. In this command post there were 50-100 soldiers. They were detained there for two weeks. During the first week, TC was raped twice. The rapes took place at night with her hands still in handcuffs. The perpetrator's name was unknown to her, but she knew that his rank was three yellow chevrons (a Sergeant-Major), that he was dark-skinned and tall with straight hair...In the second week her handcuffs were taken off. The same perpetrator raped her twice more. While she was at the military post, TC was also made to boil water and do other chores.[66]

106. TC was released after the intervention of a local catechist.* TC filed a report with the Military Police in Balide in Dili with the help of two lawyers from the HAK Foundation, a legal aid and human rights NGO, who were supported by senior Indonesian lawyers in Jakarta and Kupang. One of the lawyers, Rui Pereira dos Santos, explained:

> The [investigation process] took a long time. The main impediment was that the person who committed these crimes at the Rajawali post in Ermera had returned to his base [outside Timor-Leste]. That was…why he could not be brought to the military police (headquarters) in Dili to be investigated. When the investigation was completed we sent the papers to the Korem Commander with copies to the High Military Court in Jakarta, Military Commander-in-Chief, Minister of Defence and Security, the Attorney General and the Head of the Supreme Court in Jakarta. At the end I heard that they completed the indictment in Jakarta, but the indictment was changed from rape to having mutually consenting sexual relations [a lesser charge]. They also took away any mention of TC's domestic chores. I heard that the perpetrator was sentenced to six months, but as TC's lawyer I never actually received copies of the decision. During the investigation process, TC was already three or four months pregnant.[67]

* Catechist is a lay position in the Catholic Church that provides for local religious training and guidance for learning the liturgy, preparing families for their children's baptism, preparing children to receive communion, and similar tasks. In Timor-Leste there are Catechists in most village communities.

107. On 9 January 1997, UC and UC1 were arrested in the village of Babulo (Uatolari, Viqueque) because of their involvement in smuggling bullets to Falintil. They were taken to the Uatolari Sub-district police station then moved to the Viqueque District Police Station 1134 in the town of Viqueque. UC explained the events that followed:

When we arrived there, they detained us separately. That night they called me for interrogation then sent me back to my cell. That same night a policeman named PS112, originally from Kupang, came into my cell and raped me until dawn. On 11 January 1997 another policeman named PS396 came into my cell and again I was raped until dawn.[68]

108. After her interrogation UC was released, only to be summoned again on 23 August 1997 for a court hearing. Yayasan HAK provided UC with legal assistance during her trial and she told them about her rape while in detention. She was too afraid for her life to go with her lawyers to the Military Police, so her lawyers reported the crime using their power of attorney. They also forwarded the report to the provincial military auditor. However, according to UC's lawyer, there was no substantial response. The case remained "in the ice box".[69]

C. Rape in and around the victim's home

109. As with cases of sexual violence overall, the number of cases of rape of women reported to the Commission, including rape in detention, decreased markedly between 1985 and 1998. Women, however, still remained at risk of sexual violence. This is particularly clear in cases of rape taking place in areas that have traditionally been regarded as the realm of women: in and near their homes, in their gardens and in their neighbourhoods.

110. In 1989, VC was 15 years old when Indonesian Private First Class PS113 from a field artillery (Artileri Medan, referred to as Armed) unit came to her house in Ililapa, Lore II (Lospalos, Lautém) demanding that VC become his "wife". According to VC, by this he meant having access to her sexually and having her accompany him to parties. VC refused. PS113 threatened her with a gun, then dragged her to the bedroom and raped her. As a result of the rape she became pregnant but continued going to school. Private PS113 was transferred to Laga (Baucau). Later, he turned up again and, this time threatening her with a grenade, tried to force her to come with him to Laga. VC was able to escape.[70]

111. PS114 was the head of the aldeia of Talo, Hatolia (Hatolia, Ermera). Owing to his close ties with Infantry Battalion 744, PS114 was able to commit repeated rapes with impunity. In March 1989 he repeatedly raped 14-year-old WC, who described to the Commission how it happened:

PS114 just came in, took off my clothes, sat on top of me and raped me four times that night. He gave my mother Rp30,000…Whenever he found me by myself on the street he would pull me into the coffee bushes, strip and rape me. He even brought an Indonesian man named PS115, the supervisor of the coffee plantation, PT Salazar, in Talo. PS115 called me to the street, pulled me [into the bushes] and raped me. When I got home, PS114 raped me again. I felt like an animal. PS114 raped me many times – on the road, in the coffee plantation, anywhere…until I became pregnant. Then he never recognised the child.[71]

112. XC was another victim of the same offender, six years later. She was raped in her home in Talo in 1995. In her testimony, XC says that PS114 was known to have good relations with Infantry Battalion 744 and she feared for her life if she resisted him.[72]

113. Also in the aldeia of Talo, a soldier from Infantry Battalion 726 raped YC. On 12 July 1989 four soldiers, armed and wearing army fatigues, surrounded YC's house. At the time, her father and brother were not at home. One soldier entered the house and raped her.[73]

114. ZC's husband, a member of Falintil, was holding a secret meeting with a Falintil commander named Mau Hunu and Adjunto Mera Putar when the three were ambushed by soldiers in a joint operation comprising members of Infantry Battalion 142, the Ainaro Kodim and milsas.* As her husband managed to escape, ZC became the target of proxy violence. She was taken from her house on the same day:

On 8 November 1991, the Sukarelawan [Volunteers], led by PS98, arrived at my home with two of its members, PS116 and PS 117. They asked where my husband was. I replied that he was out working on a project. Then they took me to a place called the Pro-Integration Hall where I was interrogated. I was accused of preparing food for Falintil. I replied I did not know anything. Two days later, members of Sukarelawan tied me up together with 14 other men and women. After one night, PS98 and Second Sergeant PS118, a member of Koramil, untied us and we were forced to sign a statement…Before that we were forced to drink palm wine as part of taking an oath in a ceremony [of allegiance to Indonesia]. We were forced to take this oath in November 1991. After that we were made to dance with PS98 and milsas members until dawn. One night, members of Sukarelawan entered my house with knives, guns – AR 16, FNC, SKS – and samurai swords. PS119 ordered my father-in-law to go buy cigarettes. Then I was dragged into the bedroom, my clothes were torn off and I was raped…Another member, PS120, raped me once.[74]

* Militarisation or milsas was a process of military recruitment and training of civilians begun by the Army Strategic Reserve Command (Kostrad) in 1989. Members of civilian groups such as the Hansip (Pertahanan Sipil, Hansip), People's Resistance (Perlawanan Rakyat, Wanra) and Trained Civilians (Rakyat Terlatih, Ratih) were sent from Timor-Leste to Bali or Malang (Java) for three months of military training. Upon completion of their training they were inducted into the army. Both the training and those East Timorese who were trained in this way were commonly called milsas or sometimes three-month soldiers. [See Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation for more details of milsas programmes in Timor-Leste].

115. Women were not only raped after being taken from their homes; AD was raped in a kiosk near her house in Laleia, Manatuto. In 1994, on her way to the kiosk to buy biscuits, a group of soldiers – PS123, PS124, PS125 and several others – forced AD into a kiosk. PS123 then raped her while the other soldiers stood guard at the entrance. PS123 threatened AD with death if she screamed.[75]

116. BD1 of Aidaba Leten (Atabae, Bobonaro) gave evidence to the Commission about the rape of his wife, BD. In 1996 Halilintar militia members captured BD1 in Aidaba Leten and tortured him at the Joint Intelligence Unit (SGI) post, which was at the home of PS126. One year later, after BD1 had already fled to the forest, the same group of militia, including PS127, PS128, PS129, PS130, PS131 and PS132, came to his house where his wife, BD, was staying. They threatened they would kill all of BD's family if she did not surrender. PS130 raped BD in her own home.[76]

117. In December 1996, CD watched members of Rajawali army strategic reserve search her house in the village of Batu Manu (Atsabe, Ermera) after receiving information that she was involved in clandestine activities. CD, her brother, her father, together with two other men, CD1 and CD2, were tied up and beaten. In the middle of the night they were made to look for a man called Mateus who allegedly went to the forest to deliver grenades. CD had to climb the hills and cross a river. Two members of the army strategic reserve raped her in front of CD1.[77]

118. E1 was active in the clandestine movement. In August 1997, his sister E was taken from her home by PS133, an East Timorese Babinsa, and three East Timorese ABRI soldiers – PS134, PS135 and PS136. They took her to the village office in Betulau (Liquidoe, Aileu) where E1 was already being interrogated. There, PS133 and another militia member raped E. She kept this a secret until, on her deathbed, she told her brother.[78]

119. DD1 gave evidence to the Commission of the rape of her sister, DD, in the village of Laulana (Letefoho, Ermera) in 1998. Members of Territorial Combat Battalion (BTT) 711 took turns to rape her in her own house. Suspected of cooking for Falintil, DD was forced into the kitchen by three soldiers (one of them an Indonesian called PS137) where she was raped in front of her brother.[79]

Testimony and evidence from Mário Viegas Carrascalão on violence against women from 1982 to 1992

In his written submission to the Commission, Mário Viegas Carrascalão, the Governor of Timor-Leste from 1982 to 1992, identified four groups of perpetrators of sexual violence against women.

"1) Indonesian soldiers [who committed violent acts against women] in a more or less organised and systematic way. In these cases, the victims were in general easy targets, as they would pay with their own life, or a relative's life, if they refused to obey the violator/offender. There were accounts where even the firing of weapons was used [by soldiers] to achieve their goals. These victims included:

a. Close female relatives of Resistance members killed in combat, for instance their widows and/or daughters, as well as sisters, aunts and cousins;
b. Wives and/or daughters of those detained accused of supporting the resistance;
c. Wives and/or daughters of those who still had relatives "in the forest" even if not active [in the Resistance];
d. Female prisoners [detained] for criminal offences and female political prisoners;
e. Daughters of an East Timorese woman and Portuguese man living abroad, or their descendants;
f. Beautiful daughters of common village people, offered to the soldiers by their own relatives in exchange for favours/benefits/ secrecy; in some areas of Timor Leste, such practices were already in use during colonial times;
g. Young women living in "Guarded Villages" (Desa Binaan) that were none other than concentration camps.

"In these cases (a. to g.), [methods] frequently used were threats, intrigue, blackmail and terror. The perpetrators were consistently soldiers with territorial functions (from the provincial, Kodim and Koramil, village-level military and police officers). The women were "gifts" offered by local subordinates to their superiors when they came on working visits. This was a way used by inferiors to attract the favours of their superiors and thus get a faster promotion in their careers.

"2) East Timorese integrated into the structure of the occupying military power as informants, members of paramilitary groups or Hansip and Civilian Security, or inducted as part of the regular forces. These offenders acted mainly against the most simple and poor sections of the population. The [methods] they used were usually terror, threat of denouncement to the Secret Service, intrigue, blackmail and night visits to victims' homes (alone or accompanied by members of "Intel" or other military [personnel], in some cases dressed as ninjas, as they did in Dili). They were [also] the link between the Indonesian soldiers and the local victims [and were used to take victims] to serve their hierarchical superiors.

"3) Civilians, both East Timorese and foreigners, who occupied important positions at all levels of the administration. This group used the positions they held in the state administration to "facilitate" bureaucratic procedures for their victims (single, widowed or married women) who needed, for instance, a commercial license, streamlining the provision of pensions to which they were entitled if their deceased husband had been a public servant, or…better chances at a public tender for development projects. In return they [these civilians] would have their carnal desires satisfied.

"4) East Timorese and foreign primary school teachers. In 1983, when the system of compulsory schooling began in Timor-Leste, not only children aged six started attending school, but also youth aged up to 16 and 17 years old attended primary school. The small number of East Timorese primary school teachers led to the recruitment of many Indonesian teachers. Only male teachers, single or married (but if married, the wives had to stay in Indonesia), were sent to Timor-Leste. The East Timorese who were recruited to teach at primary schools were also mostly male, young - having just finished their degrees - and single or married. If married, their wives were not allowed to go to the countryside with them. The outcome of this situation reached the government in the form of stories about the involvement of "Sirs" or East Timorese teachers with their female students. The districts of Covalima, Maliana, Liquiçá and Baucau registered the most cases. In Baucau, a teacher from Indonesia raped 22 of his female students. The case was taken to court and the rapist was sentenced to only two and a half years in jail. This man ended up being transferred to his homeland without completely serving his time in prison.

"Not all offenders were punished for their offences because the Governor, according to Indonesian law, could not punish soldiers, police officers, district administrators (Bupati) and [others]. Thus, the maximum he could do about these people [perpetrators] was to conduct investigations and, when possible, press charges [against them] through the departments where they worked and that could, therefore, take action."[80]

Mario Carrascalão also described several cases of rape where he took action, either with letters of complaint to the provincial military commander or by speaking with Indonesian government and military leaders in Jakarta. Mario Carrascalão told the Commission that he never received an official response to any of his reports about sexual violence.

Rape and the Popular Consultation

120. Data gathered by the Commission show a sharp increase of rape cases in 1999 with peaks in April and September 1999. Of reported rapes from this year, 19% (20/105) were committed by militia members.

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

Note: Some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among prepetrators

A. Rapes before the Popular Consultation (April–August 1999)

121. Rape took place as part of the violence that spread throughout the territory before the August 1999 Popular Consultation. Incidents of rape peaked in April and May, before the ballot, in almost all districts. This occurred concurrently with the wave of population displacement caused by house burnings and other acts of violence throughout Timor-Leste.

122. Once again women were often the victims of proxy violence – members of the Indonesian security forces and the militias under their control raped the wives, sisters and daughters of the absent men whom they sought to kill because of their support for the independence movement.[81]

123. The experience of DE is an example of this pattern. DE was assaulted in her own home in Fatubessi (Hatolia, Ermera) on 14 May 1999 by Darah Merah Putih (Red and White Blood) militia. Led by commanders PS138 and PS139, the militia, together with members of Joint Intelligence Unit, attacked DE's house because they knew that her husband, DE1, had already fled to the forest to join Falintil. PS139 went inside the house, threatened DE with a knife and raped her. After that, PS138 and members of the Joint Intelligence Unit took turns sexually molesting her. They tied her hands with cable and took her to the Darah Integrasi (Blood for Integration) militia post in Hatolia where she was detained for two months. While there she continued to be a target of sexual harassment. She said that at least 24 members of the Joint Intelligence Unit and the militia sexually molested her. After two months she managed to escape.[82]

124. In May 1999, a militia group named KMP (Kaer Metin Merah Putih; literally, Grasp the Red and White) conducted a series of violent acts throughout the sub-district of Lolotoe, Bobonaro. The Special Panel for Serious Crimes of the Dili District Court found three people – Jhoni Franca, KMP commander; Sabino Leite, the head of the village of Guda (Lolotoe, Bobonaro) and José Cardoso, KMP commander – guilty of rape as a crime against humanity. This was the first case of rape to be prosecuted as part of crimes against humanity by the Special Panel.[83]

125. Also in May 1999, three women, whose identity has been suppressed by the Court, were arbitrarily detained by KMP together with 13 other people from Lolotoe. After being detained for one month in the Guidance for Family Welfare (PKK) building across the road from the Lolotoe Koramil, the three women were taken away with the pretext that they had been summoned by João Tavares, commander of PPI (Pasukan Pejuang Integrasi, Integration Fighters' Force).* They were put in a government ambulance driven by an East Timorese government health worker named PS140, together with the Lolotoe Koramil Commander, Second Lieutenant PS141 [Indonesian], and KMP commander, PS142. The three women were taken to a hotel in Atambua where they were raped repeatedly. One of the victims testified that one of the women was subjected to an injection which they believed to be some form of contraception. The three women were threatened with various weapons, and told that if they did not have sexual intercourse they would be shot dead and thrown into the sea. After being allowed out to get food they were raped again the following night.[84]

126. Militia parties were a pre-ballot phenomenon. Militia groups, with their resources and power, were able to organise parties that were compulsory for village women to attend. These parties provided an opportunity for sexual harassment and rape. DMP (Dadurus Merah Putih, Red and White Wave), the militia group that operated in the village of Lourba (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) organised such a party on 4 May 1999. In her testimony to the Commission, FE told of 14 women, herself included, who were forced to prepare coffee and food for the militia. She was summoned by the commander of DMP and raped. According to her testimony, the other 13 women suffered the same violence.[85] FE gave evidence that corroborates this incident.

> During the day a militia came to my house. He pretended to chase after my rooster, while saying: "I'll see to you shortly." At the time, my husband… had been ordered to go on an operation with them so he was not home. The militia man raped me that day although I had just given birth two months earlier.[86]

127. Another woman, GE, testified about being raped in her home after the same party:

> [M]ilitia [commanders] PS383, PS143, PS144, PS145 and PS146…shoved their hands in our bras and pulled out our breasts. We had to let them

* PPI – the Integration Fighters' Force - was launched on 17 April 1999 in an official ceremony held in front of what was then the Governor's office (now known as the Palácio do Governo) in Dili. João Tavares was PPI's chief commander and Eurico Guterres its vice commander. Later that day, militia attacked and burned the home of Manuel Carrascalão where displaced people had been sheltering, killing at least 12 people including his son, Manuelito [see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances] do it because they threatened to beat us with wooden blocks. On the way home from the party the DMP commander called me and three other women friends…to be interrogated. He had photographs of us when we were cooking for Falintil. I replied: "It is true that my friends and I have cooked for Falintil, but we are just ordinary people. We don't understand politics. If they say they are hungry, yes, I have to feed them because we are all human beings. What is wrong if we feed them? I am scared too, because the Falintil carry weapons." After the interrogation I went straight home. As soon as I got to my room, four members of DMP – PS383, PS143, PS144 and PS145 – were already naked and waiting for me. They dragged me, took my clothes off and took turns raping me. My children came into the room and the men beat and kicked the children out of the room.[87]

128. Violence increased dramatically in almost all districts in the months leading to the announcement of the Popular Consultation, causing large-scale displacement. Women displaced from their homes and villages were, once again, at risk of being raped.

129. In April 1999, HE, having been threatened with murder by members of the Sakunar (Scorpion) militia, left home to seek refuge in the house of relatives in Lesuwen (Suai Town, Covalima). Her relative was also a member of Sakunar. Despite her best efforts to protect herself, HE was raped by a member of Laksaur militia named PS147.[88]

130. After the massacre at the Liquiçá Church on 6 April 1999, many families fled their homes. Many women were raped in the chaos that ensued. IE, a woman from the village of Leotela (Liquiçá, Liquiçá), was detained by a BMP (Besi Merah Putih, Red and White Iron) militia member, PS148, on the way home from the market on 14 April 1999. IE and her woman friend were forced to sign a statement accusing the village head of Leotela of sheltering members of Falintil. A week later Territorial Combat Battalion (BTT) and Special Forces Command (Kopassus) troops came to force the people of Leotela to move to Liquiçá under threat of death. IE ran to stay with her uncle in Liquiçá, but less than one month later PS148 arrived looking for her:

On 7 May 1999 at about 9.00pm, PS148 came to my uncle's house and said to him that I had to report to the BMP commander for interrogation. Instead, PS148 took me to a place called Kaeloho [Liquiçá] where I was sexually assaulted. He forced me to kiss him and to do things that I cannot talk about here...

Three days later, on 10 May 1999 at around 3.00pm, PS148 came to my uncle's house driving a hardtop jeep. This time he used the excuse that he wanted to talk to me about a letter for the village leaders in Leotela. I was taken to the beach, close to the Kaimeno River. He forcibly removed my clothes and forced me to the ground. PS148 said that if I refused him he would kill my family and me. Then he raped me and threatened to kill me if I told his wife.[89]

131. JE was just 17 years old when the Liquiçá Church Massacre took place. On 28 May 1999, two members of the BMP militia named PS151 and PS152 arrived at her family home in Maumeta (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) at 3.00am. JE ran to hide in the district parliament building (DPRD II) but PS151 and PS152 chased her, armed with two guns and knives, and raped her.[90] In a separate incident on the same day, KE was watching television in her home in Maumeta (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) when a member of the BMP militia named PS153 and a police officer known as PS154 arrived at her house. PS153 raped KE and threatened to kill her if she told her family. Five days later, on 2 June 1999, PS153 raped her again. KE became pregnant and gave birth to a child as a result of rape.[91]

132. Similar cases were reported in other districts. After her husband ran to the forest, LE travelled to Suai Town on 25 April 1999 with her mother and aunt. When they arrived at the village of Ogues (Maucatar, Covalima), they were assaulted by two members of the Laksaur militia, PS154 and PS155. LE was taken to a room at the militia headquarters and asked about the whereabouts of her husband. PS155 ordered her to move to the Laksaur headquarters. LE refused, and she was raped there. She was pregnant at the time.[92]

133. Women were vulnerable when they moved to find safety, but also if they stayed behind to look after their homes, livestock, aging parents or young children. In the lawlessness before the Popular Consultation, those with effective immunity from the law felt free to commit crimes, including rape in people's own homes.

134. ME, in her statement to the Commission, described her rape by a BMP militia in Maumeta, (Bazartete, Liquiçá). On 1 May 1999, ME was at home when she was given a drink laced with drugs by PS156, a member of the BMP militia. She became so weak that PS156 was able to pick her up and take her into the kitchen. There, he gagged her mouth, threw her on the ground and raped her. As a result, her hip bone was broken and she is still unable to do any heavy work.[93]

135. NE was raped at her home in the aldeia of Kawa-uman, Kasabauk (Tilomar, Covalima) on 7 July 1999 after her husband and children had fled to seek refuge in the Suai Church. The Laksaur militia came to her house and one of the men, known as PS157, threatened, beat and kicked her till he broke her ribs. He then raped her until she lost consciousness.[94]

136. ABLAI (Aku Berjuang Laksanakan Amanat Integrasi, I Struggle to Execute the Integration Mandate) was another militia group that used rape as part of their attacks on civilian populations. From statements the Commission received through a submission, a pattern of sexual violence as part of ABLAI's attacks around Same (Manufahi) in April 1999 can clearly be identified. OE of Horeme (Same) gave this testimony:

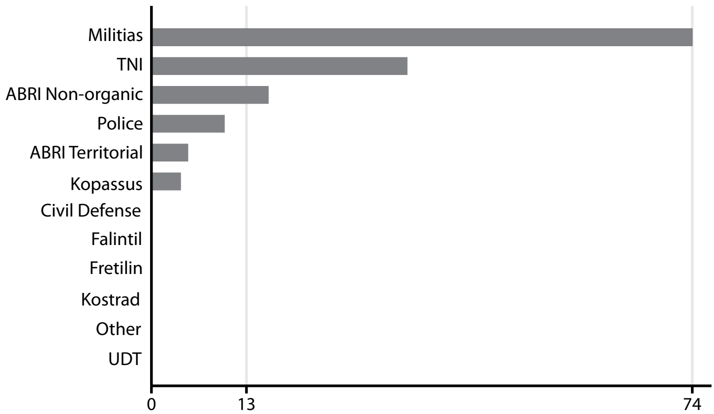
> On 17 April 1999, an ABLAI militia came looking for villagers who were hiding, but they did not find anyone. They came with machetes, knives, bows and arrows, screaming and threatening: "If you do not come out, we will kill the men and rape the women." Hearing their threats we came out from our hiding places and walked towards the chapel close to the house of one of the militia named PS158. PS158 dragged me by the arm to get me inside a room. I resisted but he threatened me: "If you do not follow [me] I will kill you." In the room they took turns raping me. After PS158 finished raping me he ordered one of his friends to rape me too. When they finished with me they just left me lying on the bed. I was so ashamed when I got up from that bed.[95]

137. A second victim, PE described how in the same village and on the same day she was ordered to cook and then taken to an empty room and repeatedly raped.[96]

138. The third and fourth victims, QE and RE, were raped on the same day. Several days later they were forcibly taken to the militia post where they had to remain until September 1999. RE, whose father and brother were killed during this incident, described her experiences of rape by ABLAI militia members:



On 17 April 1999 militia encircled the aldeia of Orema, Hola Rua [Same, Manufahi] and conducted a sweeping operation to kill us. At about 10.00am, a group of militia, including PS159, PS160, PS161, PS162 and PS163, came to my house looking for me. PS159 said: "If you dare refuse to sleep with me, I will kill you." Hearing this, my brother…tried to distract PS159 by giving him some food. But after he ate he pulled me into a room. There he took off my clothes and raped me. He brought a machete and knife into the room. After he raped me, he told me not to tell anyone. Several days later militia members PS161 and PS162 arrived at the house to take me [and three other women] to the village of Leoprema. We remained at PS160's house till August. Every Saturday night throughout our stay, PS161, PS159, PS162 and PS163 took us out and made us dance with them. At the dance the four of us were kissed, hugged and then taken outside the tent to be raped in turn until the morning.[97]

B. Rapes after the announcement of the Popular Consultation results (September–October 1999)

139. Data gathered by the Commission clearly indicate that violence peaked again during the period following the announcement of the results of the ballot on 4 September 1999. Rape took place along with forced displacement, house burning, killings, disappearances and other acts of violence. The western districts, which experienced more violence during the post-ballot period, also reported a higher incidence of sexual violence. Of the 47 reported rapes committed after the 1999 ballot and included by the Commission for statistical analysis, 81% (38/47) occurred in western districts of Timor-Leste or in West Timor.

140. As shown in the graph below, the Indonesian military and militia members committed all of rapes in 1999 that were reported to the Commission.

Count of rape by perpetrator, 1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR
Note: Some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among prepetrators

141. Rapes took place in the context of widespread displacement where many families fled their homes and became separated, often leaving those most vulnerable a target of violence. Two sisters from the village of Namleso (Liquidoe, Aileu) SE and TE, respectively 24 and 15 years old – were forcibly moved by AHI militia (Aileu Hametin Integrasi, Aileu Strengthens Integrasi) then raped by TNI soldiers while in transit. SE gave the following testimony:

> On 18 September 1999, AHI groups ordered us refugees to walk towards Aileu. [We] arrived in Aileu at 3.00pm and were put up at the local Puskesmas [health centre]. My family and I slept on the terrace. In the evening, at about 7.00pm, three militia – PS156 from Fahisoi, PS165 and PS167 from Namleso [villages in Liquidoe Sub-district, Aileu] – came to get me. They were wearing AHI T-shirts and carried weapons, knives and handmade guns. They forced me to follow them to an empty house. The three militia members ordered me to go in and then they hid somewhere. Suddenly two soldiers from the Kodim in Aileu, whom I knew but not by name, came in. They were dressed in black T-shirts and pants, the AHI uniform. The two soldiers ordered me to take off my clothes and I had to have sexual relations with them, one after the other, to save my life.[98]

142. SE's younger sister, TE, was raped by a member of the militia called PS384 after she was taken by motorcycle from the health centre to an empty house. TE testified:

> He slept with me right there while pointing a knife at my neck and saying, 'Quick, get your clothes off and don't scream.' Then he threw me down and raped me. He set down the knife next to him, so I just succumbed. After sexual intercourse I felt pain around my vagina.[99]

143. The following night, TE was taken again from the health centre where she was sleeping. A militia by the name of PS397 took her to an empty house and left her there. Because she could see a man dressed in fatigues and holding a machete, she became scared and ran back to the health centre. However, this time two soldiers in uniform came to her and threatened to shoot her if she refused to surrender herself. She was forced to return to the empty house and submit to being raped for the second time. After the rape she was told to go and get her older sister, but she did not do it. However, this did not save her sister from another rape.

> At about 2.00am, the perpetrator ordered three of his subordinates to go to my place and wake up my sister. They told her that she was being called by their superior so, willing or not, my sister had to go with them because they were armed. When she arrived at the place where I had been raped, the same thing happened to her. She was raped by a soldier, but she did not see the perpetrator because the place was dark.[100]

144. In the sub-district of Bobonaro (Bobonaro) at least three different incidents of rape were reported where East Timorese militia or civilians took a woman to Indonesian soldiers to be raped by them. UE described how the Dadurus Merah Putih militia and TNI soldiers attacked and forcibly moved the inhabitants of the village of Oat to a number of places before settling in the town of Bobonaro. According to UE, PS385, PS386 and PS387 – three militia from the village of Malilait (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) – ordered a relative of UE called UE1 to bring UE's daughter to them. UE's daughter and nieces hid in the darkness of the house where they were staying. After a while, the three militia members came to the house themselves. UE told her interviewers: "Because my daughter was still a young girl, I agreed to go with them instead." The militia members took UE to the Bobonaro Koramil and handed her over to the Koramil commander who raped her in one of the rooms.[101]

145. The testimony of VE, also from the village of Oat, is similar to that of UE above. VE was a refugee in Bobonaro on her way to Atambua. She was picked up by an East Timorese man named PS168 and taken to a house she did not know. She testified:

> The perpetrator (whom I did not know) told the people in the house to switch off the lights. Then he took me to the bedroom and had sexual intercourse with me…I did not react because I was scared he would cut my throat. I submitted because I was scared and [also] to save the lives of my family.[102]

146. Following the announcement of the results of the Popular Consultation, rapes motivated by revenge against someone who had already fled continued to take place. WE told the Commission about how she was raped in the village of Mauabu (Hatolia, Ermera) on 9 September 1999. An East Timorese member of the Army Strategic Reserve (Rajawali), PS169, and the village head, PS170, arrived at her house looking for her husband who had already fled to the forest. As her husband was not there they set fire to the family's motorcycle and WE was raped by PS169.[103]

147. In another case of proxy violence, XE was raped in front of her husband. In September 1999, XE and her husband were on their way to Lautém when they were ambushed by unknown TNI soldiers who pointed guns and machetes at them and threatened to kill them because their parents were members of CNRT. As the soldiers began to take off XE's clothes, her husband attempted to intervene but was hit unconscious by a blow to the head with a rifle butt. Then XE was raped. XE and her husband gave two traditional weavings and Rp200,000 to the soldiers in order to be released.[104]

148. The escalation of violence and impunity created a context where the most brutal forms of violence against women could take place – the double crime of rape and murder. At least two cases of rape and murder of women took place in September 1999.

149. Francisco Martins, himself a member of Darah Integrasi (Integration Red Blood) militia at the time, gave evidence to the Commission about the rape and murder of YE in the village of Lauala (Ermera, Ermera):

> On 6 September, I was on my way home to Gleno from Atambua. On that night, around 9.00pm, the Darah Integrasi militia commander, PS172, brought a young woman by the name of YE to our post in Gleno behind the marketplace and the Liurai Guesthouse. That night I saw PS172 and three other members – PS173, PS174, PS175 – take YE to sleep with her in a house. The next morning, 7 September 1999, when YE woke up her body was covered with fresh blood and her clothes were also bloody. She cried and asked our help to take her to the church. It was only then that I knew they had raped her because she couldn't walk [normally], she was stumbling.[105]

150. After the rape she was returned to the post, tied up and finally killed.

The rape and killing of ZE, 11 September 1999

ZE's mother, ZE1, told of the rape and forced disappearance of her daughter, ZE, in Ermera on 11 September 1999. ZE was an active member of CNRT and a UNAMET polling staff member. During the evacuation of the UNAMET office in Gleno, Ermera, on 31 August 1999, ZE, together with UNAMET international and local staff, were brought to Dili. However, according to her mother's testimony, on 4 September 1999 she was brought back to the Gleno Kodim in a police vehicle. ZE's mother testified to the Commission about her daughter's rape and murder.

> At approximately 8.00pm, an East Timorese TNI soldier from Battalion 744 named PS176 and his members…arrived at my neighbour's…house where we were staying because our house had been burned down a few days before. Before PS176 entered the house we were already surrounded by Rajawali troops. PS176 came into the house and sat in the front room. Then he called ZE to come out from the back [of the house] and made her sit next to him. In front of me, he pulled ZE towards him, hugged and kissed her…I went into the back room because it upset me to see my daughter treated like that. At that time my neighbour's wife told ZE's daughter and her own daughter to go into the back room. She locked them in so that they would not have to see what PS176 did to ZE…

After my neighbour left the front room, PS176 dragged ZE to the front of the house next to the stairs on the veranda, and there he raped her. We watched from the window…We heard ZE scream but we could do nothing. Perhaps because his cohorts felt they had been kept waiting too long, they fired one shot in the air and PS176 stopped what he was doing [and left]…When we went out, ZE was crying. She said, "I feel ashamed because I have been treated like an animal. Did you hear me being raped next to the stairs?" We replied, "We saw and heard but we could do nothing. We were all waiting to die." After she drank some water she made us go inside where she took off all her clothes to show to me and the neighbour that her body was damaged. She said, while she cried: "You have seen yourselves, my body is ruined. They all raped me". I saw with my own eyes that on her breasts all the way down to the vagina the skin was blackened and grazed…

On 12 September, they came again to pick up ZE [and] she went with them. We went to mass and then we too were picked up with a car and taken to Gleno…After that ZE was made to cook for TNI, the police and militia. On 13 September 1999, a commander from the Darah Merah militia known as PS177 arrived with his associates. PS177 said to ZE: "Teacher, get into the car." I said if that was the case I wanted to accompany my daughter, but they refused…ZE said to me: "Mother, now it is PS177 taking me off. I know I will be killed." I waited from morning until 5.00 that afternoon, but ZE did not come back. Suddenly a Darah Merah militia, PS178, arrived. He said to me: "Mama, stop waiting because the teacher has been killed." I replied: "If that is the case, show me ZE's body." PS178 said: "This is the first time I've ever seen someone from Ermera kill a woman."[106]

151. Some testimonies regarding sexual violence indicate that "rape centres" existed in the midst of the violence during and after the Popular Consultation. These were places where women were forcibly detained and made accessible for repeated rape. For example, in the village of Malilait (Bobonaro), the Hametin Merah Putih (Strengthen Red and White) militia abducted and detained women in a house. The house, according to an interview with Bosco da Costa, belonged to a family who had fled to Atambua (West Timor) and had been taken over by the militia. Old people and four young women were kept in the house. The HMP militia commander, PS179, his deputy, PS180 and the Aiasa village head, PS181, held the people in that house. According to da Costa, the Koramil commander and district police chief did not reprimand or take action against the militia although they had knowledge of the crimes.[107]

152. AF, a victim of repeated rape, explained that the crime was perpetrated by militia and TNI personnel together in the house of the wife of one of the militia members, and that she was not the only victim of rape in this house:

> On 10 September 1999, the militia and TNI arrived at the house armed with weapons and threatened to kill me and all my family if I did not follow them to the militia headquarters. As we were all in a state of fear and panic, in the end I gave in. My father, mother and daughter resigned themselves to [my arrest]. [At] militia headquarters the militia handed me over to three TNI soldiers who raped me for three days and three nights, from 10 to 12 September 1999.
>
> The first night I was raped by an East Timorese TNI soldier named PS182. On the second day I was raped by PS388 [East Timorese]. PS388's wife, PS389, helped…by providing the house to be used by the militia and TNI as their place of operation. One of my friends…was also raped in PS389's house on 18 September 1999 and she has not overcome the trauma. On the third day, PS388 handed me over to another friend, a TNI soldier called PS183 [East Timorese]. He raped me on the third night, 12 September 1999.[108]

153. The Commission received corroboration regarding this "rape centre" from BF, another woman who was raped in the same house:

> The command house belonged to [East Timorese] PS389 and PS388, a TNI member from Tapo. I thought I would become PS389's maid – cook, prepare coffee for the commander and the militia – but I had guessed wrong. It turned out that they planned to rape me. When I found out I became frightened. I cried and asked PS389 to help me get away, but instead she got angry and swore at me. "Many women have already been brought here and they did as they were told. Why do you have to be so stubborn?" I could only remain silent and cry quietly. There was nothing I could do. On the night of 18 September 1999, PS184 [East Timorese] came to PS389's house. She deliberately left while PS184 locked me in a room and raped me.[109]

Rape and sexual slavery after the Suai Church Massacre, 6 September 1999

The rapes and sexual slavery of women after the attack on the Suai Church on 6 September 1999, were organised systematically. Rape occurred in several places where women, who had been refugees at the Suai Church were temporarily accommodated, namely at the Suai Kodim, at a junior high school building (SMP 2), an orphanage and the Wives of Civil Servants (Dharma Wanita) building. Women were also raped in transit to Atambua, West Timor and during their stay in refugee camps there. The Commission received evidence of rape and sexual slavery from 11 testimonies that name Laksaur and Mahidi (Mati Hidup Integrasi dengan Indonesia, Dead or Alive Integration with Indonesia) militias as well as the Indonesian security forces as perpetrators of these crimes.

CF was one of the refugees attacked in Suai Church who personally witnessed the killing of one of the priests, Father Francisco. After that she was detained in the high school building and witnessed women being taken out by militia. Eventually, she too was raped by a militia member and, a few days later, by a police officer. CF told the Commission:

> We were forcibly taken to the junior high school building where we were verbally abused by the militia and were not given food for three days. Every night we were harassed and the young girls were taken away by the militia. On 11 September, precisely at 9.00pm, a man came in with a torch which he shone into my face. He lifted the sarong I was using to cover my face. The Laksaur militia ordered me to stand up and threatened that if I did not they would shoot everybody around me. I had to stand and they dragged me out of the room. I was taken away by PS185, a Laksaur militia who raped me and then returned me to the room where all I could do was cry…On the following day we were taken to the Dharma Wanita building. We were terrorised there and the women were taken out. On 14 September a police officer who was said to be a member of SGI forced me inside a vehicle. I was scared and crying. The militia said: "You had better go or I'll shoot you tonight." I was taken to the house owned by a police officer and was raped. After that I was returned to the Dharma Wanita building when the others were already asleep. A Lauksar militia threatened me, "Today you went with a policeman, if tomorrow we call you and you refuse, you will die."[110]

Irene dos Santos also testified to the Commission about the rapes that took place after the attack at the Suai Church. On 7 September 1999,

Irene saw two women, DF and EF, taken away forcibly by Laksaur militia known as PS186, PS187 and PS188. The three men beat DF severely until her mouth and nose were bleeding. Eventually DF fell to the ground and there she was raped while unconscious. As a result of the beating, the victim haemorrhaged for four months and then died.[111]

EF is a courageous young woman who testified at the Commission's First National Victims' Public Hearing Rona Ami-nia Lian (Hear our voices) in Dili from 11-12 November 2002. She witnessed the murder of many people in the Suai Church, including her own family. The survivors were divided into two groups – approximately 75 were taken to the Kodim and another 50 to the school building. EF told the Commission:

> We were taken to the school building – approximately 50 people, including children. I overhead the militia say: "Don't kill that one, we'll rape her." I was scared and did not have the courage to look at them. On the way to the high school, we were escorted by Javanese police in uniform...At the school, we were all put into a dark room…A militia called PS189, a teacher from the village of Leogor, came to force me to sleep with him. But I refused. He became angry, kicked me in the back and slapped me on the face till it was swollen and I fell to the ground. Then he forced me to take off my clothes and raped me.

EF was repeatedly raped in the junior high school building. "On the night of 10 September, they interrogated me and demanded money. Because I was scared I gave Rp100,000 to PS398, Rp100,000 to PS399 and Rp50,000 to PS400. In the darkness we were raped together with other women." According to her testimony, at least three other women were raped that night by militia members named PS191 and PS192. On 13 September 1999, the refugees were put into a Hino truck with Indonesian soldiers and militia and taken to a camp [in West Timor] to stay with other refugees. Shortly afterwards, PS189 found EF and forced her into a situation of sexual slavery. EF stated:

> He said he had been looking for me for two days. He hit me with his handmade weapon right in the mouth, kicked me in the chest and hit my back in front of several people. That night he moved me to his house and when we arrived...he raped me again. I was with this man for three months and 16 days. During the day he would go out and keep me locked inside a room and when he returned he would open the door and do it again.[112]

Those who were kept in the Suai Kodim headquarters experienced the same sexual violence. FF sought refuge in the Suai Church in July 1999. Her husband was a member of CNRT who had already fled into the forest. She stated:

[T]he large-scale attack by the Laksaur militia in the Suai Church. Also taking part in the attack were Indonesian soldiers out of uniform. They were using handmade weapons – fire arms, machetes, samurai swords…I saw many dead people.

FF escaped death only to become a victim of rape and sexual slavery. After the massacre, the survivors were mustered:

We were made to gather and not move. They threatened to shoot anyone who moved. At about 3.00pm my family and I were moved to the Kodim. At about midnight on 7 September, PS192 threatened and raped me. I did not resist because I was too scared.

After five days FF was moved to the Koramil and then to an orphanage where she was raped again by the same man:

When he did that, there were four TNI soldiers outside on night duty. At 6.00am the following morning PS192 took me on a Yamaha motorcycle from the orphanage to Rai Henek Oan [Betun, West Timor]. There, he threatened me with a knife. As long as I was there I was his "wife". He said I had to be his mistress because my husband [did not support autonomy]. I had to become his mistress because I was a survivor of the Suai Church tragedy.[113]

GF was 15 when she, with her aunt and younger brother, sought refuge in the Suai Church. Her aunt testified about GF's kidnapping and sexual slavery:

During the massacre…GF's 13-year-old brother was killed. We were made to leave the church with other refugees. We were divided into two groups - some [were taken] to the Kodim and some to the high school in Suai. GF and I were in the Kodim for one week until 12 September 1999. At the Kodim, in front of me, PS193 and a member of Laksaur [militia], PS194, put a necklace around GF's neck. PS194 said: "This is my war prize. As of now, GF is my third wife." From that moment on GF was separated from her family and taken wherever PS194 went. GF was taken to live in the Laksaur headquarters in Raihenek, Betun, West Timor.[114]

In her testimony to the Commission, HF described how she was forcibly taken from the Suai Church to the Kodim after the massacre. During the eight days of her detention there she was repeatedly raped by PS195, PS196 and four other militia. On 14 September she was moved to Atambua where she was repeatedly raped by PS197, PS198 and four other Laksaur militia.[115]

A young woman, IF, narrowly escaped death during the massacre at the Suai Church. As the situation quieted:

My aunt and I and other refugees were staying at the Kodim. We were harassed throughout our stay there. Women were taken away at night. They would come with torches and shine them on us while we were sleeping. Then they would make the women go out with them.

IF said that on 14 September she was taken to Betun, West Timor, and that night she was raped:

At about 6.00 or 7.00pm four men came in a hardtop jeep. Two of them were armed. They took me in the jeep to a forest where two Laksaur militia took turns raping me.[116]

JF was one of the refugees taken to the Kodim then forcibly displaced to West Timor, where many survivors of the Suai Church Massacre were taken:

At the time, the survivors…women and children, were separated in two groups of approximately 100 people. We were taken to the Kodim and the others to the junior high school building. PS194, his brother, who was the village head of Moruk, and several other militia wearing black Laksaur T-shirts took us there. They were carrying handmade weapons, machetes and AR [a kind of semi-automatic rifle], whereas the military and police officers were in uniform but unarmed.

On 11 September, JF was taken to a refugee camp in Wemasa, West Timor. Nine days later some Laksaur militia – PS194, PS199, PS200, PS201 (a primary school teacher), PS202 and PS203 – grabbed JF, who was holding her child, and her sister-in-law and put them in a car with other women. They were taken to an isolated area where JF was raped in turns by PS199 and PS201. She described the rape:

PS199 took me away from the vehicle, told me to put my child on the ground and to take my clothes off. Then he raped me. When he finished I held my child again. When I got back to the car, I was taken away again by PS201 and he did the same to me. My child was crying, but there was nothing I could do because at the time I was feeling severe pain. After they raped me I was taken back. It was 1.00am. On the way back they were merry and laughing.[117]

A week later JF was raped again, this time by a member of the civilian staff of the Suai Kodim named PS204. The rape took place in the refugee camp in front of her mother and sister-in law.

KF remembers in detail how the refugees were deported to West Timor and how she was raped in a refugee camp. She testified:

On Wednesday [15 September 1999], a member of Kodim 1635, a Pratu [Private First Class] whose name I did not know, arrived in a truck and took 57 of us, including children, to Wemasa in West

Timor.…At 11.00 on the night of 5 October 1999, Commander PS194, PS202, PS200, PS190 and Pratu [Private First Class] PS206 from unit 144 came to our place while we were asleep. They were dressed in army fatigues and armed. They threatened to kill us. I was raped by [Laksaur] Commander PS194. When he was finished he said: "You are just like a slut to be used and then thrown away."[118]

LF1 also told about her experiences after the murder of Father Francisco and her husband during the massacre:

[T]hose of us who survived were ordered out [of the church]. We were shoved, kicked with boots, trodden upon and beaten. They pointed guns and machetes at us all the way from the church to the Kodim 1635 house…There were many people at the Kodim, among them Domingas, the wife of the [CNRT] zone leader of the Zumalai Sub-district, with her daughters, Zulmira, Fátima, Agustinha, Cinta and Monica…While at the Kodim we were verbally abused, ridiculed and given leftover food. The other women and I did not eat because we were afraid of being poisoned. On 13 September 1999…the Kasdim [Kodim chief of staff] ordered our move to Betun [West Timor] on four trucks…but at the Camenasa [Suai, Covalima] crossroads we were left by the side of the road.

On 14 September 1999, at about 7.00pm, a Laksaur member, PS208, took away my niece who was with me at the time. She was forced into a hardtop jeep and taken away. On the same evening at 7.30, a friend and I continued [our journey] with the help of a Mahidi member we knew…He took us by foot to Betun. We were escorted by two police officers on motorcycles. Walking from the Camenasa crossroads to Betun, West Timor, took eight hours. We arrived on 15 September 1999 at 10.00am. [Just as we arrived] my niece was brought back by Laksaur member PS208 on a motorcycle. When she got off the motorcycle she could not walk because she had been raped. She had injuries and blood on her genitals, I treated her…she drank [a concoction of] water and sirih [betel leaf], I washed her with sirih water and leaves that I had boiled.[119]

MF was abducted by a Laksaur militia, PS206, and taken to the Kodim.[120] After a short while there, MF and other refugees were moved to Wemasa, West Timor. On 21 October 1999 she was assaulted by a Laksaur militia, PS210. On that night, two Laksaur militia members, PS194 and PS190, forced her into a vehicle. At first they invited her to a party under the pretext that she could meet her husband there, but when she refused they just shoved her into the car. There was already another woman in the car. "At that time I said to my parents, 'If I am not back by morning, it means I am dead.'" At the Wemasa crossroads, PS190 raped MF and PS194 raped the other woman.

The rape and sexual slavery experienced by the women who survived the Suai Church Massacre show elements of a pattern:

- collaboration between the Indonesian security forces and the militia at the time of the massacre and afterwards;
- the placement of the victims in the Suai Kodim, school building, and in other places guarded by security forces;
- militia and police personnel had unimpeded access to the women staying in those places;
- the security forces and the police did not protect the women against the perpetration of sexual crimes.

154. As indicated above in the narratives of the rape and sexual slavery following the massacre at the Suai Church, sexual violence did not stop when refugees were in transit to West Timor or resettled there. On the contrary, women became more vulnerable to sexual violence once removed from their home communities. In the context of this large-scale population movement, many women were raped in transit.

155. In September 1999, the Dadurus Merah Putih (DMP) militia forced NF and others to move into the public gymnasium (GOR) in Maliana in preparation for evacuation to Atambua. At 4.00am, in the midst of these preparations, militia member PS211 grabbed NF, dragged her behind the GOR building and raped her. PS211 threatened to attack her brothers if she did not comply.[121]

156. OF of the aldeia of Ira Lau, Pairara (Moro, Lautém) was forcibly moved from her home in September 1999 by seven TNI soldiers from a Territorial Combat Battalion (BTT) who came to her village. They were ordered to go to Lautém. On arrival in Lautém, she was threatened with a bayonet and sword and then raped:

> While waiting for the boat on the Lautém beach, two TNI members I didn't know approached. They were armed with bayonets and swords. They threatened me and my children with their weapons. They raped me in turns. I gave in so they wouldn't kill my children.[122]

157. OF was then put on a boat to West Timor along with her four children and other members of her community.

158. On the other side of the territory, in the enclave of Oecussi, a member of the Sakunar militia raped PF when her husband was made to enlist as a refugee in September 1999. PF testified at the Commission's National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict held in April 2003:

> PS212, the Sakunar militia commander in Lela-Ufe, and PS213, a militia member, gave false information to my husband, telling him we should put our names on a list in order to be moved to safety at a place called Oelbinose in West Timor. The two men threatened him: "Whoever does not come will be destroyed inside their house." After my husband and others left, the two men came to my house. PS212…came [inside the house and] accused me of having prepared food for José Poto, a member of the clandestine movement. Without saying anything, he grabbed me, took me outside and dragged me to the traditional [round] house. PS213 remained behind with my five children who were crying hysterically.

I was scared and crying because there were only the two of us in the round house. I said to him: "Please, don't do this because I am married." Nevertheless PS212 took out a knife and held it to my chest. I was so scared I wet my sarong. Trembling, I said again: "If you want, go ahead and take the goat that is in the pen." He ignored my comments…PS212 pulled me and hugged me so that I couldn't move. He pushed me into a corner, up against the wall…and raped me for a very long time.[123]

159. The West Timor refugee camps provided no protection from rape, particularly for those who had been forcibly displaced and were encamped side-by-side with the militia members who had brought them there. On 14 September 1999, QF and four of her friends were abused in Wedare (Suai, Covalima) where they had been hiding. They were taken from Wedare by a militia called PS214 along with four of his friends to their Mahidi militia post in Betun. QF and her friends were detained there for three days and three nights. After that an East Timorese village police officer (Bintara Polisi Desa, Binpolda) named PS401 took QF from the militia post in Betun to Wemata (Belu, West Timor) where he raped her.[124]

160. In September 1999, RF and her three children were refugees in Haliulun, Atambua. Her husband and son stayed behind in Timor-Leste. While she was in Haliulun, an Aitarak militia named PS126 asked her to sleep with him while offering her Rp20,000. When RF refused, PS216 threatened her with a machete and raped her. An eyewitness saw the rape.[125]

161. SF from Tilomar, Covalima, recounts a similar experience which occurred in September 1999. According to SF's testimony, her husband had already fled to the forest for fear of being attacked by the Laksaur militia. Under threat of a handmade gun,* SF was raped by one of the three militia members in her own (refugee) residence:

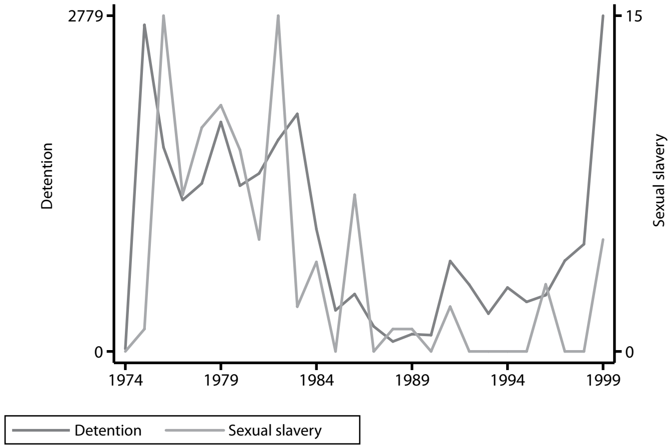
On 10 September 1999, in Manumutin, Betun [Belu, West Timor], three Laksaur militia – PS217, PS218 and PS219 – came to my house [refugee quarters in Betun]. They were armed with handmade guns and swords. PS218 and PS219 told me that the three of them were going to rape me. I replied to PS219: "You are already married to my mother's sister and I call you uncle. Why must you rape me, your child?" Of the three, only

* The use of handmade pistols (senjata rakitan) was very common among militia in 1999. For a photograph and explanation of how a three-barreled pistol was assembled by militia, see Appendix 3 and 4 in K Campbell-Nelson, YA Damapolii, L Simanjuntak and F Tadu Hungu, Perempuan dibawa/h Laki-laki yang Kalah: Kekerasan terhadap Perempuan Timor Timur dalam Kamp Pengungsian di Timor Barat [Women Carried by/Underneath Men Who Lost: Violence Against East Timorese Women in Refugee Camps in West Timor], JKPIT and PIKUL, Kupang, pp. 247, 249.

PS219 raped me. He held my hands behind me and dragged me outside the house. He threw me down with my head to the west and my feet to the east. After stripping me, PS219 raped me…While raping me, PS219 held a handmade gun that he had at my chest. After this, TNI came from Atambua and forced us [including the refugees in that region] to leave for Atambua. I was forced to join the other refugees going to Atambua because my husband was still in Suai [he had run to the forest]. After that I wasn't bothered again.[126]

Sexual slavery

162. Sexual slavery is illegal under the general prohibition on slavery. The UN Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Slavery defines sexual slavery as "the status or condition of a person over whom any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership are exercised, including sexual access through rape or other forms of sexual violence." She further explains:



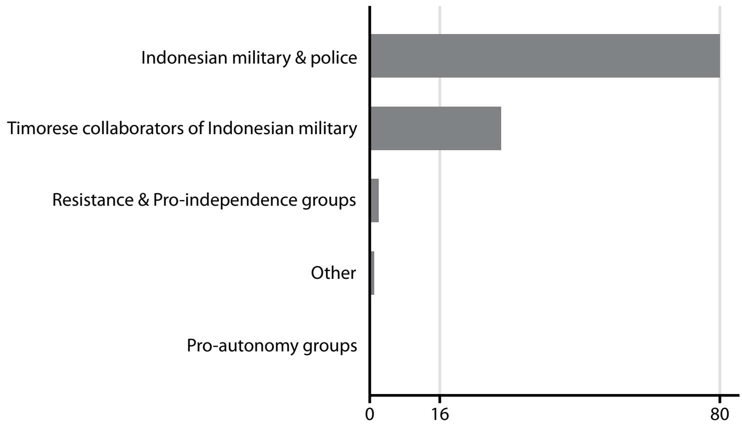
> Sexual slavery also encompasses situations where women and girls are forced into "marriage", domestic servitude or other forced labour that ultimately involves forced sexual activity, including rape by their captors.[128]

163. Sexual enslavement in international armed conflict or occupation is a violation of Article 27 of Geneva Convention IV and would be a grave breach of that convention (Article 147). It may also amount to a crime against humanity if committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population.

164. The Commission received evidence of a significant number of cases that can be categorised as sexual slavery. Many of the cases included practices that were striking in their similarity. A small number of cases involved members of East Timorese political parties as perpetrators. In the vast majority of cases members of the Indonesian security forces were the predominant class of perpetrators. Three main patterns of sexual slavery were identified by the Commission.

165. One common practice was for Indonesian officers to keep East Timorese women in conditions of sexual slavery in military installations. Ownership in these cases was either individual or collective. In other words, women could be raped by one repeat offender or by a group of offenders. Their detention was logistically supported as part of everyday military operations with the knowledge of the local military commander. The following graph shows correlation between reported acts of detention and sexual slavery during the period of the conflict.

Violations over time, 1974–1999



Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

166. A second form of military sexual slavery did not require the physical detention of women at military installations. Instead, women were summoned as required by members of the military for sexual purposes. In effect, these women were considered the property of a military unit and therefore had to provide sexual services to members of the unit if, and when, required to do so. These cases also involved the use of military installations. In some cases, a woman's name was put on a special list and the information regarding her sexual availability was passed from one battalion to the next when there was a rotation of troops in a given area.

167. A third pattern of sexual slavery involved a member of security forces establishing ownership of a woman in a domestic setting, usually her house. In this form of sexual slavery, the perpetrator would often threaten the woman or her family with death if she did not make herself available to him for sex on demand, and often also to perform other domestic work. In the circumstances of Timor-Leste, such a threat could reasonably be expected to be acted out if the demands were not complied with. In some cases, a woman would have to choose between this exclusive arrangement or repeated gang rape. The victim of this common pattern of violation was often colloquially called a "TNI mistress" or a "TNI wife". However, in reality, there was no marriage and no consent freely given by the victim to engage in sexual relations with the perpetrator.

Count of sexual slavery, 1974–1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR
Note: Some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators.

168. The Commission recognises that some genuine marriages took place between Indonesian security personnel and East Timorese women based on mutual agreement. These consensual unions, either formalised by civil registry, traditional law (lisan or lulik in Tetum, adat in Indonesian), religious rite, or as a de facto marriage, do not constitute a human rights violation. The Commission also notes that some East Timorese women willingly entered into a relationship with members of Indonesian security forces for economic reasons. The Commission considers these relationships as consensual unions which do not constitute a human rights violation.

The victim's perspective

169. In several cases the situation of sexual slavery continued over a number of years. This prolonged exercise of ownership by the perpetrator produced even more complicated results, particularly if children were born in these relationships. Some victims were alienated from their families and communities. They became financially and socially dependent on the military officer who controlled them, leaving little realistic option of escaping the situation.

170. Victims of sexual slavery used a variety of euphemisms to describe their experiences. Some simply described the first act of rape and then added "this continued for one year". Others said simply that they were made into "a whore" ("lonte" or "feto nona" (see footnote, par. 27). Others used the colloquial term of "istri TNI" (TNI wife).

171. These euphemisms reflect prejudices and stereotypes against women who became victims of sexual slavery. Whatever term was used to describe the violation, sexual slavery carried a stigma for the victim. This often resulted in isolation from her family, ridicule from the community and discrimination against the woman and her children, including in some cases by church officials. Despite these barriers, women broke the silence and with great courage told the Commission about their experiences of sexual slavery.

Sexual slavery in the context of inter-party conflict

172. The Commission found evidence of sexual slavery that occurred in the context of the inter-party conflict in 1975.

173. TF1 from village of Seloi Kraik (Aileu Town, Aileu) testified to the Commission about the sexual slavery of TF that began when Fretilin detained TF1, TF and seven others. In August 1975 TF1, three other women and five men were abducted from their fields by Fretilin troops from another village. Suspected as UDT sympathisers and accused of hiding weapons, they were beaten and interrogated at the Fretilin headquarters before being taken to the Aissirimou prison in Aileu where they were further interrogated. They were finally released, but were made to pound rice and clear land [for planting] for one month. One night, PS220, a member of Fretilin, entered the room where four women were asleep and forcibly took TF away. TF1 stated:

> PS220 came into the room [occupied] by us four women and dragged her out of the room. That night he raped TF and he continued the relationship until they married and had children.[129]

174. UF testified about the killing of her husband in 1978 in the village of Maulau (Maubisse, Ainaro), by three members of the UDT party known as PS221, PS222 and PS223. After the killing, PS221 coerced UF into a sexual relationship threatening to kill her if she refused. UF gave birth to a child from that relationship.[130]

175. In May 1977, VF and members of her family were detained by Fretilin on suspicion of treason. VF testified to the Commission about the detention and torture by Fretilin that she experienced and witnessed at Fretilin's Renal centre (Rehabilitação Nacional, National Rehabilitation) in Remexio (Aileu). * At the end of her account, VF mentioned that one of the female detainees was forced to marry a member of Fretilin:

> Six of us women were held [in the Fretilin detention centre in Roluli]… for two weeks. Throughout that period I was often beaten, kicked and interrogated. They separated us [the detainees] into two groups: men and women. My group was taken to a new place of detention known as a Renal in Remexio, Aileu. During the journey our hands were bound behind our backs and we were all tied together with a long rope pulled by Fretilin… Almost all those detained in the Renal died, including all my aunts and grandmother. They all died of starvation…On 25 June 1978 we ran helter-

* Renal detention centres were Fretilin detention camps in the interior in the 1970s after the invasion. They were used to incarcerate and "re-educate" Fretilin members on political ideas. They were also the site of numerous human rights violations [see section on Renals in Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment.]

skelter out of Renal as the Indonesian soldiers were closing in and attacking the population in that area. On that day we fled to Roluli. There, the four of us [women] went our separate ways to live with and cook for Fretilin commanders. My friend VF lived with Commander PS224, WF lived with Commander PS225, while XF and I lived with Commander PS226…After that we continued our trip separately together with the commanders…On 19 January 1979, we all…surrendered, including Commander PS226, in Metinaro [Manatuto]. Before we surrendered, my friend XF was forced to marry PS227, a member of Falintil.[131]

Sexual slavery during the Indonesian occupation (1975–1999)

176. The Commission found evidence that sexual slavery took place in the context of the Indonesian occupation. Victim and eyewitness testimonies suggest that incidents of sexual slavery increased during periods of known major Indonesian military offensives. Significant increases in cases of sexual slavery occurred in the late 1970s, again in 1982 during the levantamento period and in 1999 around the time of the Popular Consultation.

Sexual slavery during the invasion and large-scale operations (1975–1984)

177. The Commission's database of documented sexual slavery cases shows 63% occurred during the period of the Indonesian invasion and large-scale military operations between 1975 and 1984. Cases of sexual slavery during this period can be divided into two distinct patterns: military sexual slavery and domestic sexual slavery.

A. Military sexual slavery in military installations

178. The Commission has gathered strong evidence that points to the practice of sexual slavery which was institutionally tolerated and supported by the Indonesian military.[132] In cases where the victims were detained in military installations during the period of sexual slavery, the culpability of the military is obvious.

179. YF told the Commission about her experiences of detention and sexual slavery when she was about 15 years old. When the Indonesian army invaded, YF and her family, who were known as Fretilin supporters, fled to the forest from the village of Lauana (Ermera). In 1977, YF, her family and an old woman named YF1 were caught by Indonesian soldiers. They were taken to the Letefoho Koramil in Ermera for interrogation and then were ordered back into the forest to convince other Fretilin members to surrender. At the time, YF's brother, who had been captured and detained at the same time as YF, was able to prevent her from taking part in the operation. YF returned to her house in Lauana. YF1, however, went on the operation and was shot in the back by the military. Sometime later, soldiers went to YF's house and arrested her again. YF told the Commission:

The military recaptured me and my cousin, ZF, and we were taken from Lauana to the Koramil in Letefoho. In Letefoho two military men, whose names I have forgotten, forced ZF and me to have sex with them at the Koramil. They pushed us into two separate rooms and threatened us: "You are Fretilin and if you do not want [to do it] with us, we'll shoot you dead." We did not want to die so we just submitted to the soldiers who raped us.[133]

180. After the soldiers raped the two girls, they forced them to stand by the flagpole in the hot sun. They slapped them and threatened to shoot them. An East Timorese soldier at the Koramil stopped this. After four days in the Letefoho Koramil, YF was transferred to the Ermera Kodim where she was detained for one year (1977–1978). YF said of her time at the Ermera Kodim:

*The raping continued and I was not allowed to meet my family because we were all Fretilin. During my detention at the Kodim, the Peltu [the chief warrant officer], whose name I forget, continually harassed me and used me like a whore (nona).*[134]

181. YF gave evidence that two other women caught in Hauhei (Hatolia, Ermera) were also repeatedly raped by the soldiers in the Ermera Kodim. YF gave birth to two children, one of whom died.

182. In many cases of military sexual slavery, military resources were used to commit this sexual crime. Like YF, who was unlawfully arrested and detained, AG told the Commission about her experiences of rape and sexual slavery, first at the Hatolia Koramil in Ermera and then at the Maliana Kodim in Bobonaro:

In 1977 an Indonesian soldier, PS228, came to my house, threatened my parents and took me to the Hatolia Koramil…[there he] undressed me, laid me down on the cot and used me like a prostitute. [This continued] for a year.[135]

183. On completion of his tour of duty, PS228 abandoned AG. Two years later, he was again stationed in Timor-Leste, this time at the Maliana Kodim. He ordered two Hansip members to bring AG to him. Once again, under the threat of death, AG's parents had to surrender their daughter to the Indonesian soldier. AG was taken to the Maliana Kodim barracks and again forced into a situation of sexual slavery for three years. She gave birth to two children. PS228 claimed AG as his exclusive sexual property over a number of years. The fact that he ordered two Hansip members to fetch AG from the sub-district of Hatolia, which was under the control of the Ermera Kodim, to take her to the Maliana Kodim, clearly demonstrates the use of military resources and authority between Kodims in the commission of this crime (see also case below, par. 193, of PS229, Head of Intelligence Section, Ainaro Kodim).

184. Women were not only detained for sexual slavery in Kodim (district) and Koramil (sub-district) posts, but also in military posts throughout the territory. BG describes her detention and sexual slavery at the Battalion 145 post in Hatolia:

In 1977 in the town of Hatolia, the commander of Battalion 145, PS230 from South Sumatra, threatened to shoot my brother…with a gun in order to force me to go to the TNI [i.e., ABRI] post. [There he] used me as a prostitute for one year until eventually I gave birth to a child. At the time I was still a young girl.[136]

185. BG also testified that another woman, known to her as CG, was also forced to live at the Yonif 145 post. Like BG, CG was coerced into a situation of sexual slavery and eventually gave birth to a child. When Battalion 145 left Timor-Leste, the two women and their two children were abandoned without any means of support. The two women were in a situation of sexual slavery at this military post until both women became pregnant and gave birth to a child. This indicates that this practice was known and tolerated by the military.

186. Women known to have a role in Falintil were all vulnerable to sexual slavery. This included women who surrendered after having fled to the mountains and, in particular, women known to be married to Falintil leaders. DG, who two years previously had witnessed the gang rape of her sister E in Lauana, Ermera, became a guerrilla fighter and was married in a civil ceremony to a Falintil Commander named DG1. They were separated during battle and in 1977 DG heard that her husband had been killed in Aidea, Aiasa (Bobonaro, Bobonaro). A year later DG surrendered in Cailaco (Bobonaro). DG told the Commission:

Because [ABRI] knew I was the wife of Commander DG1, the Hatolia Koramil commander, a man from Sulawesi named PS231, forced me and used me as a prostitute for one year…[Then] he just abandoned me with the child born of this relationship.[137]

187. EG1 gave evidence to the Commission about the sexual slavery of his sister EG. According to his testimony, she was targeted because her brother was a Falintil commander. In 1979, after four members of her family were killed by Indonesian bombs dropped on the aldeia of Fatuacan, Fahinehan (Fatuberliu, Manufahi), EG1 and his family surrendered to the head of the aldeia of Riamori, in Fahinehan Village, named PS233. EG1's older brother, EG2, a Falintil commander, also surrendered. EG1 told the Commission:

The village head [of Fahinehan] informed Linud 100 that EG2 was a high-ranking commander in the forest and therefore he would have to be killed or, if not, TNI [sic] would have to take or marry his sister. Then they came for my sister, EG. They took her to the military post and raped her in turns. They continued to do this until 1980 when they [Linud 100] were demobilised and replaced by Battalion 643. They also took me to become a TBO at that post…I saw my sister being raped with my own eyes. When they left Fahinehan, she was released [and allowed] to go home.[138]

188. In 1979, FG, who was aged 14 at the time, surrendered to the Indonesian military in the village of Mulo (Hato Builico, Ainaro). With two other friends, FG was held in a room at the Hato Builico Koramil. There, the Koramil commander and his deputy, respectively known as PS402 and PS403, stripped and raped them. FG told the Commission:

> They raped me and my friends every night throughout the one week of our detention. The first time I was raped I bled and could not walk.[139]

189. FG had a child as a result of rape. She told the Commission that two years later an ABRI soldier, PS404 > came [to my house] to force me to marry him…I was scared because it was an increasingly heated situation where many people were being detained… [I]n the end [I gave in to him and] had a child from this union.[140]

190. In this case, FG and her friends were victims of repeated rape while detained at the Hato Builico Koramil (Ainaro), and two years later FG was the victim of domestic sexual slavery.[141]

191. In some cases, sexual slavery included forced recruitment into military operations to find Falintil, as experienced by GG. In 1979, two ABRI soldiers from Infantry Battalion 121, a Corporal PS234 from South Sumatra and an unknown man, detained GG from her home in the aldeia of Nun Sorau, Ma'abat (Manatuto, Manatuto). They took her to the Manatuto Kodim. "If I refused they would kill my father. Because I was terrified, in the end I resigned myself." After being raped on the floor, the following day GG was taken back home. "From then on I was used as his 'comfort wife' for six months and gave birth to a child as a result." While GG was pregnant she was forced to go into the forest carrying 5 kilograms of rice, food, cigarettes and two letters. The letters – one from the Kodim and the other from Battalion 121 – were an appeal to members of Fretilin still in the forest to surrender. Eventually GG met some Fretilin members who knew her but she was detained at the Fretilin command post for five days. Eventually GG was able to escape and go back to report to the Kodim in Manatuto. A few days later she was forced to go with a battalion on another search for Fretilin's places but they did not find anything. The following day she had to follow another military operation:

> Three TNI [sic] from Battalion 121 whose names I did not know threatened me with a gun and a grenade so that I would lead them into the forest to search for Fretilin's armed resistance. Because I refused, I was kicked three times on the thigh till I fell. I was one month pregnant at the time. I was told to stand and continued being forced [to walk on].[142]

192. GG returned to the village of Cribas (Manatuto, Manatuto) with this military unit in a convoy of three Hino vehicles. She was forced to climb mountains and stay in the forest with the soldiers but they failed to find any Falintil troops. The sexual slavery aspect of this case is clearly evident; the abduction from her house, the threat to her family's safety, the rape and the involvement in military operations were not of her own free will. Battalion 121 exercised the right of ownership over GG although only Corporal PS234 had sexual access to her.

193. In the following case, a head of the intelligence section was able to transfer two female detainees from the Koramil in Hato-Udo (Ainaro) to the Kodim in Ainaro strictly for his private sexual use. In 1980, MB and NB surrendered in Betano (Same, Manufahi) and were taken to the Koramil in Hato-Udo. Having heard of their capture, the head of intelligence (Kasi I Intel) from the Ainaro Kodim, known as PS229, went to interrogate them. After PS229 returned to Ainaro, he ordered two Hansip members to fetch the women from the Hato Udo Koramil and take them to the Ainaro Kodim:

> We stayed there, [then] Kasi I Intel [Head of Intelligence Section] PS229 called me and NB to [his place] to use us both. In a week, he would rape us for five days and five nights. He did this to us for one year. I had a child from this relationship.[143]

B. Military sexual slavery outside military installations

194. The Commission found evidence of sexual slavery where women, not held inside military bases, were still summoned by ABRI at will for sexual abuse by soldiers. Although not physically detained at a military compound, such victims were nonetheless under absolute military control. In some cases, women's names were on a list or file held by the military, which required them to make themselves available sexually for military personnel. These lists or files were handed down from one battalion to another. As HG of Lautém related to the Commission:

> My name was on the Kodim list as a person who could be "used". So with every [troop] rotation I would always be picked by a member of ABRI who wanted me. I always submitted to them because I feared for my life.[144]

195. IG was a victim of military sexual slavery for a period of one year that ended when she agreed to a situation of domestic sexual slavery with a Babinsa. In 1977, IG was taken from her home in the aldeia of Uaturidi, Bahú (Baucau, Baucau) by Combat Team Regiment (RTP) 15 and Infantry Battalion 330 troops. She was interrogated and tortured. "[They] burned my lips with cigarette butts, slapped me, kicked me…then told me to go home." IG was arrested again a year later, this time in the aldeia of Anawaru, Caibada Uaimua (Baucau, Baucau) and taken to the Baucau ABRI headquarters. "At the TNI [sic] headquarters, soldiers raped me repeatedly for four days. If I refused [they said they] would shoot me dead." After four days IG was released and returned to her home in Anawaru:

> But…every morning at 08.00 I was called by the TNI [sic] to be with the soldiers as husband and wife. If I refused I would be killed. All this happened because at that time my husband was still with the Falintil guerrillas.[145]

196. The situation continued for one year. In 1979, IG was beaten when she refused an ABRI soldier who wanted to have sexual intercourse with her. "I was under great stress at the time, so in the end I reluctantly gave myself to a Babinsa who wanted to marry me." She had two children from that relationship.[146]

197. G1 testified about his sister's ordeal of sexual slavery in 1978, when G1 and his family surrendered to Infantry Battalion 122 in Lauana Village (Letefoho, Ermera). At the time G was forced to become the sexual property of Battalion 122. She was only 17 years old. G1 told the Commission:

> When we surrendered, my sister G was still a virgin. The soldiers and the Hansip raped her. When the soldiers needed to satisfy their lust, they would take [G] to the post to use her. Because of these sexual violations G never married – she lives alone.[147]

C. Domestic sexual slavery

198. The Commission received evidence of cases of sexual slavery where a woman, sensing threat from armed security personnel, was forced to enter into a long-term sexual relationship in a domestic setting. In many cases of domestic sexual slavery reported to the Commission, the victim was raped prior to being forced into a long-term sexual relationship with the perpetrator.

199. The Commission received corroborating evidence regarding the case of sexual slavery experienced by JG. In 1980, ABRI was distributing corn flour to the population of Welaluhu Sub-district (now known as Fatuberliu) in Manufahi District. Two men and three women – JG, KG, LG – were detained and tortured. The three women were separated from the other detainees, placed in a house near the Koramil and raped repeatedly by the Koramil Commander, PS239, and his deputy. JG was raped for nearly 40 days by the deputy Koramil commander. Two weeks after JG was released, the deputy Koramil commander went to her house and forced her to "marry" him. This relationship continued for one month until this deputy finished his tour of duty in Timor-Leste.[148]

200. MG gave testimony about the rape and domestic sexual slavery she experienced in her own home in 1982 when she was only 15 years old. This case, which took place in the village of Manlala (Soibada, Manatuto) demonstrates the powerlessness of the local population and the civilian government in relation to the Indonesian security forces.

> In 1982, on my way home from school, I was chased by a member of Nanggala [Special Warfare Command] named PS240. I could not run fast so he caught up with me and raped me [in a place called] Besarin. A few hours later, my teacher, Lourdes, arrived at the place of the rape because my friends told her what had happened…
>
> When my father returned from the fields, he was very angry and he beat me although I was still a child. My father could not stand to see me like that and in the end he reported the incident to the government Sub-district head [Camat], a man named PS241, [so that he would] prohibit PS240 from having any contact with me. Instead Nanggala PS240 became very angry and beat and kicked my father until he bled. A week later Nanggala

PS240 came to the house and stayed there for the night. From then on he forced me to become his comfort wife, till I became pregnant. After the child was born he began to avoid [me], till [eventually] he was transferred to Baucau.[149]

201. A similar case was reported by NG1. In 1983, when NG1 was still a 12-year-old child in the village of Sananain (Laclubar, Manatuto), PS242, an Indonesian member of the village police (Binpolda), often visited NG1's family house. One night PS242 called and asked for NG1's sister, NG. NG1's parents tried to prevent PS242, but he forced his way into NG's bedroom. NG1 also tried to protect his sister, but PS242 threatened to shoot him. That night NG was raped in her home. After that night, PS242 decided that he would stay at the house from time to time in order to have sexual relations with NG. This situation continued until PS242 completed his tour of duty in Sananain. NG gave birth to a child as a result of these violations.[150]

202. The table below provides a brief summary of some cases of domestic sexual slavery during this period.

Table 1 - Summary of cases of domestic sexual slavery, 1975–1984

HRVD Statement Number	Year	Location	Perpetrator	Brief description	Duration of sexual slavery
01792	1975	Rairobo, Atabae, Bobonaro	Unnamed police	Under threat of being burnt alive, OG1 surrendered his daughter to a policeman. Two children were born of this relationship.	More than one year
01167	1975–1976	Atabae, Bobonaro	PS243, from Sulawesi Indonesia, member of the Maliana Koramil	First Sergeant PS243 forcibly entered PG's home. Under threat of death, she was forced to accept an on-going sexual relationship with him. A child was born of this relationship, but abandoned by PS243 when he returned to Indonesia.	More than nine months
01827	1975–1978	Atabae, Bobonaro	PS126, East Timorese, Partisan	When Partisan troops entered Aidabaleten Village, QG was raped for five hours by PS126. She was then forced into a situation of sexual slavery with him that lasted three years.	Three years

06190	1976–1978	Hatolia and Ermera, Ermera	PS245, District Administrator of Ermera, East Timorese	After surrendering to ABRI in the village of Samara, RG and her family were taken to Ermera. There, PS245, the district administrator of Ermera, made RG stand in line with three other girls. He selected her to be his "mistress"; he began a non-consensual sexual relationship with her.	Two years
07905	1976	Sau, Manatuto	PS246, field artillery soldier.	PS246 threatened to kill SG's parents; he then raped her in her own house. This situation continued for seven months.	Seven months
06193	1978	Hatolia Ermera	Unnamed soldier in Battalion 721	Under threat that he would kill her brother, an ABRI soldier from Battalion 721 forcibly took H from her village in Hatolia to live with him in Dili.	Six months
04108	1978–1979	Rotutu, Same, Manufahi	PS247, ABRI, Indonesian	TG was threatened by 10 Hansip members who claimed they would kill her whole family if she did not accept PS247 advances. PS247 lived with TG and her family for two months. TG was pregnant when PS247 forced her to move with him to Betano. They lived in Betano until their child was a year old before PS247 returned to Sulawesi, Indonesia.	More than one year
01161	1978–1981	Atabae, Bobonaro	PS248, Army Special Forces Regiment (RPKAD), Indonesian	PS248 threatened UG with death if she rejected his sexual advances. Three children were born from this relationship and deserted by PS248 upon his return to Indonesia.	Three years
06355	1979	Raimea-Biluli, Ermera	PS249, Commander Infantry Battalion 401, Indonesian	PS249 and nine other soldiers went to the house of VG. PS249 threatened to kill VG's brother if she rejected his advances. She submitted because she feared for her brother's life. PS249 continued to rape VG in her home. She eventually gave birth to a son who later died.	More than nine months

01066	1979–1981	Dukurai, Letefoho, Ermera	Liurai PS250, Village Chief	WG was detained by PS250 and a Hansip member named PS340. She was beaten, then forced into a situation of sexual slavery with PS250 who lived with WG in her parents' house. She had two children from this relationship.	Two years
00566	1979	Uailacama, Vemasse, Baucau	PS251, Babinsa of Vemasse, Indonesian	PS251 accused J and her father of working with Fretilin and threatened to kill them. In exchange for sparing their lives, PS251 took J and lived with her at the Vemasse Koramil. A child was born of this relationship.	One year
05212	1980	Lenao, Manatuto	PS252, ABRI soldier, Indonesian	The victim was raped under threat of death at her own home, then forced to accept an on-going sexual relationship. When PS252 was transferred to Soibada (Manatuto) he took her with him. She had a child from this relationship. He returned to Indonesia.	More than nine months
03527	1984–1987	Railaco Kraik, Railaco, Ermera	PS253, Babinsa, originally from Central Java	PS253 confiscated the possessions of XG. That night he went to her house threatening to kill members of her family. She was raped and then forced to accept an on-going sexual relationship in her home. She had a child from this relationship.	Three years

D. Consecutive domestic sexual slavery

203. The Commission received evidence of cases of consecutive domestic sexual slavery, perpetrated by different offenders on the same victim.[151] The Commission has evidence that sexual "ownership" was passed from one member of the Indonesian security forces to his replacement.

204. YG became the victim of sexual slavery by three Indonesian soldiers consecutively. In 1980 YG was nearly shot by a police officer and ABRI soldiers when she was in the fields with her children. Accused of having joined Falintil, YG was taken to the Alas Koramil (Manufahi). On the way, they threatened to kill her and throw her in the river. At the Alas Koramil, YG was interrogated for three days. Then the Alas Koramil commander, known as PS254, forced YG to give in to his sexual advances and eventually she had a child. The Koramil commander died soon after the child was born. In 1982 YG was again forced into sexual slavery, this time with an Indonesian soldier named PS255. From this relationship she gave birth to a stillborn baby. A year later, for the third time, YG was forced into sexual slavery with a member of ABRI whose name was not disclosed. The soldier left YG after a month on completion of his tour of duty.[152]

205. ZG was forced into a situation of sexual slavery that continued for one year and involved four consecutive perpetrators from different military units. In 1981, ZG was only 16 years old when PS256, the village head of Mindelo (Turiscai, Manufahi) went to ZG's house in the middle of the night with PS257, an Indonesian soldier. PS256 threatened to kill ZG's brother if he did not surrender his sister. ZG was forced into a sexual relationship with PS257 that lasted for two months. After PS257 left the region when his battalion was moved, another Indonesian soldier named PS258 arrived in the area and, with a member of Hansip, went to ZG's house. With threats, he forced ZG into a sexual relationship that lasted four months. After PS258 left he was followed by another Indonesian soldier, PS259, and later yet by another Indonesian soldier named PS260. Each of them forced ZG to have an on-going sexual relationship that lasted the duration of their duty in this region (one to four months). In 1984 another soldier whose name was not known to the victim tried again to force a sexual relationship with ZG. ZG explained to the Commission:

> I surrendered myself to be killed. I said to him, "If you want to kill me, go ahead, but I don't want to live in a situation like that again." So it didn't happen.[153]

206. As a result of her situation, ZG became mentally unstable.[154]

207. At the beginning of the 1980s, the Indonesian military considered the district of Lautém a stronghold of the Resistance, which it termed the "security disturbers movement" (Gerakan Pengacau Keamanan, GPK). Consequently, large-scale military operations were conducted in this district, increasing the incidence of sexual violence against women. In the sub-district of Lospalos torture, rape and sexual slavery were widespread. HG, whose name was on a list of "available women" at the Lospalos Kodim headquarters (see par. 194 above), was one among several women who told the Commission of her capture, and the torture and sexual violence she then experienced. In 1981, HG's husband, a member of a civil defence group of the Indonesian military known as Trained Civilians (Rakyat Terlatih, Ratih), was shot dead during a Falintil attack. A year later in 1982, HG was captured by the Indonesian military under suspicion of helping her uncle who was in the forest.

> They made me walk from the house to the Maluro [Lore I Village] post where I was detained for three days. While at the post, they stripped me naked and pulled my pubic hair, then they electrocuted me on the genitals and…on the ears. I was captured with all the young girls of Maluro. We were all stripped naked before the population of Maluro, then they inserted large batteries inside our vaginas.

208. HG was interrogated, tortured and raped for three days. Following this she was sent home, though she was summoned every night and, along with a mother and daughter, forced to sexually "service" the soldiers. She described:

> Each of us had to have sexual intercourse with one man until they returned to their own provinces. Mine was an Indonesian soldier named PS262.

After he finished with me I was not allowed to go home but was made to sleep there with him. My friend and her daughter were sent back home. One day PS262 was transferred to the Kodim in Lospalos. I was taken there too, to live with him. When I became pregnant he told me to go back to my home in Maluro. After I gave birth, he never cared for the child who eventually died of malnutrition…

The second person to claim me [sic, it is actually the third person counting the man who first raped her] was PS263 [Indonesian]. He ordered me and a group of other people to go into the forest to look for Falintil members… They made me walk about 100 metres in front of them, then they followed, always watching me from the back. During the operations in the forest I was made to wear ABRI fatigues but I was not given a weapon. During the journey I had to have sexual intercourse with PS263 whenever he wanted. When I became pregnant he asked a friend, trained as a nurse, to give me an injection to make me abort, but I refused.

I have forgotten the name of my fourth "husband". The fifth was named PS264 [Indonesian]. In the end I had five children from five different fathers. The father of my first child who died, was from the Komando Unit. The father of the second child was from Unit 412. The third was from Unit 413. I forgot the name and unit of the fourth child's father. The last child's father was PS264, I do not remember from which unit.[155]

209. Like HG, AH was also subjected to several forms of violence. In 1983, her husband was captured and detained for several years at the Lospalos Kodim (Lautém). Soon afterwards, AH was also captured by PS265, a member of the Secret Warfare Command (Nanggala) combat unit, and a soldier from Yonif Unit 642, Company A. She was taken to the ABRI post in Maluro, Lore I Village where she was tortured and raped by several ABRI soldiers for about a week. After her release, soldiers also went to her home where she lived with her two small children and raped her there. She had to report daily to the Maluro post from 1983 to 1987. Often when she went to report they would call her in to be interrogated and raped.[156]

210. BH was detained and tortured because she refused the sexual advances of a soldier. Then she became the victim of domestic sexual slavery perpetrated by two Indonesian soldiers in succession.[157] The Commission also received the testimony of CH who told of her capture, sexual torture and sexual slavery at the Maluro post. Like HG, she said that her name was listed in ABRI files and that she could be passed by a soldier from one battalion to the next as troops rotated in and out of Maluro.

In 1983, I was captured by ABRI soldiers from Unit 372 because [a member of my family] was still in the forest. I also gave cassava, sweet potatoes and beans to Xanana and Falintil who harvested them directly from my fields. An informer reported this and so ABRI soldiers came and seized me from my house and took me to the ABRI post in Maluro. On arrival, they stripped me naked and interrogated me. They hit me with their hands and with sticks, they bound me and kicked me, burned me with cigarette butts, and other forms of torture. During the interrogation another member pinched me and squeezed my breasts, but I remained passive because there was nothing I could do. They pulled my pubic hair and then raped me. They raped me in turns. Every time they needed it, I had to do it with them. If not, they would beat me black and blue. I was detained at the ABRI post for two years. My main duties while in detention were to wash their clothes, cook and take care of their sexual needs. In the end I had a child by an ABRI soldier named PS266 [Indonesian].[158]

E. Case study: rape and sexual slavery in Mau Chiga, Ainaro

211. To better understand the context in which sexual slavery occurred, the Commission conducted a special investigation on the human rights violations that took place in Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) from 1982–1987. Sexual slavery, rape and other forms of sexual violence took place at the same time as mass detention, torture, killings, and, finally, exile to the island of Ataúro and other isolated areas.

212. At dawn on 20 August 1982, Falintil troops and men from Dare and Mau Chiga attacked the Dare Koramil and other ABRI posts in the area. A heated battle ensued when ABRI and Hansip forces immediately returned fire. On the same day ABRI in the area launched a retaliation attack against the civilian population of Dare and Mau Chiga. They were soon reinforced by ABRI troops, including Infantry Battalions 745 and 746, deployed to the area from the surrounding areas. From 20-24 August, ABRI razed the village of Mau Chiga and the population fled and scattered in all directions, including up Kablaki Mountain. ABRI gave chase to the fleeing population and captured most of the women who were then detained in several places: the Kodims in Same and Ainaro; the Koramils in Maubisse (Ainaro), Lesuati (Same, Manufahi) and Dare (Ainaro); the Dare primary school building; the Dare market; and in tents or temporary huts in Dare. Except for those in the school building, most detainees were then relocated to more permanent detention sites on the island of Ataúro, in Dotik (Manufahi) and locations in and around Dare.

213. Civilians captured in Mau Chiga were taken to the Lesuati (Same, Manufahi) ABRI post after their homes were burnt down. After several weeks in Lesuati, these detainees, as well as those being held at the Kodims in Same and Ainaro, were transferred in Hino trucks to the Balide Prison in Dili. As the trucks were full, some detainees waited for another week or so for more trucks to come and get them. When they did not, the remaining detainees in Lesuati were forced to walk for several hours until they reached the Dare Koramil in early September 1982.

214. When the makeshift detention centres around Dare were full, some detainees were allowed to stay in the houses of the Dare community. Detainees living in civilian homes had to report for a daily roll call at the Dare Koramil. Meanwhile, the women in the detention centres were strictly guarded and controlled. They were separated from the men of their families and cut off from social or emotional support from their community.

215. Sexual violence towards the women of Mau Chiga began shortly after they were detained. For example, six of the women held in Lesuati reported they were taken to another ABRI post in Mantutu (not far from Lesuati). DH, EH, and FH were sexually tortured (see par. 310 below) while GH, HH and IH were taken there on separate occasions to be raped (see also section on Sexual Violence of Vol. III, Part 7.8: The Rights of the Child).[159]

216. JH was not taken to the Mantutu post, but was raped at the Lesuati post on the same night her husband and uncle were interrogated and killed at the Mantutu post.[160]

217. The gang rape of female detainees often took place in the context of interrogation. Of the 66 women interviewed (or mentioned in interviews) about the 1982 uprising in Mau Chiga, 41 were victims of sexual violence: 24 were raped, 11 others experienced slave-like sexual abuse and six others suffered from other forms of sexual violence. GH testified to the Commission:

> On 20 August 1982, two ABRI [soldiers] burned all the houses in Mau Chiga and ordered me to go to Lesuati. I stayed there for a week with my family. One night they took me to the military post in Mantutu for interrogation. As it turned out, they had lied because there I was raped by PS61, an East Timorese soldier of Battalion 745 with the rank of Serka [Sersan Kepala, Sergeant-Major]. They raped me on the road in the long grass. He wasn't the only one. ABRI and Hansip members did the same. At the time it was as if my body was that of a whore.[161]

E.1 Internment in Dare, Ainaro

218. The office of the Dare Koramil was the geographic and logistics centre where many of the crimes against the members of the community of Mau Chiga were organised and committed. The office of the Dare Koramil was located between two detention centres. The primary school was located directly behind the Koramil and the market was directly opposite, across the road. Most people who were captured were eventually taken to this Koramil before their final destination was determined.

219. For many women detainees, interrogation sessions were merely a pretext for security forces to rape them. "Each night they [the military] would take women…and say they were 'seeking information', but in reality they were raping the women." As a rule, the opening question to a married woman being interrogated was: "Where has your husband fled?"[162] Rape during interrogation was usually accompanied by other forms of physical torture. LH told the Commission:

> The three of us [LH1, LH2 and I] went to Hatuquero to look for food. There, we were caught by the village head named PS267. He took the three of us to Aituto [Maubisse, Ainaro] and handed us over to the Dare Koramil. [There] a Hansip by the name of PS54 said to the three of us: "Why don't you just come [to me] so I can make all three of you my wives?" After he said this he…started to beat me with a large bamboo stick. Then he took some matches from the pocket of his trousers and burned my mouth, ears, arms and body until my skin was all black and swollen. After he burned me, he ordered me to take off every stitch of clothing on my body. Then he went to call an ABRI [soldier] and the two took turns raping me.[163]

220. Some women were called to come for interrogation at the Koramil while others were detained there. LH1, together with LH, MH and NH were detained in the kitchen of the Dare Koramil for one week before being transferred to a house in Dare. LH1 was the only woman not raped while staying in the Koramil kitchen.[164]

221. ABRI facilities in Dare were not the only place soldiers raped the women of Mau Chiga. OH and PH, two women who cooked for a clandestine meeting to prepare for the Falintil attack on the Dare Koramil, were raped during their detention at the Ainaro Kodim.[165] One of the offenders was Sergeant-Major PS269. He raped OH after she was interrogated and beaten on her back until she was unable to walk. At the time, OH was two months pregnant. OH1, who together with other men from Mau Chiga was put in a cell of the Ainaro Kodim a few days before OH and PH were detained there, named other perpetrators. OH1 told the Commission:

On 11 June 1982, I was still in the cell when an ABRI soldier took me away for interrogation because the information I had given, in their opinion, was not the truth. They beat, kicked, pinched, burned and electrocuted me all over my body. On 12 June 1982, they caught PH and OH and put the two of them in a cell. Then they were both raped.

One day, the same thing happened to a woman whose name I don't know. She was from Ainaro. ABRI and Hansip raped her too. I know because she was in the next cell and I heard everything through the wall. I heard her screaming, something like this: "I am five months pregnant. Why must you rape me like this?" Those in charge at the time were PS270 and PS271 [Indonesian]. PS271 was an Intel agent who rarely wore a uniform. One of the men who raped PH and OH was PS272 [Chief of Intel Section, First-Sergeant]. The other one, PS406, was an intelligence agent who also rarely wore a uniform.[166]

222. QH was also detained at the Ainaro Kodim for a year before she was released from her cell to enter a situation of domestic sexual slavery, following negotiations among the soldiers at the Kodim.[167]

223. RH was held in a dark cell when she was detained at an ABRI post:

I was in Nunumogue [Hato Builico] for three months, always under ABRI's control. Suddenly a Hansip came to the house and said that three of my friends and I…were being summoned by Kasi I Pak PS271, PS270, and Pak PS273 [Indonesian]. When we got there, they interrogated me about the Falintil's attack in Mau Chiga. Because I didn't tell them the truth they put me in a secret cell with a locked door and windows. I stayed a few weeks in that dark cell. One night, when I was asleep, suddenly the ABRI soldier who stood guard at the door entered the cell and did something ugly to me [raped me]. After he finished, he threatened me: "Don't tell anybody about this." I was in that dark cell for three months.[168]

224. Dozens of people from Mau Chiga were held in the Dare market place opposite the Dare Koramil. The market place was an open courtyard covered by a thatched roof. Some of those who were captured and held in the market place stayed there only one night before they were moved across the road to the primary school. Others from Mau Chiga stayed in the market for several months while they built temporary shelter close by. ABRI and Hansip members raped at least five women while they were held there. They were taken out at night and raped behind the market. Two of the women were in an advanced state of pregnancy when raped. SH told the Commission:

> On the evening of 17 September 1982, several members of Hansip came to my place. They told me the commander wanted me for interrogation. As we left the Koramil, they immediately raped me. They were PS274, PS275, PS276 and PS277. While I was being raped, PS277 held a torch and shone it over the place where we were. I was five months pregnant at the time.[169]

225. TH was raped the night before she gave birth. She told the Commission:

> [I]t was the middle of the night, four Hansip came to our place. They asked me: "Where is Tomás, your husband?" "My husband fled, I do not know where." "You are lying!" Then they took me outside…[T]he four Hansip took turns raping me. While one raped me, another shone a torch over me and the man raping me. This continued until they finished. I was very hungry and weak because they raped me until morning without stopping. When they finished I was crying. But what did they say? "Why are you crying? Our penis is the same as your husband's. We did it so your baby will come out [be born] quickly." After saying that, they left me. I managed to stand up by holding on to the trees around me and walked back to our place. My stomach was aching. For over two hours I bled profusely. I was aware that I was about to give birth. I went to ask if I could use the kitchen of those who lived close to the Koramil, so I could give birth. In the end they gave me a place and I gave birth to my child in that kitchen on 18 September 1982 at 10.00am.[170]

226. Testimonies of those who survived the violence show that an effort was made to separate men and women detainees. Albertina Martins told the Commission that a group attending a traditional koremetan* function in Maubisse at the time of the attack was taken to Dare. There, men and women were separated. The women went to the market place while "all men in the group were taken to Ataúro."[171]

* Koremetan means "to take off black". This is a traditional ceremony performed 12 months after a person's death, when family members remove the black clothing that symbolised their grief. The ceremony is usually accompanied by singing and dancing.

227. In late August 1982, the primary school behind the Dare Koramil was taken over by ABRI for about six months to be used as a makeshift detention centre. Many of the detainees were tortured and raped in the school. Mau Chiga residents were brought to the building in groups as they were captured, starting on 22 August 1982. Some stayed for days or weeks, others stayed for months. If someone was moved out, someone else would be brought in. From the beginning to the end of September the number of people being sent to the school for detention decreased. By October hardly anyone else entered the school. Between March and April 1983 all those who had been detained there were moved and the school was returned to its original function.

228. In 1982, the primary school building consisted of four large rooms. Each room had a wooden door and large windows covered in meshed wire. Three rooms were used to house the detainees. Those detained in one room were not allowed to look at or mix with the detainees held in the other rooms. The detainees had to sleep on the bare floor and every day were released long enough to scrounge for their own food. ABRI used one of the four rooms, located at one end of the building, as an office and interrogation room. ABRI soldiers often summoned women to the "office" for "interrogation". The room had tables, books and other office facilities as well as a mat and a pillow that were used when women were raped.

229. Data gathered by the Commission suggests there was a pattern to the rape that followed the hierarchy of rank among the offenders. Higher-ranking officers used the ABRI "office" in the school for rape. Hansip and lower-ranking ABRI soldiers tended to go to the school in the middle of the night. They would drag the women out and rape them in the long grass around the school. PS278 worked as a TBO for PS279, an Indonesian member of Combat Engineers Battalion 5 (Batalion Zeni Tempur, Yon Zipur or just Zipur). PS278 told the Commission about one of his duties:

> One of my additional duties was that when they wanted a woman, they would order me to go to the school and inform the parents of the girl they wanted to use. The parents had to make her wash and wait in an empty room inside the school. The door was always open. There was a mat and a pillow on the floor. If the room was in use then the door was locked from the inside. That was my duty. I had to go to the school about twice a week. Only PS279 asked me to do that. I went in the afternoon and would immediately return to the post. Then PS279 would go and come back again. He did not stay there. Maybe the commander knew, but he could do nothing because PS279 was a brutal man and had taken over power. At night when they took a woman to the post I only heard her scream. But in the morning I did not see her.[172]

230. UH was only 15 when she was repeatedly raped by members of ABRI, Combat Engineers Battalion and the Hansip.

> At the time I was 15 and still young. When I got to Dare, all the women, small children and old people were detained in the school. While I was there, they harassed me every night. Members of ABRI and Hansip, PS280 and PS281, would take me to the room of an Indonesian soldier named PS279. The room was an office room as well as a bedroom. He carried a small gun and was in full ABRI uniform to "attack" me...On the second night a Hansip from Hato Builico [Ainaro] did the same to me. He did it outdoors, standing up. On the third night, the same thing happened in PS279's room. On the fourth night an ABRI soldier, PS229 [Indonesian], took me to the house of his friend PS283. The friend was out and PS229 did that shameful thing to me.[173]

231. Although the interrogation room at the school served as a place to rape women, most rapes occurred outdoors, as depicted in the following two testimonies. As VH told the Commission:

After being held in the school for one month some Hansip – PS284 from Tatiru Dare, platoon commander PS54, PS286 and PS287 – called me in for interrogation, but as soon as I was outside the school they took me into the bushes and raped me.[174]

232. WH, whose husband had fled to the mountains, relates:

When I arrived at the school the Hansip and ABRI soldiers showed their true colours. If there were no young girls then the older women would become their victims. A Hansip whom I knew, PS288 from Dare Mulo, did that bad thing to me. At first he pretended to ask me the whereabouts of my husband, then in the end he unleashed his anger on me outside the school in the long grass.[175]

233. Nearly one-third of the women in the Dare primary school, aged 15 years and above, were raped while in detention there.

Table 2 - Women detainees at primary school building, Dare, Ainaro, 1982–1983

No.	Date detained (1982)	Name	Approximate Age	Accompanying children	Reported sexual violence while detained at the school
1	23 August	XH	22		rape (later: sex slavery)
2	25/26 August	VH	25	one toddler, one nursing baby	rape
3	"	Orlanda da Costa	18-20	one nursing baby
4	"	YH	15		rape

5	"	ZH	15		rape
6	"	UH	15		rape
7	"	AI	38	one toddler, one nursing baby	attempted rape
8	"	Mariana da Costa	40	eight children
9	"	BI	22		(later: sexual slavery)
10	Late August	Eduarda da Costa	33	three children, one nursing baby
11	"	Celestina da Silva	30	one child
12	"	FH	33	six children, one nursing baby	(prior: sexual torture)
13	"	DH	36	two children	(prior: sexual torture)
14	"	EH	26	one nursing baby	(prior: sexual torture)
15	"	Laurentina de Orleans	44	five children, one nursing baby
16	Early Sept	WH	35	one child	rape
17	Mid-Sept	CI	40	three children	rape
18	"	Joana Britos	Unknown	five children, one nursing baby
19	"	DI	20	two children	rape
20	"	EI	25		attempted rape
21	"	Elisa Barbosa	50
22	30 Sept/1 Oct	Armanda Barbosa	45	two children
23	Unknown	FI	teen		rape
24	Unknown	IH	14
25	Unknown	Silvina Barbosa	Unknown
26	Unknown	Juliana B	40

27	Unknown	Josefa da Conceição	30+
28	Unknown	Bendita Barbosa	22
29	Unknown	TH	25		rape

234. By about mid-September, with the market place and primary school full of detainees, ABRI had to find alternative accommodation. Some detainees were allowed to stay with family or acquaintances that lived close to the Koramil in Dare. However, living in a house rather than the school or market place was no guarantee of safety for the women. As BI told the Commission:

> Every night the ABRI soldiers picked me up from the house to go to a party and dance with them [around Dare]. They used that opportunity to satisfy their lust. In the end I had a child by a Nanggala 16 soldier named PS289.[176]

235. The military determined locations where detainees were to build their own houses. Two places mentioned were Lebukua, slightly higher up from the school towards Blehetu Mountain, and Fatuk Hun, a neighbourhood in Dare. When all corners of Dare were saturated with detainees from Mau Chiga, the Koramil commander enlisted the help of the head of the Nunumogue to move some of the detainees to Nunumogue. The situation in Nunumogue did not differ much from Dare. There were no facilities for displaced persons so that those from Mau Chiga had to build very simple huts with materials from the forest. As in Dare, displaced women in Nunuogue were also vulnerable to sexual violence. One day, when GH * went out of the house to collect water, she was followed by a Hansip who raped her.[177]

236. Rape was not only perpetrated against the women of Mau Chiga, but also against women from neighbouring communities. GI from the village of Mulo (Hato Builico) told of her abduction at the time of the Infantry Battalion 745 attack on Hautio in 1982. Using the pretext that the Ainaro Kodim head of intelligence had summoned her, GI was taken to a command post where she was repeatedly raped by three members of Infantry Battalion 745. Previously, GI had also been tortured and raped by the head of the intelligence section, PS229 [Indonesian], and two members of Kodim 1633, PS291 and PS292 [Indonesian].[178]

* GH is the same woman whose account of rape at the Mantutu post shortly after the razing of Mau Chiga is found earlier in this part.

237. Rape and sexual slavery continued in Dare long after the first retaliation attack and mass arrests of August and September 1982. HI was captured in 1984 because her uncle was a member of Falintil. At the Dare Koramil post 10 members of the Special Warfare Command (Nanggala) beat her and then took her to the Kodim in Ainaro where she was stripped naked and electrocuted for two hours until she was unconscious. After that she was forced into a situation of sexual slavery with the head of the intelligence section, PS229, from the Ainaro Koramil that lasted for three months.[179]

E.2 Internment on the island of Ataúro, Dili

238. Following the failed uprising, detainees from Mau Chiga were sent to the island of Ataúro in at least three waves of displacement. On 30 August 1982, the first group from Mau Chiga was sent to Ataúro. It included men captured prior to Falintil's attack on the Dare Koramil, some held at the Ainaro Kodim and some held at the Koramil in Lesuati. The second group left for Ataúro on 16 October 1982 and the third went on 6 January 1983. A submission received by the Commission from the community of Mau Chiga listed the names of people who died or were detained. It indicates the total interned on Ataúro was 431; 202 men and 229 women.[180] Living conditions in Ataúro were extremely poor, with the arrival of more than 3,000 detainees from all parts of Timor-Leste. From the Mau Chiga area, at least 56 men, women and children died from disease, lack of water and malnutrition during their internment in Ataúro. The Commission found no evidence of sexual violence during this period (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict; Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

239. On 27 November 1984, after two years on Ataúro, about 300 people from Mau Chiga and surrounding villages were sent back to the district of Ainaro.[181] They were moved to Bonuk (Hato-Udo, Ainaro), an uninhabited location on the south coast of the district. Several sources reported that life in Bonuk resembled the first few months in Ataúro: "…[we] suffered more compared with life in Ataúro, because Bonuk was very remote, dry and full of mosquitoes."[1812]The only food they had was leftover corn they had brought with them from Ataúro. After about 50 days in Bonuk, and following a visit by Governor Mário Viegas Carrascalão, the Bonuk detainees were returned to Dare. There they were once again close to the Dare Koramil, the local centre that controlled the Mau Chiga population. On the way from Bonuk to Dare, some 20 to 30 men and women who were considered leaders of the Resistance were detained in Mau-ulo III, a village about one kilometre from Ainaro.[*] They were told to build houses and live there. No sexual violations were reported to have occurred in Ataúro or Bonuk (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment).

* Located on the road between Ainaro and Suai, Mau-ulo III was not far from the notorious execution site of Builico, popularly known as Jakarta II (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment). The people left in Mau-ulo III knew of Jakarta II and this may have added to the repression they experienced while living there. On the road from Suai, just before Mau-ulo III, there was also an army post where war equipment was stored. A platoon of 30 to 40 soldiers were on duty at that post.

240. The majority of the community of Mau Chiga was eventually returned to Dare. Compared to the years on Ataúro, conditions in Dare were worse, primarily because military control was much tighter in and around Dare. Those from Bonuk had to report to the Koramil before they were allowed to return to their own houses. JI moved into her family's traditional home in Dare and remained there for more than three years. JL told the Commission:

> On the first night we were there, an ABRI soldier, PS294, a Head of Section III from East Java, came to the house with a TBO. They called me to come out, but I refused. On the second night [the ABRI soldier] came alone in full uniform and armed with a gun, like the first night. He threatened to kill all my family. My mother had to say: "You had better give in." So, before he was transferred to Ainaro, PS294 came to my house [every day] for a week and raped me. I became pregnant from my relationship with him. I had just given birth when an [Indonesian] ABRI soldier, PS229, came and gave me a can of corn to eat so I could nurse the baby…When…[my daughter] was five months old, First Sergeant PS391 [Indonesian] wanted to have a relationship with me but I refused. From then on I was no longer harassed by soldiers wanting to rape me.*[183]

E.3 Internment in Dotik (Alas, Manufahi)

241. Generally, the people of Mau Chiga who were captured in caves and wooded areas of Mount Kablaki above Same were detained at the Same Kodim or Koramil. On 7 January 1983, about 100 people from the Mau Chiga area, over 70% of them men, were sent from Same to Dotik, a village south of Alas on the south coast of Manufahi. When they arrived, they found an ABRI post and a handful of families already living there. However, no houses or land for cultivation had been prepared for them and ABRI did not tell them where they had to live. The village head of Dotik, Eusebio, gave them an area of uncultivated land some distance from the ABRI post and the other families. They lived there under tarpaulins provided by ABRI while building their houses from materials in the forest. Like Bonuk, Dotik was hot, water was scarce and mosquitoes were abundant. Four Neighbourhood Security System posts (pos Siskamling) were built around the perimeter of the houses, one in each direction – north, south, east and west. The posts were manned by members of Battalion 745.

242. At least three women were raped in Dotik. In 1982 KI, her father and her sister lived in a house with two women from Mau Chiga, L and M, and M's child (about six months old). KI told the Commission:

> We had been in Dotik one month when ABRI came and started to harass us. One night M was called and raped because her husband was a Falintil commander. He is dead now. But it was not just M. The three of us were also raped. They came from their post to Dotik every one or two weeks and whenever they wanted to sleep with a woman, they just came. Sometimes they came one at a time. Sometimes they would come and take turns raping us till they had enough. The first time they came, they fired shots inside the house. At the time my father said: "We are in their hands now, it's better you [three girls] give in to them." Then they started coming periodically.

* Kasi or Kepala Seksi (Head of Section) III would be Head of Section for Territorial Matters; Kasi I was Head of Section for Intelligence.

There was also an Indonesian Babinsa named PS295. He kept coming to harass all of us, but in the end he took L as his "wife". He told the community to build a house for him and L after they had been there two months. After a year and a half, L gave birth to a child. When the child was one year old they moved to Dare. L remained in the house there when PS295 went back to Indonesia. The first few weeks PS295 raped M and me, but after L moved from our house to live with him he stopped harassing us.

One day, PS296, a Babinsa from Bobonaro, came to the house and threatened me. I was raped by three men – PS296 [East Timorese] and two Indonesian soldiers. While one was raping me the other stood guard. One of the Indonesian soldiers once threatened me with a gun pointed at my throat. I was raped until [eventually] I had a child. I lived in Dotik for three years.[184]

243. In 1984, Governor Mário Viegas Carrascalão visited the displaced community in Dotik, just as he had visited the people of Mau Chiga who had been detained in Bonuk. Shortly after this visit, the detainees in Dotik were returned to Dare. Around 1985, those people from Mau Chiga who had been interned on Ataúro, in Bonuk, Mau-ulo and Dotik returned to Dare. Once again, they had to take care of their own food and accommodation needs. It was only later in about 1987, after five years of displacement and hardship, that the people of Mau Chiga were allowed to return to their own village.

Testimony of XH, Mau Chiga, Hato Builico, Ainaro

XH's story begins with Falintil's attack on the Dare and Ainaro Koramil and ABRI's retaliatory operation on 20 August 1982. XH helped to take care of a wounded Falintil member she found close to her house:

Maybe because I helped him I became a suspect and on that afternoon I was captured by ABRI and Hansip at my home in Mau Chiga and was taken to Dare. At that time only women were detained at the Koramil post in Dare. There, ABRI and Hansip [Hansip] started to torture each one of us. Before raping me they beat me…they used weapons to poke me in the ribs until I was injured, they kicked me with army boots in my lower back until I was unable to walk…Then they raped me. After raping me, they burned me with cigarette butts on the face and arms till my skin blackened. They did all this [to me] for more than a month in the Dare Koramil post.

I was also treated like a slave. Every day I had to wash clothes, cook and do other domestic chores for the ABRI. They also made me wear an ABRI uniform. I was given a rucksack, a radio, a pistol and ammunition. They taught me how to use the equipment so I could go with them to Mount Kablaki to search for Falintil commanders. The rucksack was so heavy that sometimes I fell. Once I fell in the middle of a river and all my clothes were soaked, but the ABRI did not heed me and ordered me to continue walking. On arrival at [our destination] they handed me over to the troops there to rape me. After that we returned to the Dare Koramil post with the excuse that no Falintil commander had been found. The following day I refused to go on more operations.

At that time ABRI…[used the school building behind the] Dare Koramil post. It was not exactly a school, but a place where women had to live with ABRI soldiers. That is where I lived. Every day I was called for interrogation, but even before they started they had already received false information about me from a Hansip commander, an East Timorese who lived in Hato Builico. If I did not speak according to this false information they had received from this commander I would be tortured and raped. I was not the only one raped. There were also women still breastfeeding, women whose children were a couple of months old and others whose children were three or four years old. When the soldiers raped the women, they took them outside and separated them from the children. Even if the children were crying, the soldiers did not care. All they wanted was to satisfy their lust. They also raped pregnant women.

Tomás was the husband of one of the women [who was detained]. They bound both his hands behind his back and then dragged him behind a Hino truck all around Dare. While he was being dragged, the ABRI and Hansip hit him with wooden clubs every time he passed them until his body was crushed and the white of his bones could be seen. Only his face looked intact. Another young man was put inside a 50 kilogram plastic sugar sack. It was not the sack itself but the plastic lining they used. They tied up the plastic bag, poured kerosene over it and burned the young man alive. Strangely enough, when he was dead – his body was completely burned – but he was still kneeling and holding up his right hand. I saw with my own eyes how sadistically they treated those two men.

In the end, I had to find a solution, so I ran away to the Sisters' convent in Ainaro to continue my vocational schooling [at SMPK] in Ainaro. To get permission to leave I said I had some pressing business in Ainaro. But instead I ran away and was able to return to school. But not for long… [ABRI]…wrote a statement…[accusing me of having] links with Falintil. Then they took the false statement to the school principal…and in September 1982 they recaptured me at the school in Ainaro. Four men came for me – two ABRI and two East Timorese Hansip members – and took me back to the Kodim in Ainaro.

On arrival at the Kodim, the Kasi Intel [head of the intelligence section] had gone to the village of Cassa (Ainaro, Ainaro) so I had to wait until he returned. He immediately asked his subordinate: "Is this XH? Now you wait, I'll bathe first." After he finished bathing, he immediately called me in, not into the interrogation room, but into his bedroom to be raped. After that they started interrogating me, [throwing] all kinds of accusations at me: "You have provided food to Falintil, haven't you? Wasn't your house used for Falintil meetings?" I denied everything and that is when they started torturing me for the second time…They hit me on the head with a wooden chair until blood was streaming down my face onto my clothes. At the same time they put electric cables in my ears to electrocute me. They also electrocuted my hands and feet. I jumped here and there until my blood froze. Every time they threw a question at me, they burned me with cigarette butts – in the mouth, on the face and other parts of my body. Or they electrocuted me. When I became helpless they raped me again. Then they took me to the toilet in the office of Kasi Intel and detained me there three months. Every day, when the soldiers, went in there to use the toilet, I would have to go out…Whatever they did in there, they never flushed it. There [in the toilet] I lived, slept and ate for three months. They put my food in a small can of condensed milk and I got that once a day. Drinking water also went into that can. For three months I did not change my clothes and did not bathe.

One day, all the ABRI personnel went to a function in Dili. While they were gone a Timorese civil servant seized the opportunity and attempted to rape me. He started touching me and said that he considered me his second wife. I reminded him: "You already have a wife. I also have a husband. Don't treat me like those outsiders. My husband will come back from Ataúro and when we are walking together, what will you say [then]?" In that way I was able to prevent him from raping me.

In the afternoon when the ABRI returned from Dili, the civil servant reported to them saying: "XH says that she keeps thinking of her Falintil husband in the forest." But I had never said that. That night ABRI took seven men and two women detainees, including myself, to throw us off Builico [a very deep ravine known as Jakarta II]. When we arrived, the men were made to stand on the edge of the ravine and then pushed to their death. When they tried to push us women off we held on to their legs so that if we fell we'd fall together with the soldiers. One commander said: "So, do we want to kill them or shall we just take them back?" Another soldier said it would be better to take us back as the others were already dead. As soon as we got back, my friend and I were immediately tortured and raped.

There was never a day without rape. At any time, any day, my friends and I were raped.

One day, a friend called Maria was summoned to the office of the Kasi Intel. Maria was also a detainee. When she was in the office of the Kasi Intel, she saw me in the toilet and whispered through a small hole in the wall: "It is better to confess to anything they ask you so that you can get out of that toilet fast. Whatever they ask you, you agree and tell them that I, Maria, was your commander." In the end I told the ABRI that Maria was my commander. After they got confirmation from Maria they released me from the toilet and moved me to a prison cell where I stayed for three months until April 1983 when I was released and I returned to Dare.[185]

Sexual slavery during consolidation of the occupation (1985–1998)

244. Compared with the post-invasion period and 1999, cases of sexual slavery reported for the period 1985–1998, as with cases of rape, were at markedly lower levels. This coincides with a drop in cases of women detainees.

245. The evidence gathered points to a decline in military sexual slavery and an increase in cases of domestic sexual slavery, where a member of the armed forces used the power of his position and arms to force a woman into a sexual relationship in a domestic setting.

246. K was a victim of domestic sexual slavery for five years, from 1985 until 1989, perpetrated by the Koramil commander of Laclubar Sub-district in Manatuto. At first, the commander named PS297, kicked down the door of K's house because her parents did not want to open the door for him. Threatening her with a weapon, PS297 forced K to take off her clothes and then he raped her in her own home. K's parents could not accept this and beat K so that she would refuse to have a relationship with PS297. However, PS297 continued to visit K's home and to have sexual intercourse with her. In the end, K became pregnant and had a child who died soon after birth. The situation continued for five years until PS297 returned to Sumatra at the end of his tour of duty in Timor-Leste.[186]

247. The Commission also received evidence of women being traded to prevent or stop the torture of family members. N1, from the village of Bado-Ho'o (Venilale, Baucau), was arrested by an Indonesian village-based military officer (Babinsa) named PS298 in August 1986. Prior to the arrest, PS298 had asked N1's sister, N, to have sexual intercourse with him. Because she refused, PS298 brought N1 to a military post where he was tortured. They accused him of being a member of the Fretilin security disturbance group (GPK). They kicked and hit him with a gun on his mouth until his teeth fell out. The next day N1 was made to stand by the flagpole at the post, staring at the sun from morning until afternoon. On the second day N1 was threatened with detention and torture for one month if he did not hand over his sister. In the end N had to enter into a situation of sexual slavery with PS298 to save her brother.[187]

248. Some victims of sexual slavery committed by Indonesian soldiers also became targets of the same crime committed by Timorese from civilian groups. LI testified that for six years, beginning in 1980, she was forced into a situation of sexual slavery by an Indonesian soldier from the Koramil of Laleia (Manatuto) named PS299. In 1986, she was again coerced into a situation of sexual slavery by PS300 [East Timorese]. He was a member of the Hansip from the same Koramil. Threatened with a weapon, LI was raped every night in her own house. In the end she alone was responsible for raising her two children, one from each of the relationships.[188]

Testimony of MI, Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque

MI is a small, soft-spoken woman who bravely shared her experiences of domestic sexual slavery with the Commission in April 2003.

After the Hansip revolt led by Commander Ular and followed by the massacres of Kraras in the village of Bibileo (Viqueque, Viqueque) in September 1983, the surviving Kraras population, mostly women, were transferred by the Indonesian military to a village called Lalerek Mutin. This village later became known as the "village of widows". At the time of the massacres of Kraras, MI was two months pregnant. She ran to the forest with her husband, but then surrendered. When the child was five days old her husband came out of the forest.

> After he surrendered…he came back to the house where we lived for one month. In March [1984], ABRI summoned him to make him a TBO. After he left to report, my husband never returned. Maybe they killed him the same night they called him.

When MI's child was a year and two months old he fell ill and died due to lack of medical care. Together with other inhabitants of Lalerek Mutin, MI was forced to join a Spear Troops (Pasukan Tombak) whose duty was to patrol the area. Every night the widows of this civilian brigade were threatened and harassed by ABRI members.

One night, ABRI had a party. MI was ordered to attend by PS301, an Indonesian Private Second Class from the Special Warfare Command, Nanggala III. By using a number of excuses, MI was able to refuse this order twice. The third time, however, three men went to MI's house and woke her up and forced her to attend the party. On arriving at the party, PS301 accused her of harbouring a member of the Falintil (known as GPK to the military) in her house. She denied this. PS301 also danced with MI late into the night and would not let anyone else dance with her. Early in the morning he ordered MI to go back to her house and wait for him there. As soon as she arrived at the house, MI took a knife for harvesting rice, a food container and some water, and went to the rice field with her cousin. She was very tired and slept in a hut at the rice field while her cousin tended the field. Not long afterwards, a member of the Hansip and an East Timorese friend arrived with PS301 and his three men from the previous night. When they found her, PS301 seized the opportunity to "capture" MI with the accusation that among those running away was Commander Ular, the leader of the rebellion that attacked the combat engineers (Zipur) post in Kraras. PS301 then assaulted MI.

He started slapping me and I fell. When I tried to stand, he stamped on my breasts and I was flat on my back again. Then he hit me on the back, he took a thick cassava trunk… and hit me with it. I do not know how many times, I was not counting, but he beat me until he broke the trunk on my body. I was not crying, I don't know why, but I felt that I was about to die. When he finished beating me my face felt swollen. I ran to the house and they followed me to the house.

Before PS301 arrived at MIs house, her sister-in-law had reported the incident to leaders in the neighbourhood and another person who had come to MI's house. They looked at her but said nothing. Soon after PS301 arrived at the house, he asked for a pan and he himself boiled water to put compresses on MI's body. When he went out to prepare the water, MI argued with the East Timorese who had gathered at her house.

My in-laws, the head of [the neighbourhood] started saying to me: "It doesn't matter, just accept him. Nobody will scorn you for 'marrying' him. It is not because you want to. We all know that you are being forced. If you won't have him, we'll all die. Better you sell your soul to save our skins." I replied: "You can say that, but what's to happen when the situation begins to normalise? My parents will come and ask you about me. What will you say?" They replied: "If they ask us we'll be ready with an answer because in a situation like this we're stuck."

After the boiled water was ready, they all busied themselves tending to my body. One put a compress on my face, another on my arms and on my legs until I started feeling better and the swelling went down. When they finished, they all went home except PS301. He stayed and from that day on we lived like husband and wife for a year. After that he returned to his country. I became pregnant but after three months and 15 days I miscarried.

In 1991, fresh combat troops arrived in Lalerek Mutin. One day, while MI was in the rice field with a friend, a member of the new troops, Private Second Class PS302, followed her and when he arrived at the field he fired a shot in her direction. MI and her friend became scared and ran home. Once again, the people around MI encouraged her to give herself to an Indonesian soldier.

On the way home, my friends said: "Just give yourself to him; if not, you'll die." Then, because I was ashamed, I said: "OK, I'll cut myself in two. The bottom part I'll give to him, but the top part will be for my country, for Timor." They said to me: "Don't be afraid. Don't run away. Maybe you have to suffer [like this] because your husband was killed, but you are still alive. Never mind. Our lives are all the same." [PS302] started following and walking with me…to my house…I accepted that maybe this was my fate. We lived as man and wife and I had a child.

In 1993, once again MI was forced to live with a soldier, PS303 from Infantry Battalion 408.

I had a daughter from our relationship…[When the child] was only a few months old PS303 [Indonesian] left. After that I lived with my two children. Fortunately there was my sister-in-law from the family of my first husband. [She] was willing to look after the children when I was working in the rice field.

Later on, Yonif 514, 527 and Linud 100 were deployed to Lalerek Mutin. I was suspected of being a buihu [an informer] because I was an "ABRI wife". The people were saying I was not a good woman because I had lived with three men. Sometimes I felt angry...If [I heard them] talk about me I would curse them saying: "If you say I am a collaborator it is not because my husband was killed because he was a thief. He was not killed because he harassed someone else's wife. If you want to call somebody a collaborator, say it to someone else. All you see is me as the wife of ABRI, but you do not know what I think." After that they didn't gossip about me again.[189]

249. Despite the reduction in reported cases of sexual slavery during the "consolidation" of Indonesia's occupation, between 1985 and 1998, the following statements illustrate that domestic sexual slavery still occurred among the security forces throughout the territory.

250. In 1987, in the village of Matahoi (Uatolari, Viqueque), NI was threatened with a knife to accept the sexual advances of a member of Special Forces Command Chandraca-7 by the name of PS304. Because two of her family members were still in the forest, NI entered a situation of domestic sexual slavery. She had a child from this relationship.[190]

251. In 1988, OI from Aicurus (Remexio, Aileu) was visited by a Babinsa, PS305 [Indonesian], who arrived in full uniform and was armed with a gun. PS305 asked OI's mother for her daughter and immediately dragged OI into the bedroom to rape her. Their relationship continued for 10 months until the officer finished his tour of duty. OI had a child from the relationship.[191]

252. In 1993, PS306 [Indonesian], a member of Battalion 122 went to the house of PI in Sananain (Laclubar, Manatuto). The soldier raped her and from that day they lived together. PI became pregnant and PS306 abandoned her.[192]

253. QI from Lauana (Letefoho, Ermera) entered into a situation of sexual slavery after a militiaman, PS307, threatened her parents with a knife in November 1998. As QI's brother was a member of a clandestine organisation, QI had to protect him. When she was two months pregnant PS307 beat her and she miscarried.[193]

Sexual slavery by members of Falintil

254. One case reported to the Commission of sexual slavery which took place during the period of Indonesian occupation involved Falintil members as perpetrators. On 26 October 1996, RI and her sister, SI, respectively 14 and 13 years old, were threatened with guns and grenades by a member of the clandestine movement – PS308 – and two members of Falintil – PS309 and PS310 in Manusae (Hatolia, Ermera). After the threats, RI was raped by PS309 and SI was raped by PS310. The situation continued for several months until both girls became pregnant and the two men disappeared.[194]

Sexual slavery and the Popular Consultation (1999)

255. Incidents of sexual slavery in 1999 should not be seen in isolation from the cases of rape described in the previous sections. The Commission received strong evidence that points to a situation of lawlessness that not only allowed rape to occur periodically, but also allowed perpetrators to rape a woman repeatedly for months at a time. Victims had no way to stop the crimes, nor a way to demand justice.

256. TI1, a woman from the village of Mauabu (Hatolia, Ermera), described how a village head and a Strategic Reserve Command (Rajawali) soldier went to her house and threatened her with weapons, accusing her because her daughter had married a member of Falintil.[195] TI1 was forced to look for her children who had fled into the forest. Her daughter, TI, and niece, UI, went to pay Rp1million (about US$100) to the ABRI to "save their lives."[196] However, TI and UI were captured and taken to the strategic reserve command post where they were made to cook for one month. One night Sergeant PS311 [Indonesian], pointing a gun at TI, forced his way into her room and raped her. A soldier known as PS312 did the same to UI. This case was reported to the local police headquarters in Ermera, but police took no action. TI stated:

> On 22 May 1999, around 12.00 noon, Second Sergeant PS311 from BTT [Territorial Combat Battalion] 144 came for me and my niece UI because he had received information that some members of Falintil often ate and stayed at our house. After he took us to his BTT post, Second Sergeant PS313 dragged me into a room. He stripped me naked while threatening me with a gun. If I did not have sex with him [he said] he would kill me, so I had to submit to save my life.

He raped me…while my niece UI was taken by ABRI Private First Class PS312 [East Timorese], a member of Koramil 1637. They made us wash their clothes, iron and cook like servants. At night they sent us home. They threatened they would hurt our parents: "You must not say anything, if you dare to talk, they'll die." On 25 May 1999…PS313 [again] pulled me by the arm into his room where he took my clothes off and raped me…then on 27 June it happened again…but I refused and Second Sergeant PS313 slapped me and kicked me till I fell. He pulled me up by the hand and I stood with my niece UI. They took us to the BTT 144 post to work for them as servants and to take care of their sexual needs. We served them from 25 May to 27 June 1999.[197]

257. Long before the massacre at Suai Church, the Laksaur militia perpetrated acts of sexual terror, including sexual slavery. On 25 April 1999, the Laksaur militia turned VI's house in Fatumean (Covalima) into a militia post. Her husband was forced to flee into the forest while VI, who was left behind, was forced into a situation of sexual slavery. She was repeatedly raped by PS314 [East Timorese militia], and when PS314 was away, PS315 and PS316, other militia members also raped her. As a result VI became pregnant and her husband later separated from her when he heard about her condition.[198]

258. Another Laksaur militia member, PS208, who was named a perpetrator of sexual violence in the Suai Church Massacre following the ballot, was also actively involved in sexual violence prior to the vote. On 6 June 1999, PS208 broke into the house of WI in the village of Salele (Tilomar, Covalima) by breaking the door. He threatened to kill her and her father and then forced WI to have repeated sexual intercourse with him. As a result she became pregnant, but after two months was able to run away to safety.[199]

Rape and sexual slavery by Halilintar militia in Atabae, Bobonaro*

As early as 1998, Halilintar and Armui (Aku rela mati untuk Indonesia, I'm willing to die for Indonesia) militia groups instituted a widespread

* Halilintar (Thunderbolt) was a pro-integration paramilitary group first established in the late 1970s or early 1980s by João Tavares, a descendent of East Timorese royalty in Bobonaro. Originally a member of the UDT political party, Tavares was among those first courted by Indonesians and became a commander of the Partisans. His Partisan troops were what formed Halilintar. Tavares became the district administrator of Bobonaro District in the late 1970s. Halilintar was disbanded in 1983. Halilintar was resurrected in 1994 as a militia group at the time that the clandestine movement was gaining strength in Bobonaro. At this time Tavares also formed several other militia groups, including Armui, under the command of the Halilintar militia. [See Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation.]

campaign of terror in the sub-district of Atabae, Bobonaro. From the 13 testimonies reporting cases of rape and sexual slavery perpetrated by these groups, the Commission is convinced that rape was an integral part of the pattern of violence. An offender repeatedly named by victims as PS318 was the deputy commander of Halilintar. It is believed he was killed in a skirmish with Interfet in October 1999.[200] Another repeat offender was Halilintar commander PS319. His name also appeared in the indictment filed by the General Prosecutor in the Special Panels Court in Dili for crimes against humanity (torture, rape and persecution).[201]

Halilintar began these acts of terror in the sub-district of Atabae in 1998. A Halilintar militia named PS320 entered XI's house in Boloi on 5 May 1998. PS320 put his knife on the table, forced XI into the bedroom and raped her. XI described the slave-like sexual practice in this way: "The perpetrator made me his mistress and every night at about 9.00 he would come and sleep in my house and we lived together this way until 25 October 1999." Also in the village of Boloi, YI was raped in her own bedroom by a militia called PS322. She was unable to refuse him and the rapes continued from 1998 until 26 October 1999.[202] At that time PS322's wife reported the situation to the Halilintar commander, PS319. As a result of the report YI was beaten by PS319, who shouted: "A woman like this should be shot in the legs, stripped naked and made to walk from Aidabasalala to Coilima, Atabae." YI was supposed to pay a fine to the family of PS322 and his wife as required by their traditional custom in cases of adultery. However, this did not happen because the security situation worsened and most villagers fled for safety.[203]

Commander PS319 threatened ZI, from the aldeia of Aidabasalala, Hataz Village, with a weapon and raped her in her own home in February 1999.[204] ZI remained in a situation of sexual slavery until August 1999. Sexual slavery also occurred in the cases of two other women, AJ and BJ. After AJ's husband, a member of the Koramil in Atabae, was arrested on suspicion of participating in the clandestine movement, AJ was raped by PS323, a member of the militia. PS318 aided this rape by threatening AJ with a weapon.[205]

When BJ's house was ransacked by Halilintar militia on 2 February 1999, her father was beaten as he tried to intervene. He was taken to the Maliana hospital for treatment. While her father was hospitalised, PS318 came to BJ's house, raped her and forced her into a situation of sexual slavery until she gave birth to a child.[206]

CJ was raped when the militia organised an oath of allegiance ceremony to Halilintar in the aldeia of Kaitapo, Aidabaleten Village, prior to the ballot. Threatened with death, CJ was coerced into making an oath of allegiance to Halilintar. As CJ recalls, commander PS318 "ordered Halilintar militia PS324 to call me. At first I refused, but because I was [threatened] I submitted…" CJ was raped "for three hours" before PS318 left her alone.[207]

Manuel Pereira testified about a series of violations committed by Halilintar militia that he experienced and witnessed. On 15 March 1999, Manuel was attacked at his home in Sorohati, Hataz (Atabae, Bobonaro) by members of Halilintar militia, including Commander PS319, PS318 and PS323. He was brought to the village office in Hataz, which functioned as the local militia headquarters. After three months in detention at the militia headquarters, he escaped a murder attempt. During this time he also witnessed PS318 force a woman named DJ to have sexual relations with him. Out of fear, this woman took PS318 as her "husband", but one that was forced upon her.[208]

EJ, whose husband had fled to the forest, was detained in the village office at Aidabasalala, for one night:

> Commander PS319 threatened me. I kept quiet and prayed silently. He pointed a knife at me and ordered me to take off the sarong I was wearing. I refused and he threatened to kill me. I was scared, so I had to obey him. PS319 immediately raped me.[209]

FJ, from the aldeia of Loumeta (Ermera), told of being repeatedly raped both before and after the Popular Consultation. On 17 April 1999 FJ was abducted, together with two friends, by the militia and taken to the house of PS327 which "served as the headquarters where the militia men committed their crimes". She was detained and tortured there for two days and raped by commander PS319. Following the ballot FJ continued to be subjected to sexual violence:

> The militia treated those of us who were raped as their mistresses. Every time they needed us for [sexual] intercourse we were taken to the house of PS327. I was raped six times. The first time was on 4 September 1999 at the BMP post [where] I was raped by PS327. The second time I was raped at the house of militia PS407 in Madapau. The third rape was in PS 408's house; the fourth rape was at PS327's militia post; the fifth rape was in PS 409's house; and the sixth time I was raped in the village office in Hataz.[210]

Halilintar militia first ransacked the house of GJ in the village of Saburapo on 14 April 1999. Two days later they returned to her house to take her away:

Three unknown militia dragged me by the arm and took me into a neighbour's house. The three stood guard outside while a militia named PS328 came into the house, put down the handmade rifle and the knife he was holding, and unfastened his pants. He pulled me towards him. I tried to fight back, but he hit me on the head with a G-3 (an automatic rifle) and I fell on the floor. Then he raped me at about 10.00 in the evening.[211]

After this rape, GJ fled to Maliana, but PS328 followed her and managed to rape her several more times, including in a refugee camp in West Timor after the Popular Consultation. During one of the rape incidents, PS328 was accompanied by PS318 who stood guard outside the house while PS328 committed the crime.[212]

The Halilintar militia increased its violent attacks immediately after the Popular Consultation. HJ from the village of Biadila (Cailaco, Bobonaro) was abducted from her house on 2 September 1999. Militia members PS318 and PS329, acting on instructions from Commander PS319, tied her with a rope, took her outside and threw her on the ground where she was raped by PS328.[213]

PS6 was also involved in the rape of IJ, also from the aldeia of Aidabasalala, after the forced disappearance of her husband. On 18 September 1999, IJ's husband was taken from his house by members of the Armui militia. About a week later PS318 and other militia members came to her house and told her that her husband had been killed.

When I heard what he said, I immediately started crying. PS330 from the Halilintar team pulled me by the hand and kissed me. I tried to bite him on his leg. He said: "Today I will sleep in this woman's house. If she does not agree, I will shoot her dead." He went into the room, while I was [outside] crying. My sister-in-law came out and said it was better if I ''serviced' him. Hearing these words, PS330 made a coughing sound inside the room. In the end I entered the room. He stood up and, while hugging and kissing me, threw me on the mattress where he raped me twice in the same night …[Nine days later] at about 8.00pm, PS330, wearing shorts and shoes and with a G-3, was standing at the window. He called me – I was asleep at the time – and said, "Do not lock the door. If you do, you know the consequences." Later, he came into the house and raped me again.[214]

PS318 and PS319 were jointly involved in a case of repeated rape. Six months after KJ's house was burned down in March 1999, KJ was captured by Halilintar militia on 13 September 1999. She was blindfolded, beaten and raped by Commander PS319. On 29 September she was beaten, threatened and raped again, this time by Deputy Commander PS318.

She stated that on the following day "at midnight, militia PS319 beat, slapped and kicked [me], tied my hands behind my back, blindfolded me with a black cloth and then raped me on the main road close to the Halilintar post."[215]

In October 1999, the Halilintar militia group was still operational, although Interfet troops had already entered Dili. One night in October, around midnight, PS318, with PS331, PS332 and other unknown militia, smashed their way into the house of LJ. She was forcibly abducted and taken to the Halilintar post to be interrogated about the whereabouts of her husband who had already fled to the mountains. After being detained for over one hour she was raped by PS318.[216]

259. Following the announcement of the result of the Popular Consultation, the ensuing widespread violence and mass displacement of the population provided opportunities for rape. In a situation of chaos and lawlessness, rape offenders had an immense opportunity to gain access to victims and create conditions of sexual slavery and slave-like conditions.

260. In Aileu, a 17 year-old girl from the village of Seloi Kraik (Aileu Town, Aileu) was forced into a situation of sexual slavery during the period following the announcement of the ballot result. MJ recalled how the AHI militia terrorised everyone: "[They] said we had to evacuate [our homes] quickly because a hundred Indonesian fighter planes [were on their way to] burn all the houses [in the village]". MJ and her family left for the town of Aileu intending to go to Atambua in West Timor. While in Aileu, MJ was raped for the first time.

> PS333, a militiaman and member of Kodim 1632 in Aileu threatened my mother so he could take me away. She was scared of the threats and gave in. The man took me to stay at his house in Aileu Town for one week. On 12 September he came into my room at about 8.00pm and forced me to have sexual intercourse. I submitted because I saw that he was wearing a uniform and had a rifle. I allowed him to rape me to save my family.[217]

261. MJ was repeatedly raped and forced to go to Dili with PS333's family. Eventually the wife of PS333 found out what had happened and threw MJ out of the house. MJ was moved to Kupang, West Timor where she eventually found her family.

262. NJ and her family hid in their house in Cassa (Ainaro, Ainaro) after casting their votes in the Popular Consultation. A member of the Mahidi militia, PS334, entered NJ's house with a rifle. To protect her two younger sisters, who were still virgins, NJ submitted to having sexual intercourse with PS334. This situation continued for some weeks until eventually NJ encouraged her family to flee to Betun, West Timor, where PS334 found her again. Having heard that NJ was pregnant, PS334 took her to a community health centre (puskesmas) in Betun for an injection with the intention to make her abort.

PS334 was unsuccessful and NJ was still pregnant when she left West Timor to return to Ainaro.[218]

263. As demonstrated by the case studies above of sexual violence by Halilintar militia and during the Suai Church Massacre, victims of sexual slavery in Bobonaro and Covalima were often forcibly displaced to West Timor in late September 1999 by the same men who abducted them. Other cases of sexual slavery that continued in West Timor were also reported to the Commission. After the violence in Gleno, Ermera, the Integration Red Blood militia member implicated in the murder of ZE above, known as PS177, continued his violent rampage. He threatened the family of OJ1 and eventually took OJ1's niece, OJ. PS177 threatened to kill OJ for being a member of the Student Council if she did not agree to follow him to Atambua, West Timor. PS177 essentially kidnapped OJ as property to serve him sexually in Atambua.[219]

264. In the case of PJ from the village of Metagou (Bazartete, Liquiçá), PS336, a Besi Merah Putih militia member arrived at her house on 4 September 1999 with a homemade weapon and a knife. He demanded that PJ become his "wife". Two other militia members appeared at the house and continued to threaten PJ and her family. Out of fear, PJ was forced to do his bidding. He made her wash his clothes. A few days later PJ and her family were ordered to go to Atambua where PS336 asserted his ownership of PJ by raping her on a regular basis for four months. In February 2000, PJ escaped from PS336 and returned to Liquiçá.[220]

265. On 12 April 1999, Falintil forces launched an attack in the sub-district of Cailaco, Bobonaro in which some Indonesian soldiers and pro-integration militia were killed. The Indonesian military and local militia retaliated by targeting the civilian population in Cailaco. This included house burning, arbitrary detention, torture, and the public execution of seven men. Rape and sexual slavery also occurred in the context of these acts of violence.[221] Soldiers from the Cailaco Koramil, who were also known to be militia members, raped at least four women. Two of the four victims were forced to West Timor as refugees where they became victims of sexual slavery while in the refugee camp. One of the victims recounted:

> On 12 April 1999, after my two brothers were killed by militia from Cailaco, I had to protect the other members of my family from threats by PS337 [East Timorese], a member of TNI. I was forced to surrender myself to be used [sexually]. I left my village after this incident. When the results of the referendum were announced, PS337 came looking for me and forced me and my family to go to Haekesak [West Timor]. While in the refugee camp, he forced me to have sexual intercourse and I became his mistress.[222]

266. There is little documentation regarding sexual violence in the refugee camps in West Timor from September 1999 to January 2000. However, results of research by the NGO group the West Timor Humanitarian Team (Tim Kemanusiaan Timor Barat, TKTB) from February through mid-May 2000 indicate notable levels of violence against women in the camps, mostly by East Timorese members of the Indonesian army and militia members who effectively had control of the camps.[223] Of the 15 cases of reported polygamy, at least nine of them are suggestive of sexual slavery where a man has forcibly taken and claimed ownership of a second (or third) "wife". Most of these nine cases seem to have been initiated during the ballot-related violence in Timor-Leste rather than in the refugee camps.

Other forms of sexual violence

267. The Commission has found that other forms of sexual violence, in particular sexual torture in detention, public sexual humiliation and sexual harassment were widely used by the Indonesian security forces during the occupation. Sexual torture was an effective way to break prisoners during interrogation and to instil fear among the wider population. Sexual torture is a specific type of torture carried out by sexual means, or by targeting the victim's sexuality (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment for a definition of torture).

268. Torture, including sexual torture, in armed conflict, is a violation of the International Law of Armed Conflict, a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions and a violation of the Laws and Customs of War. Torture may also be a crime against humanity.

269. Many of the cases described in the previous sections on rape and sexual slavery also depicted other forms of sexual violence such as sexual torture. Public sexual humiliation was used as a way to exert power and domination over the civilian population. Sexual harassment was also a feature in some kidnappings perpetrated by the military. It is also a prominent form of sexual violence that is described in testimonies by women who were forced to attend parties organised by the military and its auxiliary groups. At these parties they were forced to dance with armed men and submit to sexual harassment by them.

270. More male victims reported that they experienced these forms of sexual violence, particularly sexual torture, in detention.

Other forms of sexual violence in the context of inter-party conflict

271. The only incidence of sexual violence other than rape or sexual slavery from this period reported to the Commission was the sexual torture of a woman by members of Fretilin in 1977. VF1's father and uncle were members of UDT who later escaped from a Fretilin detention centre and sought protection with the Indonesian military. VF1 and other family members were branded as traitors by Fretilin. They were consequently detained and tortured by Fretilin members in Laclo, Manatuto, in May 1977. VF1 gave a moving testimony about the torture experienced by her cousin, WF, and by her aunt.

> They started to interrogate, beat and burn WF's body with a red-hot iron, which they heated on a fire. They forced my cousin to say that she knew where UDT and ABRI's arms and guns were. Because she said she had not seen them…they beat her until she gave a false confession… The same with my aunt; they beat, kicked her, and burnt her with a hot iron all over her body, including her genitals. Then they took her hands and feet and tied them together, she was hung upside down – head on the bottom and feet on top – for one whole day.[224]

Other forms of sexual violence during the Indonesian occupation (1975–1999)

Sexual torture and humiliation in detention

272. The Commission found evidence that the Indonesian forces practiced torture, cruel treatment and humiliation of a sexual nature on male and female detainees alike. This sexual violence was used effectively to obtain information from detainees and to make them comply with the interrogator. Methods of this type of sexual violence reported to the Commission include:

- stripping detainees naked during interrogation;
- burning and electrocuting breasts and genitalia;
- forcing detainees to perform sexual acts on each other; and
- photographing detainees in humiliating poses, including while naked.

273. The following examples of sexual torture, cruel treatment and humiliation do not include rape although in certain circumstances rape too is a form of torture as explained above.

274. Stripping detainees naked and placing them in a situation of total vulnerability was a way to break their spirit. Beginning with her arrest at the end of 1975, RJ, an aunt of Fretilin leader RJ1, was detained and released at least 20 times in Baucau. She was suspected of being a member of Fretilin, a leader of the Popular Organisation of Timorese Women (Organização Popular da Mulher Timor, OPMT)* and a communist. According to her statement, each time a group of people surrendered or was captured, ABRI interrogators would summon RJ to interrogate her about those newly arrested. During her many interrogations, the military asked her to confess about her involvement in Fretilin and Fretilin dance parties, where everyone allegedly danced in the nude. She tried in vain to say that this never took place. She told the Commission about her interrogation one night at the Flamboyan Hotel.

Then at about midnight ABRI came to the house…"You are wanted by the Kodim commander." I went out and saw about 10 armed men ready outside. [After being taken for interrogation] they asked, "Where is the G-3? Where are the two grenades? Where are the guns?" Actually I had a gun but I lied. [I said] that there was no gun, that I was a woman and did not know how to use one.

* OPMT played an active role in the Resistance by providing political education in the villages as well as provisions and medicine for Falintil fighters.

I saw a syringe needle on the small table. I had never seen one so big, 5 or 10 cc. I suspected that [the] needle was used for injecting animals but they had prepared it for me…They slammed me down on the bed then straightened my arm and with that needle started searching for a vein to inject me. When the injection was done I immediately fell to the floor and I could hear them laughing. They picked me up and threw me on a small cot used by ABRI soldiers. At the time I lost consciousness of what they were doing to me. I just knew that I had cramps in my arms and legs and that I was almost dead. Then they saw that my eyes did not move. Someone took another five pills and stuffed them in my mouth.

After feeding me the medicine, they started taking off my clothes, one item at a time. First they took off my long pants and laughed. Then they took off my blouse and threw it away. Again they laughed. They laughed again when they took off my bra. They took off my underpants last and there I was, lying naked like a small child. Tears were streaming down my face, but I could not talk, I could not move. I thought maybe they wanted to rape me and that is why they left me lying naked on the bed. But God is great. When I was…on the bed an ABRI member called PS338 [Indonesian] from the Umi unit came in and interrogated me while I was naked. He was carrying an SKS gun that he pointed at my throat, saying, "If you refuse to talk I'll kill you." I wanted to talk but my mouth, my arms, my legs were in spasms….But I could hear and understand everything. I was trembling like a chicken as a result of the drug they injected into me. I felt very sick. When I wanted to open my eyes wider, I heard a military commander come in and order his men to return my clothes to me…I felt them move my legs and they laughed because I was naked. They ogled me until about 4.00am and only then [did they return my clothes]. They did not return my watch and my gold chain.*[225]

275. RJ was detained for four days then released. She started cooking for ABRI events and eventually was no longer a target for interrogations.

276. Sometimes detainees were not stripped naked, but by being placed in a compromising situation against local cultural norms, it was tantamount to sexual violence. SJ and her husband were detained in July 1976 for their role as messengers (estafeta) between Falintil guerrillas in the mountains and their supporters in Baucau. SJ was held in the detention centre called House Five (Rumah Lima) for one week, then moved to the Flamboyan Hotel for two weeks. There, male and female detainees were tied facing each other in a position that simulated sexual intercourse:

* Umi was a radio call sign used by a fourth unit (Nanggala 4) of the Special Warfare Command (Komando Pasukan Sandi Yudha). [See Ken Conboy, Kopassus: Inside Indonesia's Special Forces, Equinox Publishing, Jakarta and Singapore, 2003, p. 218.]

I was not tortured there but what made me almost go crazy was that ABRI tied us up [in couples] – man and woman facing one another. We were only released when we went to the bathroom, ate, and were interrogated. Other than those times, we were tied in couples with a different person each time. I could only resign myself [to the situation]… [T]hat act went against Timorese norms and culture, [and was] especially [cruel to me] since I was a married woman.[226]

277. More often than not, sexual humiliation and torture involved nudity and direct attacks on reproductive organs. After a Falintil attack on an ABRI truck in the village of Guruça (Quelicai, Baucau) in July 1977, TJ and members of her family were detained by ABRI soldiers and marines. TJ's husband and father were tied, then beaten and kicked until morning at the post of Marine Troop 9 (Pasukan Marinir 9, Pasmar 9). They were then taken to the sub-district of Laga where four other detainees joined them. At the "marine post" in Laga (a school building), TJ was stripped naked, interrogated and sexually tortured:

When we arrived, TNI [i.e. ABRI] soldiers started to interrogate and electrocute me. They told me to take off my clothes and with a gas lighter burned my vagina. Every day during this week the TNI [ABRI] made me take off my clothes and tortured me.[227]

278. On 26 April 1981, UJ1 was arrested by two members of the Hansip under the command of the sub-district military officer in Quelicai, Baucau. UJ1 was detained along with five female members of his family – UJ, VJ, UJ2, UJ3 and WJ – and a few others. When they arrived at the Koramil, UJ1's hands were tied behind his back and he was beaten and kicked. UJ and VJ were taken to a separate room where two soldiers stripped them naked then beat them with a stick and crushed their toes under the leg of a chair. They also interrogated UJ2 and UJ3. They stripped naked WJ and made her sit in a drum filled with water. Later on, they burned parts of her body, including her breasts, with a cigarette.[228]

279. In Dili, XJ described how he took part in a Falintil assault on 10 July 1981, later to be known as the Marabia attack (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict). He was captured and released the following day, but then re-arrested on 12 July. He was brought to the sub-regional military command (Korem) officer's mess where he was beaten and tortured. XJ worked as a driver for a local priest; his interrogators asked him about the involvement of the Church in supporting the pro-independence movement:

*On 29 July [1981] the military took me outside again. They took off my trousers and underpants and again placed me in a tank, this time together with another Timorese [man] who was not known to me. I didn't know why he had been put in the tank with me. They bound us and then tied our penises together. After that they began beating the other man, thus pulling on the rope that bound our penises together, causing me pain. I had to sit next to the other man waiting for him to regain consciousness as we remained tied to each other. After this we were again tied together* at 9.00am. During the hot part of the day we were taken and placed on a rock in the sandy part of the Kodim headquarters where we were left for almost an hour before being returned inside the building.[229]

280. The following day, XJ was moved to the Balide Prison in Dili where he was detained in an isolation cell for about 10 days. On 3 September 1981, he was put on a boat to Ataúro.

281. YJ, from the village of Fuat (Iliomar, Lautém), told the Commission about the sexual torture he experienced in 1982:

> *In September 1982, I was captured by Indonesian Battalion 320 because they suspected I was taking food and information to Fretilin in the forest. They took me to the Komaril Iliomar 03 Post to be interrogated by Commander PS339 [Indonesian] and a translator named PS390 [East Timorese]. After that, they took me to a place [aldeia] called Paitomar, [Iliomar I Village, Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém]. When we arrived, they stripped me naked, told me to lie on the ground and placed a big rock on my stomach. Then I was beaten with a gun in the back. After that I was hung from a tree. [They] forced a woman, who was also suspected [of being pro-independence] to hold my penis, shake it around, suck on it and play with it. They also burned my body with fire.*[230]

282. ZJ from Cairui, Laleia (Manatuto) was captured in 1982 by members of Hansip known as PS341 and PS342. The Hansip took him on foot to the Laleia Koramil. He was interrogated there by PS338, also a Hansip member, and tortured by PS341 and PS338. They stripped him naked, beat and kicked him until he almost lost consciousness. They tied a stone to his penis. This torture continued from 7.00am until 4.00pm. Feliciano was detained at the Koramil for one year.[231]

283. Female detainees often experienced sexual humiliation. Because O1's husband was a guerrilla fighter in the forest, ABRI soldiers, including one known to the victim as PS344 [East Timorese], went to O1's house in Ainaro in 1982. The soldiers killed her brother and then beat, stripped naked and raped her sister-in-law, O. After the rape, O and O1 were taken to the Kodim in Ainaro where an intelligence officer interrogated them.

> After that O and I were rounded up and taken to the intelligence office in Ainaro, where we were detained with other women victims…We were held one month in the intelligence office and could not leave the place. If one of us was menstruating she had to wash her clothes in water and put them on again, although still damp. While in detention we were interrogated by PS344. He always had a knife that he used to jab [us] around the mouth and in the lower belly. One day O and I were separated from the other detainees and kept inside a toilet for two days and two nights.[232]

284. In 1983, AK was detained in Hato-Udo (Ainaro) under suspicion of having contact with Falintil. He managed to escape, but was recaptured in Mau Ulo, Ainaro by about 50 soldiers from Infantry Battalion 744. After soldiers detained him for two days at the 744 headquarters, they took him to see the district military commander of Ainaro who confirmed that AK was the person they were looking for. AK was then detained at the military headquarters in Ainaro. AK told the Commission:

> When I arrived there a soldier named PS345 began torturing me. I was kicked, beaten, slapped…then he told me to strip. I was naked. [While I was] naked, PS345 attached wires to different parts of my body: my hair, ears, neck, all my fingers and toes, and genitals.…PS229 turned on the electricity and I was electrocuted from 8.00pm until 1.00am. I was detained in Ainaro for one month and one week. They also captured two middle-aged women who wore traditional clothes, who were from Zumalai [Covalima]. They were interrogated by PS229 and PS345 forced them to undress. While they were naked, I was forced to place the wires on their bodies. Then PS229 and PS345 turned on the electricity and electrocuted them. After they were tortured, they were kept as "mistresses" by PS229 and members of Nanggala.[233]

285. In Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém), the Indonesian military retaliated strongly against the women left behind by their sons and husbands who joined Falintil en masse in August 1983. BK, her friend, P, and her young son were detained. BK described how sexual violence was used to torture her:

> On 9 August 1983, members of the Wanra, Hansip, the village head and the whole male population fled to the forest. Two months later soldiers from Linud 100 [Airborne Battalion from Sumatra] ordered all women whose husbands had fled to the forest to assemble in the village. They then told the women, "All of you can go home except for P and BK. They have to stay here for questioning." [We] were taken to the post. We arrived at 6.00pm. They immediately started interrogating me and my friend, P. They asked, "Why did your husbands flee to the forest?" We replied, "We don't know why they fled to the forest." "Why don't you know? They are your husbands, aren't they? You are GPK! Communists!" Then they started beating and stripping us...from 6.00pm until 1.00am. They hit us with wooden sticks, they kicked, stripped and threatened us with weapons, ordering us to confess. We did not confess to anything because we did not know anything. That night, Kasi I [army intelligence officer] started to interrogate me while pulling out my pubic hairs one at a time, so that I hurt and when I could no longer bear the pain I would confess to anything I knew. But because I knew nothing I remained silent, although I was in great pain. As I did not confess they became increasingly angry and beat me until blood was coming out of my nose and mouth. Then at 1.00am they stopped torturing me. After that they told me and my friend P to eat, but I refused. My whole body was in pain as they had pricked me with the thorns of a tree, something like the areca [sugar] palm, and I was bleeding from it.[234]

286. Although she was released after that night, BK was detained once again by Battalion 641 and held in a traditional house in Mehara for six months.

287. Unlike many of the women from the aldeia of Maluro, Lore (Lospalos, Lautém) who experienced sexual slavery during the military's large-scale operations in that area as described above, CK managed to escape rape. She did, however, experience torture and sexual harassment:

> On 11 October 1983, I was captured by ABRI 744 troops and Hansip. I was handed over to the troops carrying out field operations who at the time were on duty at the edge of the forest. For a week I was interrogated every night. If I did not give the right answer I would be beaten. They beat and kicked me in the thighs then they sat on a chair on top of my foot. During the interrogation they touched me and pinched me, but they did not rape me. After that they just left me there. For over a month, while I was there, I was not interrogated or harassed.[235]

Testimony of DK, Mehara, Tutuala

DK gave testimony regarding her husband's disappearance and how she was a victim of sexual violence:

> My husband was a primary school teacher in the aldeia of Poros Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém) and a leader of a clandestine organisation called Loriku Assuwain. In 1983, a group of the Hansip from Poros fled to the forest to join Falintil. After several weeks the commander of the army taskforce [Komandan Satgas] of Tutuala forced my husband to join the "fence of legs" operation for one month in search of those Hansip who had fled.
>
> On 13 November 1983, those members of Hansip who had returned from the forest to work again with TNI [sic] 641 in Poros came to the house to arrest my husband. Several days later, three Hansip came to the house with two soldiers from Battalion 641, to look for documents on clandestine activities. They did not find any because I had hidden them. I was forced to go to Military Post 641 in Laluna Lopo, Poros, to give a statement. That evening I took my child, who at that time was three months old, and headed for military post [Battalion] 641.
>
> There I was asked by the commander of Post 641, "Do you know about your husband's clandestine involvement? Have you met with Fretilin?" I answered "no" to all these questions. Then they prepared three places to sleep – one for me, one for my child and one for a friend who was pregnant at the time. In the middle of the night a soldier began to embrace me, kiss me, pressing his lips on mine and told me to hold his private parts. Then he touched my private parts and said, "My private parts are just like your husband's private parts. Why do you resist me?" I answered, "I was not called to this place to do this. If you want to ask something about my husband's involvement, please go ahead." After hearing my response, he released his embrace. This happened for two nights, but never to the point of intercourse.

However, it was different with my friend who was pregnant. One of the soldiers began to push and beat her stomach to kill the child in her womb, saying that the child she was carrying was the result of her relationship with her husband who had left for the forest. The child survived, but has a disfigured face. On the third night we were sent home. When I arrived home my husband said to me, "My wife, I will go and face the soldiers at post 641. I believe I won't return. I have only one child. May this child replace me. It may well be that after I am gone you will be made the prostitute of Military Battalion 641. But be good in your heart and be patient. This is happening because of the political conflict, for us to free ourselves from the oppressor. Should we go and not return, look for our trails because the time will come when all the people will ask about us. May you be our witness because we are working for the liberation of our nation." After saying this, my husband was taken to Military Post 641 in Lalua Lopo.

After my husband was taken to the military post, he and several of his friends were sent to Kodim 1629 in Lospalos. To this day, my husband and two of his friends have not returned. A third friend was released and lives in Poros, Mehara.

My three-month-old baby died after getting sick with malaria during our two nights at military post 641.[236]

288. On 14 October 1991, EK was arrested under suspicion of stealing secret documents from the sub-regional military office (Korem) where she had been working as an administrative assistant for 10 years. Initially she was detained and tortured at the office of the Intelligence Platoon Commander (Komandan Peleton Intelijen, Danton Intel). Although she was never raped, the threat of rape, sexual harassment and humiliation were part of the strategy intended to terrorise her and to break her resistance during interrogation. In addition to threats of sexual violence, EK was also humiliated. During the first three days of her interrogation, she was not allowed to bathe or change her clothes, despite the fact that she was menstruating. She told the Commission:

An Intel [intelligence agent] with the rank of captain from Nusra Bakti [of Dili] – I forget his name – interrogated me from half past two to six o'clock in the morning. At the time he brought a snake that he kept inside a sack. When I was not talking much and only replied that I did not know, he tried to undo the buttons of my blouse… then the captain pointed the gun at my forehead and I passed out. When I regained consciousness the snake that had been in the sack, was winding itself around my body…but it did not bite me [maybe] because I kept praying in my heart. Then the snake moved down and slithered back towards his owner. When it got back on the body of its owner, the snake shat on him and slithered back into the sack…After the interrogation, the Intel from Korem did not do anything brutal to me, but those from Nusra Bakti always sexually harassed me. They would put their feet inside my skirt, trying to take it off, but I never let them.[237]

289. After receiving a visit from the International Red Cross, EK was secretly moved to the West Dili Police Station (Polsekwil Dili Barat). According to EK, the chief of police was a kind man who hid the keys to her cell so that others could not enter it at night. Every night, soldiers and intelligence officers would taunt her from outside her cell. She continued:

A soldier from [Battalion] 744 who had become an Intel, usually called PS347 [East Timorese], said, "Come on, let's open the door. We'll burst in and attack her inside." After saying that, they tried to kick in the door. Then they looked for the key inside a P3K [First Aid] box. They found a key and tried to open my cell door, but it did not open. They said, "Today we cannot eat your flesh, but tomorrow we'll be back."[238]

290. The threats continued every night. Soldiers threatened her with a gun, called her names using sexually explicit language, and even beat up a young man who was detained in the cell next to EK, which increased her fear. Eventually, an East Timorese police officer smuggled a letter from EK to her family. The following day staff from the International Red Cross came and successfully transferred her to the Becora Prison. Her situation was a little improved there, although she was still harassed regularly by intelligence officers from Nusra Bakti. In January 1992, EK, her uncle and brother-in-law were tried and sentenced to six years imprisonment. She was released in 1997.

291. Torture that employed sexual violence and the threat of it, for those in detention, was practiced not only by the Indonesian military, but also by the Indonesian police. In October 1996, after an Indonesian trader, believed by Falintil to be an intelligence officer, was killed, FK, GK, HK, IK and two other men were arrested by the police in Ermera. The six men were taken to police headquarters in Gleno Sub-district (Ermera). Police officers forced the men to strip naked. They then beat them on the head and body and forcefully pulled on their penises. IK's genitals were beaten until they were swollen. The police also applied electric shots all over the men's bodies. HK was fed a live lizard and made to hang on a cross naked. His penis was rubbed with the sap of a flower which was an irritant. GK1 and JK, the parents of GK, were also arrested. JK was interrogated and was stripped nearly naked by a police officer. She was made to give Rp900,000 and a goat, chicken and corn to the police. In the end, the six men were tried and sentenced to 10 years in prison. They fled from prison in 1999.[239]

Photographing of detainees

292. Photographs of naked, tortured, and murdered men's and women's bodies are yet another form of sexual violence that is intended to degrade its victims and instil terror in those who view them. The Commission examined photographs that depict women's naked, bruised and bloodied bodies, but whose faces are covered. Also visible in the photographs are the legs and feet of individuals dressed in fatigues and army boots. These pictures were first obtained and disseminated in Timor-Leste in November 1997 by ETISC (East Timor International Support Centre), an Australian-based organisation that supported self-determination for Timor-Leste. ETISC obtained about 40 photographs that explicitly show tortured bodies of possibly five women. Testimonies received by the Commission indicate that photographing the bodies of male and female victims of torture and rape was a practice of Indonesian security forces.*

293. The following cases provide evidence of detainees who were photographed. They indicate how torture and humiliation that target sexuality are often closely related to acts of rape or sexual slavery.

294. In 1977, an ABRI translator, PS348 [East Timorese], took KK from her home. She was initially taken to the Koramil and later moved to a detention centre in Dili known as Sang Tai Hoo in Colmera. KK told the Commission about her experience of being stripped naked, tortured and then being photographed. She was also raped each day, and eventually made the difficult choice to enter a relationship with an ABRI officer:

> During the interrogation I was tortured…I was beaten with a belt [to force me] to confess that I was in contact with Falintil and had received a letter from a member of Falintil. But I did not confess. On the second day, 30 January 1977, I was interrogated again by intel in Sang Tai Hoo in the daytime…During the interrogation they stripped me naked and burned my body with cigarette butts, electrocuted me while I was naked, and then they photographed me. I was raped by ABRI who always said that if I slept with them I could go home. Because I refused, they kicked me. I was kept in Sang Tai Hoo for 25 days.
>
> On 14 February 1977, I was transferred again to the Balide Prison about 5 o'clock…In the group cell I met two of my friends, LK and MK. Not even a week later we were transferred again, but before that they took us to a room in Balide Prison where they pierced our dresses with a nail. Then they raped us until the morning. In the morning we were separated again.

* The Commission holds copies of these photographs in its Archive. The Commission has decided not to re-publish these photographs in this Report or other publications, out of respect for the dignity of the victims.]

The two of them went to Sang Tai Hoo and I remained in Balide. While there I met some Timorese women who had just surrendered but whose names I did not know. The TNI [ABRI] made us bathe outside in the nude and when we finished they moved me again into the common cell. [240]

295. KK was detained until 1980 when she agreed to a sexual relationship with a Lieutenant-Colonel named PS349 [Indonesian]. She gave birth to a child from this relationship.

296. In 1982, NK was 14 years old when he was captured by Indonesian soldiers during military operations after the Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) uprising (see Mau Chiga case study, par. 211 ff, above). After two weeks of hiding in a cave on Mount Kablaki, NK, along with his father and older brother, were discovered and captured. NK recalled that a photograph taken of him played a role in his public humiliation and cruel treatment:

After I was [captured], I was immediately made a TBO and moved to the Zipur [combat engineers] post. After I had been with them for about two days, I started seeing genitalia and ears hanging on a pine tree at the post. I was on guard duty at the post with them at night. They took turns so they could sleep. Only I could not sleep. I had to sing and shout till morning. Approximately a week or so later they took me again to the Koramil post. I was tied to the flagpole at about 8.00am. After that they took my clothes off till I stood naked, then they gave me a pair of their underpants to wear when I was tied up. I was released from the flagpole and made to carry an empty box to the Zipur post. On the way I was told to shout to the people there, "Don't follow Falintil's arse! If you follow Falintil you will all be like me!" When I arrived at the Zipur post they took my picture. I asked for my clothes before they photographed me but they refused. They only gave them back to me in the afternoon.[241]

297. In 1983, hundreds of men from villages around Lospalos joined Falintil in the forest. Due to this exodus, the wives of men who had left the village were made to sleep at the military post every night for one year. PK from Porlamanu, Mehara (Lospalos, Lautém) was questioned by soldiers from Airborne Battalion 100 and Battalion 641 because her husband had also fled to join the guerrillas. PK told the Commission:

They bound my hands tightly with my belt, then they put money on the table and said, "If you give us the name of the commander in the clandestine [organisation] you can take this money." I replied, "I don't know, I only know my husband." After that they tied my neck close to the wall and stripped me naked. Then they burned my whole body with cigarette butts…[They] ordered me to count my pubic hair and took a picture of me while I was naked.[242]

298. Pretending that she needed to go to the toilet, PK was able to run from her captors and seek assistance from Infantry Battalion 623. She was released the same night.

299. QK1 told of an interrogation session with two of his friends. His friends were stripped naked and ordered to stand on one leg with both arms stretched up above their heads for a photograph:

> In 1994, a unit of Nanggala [Special Warfare Command] soldiers stripped naked two of my friends, QK and RK, and made them sit on a table, then electrocuted them on their genitals. The following day, the same [thing happened]. They started again to beat us and told us to strip down to our underpants. We stood on one leg with both our arms stretched above our heads then they took pictures of us. After the photograph [was taken] we were allowed to get dressed again.[243]

300. SK gave further corroboration regarding the army's practice of photographing detainees:

> In 1996 I received a letter saying I had to pick up a journalist in Baraut and that I was to cooperate [with her]. I went and we met. I took all [my] documents and gave them to the journalist. Because we [didn't feel free] to talk much in that place, we decided to return…to Becora [Cristo Rei/ Dili]…I took a taxi to Fatuhada [Dom Aleixo/Dili]. After I got into the taxi I noticed another taxi, an Argo, following me. In the Argo taxi were four fat men wearing dark glasses and black jackets. My heart started pounding.
>
> After we got on the road, going into Delta [an area of Dili] at about 5.00pm, two men got into the taxi with me. They were also wearing black jackets, dark glasses and [their faces were] covered with "ninja" masks. I was scared. In the taxi, the two started pushing against my legs, and I couldn't do anything. They started tying me up and blindfolded me with a cloth. Then they took off all my clothes. I did not have a stitch on. They took me to a house in Taci Tolu. Before raping me, they burned me all over my body with cigarette butts and drugged me. They held a handkerchief – probably already soaked with a narcotic drug – over my mouth and nose so that when I was raped I would be unconscious. I did not know how many of them there were, but certainly more than five. When they finished raping me, they threw me out around Kasait [Liquiçá], near the beach. When I regained consciousness I realised that I was naked. My whole body (including my breasts) was covered in blood and injuries. Several months later an SGI [joint intelligence unit] member from Ambon told Julio, an Ambonese who worked in the Prosecutor's office, that he had seen photographs of me in the nude. Julio passed the information on to me.
>
> On 20 May 2002, on Timor-Leste's independence day, I saw the pictures of myself naked at an exhibition. I know the shape of my body and I have a mole on my breast so it was easy to recognise [myself in] the photograph.[244]

Public sexual humiliation

301. Public displays of nudity were a form of cruel and degrading treatment effectively used by the occupying force to subjugate both detainees and the general public who were forced to witness these events. After the mass arrests in response to the Mau Chiga uprising in 1982, three women were detained at the Koramil in the village of Lesuati (Turiscai, Manufahi). One night they were taken outside, stripped naked, and made to climb a pine tree. DH told the Commission:

> Our house in Hatuquero was burned down and TNI [ABRI] forced us to run to the Koramil in Lesuati. There I met EH and FH. On that night ABRI soldiers took us to Mantutu. My two friends and I were made to strip completely naked and then were made to climb a large, tall pine tree. They made us go up and down the tree several times, all the while burning our bodies with sticks they had put in the fire. They also doused us with cold water they had already prepared in a bucket. They brought electric torches to shine on our genitals from below while laughing as we were climbing the tree. FH could not climb because she found the pain from the burns and her grazed skin unbearable, so that she kept slipping down because she could not climb the tree. But the TNI [ABRI] made her climb all the way to the top.[245]

302. On 30 January 1983, Battalion 745, under the command of a man known as Pak PS350 [Indonesian], detained TK from Souro (Lospalos, Lautém) with six men and four women as they returned home from their gardens. As they were marched to the military post, one of the men successfully escaped despite the fact that ABRI opened fire on him. The escape of this detainee angered the soldiers, who then separated the men from the women. The men were taken somewhere and have never been seen since. TK told the Commission about what happened to the five remaining women:

> We five women were made to strip and stand naked while they shaved our heads. Then they burned our clothes in front of us…
>
> Then we were made to go on foot to the 745 barracks in Lospalos. As we walked through the village of Home the ABRI soldiers made all the people come out of their houses and look at us walking naked…They remained silent and some bowed their heads as we passed before them. Others cried to see what the soldiers were doing to us, but they did not say anything because they were afraid of being killed. We were very ashamed but said nothing and did what they wanted because we were afraid we would die. We remained at the 745 barracks one night only. [246]

303. The following day, the head of Ventura village, came to ask ABRI to release the women. Eventually, the women were given sacks to put over their naked bodies and allowed to go to the house of the village head. One of the women, UK, told the Commission that she was raped during the overnight stay at the Battalion 745 barracks:

During the night we spent at the 745 barracks in Lospalos, an ABRI soldier raped me in front of four other friends. I felt very ashamed and shocked. At the time I was still stressed about the fate of my husband…who had been captured with us in Souro. I did not know whether he was still alive or whether he had been killed by ABRI. I felt I was betraying my husband. All my friends knew that I was raped that night, but they could do nothing to defend me because all our lives were in ABRI's hands.[247]

304. A year later in 1984, also in the village of Souro (Lospalos, Lautém), WK and her family members were detained by soldiers from Territorial Combat Battalion (BTT) 315 under suspicion of involvement in clandestine activities. They were brought to the BTT 315 post in the aldeia of Karalata, Souro (Lospalos, Lautém), where they were held and interrogated for one week. One day, WK and XK were stripped naked from the waist up and made to stand under the sun for the whole day.[248]

305. In Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém) in 1985, YK was arrested by a member of the Wanra forces named PS351, under orders from a local commander known as PS392 (Indonesian). PS351 took YK to a water tank, doused her with water and molested her. He then took her to the command post,* where she was beaten along with other detainees there. After they beat her, they placed her in a detention cell with two other women named Q and R. They stripped the three women naked and put them in a water tank overnight. YK told the Commission about her public sexual humiliation:

At the command post they put me in a detention cell with two other women, Q and R. The three of us were put in a mossy water tank and in the morning they returned our clothes for us to wear. The following day I was taken out of the cell without clothes, just wearing training pants. In front of many people, a member of Tim Alfa,† PS352, tore the pants off me and said to his friends, "Who wants to have sex with YK?" But nobody came forward.[249]

306. She was then given her clothes to put back on and taken back to the post. She was released three days later.

307. Sexual humiliation did not always occur in public. On 26 April 1999, AL was captured at her home in the village of Purogoa (Cailaco, Bobonaro) by members of the Halilintar militia, including a man named PS410, and police. AL told the Commission:

On 26 April 1999, PS410, along with members of Halilintar militia, and the police, took me from my house about 10.00am. I didn't know their names except for PS410 and PS353. They dragged me into the street and hit me with a large piece of cassava…PS410 and PS353…took a red-white flag [the Indonesian flag] and covered my face with it so the people wouldn't know me…They didn't take it off until we reached the aldeia of Biadoi, Meligo [Cailaco, Bobonaro]. Then they shoved me into a car. When we arrived at PS410's office in Cailaco Town, PS353 kicked me [and] PS410 stripped me down to my underpants and bra. After that, at about 12.00pm PS410 made me sign a statement that said I would not be involved in any illegal organisation. After this I was taken home.[250]

* The original statement refers simply to a command post. This could be a Civilian Defence post or a Team Alfa militia post.

† "Team Alfa had been set up by Kopassus [Special Forces Command] in the mid-1980s, to infiltrate the clandestine movement and to assist in combat operations. That institutional tie remained in 1999." [Geoffrey Robinson, East Timor 1999 – Crimes against Humanity, Report commissioned by the United Nations Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), July 2003, Submission to CAVR, April 2004, p. 165].

Sexual harassment

308. Sexual harassment is commonly defined as unsolicited sexual attention that takes place within the context of an unequal power relationship. Sexual harassment is said to take place when the person possessing the dominant power uses this advantage to conduct uninvited sexual advances, whether verbal or physical, towards the less powerful person. As already seen above, in the context of armed conflict in Timor-Leste, armed or powerful men made use of their power over the civilian population to engage in all forms of sexual violence, including sexual harassment.*

309. On 26 March 1996, the house of BL, in the village of Lisabat (Hatolia, Ermera), was raided by Army Strategy and Reserve Command (Rajawali) 401 Team. She and her husband were harbouring a Falintil assistant commander named BL2 who was then captured. The soldiers tied her husband, BL1, and BL2 with a rope, beat and kicked them, while forcing them to parade around the house. They hit BL with a gun, stripped her naked and molested her. They also stripped naked BL's mother-in-law, CL, and interrogated her:

Rajawali came in to the kitchen. They held my hands tightly while interrogating me about whether I hid Falintil members or took food to them in the forest. They tortured me, hit me, slapped me, dragged me around and battered me in the head with gun. After that there was a Rajawali who hugged me and held my breasts. Then they began to strip me and feel my entire body with the excuse that I was hiding weapons. After that, Rajawali began to hold my mother-in-law and strip her as part of their interrogation of her. Some of the Rajawali beat her. The Rajawali also beat my husband until he was black and blue, while I was just left standing there naked like a doll.[251]

310. Many women suffered from cruel and degrading treatment through sexual harassment they experienced at "dance parties" in 1999. At the height of militia activity in 1999, militia groups across Timor-Leste organised dance parties and then forced women from the surrounding villages to attend them. One such party took place in the village of Lourba (Bobonaro, Bobonaro). DL described the incident to the Commission:

* Sexual harassment is often discussed in the context of employee-employer or student-teacher relationships.

> On 4 May 1999, the DMP [Dadurus Merah Putih] militia conducted an operation in our village…They made us slaughter cows, pigs, goats and chickens and give [the meat] to them. At the time the commanders were PS354 and PS355 and their membership was about 300 men. During the day we had to cook for them and in the night we had to serve them…keep them company and dance with them…
>
> During the dance they started doing all sort of things like poking fingers into sensitive areas [of the body] and touching our bodies as if we were their wives. But what could I say? If I resisted I would die. At that time I was with friends [three other women].[252]

311. The militia used sexual harassment, as they did other forms of sexual violence, in their campaign of terror to generate fear among the general population. The Commission received statements from women who were forcibly taken by groups of militia, often during the night, and subjected to sexual harassment.

312. In the middle of the night, sometime before the Popular Consultation in 1999, EL and S were forcibly taken from their home in the village of Laclo (Atsabe, Ermera) by five militia men from the militia group, Pancasila, under the orders of the village head, PS356. When they arrived at the village head's house they were forced to dance with officers from the Joint Intelligence Force (SGI) until morning. Because they feared for their lives, EL and S danced with these men who touched their breasts and molested them while dancing. In September 1999, the two women were again detained by members of the same militia group and again brought to the village head's house. This time they were immersed in a tank of water with a black snake which later bit them.[253]

313. On 7 May 1999, the Mahidi militia raided the house of FL from the sub-district of Zumalai (Covalima) in search of her husband who had already fled to the forest. FL told the Commission:

> Between 7 and 9 May 1999, they came and surrounded our house. They searched the whole house looking for a Fretilin flag, documents and for my husband. Because they did not find anything they vented their frustration on me and my one-year-old child. They threw my child in the vehicle and hit me around the head and abused me verbally before throwing me inside the vehicle too. They said, "Let's have some sport first," and continued to hit me. They took us to the Mahidi post and put us into a cell. I was interrogated by the wife of the village head named PS360 [East Timorese]. I was hit because I did not answer her questions. When they finished hitting me, they gave me food – rice without vegetables. After I ate, they hit me again and forced me to drink urine. I don't know whose urine. I was in a cell with four other women: Lucilia, Domingas, Monica and Lucia. The cell was in the house of a police officer called PS358 [East Timorese].

After that a militiawoman called PS359 [female] came to my cell and burned my mouth with a cigarette while threatening, "If her husband is not here, better just kill the wife." PS357 asked me, "Where did you hide the Fretilin flag?" I still did not answer the question, so she left the cell and told five men to go into my cell, saying, "Play with her, it's free." But they did not do anything to me. Of the five militiamen, only PS361 tried to rape me. But I refused and said, "You'd better kill me." Then the 743 TNI company commander [Danki] came back and said, "Let's be together, you often kiss Falintil." I gave him a rude reply and he hit me across the mouth until it swelled up. After making a statement that we would remain under [the control of] Mahidi and Merah Putih, we were released on the order of PS357.[254]

314. GL was taken from her village of Cová (Balibó, Bobonaro) by Firmi Merah Putih militia, along with two other women, to their command post. Using the excuse that they were examining their breasts for "magical" implants, they stripped them naked.

On 7 May 1999, Firmi militia PS362 and Commander PS363 captured me together with HL and IL at Railulu of Cová Village, Bobonaro. The three of us were taken to the Firmi militia post in Balibó. When we arrived they interrogated us and then put us in a room and told us to take off our clothes to see what kind of "medicine" we had implanted in our breasts. As they found nothing, after the examination we were told to back home.[255]

The impact of sexual violations on victims

315. Twenty five (25) years of conflict had a profound impact on its victims, regardless of gender and age. All families in Timor-Leste have been touched in some way by violence. However, although men and women share a common thread of being victims of the conflict, it is important to point out the differences experienced by male and female victims of human rights violations. There are three ways in which the experience of women victims was different:

- women were the predominant victims of sexual violence and therefore suffered the specific social, mental and physical consequences of that violence
- women who suffered non-sexual human rights violations had different barriers to their recovery due to the different reproductive functions, as well as the different roles and status assigned to men and women; and
- women as primary caregivers of the family also suffered when male members of their families experienced gross human rights violations as they had to fulfil all the responsibilities of providing protection, livelihood and caring for children and other dependents in the absence of their spouses.

316. During the period of conflict in Timor-Leste, sexual violence had a profound impact on its victims and on the general community. Although most acts of sexual violence took place behind closed doors, knowledge of these acts spread through the community very quickly. Long after the incident itself, sexual violence continues to affect the lives of survivors in their physical and mental well-being and in their social status.

Reproductive health

317. During ABRI's retaliation towards residents of Mau Chiga (Hatu Builico, Ainaro) following the failed Falintil uprising in 1982, IH was among the many Mau Chiga women who suffered sexual violence. IH was a teenage victim of repeated rape at the Mantutu military post close to Lesuati before she was moved to Dare and then to Nunumogue. She was often "chased" by Indonesian soldiers. One Hansip member followed her all the way to Nunumogue and raped her there.[256]

> Every night I was followed by [members of] ABRI and Hansip because at the time I was about 12 years old. Before I was raped I was tortured in different ways. [They] hit me with weapons, they burnt me, threw water at me and undressed me. They took me out in the middle of the long grass and there, the unthinkable happened. On the first night a corporal from 744 named PS364 [East Timorese] raped me. On the second night, I was raped by PS365 [East Timorese], also a corporal from 744. On the third night I was raped by PS366 [East Timorese], a corporal from 744. After [the first incident] my body was covered in blood, I had never had sexual intercourse before. There was a Hansip who was not satisfied. He followed me to Nunumogue [Hatu Builico, Ainaro]. He took me out at night and did it to me outside the house. Before the rape, he hit me on the head with his gun. After all that, I felt pain in my genitals – itching, difficulty in urinating – and also pain in my abdomen and around my hips.[257]

318. During the period of conflict, women had limited access to reproductive health services. Although community health centres existed, Indonesian health services focused on providing primary and maternal health care and meeting family planning targets. They turned a blind-eye to reproductive and sexual health care.[258] Specific needs around reproductive health care, like tests and medical cures for sexually transmitted diseases or early detection of cancer or pre-cancerous cells in the reproductive system were not accessible to women. Women survivors of rape had nowhere to go for formal medical care.

319. In many cases, family members treated them with traditional medicine.

> *When [my niece] got off from the motorcycle she could not walk because she had been raped. She arrived with injuries and blood on her genitals, I treated her…she drank [a concoction of] water and betel leaf (sirih), I washed her with sirih water and leaves that I had boiled.*[259]

320. Untreated, sexually transmitted diseases may cause a relatively quick death from severe pelvic infection or long-term reproductive health problems, including cancer and sterility. In a few of statements that the Commission collected, survivors of rape or their family members spoke of some kind of vague "female illness":

> They took her to the military post and raped her in turns. They continued to do this until 1980 when they [Linud 100] were demobilised and replaced by Battalion 643. They also took me to become a TBO at that post…I saw my sister being raped with my own eyes. When they left Fahinehan [Fatuberliu, Manufahi], she was released [and allowed] to go home… After being subjected to sexual violence for such a long time, she developed a uterine condition and died in 1994.[260]

321. Women who experienced repeated rape and severe torture suffered from multiple health problems: reproductive, mental and physical. The fact that these crimes were unpunished, and could at any time be repeated, were added mental burdens to the survivors:

> We were held for 16 days in detention and every night my three friends and I were raped by four men…When they got tired, they forced some of the male detainees to rape us. Then I was tortured. They hit me with a thick piece of wood. They hit my hips and head. Because of this my hip broke, I continued to have headaches and could not walk…After 16 days, they released us. They had to carry me home to Uatolari [Viqueque]. At home I was treated with traditional medicine, but it did not really help. The only thing that lessened the pain a little was putting ice on my hips. I was so traumatised, I continued to feel that there was someone spying on me, waiting to arrest me. I was so afraid, I finally ran to Dili.
>
> [Eventually] I got married and had a son. After I gave birth I began to feel a lot of pain around my hip. I could not walk. I just had to lie down. I stayed in bed for three years. Now I am beginning to walk again. I want to tell so much more, but I have forgotten much, maybe because of the torture I experienced when I was detained.[261]

322. Pregnant women were subject to sexual violence and other human rights violations. This had severe implications for their maternal health and for the survival of the foetus:

> My wife and her young sister were arrested and then raped for six hours, from morning to 4.00pm. [My wife] was six months pregnant at the time. They were able to run away, but the TNI soldiers shot at them. JL was shot dead, and my wife was shot in her hip. She was able to escape to [the place] where I was…She had a miscarriage and not long after she also died.[262]

Unsafe abortions

323. For some victims of rape who became pregnant due to the rape, the feeling of shame, guilt and rage pushed them to desperate measures in order to terminate the pregnancy. In some cases, unsafe abortions had fatal results:

After we came back from Ataúro, we were always monitored by ABRI intelligence. Our life was difficult. The worst thing was hearing the news, upon our return, that my sister, KL, had died. She became pregnant by ABRI when she was detained in the Korem in Dili. When she heard that her husband was soon to [be released] and return to Laleia, Manatuto, she tried to abort her pregnancy because she was afraid that she would be seen as an unfaithful wife. She died from the abortion.[263]

324. In one case, a woman victim of domestic sexual slavery died due to illness which was possibly related to attempts to terminate the pregnancy by the soldier who raped her:

In March 1979, my younger sister T was taken by a member of the Hansip named PS367 to the command post in Leohat [Soibada, Manatuto], under instruction from a Hansip member named PS368 who often beat up the local population. My sister told me that when she arrived there she was raped by a Nanggala named PS369 [Indonesian]. She was then forced to be his "wife" for six months. When he found out that T was pregnant, PS369 tried to terminate the pregnancy by continuously massaging her stomach with Rheumason (balsam), until she became ill. When she was very sick, PS369 brought her to my uncle's house on 6 September 1979. Four days later I was made to go to the forest with Command 122 as a TBO for one month. When I returned, T was already dead. My uncle said that she only lived for another six days.[264]

325. The Commission also received evidence about cases where the perpetrator had attempted to force the victim to terminate that pregnancy. In some cases women were brought to local health clinics and given injections which were believed to be able to induce abortion:

In Betun, West Timor I met again with him and he wanted to make me have sex with him again. I said, sorry, but I have now missed my period [as a consequence of rape by the same man]. He was surprised and brought me to a health centre where I received an injection. Three days later he came to ask me if I had gotten my period. I said no. From that day on he avoided me and never came back.[265]

326. Unsafe abortions could lead to maternal death, long-term illness or disability affecting the mother. There could also be repercussions on the health of a baby who survived attempts at termination.

Mental health

Not one person cared about what happened to me. I was alone. After the [rape] incident my shoulder hurt and I also became sick from thinking about it so much I became stressed. Because of this clandestine work, I did not take care of my child, who died in August 1999 after the raising of the Falintil flag. Because of the violations I had a female disease – an attack of white blood. I became crazy and at the end I split up with my husband. Now I live alone with my four children.[266]

327. For some women who experienced distress and trauma from sexual violence, the continued lack of security, the lack of mental health services to deal with the trauma, and their sense of rage, shame, isolation and guilt led to the development of long-term mental health illness. Some, whose family members provided support and care, were able to overcome their trauma without severe long-term consequences (see Vol. IV, Part 10: Acolhimento and Victim Support).

328. Other women who experienced severe sexual violence were not able to recover from their trauma, despite support from their family:

The soldiers, both Indonesian and Timorese, raped me and my sister in pairs. I could not keep track of how many because there were so many. This continued for four days. Until now U still suffers from the bad things they did to her. She is mentally unstable, has fainting spells and remains unmarried because she is unwell.[267]

329. Again and again, the Commission heard of the long-term mental health consequences of rape:

During the month that troops from Battalion 122 from Sumatra occupied the area, many women became victims of rape. They went to people's homes, took people and their belongings, chickens, eggs, and forced daughters and wives to comply with their sexual desires. A woman became mentally depressed and eventually went crazy because these troops violated her repeatedly.[268]

330. During periods of escalating violence, those already coping with mental illness due to past violations would become vulnerable to recurring trauma.

331. In 1999, Fokupers* reported a case of a woman who was a victim of sexual slavery in Viqueque. A school teacher during the Portuguese period, she was repeatedly taken as "wife" by at least five different military personnel, one after the other. When Fokupers staff first heard of the case, Dina, as she was referred to in the report to protect their client's identity, was mentally ill. Without any mental health care to treat her illness, Dina would walk around naked in her village until, in exasperation, her parents chained her to her bed.[269]

* Fokupers (Forum Komunikasi Perempuan, Women's Communication Forum) is a prominent East Timorese women's advocacy NGO based in Dili. It was established in 1997, and conducts an extensive programme of psycho-social support to women survivors of violence. Fokupers worked closely with the Commission on a number of elements of its programme of support to victims of human rights violations, especially women survivors.

332. Access to mental health services during the 25-year period of conflict was very limited and remains a problem for survivors of sexual violence (see Vol. IV, Part 10: Acolhimento and Victim Support; also Part 11: Recommendations).

Spiral of victimisation

333. Women survivors of sexual violence often found themselves in a spiral of victimisation. Most victims of sexual violence were also victims of other human rights violations, such as illegal detention or forced displacement. In many cases, an incident of sexual violence led to further violations, both sexual and otherwise, by other perpetrators. Tragically, women who had suffered sexual violence also suffered by becoming further victimised by their community which, due to common misconceptions, sought to blame the women for breaking the tightly guarded sexual mores. Women who have internalised these mores fell prey to blaming themselves, despite recognising their lack of consent to the crime.

Self-blame

334. In Timor-Leste, social perceptions around rape and sexual violence are heavily influenced by notions of honour. Thus, victims of sexual violence often felt guilty for failing to safe-guard their honour and the honour of their family, and in some cases, their husband. In the following statement, a victim of rape expressed her feeling that she had betrayed her husband by "allowing" herself to be raped:

> I was so ashamed and shaken. At the time I was so depressed when I thought about the fate of my husband who was arrested together with us in Souro [Lospalos, Lautém]. I did not know whether he lived or had been killed by ABRI. I felt that I had betrayed my husband.[270]

335. Some victims of rape were driven to the point of having suicidal thoughts:

> I was in a situation that was very difficult. I feared that he would rape my little sister. So I sacrificed myself, although I tried to give him medical reasons why he shouldn't rape me. He raped me four times. I wanted to kill myself. [I tried] to escape but the militia continued to watch over me.[271]

336. Women victims who were unmarried during the time of rape felt deeply ashamed about what happened to them. In some cases, this became an impediment for them in developing a relationship or seeking marriage:

> [After the rape, the Falintil soldier] threatened me to never tell my parents or anyone else; if [I did] he would come and kill me one night. Until now I do not want to get married, because he destroyed me like an animal. I am too embarrassed to get married. Better I just sit tight and work in my garden for my livelihood.[272]

Blaming the victim

337. Victims of sexual slavery experienced the most extreme forms of social isolation. The long-term nature of the violation often involved more subtle forms of coercion. The community perception of women who were subjected to sexual slavery, particularly domestic sexual slavery, was coloured by popular belief which did not distinguish between consensual and non-consensual extra-marital sexual relations:

> Most people [in Liquiçá] say I am a cheap woman, a whore [lonte]. They say that I am an ABRI mistress. I tell them it is not something that I wanted, it is the war that made me like this. Yes, I was "married" to them. If I did not consent they would have killed us.... I fought for our independence by surrendering myself on behalf of our land, Timor-Leste.[273]

338. Not only the victims but also their immediate family members were subjugated to shame and ridicule:

> Many victims suffered greatly because some members of the community used to call them names and say that they were the mistress of ABRI. Others called them whores. According to our community, forced marriage with ABRI is a shame which cannot be talked about by anyone.[274]

339. The strong community feelings against women who were subjected to sexual slavery were known to all, including young children. Many of those who had no choice but to comply with the wishes of armed men entered into sexual slavery with open eyes about public contempt. This also affected their life choices when they were able to escape their situation:

> I said I was still a [13–year-old] child, I still want to go to school…The village head asked, "Why don't you want to do it? Do you want ABRI to come and take you away to kill you? Don't you want to live?" I said, *"Uncle, marrying an ABRI is good, but according to our elders, a woman who becomes a soldier's mistress is called "puta" [a whore]. I do not want to be called a "feto puta...." After three months the Kodim commander was inaugurated as bupati of Viqueque District and brought his Javanese wife back to Viqueque. From then on the Kodim commander stopped using me. When we were being picked up at night to go to the Kodim our school friends saw us and I was ashamed. In the end I did not go back to school.*[275]

340. Another woman recounts:

> For four months I had to go back and forth to their post, day and night. I was so ashamed. There was a lot of gossip about me having sex with all the soldiers at the post.[276]

341. In some cases there was community complicity in supporting the sacrifice of one or a group of women to become an "army mistress" in exchange for collective security. Despite this, women subjected to domestic sexual slavery often faced ridicule and suspicion.

342. In some cases, the popular misconception of sexual slavery as consensual extra-marital relations resulted in added abuse from others toward the victims:

> For one month my family and I lived in Hakesak [Atambua, West Timor]. When we arrived at the camp, PS370 [East Timorese] continued to use me as his second wife. One day his wife came and called me names, perempuan lonte, [whore]. She threatened to kill me if I continued to have an intimate relationship with her husband. At that time, I was between a rock and a hard place. PS370 threatened to kill my family if I did not have sex with him, but then his wife came to the camp and also threatened me.[277]

343. Domestic sexual slavery was a disgrace to the family. Women were often blamed for the shame they brought to the family, despite the fact that they were forced into the situation:

> He pushed the door and raped me with force. I cried as he raped me because I was so young then. I was only 15 years old. After that the Laclubar Koramil Commander PS371 [Indonesian] told me, "You have to marry me." When PS371 left the house my parents hit me until I bled. My parents said: "Don't get married to a member of the military." But PS371 kept coming to my house. I became pregnant, but the baby died after birth. He was married to me for five years, 1985–1989, then he left me as a widow. He returned to Sumatera without a word to me or my parents.[278]

Loss of virginity, loss of marriage opportunities

344. Social norms about the value of virginity in Timor-Leste society, particularly in rural areas, have led some women survivors of rape to have difficulty getting married. Again, the lack of distinction between consensual and non-consensual sexual relations victimised the victim of rape:

> After the rape, my sister said, "This is the result of war." She brought me to Ermera to get medical treatment because of the wound on my sexual organ due to the force used during the rape by that soldier. I stayed there for two months. Because of the rape, I remain unmarried until now. I live with my father.[279]

345. However, the Commission also heard testimonies from victims of rape and sexual slavery who were able to find happiness in marriage, despite what had happened to them.

Survival and discrimination against children

346. Women who became pregnant and bore children from non-consensual sexual relationships faced multiple layers of discrimination. Women who were in a situation of sexual slavery were considered sexually "loose". Women who were raped were thought of as "used goods." Their children were often discriminated against, as they were seen as illegitimate children born out of wedlock. This branding of women and their children not only resulted in social isolation, but also often resulted in severe psychological problems within the family:

> There was one difficult case which was handled by Fokupers, but it was far too late. The victim had already been raped by a number of ABRI members. She had children from different fathers. The victim experienced discrimination and ridicule from her community. She was called names and isolated from her community. They called her "feto puta", or whore, who had sold herself to ABRI. The victim could not accept her own children, she could not look at their faces because of the pressure from her community.[280]

347. In many cases where the biological father was an Indonesian soldier, mother and child (or children) were abandoned at the end of the soldier's tour of duty. The struggle for daily survival, without support from the community and extended family was extremely difficult, a situation that continues for many women today:

> After my child was born, PS303 (an Indonesian soldier) left. After that I lived with my two children. When I had to work in the field I had to bring them both since no one was there to look after them. Luckily, [after a while] my sister-in-law agreed to look after them when I was in the rice fields.[281]

348. These single mothers, without protection from the traditional male figure of husband or father, were vulnerable to sexual advances from other men. In the following statement, a woman already caring for a child born out of sexual slavery by an Indonesian Koramil commander is forced to accept the advances of an East Timorese soldier:

> After my child was 8 years old, a Timorese ABRI member named PS373 came to force me, threatening to kill my brother. This soldier promised to marry me, but after I gave birth to his child and he had a task in Buicaren [Bahalarauain Village, Viqueque, Viqueque], he married someone else and no longer paid attention to me.[282]

349. Some women, despite all odds, were able to meet their children's basic needs and put them through school:

> I was left by PS374 [Indonesian] with three children. They have now finished their education. This was only possible due to my hard work earning an income to put them through school.[283]

350. Others were less fortunate and unable to provide their children with the education they needed to better their future:

> I have four children from Indonesian soldiers. One died, leaving me with three. Because we went to war for our independence, I accept what happened to me with open arms. Maybe in the future, the state will pay attention to us. If it does not, well, that doesn't matter. What I did for the struggle was to give myself up to Indonesian soldiers in order to save others. Maybe if there was no war I could have been a good woman. But it doesn't matter, as this [independence] is what we all wanted. This was the consequence of war...I ask for help to put my three children through school, so they can have a good future, like other children. Because of the war I was used like a horse by the Indonesian soldiers who took me in turns and made me bear so many children. But now I no longer have the strength to push my children towards a better future.[284]

351. The Catholic Church played an important role during the years of conflict in Timor-Leste in providing shelter and protection for victims of human rights violations, including protection for victims of rape. * Despite this, in some cases it failed to overcome its prejudices against women victims of sexual slavery and their children. Without understanding the non-consensual element in sexual slavery, Church officials sometimes misperceived sexual slavery as extra-marital sexual relations. For women victims, particularly those who bore children out of consecutive non-consensual relationships, their experiences of being slighted by the Church have had a deep impact upon their minds. Children who were denied Baptism were not only deprived of the normal lives their mothers so craved for them. The mothers also faced practical consequences, such as difficulties in school registration, which required a certificate of baptism:

> Family members from both my dead husband's side and my own relatives all supported me. This made my life acceptable. But the community around me called me names and avoided me. I still could survive this. But the Church did not support me and did not allow me to get my children baptised. It was only in 2000 when we were free that the Church allowed my children to be baptised.[285]

352. In the following testimony, this victim of consecutive sexual slavery and her children were publicly shamed by the Church, resulting in a shunning from all communal religious activities for 16 years:

> I was not shunned by my family but by the community and the Church. When people called me names my father said, "Whatever the consequences she is our child. Her sins are also our sins, it is a burden, a cross, that we bear as her parents."

* For example, see the case of TC (par. 106 above); see also HRVD Statement 03335 where the Church provided protection for women from repeated rape from security personnel.

One day, my child and I were in a line in front of the altar to receive the Baptism sacrament. There were only two people before we got to the Priest, when we were pulled out by a church official…He said the Priest told him to do this. My child was not allowed to be baptised because he was born out of wedlock. My parents and I were not allowed to take communion, confess our sins, or to pray during the month of Holy Mary. From 1980 to 1996 our house never had a turn [to host] prayers for Mother Mary and the Sacred Heart of Jesus. I had to wait until ABRI did not live among us anymore. Then I was allowed to participate in Church activities again, including receiving Communion and going to Confession.[286]

Marital separation or reconciliation

353. The reaction of husbands to the sexual violence committed against their wives was an important factor in the capacity for women to recover. The Commission has heard testimonies from women survivors of sexual slavery and rape whose husbands were unable to accept what had happened to them and subsequently left them:

My husband sent a letter to me [in West Timor] in April 2001, twice, although I only was able to receive one. He told me that he was not dead yet and that he already heard that I had a child by [Laksaur Commander] PS314. In his letter, he urged me to come home with this child. The second letter fell to the hands of Kostrad on the border and was given to PS314. When PS314 was killed, his brother PS194 came for the funeral and threatened to take my child away…I stole away from the house to put my name on the UNHCR [repatriation] list. After being rejected three times, a friend of mine finally succeeded in putting my name down. I left without the knowledge of PS194. When I arrived home, my husband had already taken a new wife. When I approached him, he said he did not want to accept me as his wife. I know that I have this child from a Laksaur man but it was the situation that made this happen. If I did not follow their orders, I would have been killed.[287]

354. On the other hand, the Commission has also received statements from survivors of sexual violence whose husbands were able to accept the fact that what took place was beyond their wives' control. These women survivors of rape and sexual slavery found acceptance from their husbands:

On the boat [on the way to exile in Ataúro] I was re-united with my husband. After a few weeks, I told him what had happened to me. My husband still could accept me as his wife.[288]

355. In the following statement, a woman who was repeatedly raped in detention for many months tells her husband about her experiences of sexual violations. Reconciliation does not come immediately. The issue is discussed in a meeting involving both sides of the family; a priest is asked to mediate between the two:

Not long after I returned, my husband was released from Ataúro. Then both sides of our families came together to discuss all that had happened while I was detained by the Indonesian military. Once, my husband and I met with a priest. On that occassion I explained directly to my husband that everything that happened was forced on me, not because I wanted it. The priest asked my husband if he wanted to receive me back as his wife. My husband agreed. The two of us returned to Mau Chiga to start our own happy family.[289]

356. In some cases, women and their children, born out of rape, were accepted by their husbands. In the following case, a woman, separated for about three years from her exiled husband, greeted her husband with her child:

In 1985, when my husband returned from exile, I told him about [the sexual violations which I experienced including the fact that I had a child.] He said he continued to accept me as his wife. He said that it is not my desire, but it is a consequence of war.[290]

357. The understanding and acceptance of the extended family was crucial, particularly during the period before the return of the husband:

Not one person, not from my family or my husband's side, tried to defend me when I was treated that way. At the time…their lives were also threatened. No one from my family called me names. They supported me and said that this was not what I wanted, but it is the result of the situation. When I got pregnant [from rape] my husband was released from the prison in Lospalos. When he arrived home, he was not angry at me. He accepted the child that I was carrying as his own. When this child was being baptised, the priest did not say anything because he did not know it was not my husband's child. He baptised my child.[291]

Findings

Sexual violations by members of Fretilin and UDT

358. The Commission finds that:

1. Members of the Fretilin and UDT parties were involved in rape and sexual violence during the internal political conflict of 1974–1976 and at other times during the period of the Commission's mandate. However, the low number of cases reported to the Commission (two involving UDT and one involving Fretilin) indicates that these incidents were isolated and not systematic.

Sexual violations by members of Falintil

359. The Commission finds that:

2. Members of Falintil were also involved in rape and sexual violence during the Indonesian occupation. In some cases, impunity was enjoyed because of the reluctance of communities to report Falintil activities to the authorities. However, the small number of cases reported to the Commission indicate that the incidents were isolated and not systematic.

Rape and sexual torture by members of the Indonesian security forces

360. The Commission finds that during the period of the invasion and occupation of Timor-Leste:

3. Members of the Indonesian security forces and their auxiliaries were involved in widespread and systematic rape, sexual torture and acts of sexual violence (other than sexual slavery) directed mainly towards vulnerable East Timorese women.

361. The Commission bases this finding on the interviews and statements of hundreds of victims who courageously gave first-hand testimony of their personal experiences, as well as corroborating evidence contained in other witness statements and documents considered by the Commission. The evidence of the individual victims was judged to be particularly credible because of the negative personal impact and trauma associated with giving information of this nature to an official institution.

4. Institutional practices and formal or informal policy of the Indonesian security forces tolerated and encouraged the rape, sexual torture and sexual humiliation of East Timorese women by members of the Indonesian armed forces and the auxiliary groups under their command and control.

362. This finding is based on strong, widely corroborated evidence which demonstrates that:

- The violations were commonly committed in a wide range of military institutions; and
- Military commanders and civilian officials knew that soldiers under their command routinely used military premises and equipment for the purposes of raping and torturing women and took no steps to deter these activities or to punish those involved. On the contrary, the commanders and officials were in some cases themselves also perpetrators of sexual violence. At middle and senior levels, this included practices of providing young women who could be raped on demand by visiting guests and passing on the "license to rape", or "ownership of", young women to another officer at the end of a tour of duty.

5. Victims of sexual torture were usually women perceived by the security forces to have a connection to the pro-independence movement. Often these women were the targets of proxy violence. That is, because the woman's husband or brother who was being sought by the military was absent, the woman would be raped and tortured as a means of indirectly attacking the absent target.

363. It was common for these women to be taken to military installations where they would be questioned about the activities of their absent husbands or family members and subjected to a range of obscene methods of torture. In other cases, the women were raped in their homes or other places during military operations.

6. The Commission finds that the following acts directed at East Timorese women took place inside official Indonesian military installations:

- Mutilation of women's sexual organs, including insertion of batteries into vaginas and burning nipples and genitals with cigarettes
- Use of electric shocks applied to the genitals, breasts and mouths
- Gang rape by members of the security forces
- Forcing of detainees to engage in sexual acts with each other, while watched and ridiculed by members of the security forces
- Rape of detainees following periods of prolonged sexual torture
- Rape of women who had their hands and feet handcuffed and who were blindfolded. In some cases women bound in this way were raped until they were unconscious
- Forceful plucking of pubic hairs in the presence of male soldiers
- Rape of pregnant women. The Commission received repeated evidence of this, including one account in which a woman was raped the day before she gave birth
- Forcing of victims to be nude, or to be sexually violated in front of strangers, friends and family members. In at least one case a woman was raped in front of her mother and later killed. More commonly, victims were raped and tortured in front of their children
- Women raped in the presence of fellow prisoners as a means of terrorising both the victims and the other prisoners
- Placing women in tanks of water for prolonged periods, including submerging their heads, before being raped
- The use of a snake to instil terror during sexual torture
- Threats issued to women that their children would be killed or tortured if the women resisted or complained about being raped
- Repeated rape of women by a multitude of (unknown) members of the security forces. In some cases the women said they could not count the number of men who raped them. The Commission accepts that some victims were raped by various military officers every day during months of detention

- Forced oral sex
- Urinating into the mouth of victims
- Rape and sexual violence indiscriminately inflicted upon married women, unmarried women, and young teenagers still children by law
- Keeping lists of local women who could be routinely forced to come to the military post or headquarters so that soldiers could rape them. Lists were traded between military units. In some cases these women were commanded to appear at the military post every morning, in order to be raped by members of the security forces.

7. The degree of rape and other forms of sexual violence reflected the patterns and degree of military activity at the time. Sexual violations increased during periods of major military operations, and decreased when such operations were less frequent.
8. Women who had surrendered to the Indonesian security forces were particularly vulnerable to rape and sexual torture. In the early years of the conflict, 1975–1978, a large proportion of victims of sexual violations had surrendered and were living in temporary shelters supplied by the Indonesian military, or had recently returned to their former homes following surrender.
9. Women who surrendered from the mountains, who were known to have links to the guerrilla forces or who were thought to know the location of guerrillas and their supporters, were made to assist the Indonesian military in searching for these groups. In some cases, women were subjected to torture and rape during their participation in these military operations. Women were also forcibly recruited into civilian defence groups and made to patrol around their villages. During these patrols, supervised by armed men, women were commonly raped and sexually harassed.
10. The mass arrests following civil uprisings in 1981–1983 led to increases in the number of women who were raped by members of the security forces. This reinforces the finding that there was a connection between military operations and objectives and the scale of rape and other sexual violations committed by members of the security forces.

364. In some cases, large military operations were accompanied and followed by coordinated and large-scale rape and other violations targeting female members of communities involved in the military operations.

- Following the Falintil attack on the Dare Koramil and other ABRI posts in Dare and Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) in 1982, members of the Indonesian security forces separated women from other members of the community. They then proceeded to undertake a programme of individual and gang rape, sexual torture and other forms of sexual violence towards scores of these vulnerable women. The programme continued over a period of several months and involved military commanders, lower ranked officers and Hansip members as perpetrators. The Commission finds the military commanders and civilian officials of Ainaro District during this period responsible and accountable for these massive violations of human rights.

- Extreme sexual violence on local East Timorese women was also used to suppress the local population following the uprising in Kraras, Bibileo (Viqueque, Viqueque) in 1983. This included forcing women into sexual slavery.
- Mass arrests leading to sexual abuse of women in detention as part of military operations. This was experienced by women detainees in Flamboyan Hotel in Bahu (Baucau Town, Baucau), the Koramil in Uatolari Sub-district (Viqueque), and in the Balide Prison (Comarca) in Dili, as well as other detention centres.

11. The large-scale violence during 1999 led to a significant increase in the number of rapes of women, particularly of women who had become displaced or were refugees. These incidents of sexual violence were perpetrated by members of the militias, the TNI and in some cases by members of both groups acting together.

Impunity for perpetrators of rape and sexual torture

12. The practice of capturing, raping and torturing women was conducted openly and without fear of any form of sanction, by senior military officers, civilian officials, junior ranking officers, police officers, teachers and members of the auxiliary groups such as Hansip and the militias. When victims of sexual violence or their family representatives complained to the legal authorities about what had taken place their requests for help were generally met with denial and aggression. In some cases family members who complained were beaten and otherwise punished for doing so.
13. There were no practical steps that could be taken by an East Timorese victim of rape or sexual violence to seek a legal remedy for such crimes. There was also no avenue through which they or family members acting on their behalf could seek official help to stop these violations from taking place or continuing. Victims were helpless and unable to escape the violations by members of the security forces.
14. Participation in, and acceptance of, such practices by military commanders and civilian officials, widespread knowledge that rape and sexual torture was officially condoned, use of military and official facilities for this purpose, and almost total impunity for offenders led to a situation where such practices could be undertaken by members of the security forces at will. This led to an increase in sexual violence in the years following the invasion and expanding participation by officers of lower rank and members of auxiliary forces, such as Hansip and the militias, operating under the control and protection of the security forces. In some cases members of Hansip or low-ranking local civilian officials would forcibly take women and pass them on to the military commanders in return for increased status and rewards.

365. Indonesian police officers were also involved in torturing and rape, but not to the same extent as the military. Police officers enjoyed the same general impunity in committing sexual violations, which extended to other members of the security forces.

366. There were also incidents in which male members of the Indonesian security forces raped (including having forced oral sex and other forms of sexual violation) East Timorese male prisoners and civilians. However, this type of violation occurred far less frequently than sexual violence against East Timorese women.

Sexual slavery

15. Throughout the invasion and occupation there was a persistent practice of forcing East Timorese women to become, in effect, the sexual slaves of military officers. These activities were conducted openly, without fear of reprisal, inside military installations, at other official sites and inside the private homes of women who were targeted. In a significant number of similar cases, rapes and sexual assaults were repeatedly conducted inside victims' homes, despite the presence of parents, children and other family members of the victim.
16. As with rape, sexual slavery also increased dramatically during periods of major military operations, and decreased when such operations were less frequent. For example, 64% of sexual slavery cases reported to the Commission took place during the period of invasion and during periods of large-scale military operations.
17. It was common practice for members of the Indonesian security forces to keep East Timorese women in detention in military bases for reasons that were not related to a military objective. These women, who were sometimes detained for many months and sometimes years, were often raped on a daily basis or on demand by the officer who controlled them, and often also by other soldiers. In addition, they were forced to do unpaid domestic work.
18. The victims of this form of sexual slavery were not free to move about or travel, or to act independently in any way. It was not uncommon for the "ownership rights" over these women to be passed on from an officer who was finishing his tour of duty to his replacement or another officer. In some situations, women forced into these situations became pregnant and gave birth to children of several different officers during the years in which they were the victims of sexual slavery.

19. In general, Indonesian officers who were responsible for fathering these children through rape or sexual slavery accepted no on-going responsibility to support their material well-being. Mothers of these children faced significant difficulties in providing for them. This was particularly problematic because former victims of rape and sexual slavery at the hands of the Indonesian military forces were often considered "soiled" and unsuitable for marriage by East Timorese men, and faced on-going social stigma.

20. The methods used to force East Timorese women into situations of sexual slavery often involved torture by members of the security forces, threats of torture and killing of victims, their family members, or the targeting of their community.

Impunity for perpetrators of sexual slavery

21. Members of the Indonesian security forces forced women into conditions of sexual slavery in military institutions or their homes openly, without fear of reprisal. The total impunity enjoyed by members of the security forces, their demonstrated capacity to kill and torture at will, and the systematic nature of these violations across the territory presented victims with no possibility of escape. The women who were targeted were forced to experience the repeated and horrific violation of their bodies and personal dignity, or be faced with an even greater harm to themselves, their family or community. In this impossible situation there was no hope of help from law enforcement officials, or any other source, and no reason to believe the situation would end in the foreseeable future.

22. The scope and nature of the violations which were being committed and the complete impunity enjoyed by all classes of perpetrators was well-known at all levels of the security forces and civil administration during the occupation. This impunity could not have continued without the knowledge and complicity of members of the Indonesian security forces, the police force, the highest levels of the civilian administration and members of the judiciary.

Sexual violations as a tool of terror and degradation

23. In addition to rape, sexual torture and sexual slavery, a wide variety of other sexual violations were committed by members of the Indonesian security forces. Violations that were particularly degrading to victims or culturally repulsive were often kept in public view. This included instances of forcing prisoners to walk long distances through communities while naked, public rape and multiple instances of rape and torture in military posts carried out where other prisoners could hear the screams of the victims.

24. The scope and nature of the violations demonstrate that the intention was not only limited to the personal gratification of perpetrators or the direct impact on individual victims. The purpose was also to humiliate and dehumanise the East Timorese people. It was an attempt to destroy their will to resist, to reinforce the reality that they were utterly powerless and subject to the cruel and inhuman whims of those who controlled the situation with guns. Military officers repeatedly treated and spoke to East Timorese victims as if they were "less than human". These patterns helped to justify and spread these views among security personnel, leading to wider participation in sexual violations.

25. Rape, sexual slavery and sexual violence were tools used as part of the campaign designed to inflict a deep experience of terror, powerlessness and hopelessness upon pro-independence supporters. Sexual violation of East Timorese women, particularly those connected to members of Fretilin and Falintil, was intentionally carried out to destroy the self-esteem and spirit, not only of the victims, but of all who supported the movement for independence, with the aim of forcing them to accept the political goal of integration with Indonesia

Total number of victims of sexual violations

26. The Commission notes the inevitable conclusion that many victims of sexual violations did not come forward to report them to the Commission. Reasons for under-reporting include death of victims and witnesses (especially for earlier periods of the conflict), victims who may be outside Timor-Leste (especially in West Timor), the painful and very personal nature of the experiences, and the fear of social or family humiliation or rejection if their experiences are known publicly. These strong reasons for under-reporting and the fact that 853 cases of rape and sexual slavery, along with evidence from about another 200 interviews were recorded, lead the Commission to the finding that the total number of sexual violations is likely to be several times higher than the number of cases reported. The Commission estimates that the number of women who were subjected to serious sexual violations by members of the Indonesian security forces numbers in the thousands, rather than hundreds.

Impact on victims

27. Although victims of sexual violence cannot in any way be blamed or held responsible for the terrible violations that were forced upon them, they were often socially marginalised or mistreated by their own families, community members and the Catholic Church because of their experiences. Misperceptions of sexual violence continue to lead to the victimisation of women.

Endnotes

1. United Nations, Contemporary Forms of Slavery: Systematic Rape, Sexual Slavery and Slavery-like Practices during Armed Conflict, Final Report submitted by Gay J. McDougall, Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Slavery, New York: United Nations, 1998, E/CN.4/Sub.2/1998/13, pp. 7-8.
2. CAVR, Women's Research Team, Perempuan dan Konflik, April 1974 s/d Oktober 1999: Laporan Tim Penelitian Perempuan dan Konflik, FOKUPERS-CAVR [Women and Conflict: April 1974-October 1999: Report of the Research Team on Women and Conflict, FOKUPERS-CAVR], April 2004.
3. Prosecutor v Jean-Paul Akayesu, ICTR Case No. ICTR-96-4-T, Trial Chamber Judgment, 2 September 1998, paragraph 598; Prosecutor v Zejnil Delalic, ICTY Case No. IT-96-21, Trial Chamber Judgment, 16 November 1998, paragraph 479.
4. Prosecutor v Zejnil Delalic, ICTY Case No. IT-96-21, Trial Chamber Judgment, 16 November 1998, para 479. Followed by Prosecutor v Dragoljub Kunarac, Radomir Kovac and Zoran Vukovic, ICTY Case No. IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1, Appeals Chamber Judgment, 12 June 2002, paras 127-133; Prosecutor v Dragoljub Kunarac, Radomir Kovac and Zoran Vukovic, ICTY Case No. IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1, Appeals Chamber Judgment, 12 June 2002, paragraphs 127-128.
5. Prosecutor v Dragoljub Kunarac, Radomir Kovac and Zoran Vukovic, ICTY Case No. IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1, Trial Chamber Judgment, 22 February 2001, paragraph 460. This was upheld on appeal: Prosecutor v Dragoljub Kunarac, Radomir Kovac and Zoran Vukovic, ICTY Case No. IT-96-23 and IT-96-23/1, Appeals Chamber Judgment, 12 June 2002, paragraphs 127-133.
6. AA, Statement Summary, prepared by CAVR from the Interview with AA, Dili, 23 April 2003, for the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, Dili, 28-29 April 2003.
7. HRVD Statement 04309.
8. HRVD Statement 04346.
9. HRVD Statement 08160.
10. See also HRVD 03537 for reported cases of rape by members of Falintil other than the five cases described in this section.
11. HRVD Statement 03184.
12. HRVD Statement 03579.
13. HRVD Statement 06400.
14. HRVD Statement 06353.
15. HRVD Statement 02571.
16. HRVD Statement 01784.
17. HRVD Statement 03574.
18. HRVD Statements 04956; 04972.
19. HRVD Statements 04083; 04085.
20. HRVD Statement 05778.
21. HRVD Statement 08370.
22. HRVD Statement 06205.
23. HRVD Statement 07463.
24. HRVD Statement 07218.
25. HRVD Statement 00163.
26. HRVD Statement 07217.
27. HRVD Statement 01671.

28. CAVR interview with WA, Afaloicai (Uatolari, Viqueque), 17 September 2003.
29. HRVD Statement 07428; CAVR Interview with XA, Becora (Cristo Rei/Dili Oriental, Dili), 13 Februari 2003; Macadique (Uatolari, Viqueque), 17 September 2003.
30. CAVR interview with YA, Macadique (Uatolari, Viqueque), 17 September 2003.
31. CAVR interview with ZA, Macadique (Uatolari, Viqueque), 17 September 2003.
32. HRVD Statement 08067.
33. CAVR Interview with BB, Rotutu (Same, Manufahi), 22 April 2003; HRVD Statement 04104.
34. HRVD Statement 01613.
35. HRVD Statement 05796.
36. HRVD Statement 01370.
37. HRVD Statement 05228.
38. CAVR Interview with Dulce Vitor, Bairo Formosa (Nain Feto/Dili Oriental, Dili), 13 June 2004.
39. HRVD Statement 05393.
40. HRVD Statement 02698.
41. HRVD Statement 08038.
42. HRVD Statement 07193.
43. HRVD Statement 07271.
44. HRVD Statement 03189.
45. HRVD Statement 01612.
46. CAVR Interview with RB, Poros, Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém), 28 October 2003.
47. CAVR Interview with SB1, Bahú (Baucau, Baucau), 27 May 2004.
48. CAVR Interview with TB, Lame Gua, Bahú (Baucau, Baucau), 26 May 2004.
49. CAVR Interviews with UB1, Bahú (Baucau, Baucau), 11 June 2003; VB1 dan VB2, Bairro Alto, Bahú (Baucau, Baucau), 14 June 2003.
50. CAVR Interview with VB1, Bairro Alto, Bahú (Baucau, Baucau), 14 June 2003.
51. CAVR Interview with Zeferino Armando Ximenes, Teulale, Tirilolo (Baucau, Baucau), 13 June 2003.
52. HRVD Statement 04932.
53. HRVD Statement 07209.
54. HRVD Statement 02721.
55. HRVD Statement 03335.
56. HRVD Statement 07747.
57. HRVD Statement 02693.
58. HRVD Statement 03767.
59. HRVD Statement 00774.
60. HRVD Statements 02516; 02527.
61. HRVD Statement 02426.
62. HRVD Statement 06679.
63. HRVD Statement 04482.
64. HRVD Statement 03681.
65. HRVD Statement 00649.
66. APIK (Asosiasi Perempuan Indonesia untuk Keadilan, Indonesian Women's Association for Justice) et al, Laporan Kasus Perkosaan atas Diri TC [Report of the Rape Case of TC], Submission to Komnas HAM [Nasional Commission for Human Rights in Indonesia], 22 January 1997.
67. CAVR Interview with Rui Pereira dos Santos, aldeia of Bedalan (Bebora), 20 de Maio Village (Dom Aleixo/ Dili Ocidental, Dili), 24 October 2004.
68. HRVD Statement 07439.
69. CAVR Interview with Rui Pereira dos Santos, aldeia of Bedalan (Bebora), 20 de Maio Village (Dom Aleixo/ Dili Ocidental, Dili), 24 October 2004.
70. HRVD Statement 05326.
71. HRVD Statement 06238.
72. HRVD Statement 06167.

73. HRVD Statement 06237.
74. Fokupers, Database (complete with typed statements) of gender-based violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, 2004; HRVD Statement F9369.
75. HRVD Statement 03054.
76. HRVD Statement 01857.
77. HRVD Statement 02541.
78. HRVD Statement 05837.
79. HRVD Statement 01658.
80. Mário Viegas Carrascalão, Written deposition on Women and Family Planning, Submission to CAVR, 28 April 2004.
81. See HRVD Statement 04652.
82. HRVD Statement 06441.
83. The General Prosecutor of UNTAET, Indictment against João Franca da Silva alias Jhoni Franca et al., Case No. BO-06, 1-99-SC (04a/2001).
84. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statements F9466; F9482; F9474.
85. HRVD Statement 06768.
86. CAVR Interview with FE, Lourba (Bobonaro, Bobonaro), 10 July 2003.
87. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9463.
88. HRVD Statement 03631.
89. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9483.
90. HRVD Statement 00297.
91. HRVD Statement 00248.
92. HRVD Statement 01204.
93. HRVD Statement 01964.
94. HRVD Statement 06296.
95. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9290.
96. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9291
97. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statements F9297; F9298.
98. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9382; 08980.
99. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9383.
100. Ibid.
101. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9362.
102. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9480.
103. HRVD Statement 06437.
104. HRVD Statement 02139.
105. HRVD Statement 06200.
106. ZE1, Statement Summary, prepared by CAVR from the Interview with ZE1, Ermera, 18 March 2003, for the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, Dili, 28-29 April 2003; HRVD Statement 02183.
107. CAVR Interview with Bosco da Costa, Malilat (Bobonaro, Bobonaro), 10 July 2003.
108. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9452.
109. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9453.
110. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9453; 05116.
111. HRVD Statement 08459.
112. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9320; 01273.
113. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9389.
114. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9266.
115. HRVD Statement 08462.
116. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9268.
117. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9323.
118. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9243.
119. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9258; CAVR Interview with LF1, Kuluoan (Zumalai, Covalima), 12 April 2003.

120. HRVD Statement 03622.
121. HRVD Statement 02466.
122. HRVD Statement 02149.
123. PF, Statement Summary, prepared by CAVR from the Interview with PF, Nitibe, Lela Ufe (Hau Ufe, Oecussi), 3 April 2003, for the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, Dili, 28-29 April 2003; HRVD Statement 00362.
124. HRVD Statement 07421.
125. HRVD Statement 02110.
126. HRVD Statement 08473.
127. Universal Declaration of Human Rights 1948 (entered into force 10 December 1948), article 4; International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, opened for signatures 16 December 1966 (entered into force 23 March 1976), article 8; Slavery Convention (entered into force on 25 September 1926).
128. United Nations, Contemporary Forms of Slavery: Systematic Rape, Sexual Slavery and Slavery-like Practices during Armed Conflict, Final Report submitted by Gay J. McDougall, Special Rapporteur on Contemporary Forms of Slavery, New York: United Nations, 1998, E/CN.4/Sub.2/1998/13.
129. HRVD Statement 03201.
130. HRVD Statement 04943.
131. CAVR Interview with VF1, Umanaruk (Laclo, Manatuto), 20 March 2003.
132. See HRVD Statement 04741.
133. HRVD Statement 01022.
134. Ibid.
135. HRVD Statement 06239.
136. HRVD Statement 06159.
137. HRVD Statement 06205.
138. HRVD Statements 03474; 03492.
139. HRVD Statement 07179.
140. Ibid.
141. Ibid
142. HR VD Statement 06479.
143. HRVD Statements 03344; 03346.
144. CAVR Interview with HG, Chai (Tsai), Lore I (Lospalos, Lautém), 10 July 2003.
145. HRVD Statement 07725.
146. Ibid
147. HRVD Statement 01686.
148. HRVD Statements 03492; 03498; 04018; 04057.
149. HRVD Statement 00664.
150. HRVD Statement 06542.
151. HRVD Statement 02330.
152. HRVD Statement 01504.
153. HRVD Statement 06609.
154. Ibid.
155. CAVR Interview with HG, Chai (Tsai), Lore I (Lospalos, Lautém), 10 July 2003.
156. CAVR Interview with AH, Lore II (Lospalos, Lautém), 10 July 2003.
157. CAVR Interview with BH, Lore II (Lospalos, Lautém), 10 July 2003.
158. CAVR Interview with CH, Titilari, Lore I (Lospalos, Lautém), 10 July 2003.
159. CAVR Interview with IH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003; HRVD Statement 07196.
160. CAVR Interview with JH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003.
161. CAVR Interview with GH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 30 May 2003.
162. CAVR Interview with AI, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 29 May 2003.
163. CAVR Interview with LH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 29 May 2003.
164. CAVR Interviews with NH and MH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 29 May 2003.

165. CAVR Interview with OH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 30 May 2003.
166. CAVR Interview OH1, Dare (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 1 June 2003.
167. CAVR Interview with QH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 17 March 2003; HRVD Statement 07269.
168. CAVR Interview with RH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 31 May 2003.
169. CAVR Interview with SH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003.
170. CAVR Interview with TH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003.
171. CAVR Interview with Albertina Martins, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003.
172. CAVR Interview with NK, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003.
173. CAVR Interview with UH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003.
174. CAVR Interview with VH, Mau Chiga (Hatu Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003.
175. CAVR Interview with WH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003.
176. CAVR Interview with BI, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003.
177. CAVR Interview with GH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 30 May 2003.
178. HRVD Statement 04910.
179. HRVD Statement 07234.
180. Abilio dos Santos, Village Secretary of Mau Chiga, List of Victims [handwritten spreadsheet,] August 20 1982, Submission to CAVR, May 2003.
181. CAVR Interview with Adriana do Rego, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 31 May 2003.
182. CAVR Interview with OH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 30 May 2003.
183. CAVR Interview with JI, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 30 May 2003; HRVD Statement 07191.
184. CAVR interview with KI, Mau Chiga (Hatu Builico, Ainaro), 31 May 2003. HRVD Statement 07241
185. XH, Statement Summary, prepared by CAVR from the interview with XH, 17 March 2003, for the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, Dili, 28 April 2003.
186. HRVD Statement 05299.
187. HRVD Statement 03869.
188. HRVD Statement 05212.
189. MI, Statement Summary, prepared by CAVR from the interview with MI, Lalerek Mutin, Bibileo (Viqueque, Viqueque), 24 March 2003, for the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, Dili, 29 April 2003.
190. HRVD Statement 07440.
191. HRVD Statement 05746.
192. HRVD Statement 06567.
193. HRVD Statement 01733.
194. HRVD Statement 06204.
195. HRVD Statement 06381.
196. HRVD Statement 06380.
197. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9315.
198. HRVD Statement 05125.
199. HRVD Statement 08470.
200. CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 21 September 2004.
201. The General Prosecutor of the Democratic Republic of East Timor, Indictment against Paulo Gonçalves et al., Case No. B0-84-99-SC (08-2002).
202. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9497.
203. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9400.
204. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9433.
205. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9280.
206. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9478.
207. HRVD Statement 01854.
208. HRVD Statement 01860.
209. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9401.
210. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9485.

211. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9488.
212. Ibid.
213. HRVD Statement 05537.
214. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9366.
215. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9434; 01799.
216. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9486; 01855.
217. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9386.
218. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9387.
219. HRVD Statement 08397.
220. HRVD Statement 00247.
221. Fokupers, 2004; HRVD Statements F9470; F9420; F9411; 99BOB016; 99BOB024.
222. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9420.
223. Karen Campbell-Nelson, Yooke Adelina Damapolii, Leonard Simanjuntak and Ferderika Tadu Hungu, Perempuan dibawa/h Laki-laki Yang Kalah: Kekerasan terhadap Perempuan Timor Timur dalam Kamp Pengungsian di Timor Barat [Women Carried by/Underneath Men Who Lost: Violence Against East Timorese Women in Refugee Camps in West Timor], JKPIT and PIKUL, Kupang NTT, n.d., pp. 217-242.
224. VF1, Statement Summary, prepared by CAVR from the interview with VF1, Umanaruk (Laclo, Manatuto), 20 March 2003, for the CAVR National Public Hearing on Women and Conflict, Dili, 28-29 April 2003.
225. CAVR Interview with RJ, Bahú (Baucau, Baucau), 10 Juni 2003.
226. CAVR Interview with SJ, Bahú (Baucau, Baucau), 27 May 2004.
227. HRVD Statement 07792.
228. HRVD Statement 09776.
229. XJ, Statement Summary, prepared by CAVR from the Interview with XJ, Ataúro, Dili, 7 March 2002, for the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17-18 February 2003.
230. HRVD Statement 03936.
231. HRVD Statement 05303.
232. HRVD Statement 03357.
233. HRVD Statement 03346.
234. CAVR Interview with BK, Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém), 31 October 2003.
235. CAVR Interview with CK, Lore I (Lospalos, Lautém), 10 July 2003.
236. DK, Statement Summary, prepared by CAVR from the interview with DK, Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém), February 2003, for the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17-18 February 2003.
237. CAVR Interview with EK, Meti Aut (Nain Feto/Dili Oriental, Dili), 4 May 2004.
238. Ibid.
239. HRVD Statement 08342.
240. KK, Statement Summary, prepared by CAVR from the interview with KK, Akadiru-Hun (Cristo Rei/Dili Oriental, Dili), 7 January 2003, for the CAVR National Public Hearing on Political Imprisonment, Dili, 17-18 February 2003.
241. CAVR Interview with NK, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 29 May 2003.
242. CAVR Interview with PK, Porlamanu, Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém), 30 October 2003.
243. HRVD Statement 004735.
244. CAVR Interviews with SK, Vila Verde (Dom Aleixo/Dili), 23 May 2003 and 15 July 2003.
245. CAVR Interview with DH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003.
246. CAVR Interview with TK, Souro (Lospalos, Lautém), 8 July 2003.
247. CAVR Interview with UK, Souro (Lospalos, Lautém), 8 July 2003.
248. HRVD Statement 008754.
249. HRVD Statement 01617.
250. HRVD Statement 04235.
251. HRVD Statement 06385.
252. CAVR Interview with DL, Lourba, (Bobonaro, Bobonaro), 10 July 2003.
253. HRVD Statement 004493.

254. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9261.
255. HRVD Statement 06867.
256. CAVR Interview with IH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 28 May 2003.
257. Ibid.
258. Rosalia Sciortino, "The Challenge of Addressing Gender in Reproductive Health Programs: Examples from Indonesia," http://www.hsph.harvard.edu/Organizations/healthnet/SAsia/suchana/ 0310/ sciortino.html at 31 March 2005.
259. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9258.
260. HRVD Statements 03474; 03492.
261. CAVR Interview with XA, Dili, 13 February 2003.
262. HRVD Statement 03501.
263. CAVR Interview with KL1, Dili, 19 March 2003.
264. HRVD Statement 00678.
265. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9387.
266. HRVD Statement 06400.
267. HRVD Statement 02516.
268. Manuel Carceres da Costa, testimony given to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres, 19-21 November 2003.
269. Fokupers, Six Monthly Report on the Situation of Violence Against Women in East Timor, January-July 1999.
270. CAVR Interview with UK, Souro (Lospalos, Lautém), 8 July 2003.
271. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9487.
272. HRVD Statement 06353.
273. CAVR Interview with ML, Liquiçá, 28 March 2003.
274. CAVR Interview with Luis Franco, Lalerek Mutin, Bibileo (Viqueque, Viqueque), 30 May 2003.
275. CAVR Interview with NL, Lalerek Mutin, Bibileo (Viqueque, Viqueque), 24 March 2003.
276. CAVR Interview with OL, Lifau (Laleia, Manatuto), 19 March 2003.
277. CAVR Interview with PL (Cailaco, Bobonaro), 8 July 2003.
278. HRVD Statement 05299.
279. HRVD Statement 01023.
280. CAVR Interview with Judith da Conceição and Maria Barreto, Farol, Motael (Dom Aleixo/Dili Ocidental, Dili), 26 October 2004.
281. CAVR Interview with MI, Lalerek Mutin, Bibileo (Viqueque, Viqueque), 24 March 2003.
282. CAVR Interview with QL, Beobe (Viqueque, Viqueque), 31 May 2003.
283. CAVR Interview with ML, Maubara, Liquiçá, 28 March 2003.
284. CAVR Interview with AG, Afaloicai (Uatolari, Viqueque), 18 September 2003.
285. CAVR Interview with HG, Chai (Tsai), Lore I (Lospalos, Lautém), 10 July 2003.
286. CAVR Interview with OL, Lifau (Laleia, Manatuto), 19 March 2003.
287. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement F9268; 05125.
288. CAVR Interview with OH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 30 May 2003.
289. CAVR Interview with XH, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 17 March 2003.
290. CAVR Interview with BI, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro), 30 May 2003.
291. CAVR Interview with AH, Lore II (Lospalos, Lautém), 10 July 2003.

Chega!

Part 7.8.

Violation of the Rights of the Child

Part 7.8. Violation of the Rights of the Child

Graphics:

7.8. Violation of the Rights of the Child

Introduction

1. Children in Timor-Leste experienced the full range of human rights violations during the period of the Commission's mandate, 25 April 1974 to 25 October 1999. The Commission's research has revealed that all sides to the political conflicts in Timor-Leste perpetrated violations against children. The overwhelming majority of these violations were committed by the Indonesian military and their auxiliaries. These forces killed, sexually violated, detained and tortured, forcibly displaced and forcibly recruited children.

2. In some ways, then, children's experience was like that of adults; they suffered from the general failure on all sides to distinguish civilians from combatants. As a result children were not spared when mass killings took place or when they were caught with their families in the line of fire during military operations. The data collected by the Commission through the statement-taking process show that children suffered most violations during the years 1976-81 and 1999, more or less exactly mirroring the pattern of violations experienced by the population as a whole.

3. Moreover, the manner in which violations were perpetrated against children was often the same as for adults. Except for the age of the victims, the content of the reports of sexual violence against children recounted below barely differ from those in the part of the Report on sexual violence. They describe:

- rape and sexual slavery in the resettlement camps;
- "proxy" sexual violence aimed at family members still in the forest;
- violations against children engaged in clandestine activity that could turn into long-term sexual exploitation; and
- strategic use of sexual violence as a form of torture, and its apparently opportunistic perpetration.

4. For children, as for adults, sexual violence was conducted openly without fear of sanction by all ranks of the military and by East Timorese paramilitaries, as well as by persons in positions of civilian authority such as village heads.

5. Further muddying the distinction between the experience of adults and children is the fact that the East Timorese have a more flexible understanding of childhood than the clear-cut one adopted under international definitions. Consistent with instruments of international law, such as the Convention on the Rights of the Child, the Commission has adopted the definition of children as persons aged 17 years old and under.*

6. Why then are children being dealt with separately in this Report?

7. First, violations perpetrated against children are universally deplored. Thus, the expectation that all sides would treat them with greater respect than would be shown to adults makes violations against children on any scale especially shocking. This sense that they are particularly shocking derives from an understanding that children as a group are innocent and that their innocence should be preserved from the corruptions of adulthood for as long as possible.

8. Second, it is plain that children are among the most vulnerable sections of society, particularly in situations of conflict and upheaval such as Timor-Leste underwent during the 25 years of the Commission's mandate. As described in Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine, children were among those who were moved from their homes following the invasion, sometimes for years at a time, and were the main casualties of famine and illness. Many others were left without family members to support them and were therefore vulnerable to abuse, kidnapping, or forced recruitment. The use of children as TBOs (Tenaga Bantuan Operasi, Operations Assistants), for example, endangered their lives, their health and their future prospects. Their relative physical weakness meant that the heavy loads they were obliged to carry were more liable to undermine their health. Periods of service that could last for several years blighted their educational chances.

9. The special position of children in Timor-Leste does not arise only from the universal acknowledgment of their unique status. It is also derived from the fact that children represent the future. Both sides sought to cultivate loyalty to their cause among children from a young age. The Indonesian military actively involved children in the military and paramilitaries through using them as TBOs and militia. Some rose through the ranks to become senior pro-integration figures. As described in Vol. III, Part 7.9: Economic and Social Rights, Indonesia openly used the education system to deliver propaganda on integration and the Indonesian state to children from the earliest days of the occupation. The Resistance mainly engaged with children through using them in minor roles such as couriers and guards. However, as the stories below demonstrate,

* In Timor-Leste, the group is understood to consist of persons who are not yet married. Thus persons younger than 18 years who are married may be regarded as adults, and single persons over the age of 17 may be regarded as children. The conflict itself created further complications: for example, children as young as 15 held positions of authority in Falintil and were treated as adults; because of the disruption caused by war, many high-school students were aged 18 and above.

it allowed them to rise up through the ranks of the clandestine movement. There were practical reasons for engaging with children as well: for the Indonesian military, children were more malleable and more compliant than adults. For the Resistance, children had the advantage of being above suspicion from the authorities and of having existing church and community networks that could be co-opted into the struggle.

10. Because of the special vulnerability of children, the Commission believes that trauma is widespread among East Timorese who grew up under the Indonesian occupation. There is evidence that the incidence of trauma may be acute among those recruited as child militia in 1998-99. In their case, trauma was due not only to their exposure to extreme violence, but also to the psychological impact of forced recruitment, divided loyalties and the shame of ending up on the wrong side. Reported below are the cases of other children who were subject to comparable stresses. TBOs, for example, were often recruited precisely because they or their families were suspected of having ties to the pro-independence movement. There was a gross imbalance in power and resources between the occupier and the occupied. As with the rest of the population, the line between coercion and acquiescence was never a clear one. The need to balance these pressures put children at risk of being called two-headed (kepala dua [Indonesian], ulun rua [Tetum]) by either side. Children's responses to these pressures might change over time as a result of torture, inducements or exposure to battle.

11. Third, Timorese children suffered abuses that were specific to them rather than those perpetrated against the population as a whole. In particular, only children were transferred in their thousands to Indonesia. Many of these children were transferred to Indonesia forcibly and in the face of parental opposition and, thus were in effect abducted. It is unclear if this practice was formalised in policy. However, there is plenty of evidence that high-level officials, both military and civilian, failed to regulate it and were sometimes themselves involved. Even where the transfers were motivated in part by humanitarian concerns or where parental consent was sought, little effort was made to ensure that children maintained contact with their families. They were not able to choose freely whether or not to return to Timor-Leste nor were they allowed to maintain their cultural identity. In some cases all of these things were positively discouraged.

12. Like women, children were often treated as chattel. As TBOs, for example, they were not regularly paid for their services. They were required to carry heavy loads. They could be taken back to Indonesia by the soldier who had recruited them or passed on to another soldier. Their ties to their families and their special status as children were largely ignored.

13. Fourth, the special status of children is recognised under international law and most systems of domestic law, including that of Indonesia. Most legal systems give special consideration to the needs of children. While in situations of armed conflict and occupation, international law provides children protection not accorded to the general population.

14. Some of the relevant provisions of international law apply equally to all sections of the population. For example, forcing civilians to serve in military operations against their own country is prohibited by humanitarian law[1] and also constitutes a grave breach of Geneva Convention IV.[2] Human rights law provides rights to both children and adults, including the rights to life, food and freedom from torture and arbitrary detention. There is also an extensive body of international standards governing how children are to be treated by the state, both in situations of armed conflict and in peace-time.

15. Under Geneva Convention IV, Indonesia had responsibilities towards Timor-Leste's children during the conflict. It was required to:

1. make attempts to evacuate children from the field of conflict;[3]
2. ensure that if evacuations or transfers of population were necessary within the occupied territory, and that members of the same family were not separated;[4]
3. take measures to care for children under 15 years who were orphaned or separated from their families;[5]
4. take all necessary steps to identify children and register their parentage;[6]
5. facilitate the proper working of institutions for the care and education of children;[7] and
6. refrain from changing children's personal status or enlisting them in its organisations.[8]

16. By ratifying the Convention on the Rights of the Child in September 1990, Indonesia accepted further obligations under international human rights law in respect of children in Timor-Leste. These include, to:

7. give priority to the best interests of the child when making decisions in relation to children;[9]
8. protect children from physical or mental harm, sexual exploitation and abuse, and all other forms of exploitation;[10]
9. provide children with a standard of living adequate for their physical, mental, spiritual and social development;[11]
10. regulate adoption processes and ensure that adoption was undertaken by competent authorities according to the applicable law;[12]
11. combat the illicit transfer of children abroad and the abduction, sale or traffic of children;[13]
12. provide special care for children separated from their families, taking the child's cultural background into account;[14] and
13. take steps to promote the physical and psychological recovery and social reintegration of child victims of armed conflicts and abuse.[15]

17. Indonesian domestic law also contains provisions that could have been invoked to protect children. Thus, aside from general provisions outlawing kidnapping (Article 328) and the deprivation of a person's liberty (Article 333), the Indonesian Penal Code (Kitab Undang-undang Hukum Pidana, KUHP) also specifically criminalises the act of withdrawing a minor from those exercising lawful authority over the child, for which the penalty is increased if deception, force or the threat of force are used (Article 330).

Research methods

18. The Commission has drawn material together from a number of different sources to investigate violations committed against children.

19. Through the Commission's truth-seeking process of taking statements from the community and entering them into a database, a total of 2,991 victims under the age of 18 were identified. This is 3.4% of the total number of victims reported to the Commission through its statement taking process. However, it does not represent the proportion of child victims in Timor-Leste, as in 73.3% of cases the age of the victim was not provided. This is because many statement givers did not know the ages of the victims, particularly where the victim was not a close family member. In other cases statement-givers could not remember the age of the victim where the violation occurred some time ago. Also, the statement taking process itself focussed on narrative rather than specific biographic details.

20. The Commission also conducted over 100 interviews with individuals who had suffered violations as children, or who had some knowledge of the treatment of children during the occupation. This was particularly important in relation to the Commission's investigation of children taken to Indonesia, which was not a violation included in the Commission's statistical truth-seeking process. The Commission also organised 257 Community Profile workshops throughout the country, which provided additional information on children. The details of each community's human rights violations including those suffered by children were given in these workshops.

21. Statements provided to the Commission's community reconciliation unit by perpetrators of minor violations gave context to research into children involved in pro-autonomy militias. However, the purpose of such statements was to facilitate the deponent's return to communities rather than truth-seeking, and so they did not provide detailed information on the topics covered in this part.

Children in the armed political conflicts and the clandestine movement

22. One of the most direct ways of involving children in conflict is by forcing them to join the armed forces or to take part in related military activities. Physically vulnerable, more impressionable and more easily controlled than adults, children can be a valuable source of support to military operations. However, the costs, both to the children and to the broader community, are high. Children lose their status as civilians in armed conflict and thus the entitlement to protections from the violence of war that international humanitarian law provides. Further, they are exposed to extreme danger and to violence as a routine occurrence over the most formative period of their lives. This often includes serious human rights violations, whether as victims, perpetrators or witnesses. The use of children in this way contributes to the militarisation and polarisation of the broader society. It puts children not just on the frontline of the military conflict, but on the frontline of societal conflict as well.

23. For these reasons, forcing children in occupied territories to work in or with the armed forces is specifically prohibited under international law. There has been and continues to be controversy over the age at which children may join the military.

24. Under the Convention on the Rights of the Child, which Indonesia ratified in 1990, the following rules apply:

- States must refrain from recruiting children under the age of 15 into their armed forces, and must take measures to prevent children under the age of 15 from directly participating in hostilities.[16]
- If recruiting children between the ages of 15 and 18 into their armed forces, states must give priority to older children.[17]
- Children have a right to protection from economic exploitation and from performing work that is likely to be harmful or dangerous to the child.[18]

25. In addition, Article 51 of Geneva Convention IV prohibits an Occupying Power from forcing any civilians to serve in its armed forces and from using propaganda to secure voluntary enlistment. Children under the age of 18 must not be compelled to do any work.

26. The Commission documented 146 cases of child recruitment in the statement-taking process. This accounted for 6.8% (146/2,157) of all forced recruitments documented by the Commission. However, in 45.5% (981/2,157) of cases of recruitment, the victim's age was not known. It is likely, therefore, that some of the 981 cases of recruitment where the victim's age was unknown were perpetrated against children.

27. The overwhelming majority, 83.6% (122/146), of the documented cases of child recruitment occurred between 1975 and 1983. Hence, child recruitment appears to have been mainly used during the initial years of the Indonesian occupation. Of the cases of child recruitment documented by the Commission, 84.3% (123/146) were attributed to the Indonesian military and 17.8% (26/146) were attributed to the Timorese associates of the Indonesian military, including the militias in 1999.* Only 3.4% (5/146) of cases of child recruitment documented by the Commission were attributed to the clandestine movement or Falintil.

28. All sides to the political conflicts in Timor-Leste used children over the mandate period of the Commission. As TBOs children performed a variety of tasks. Although not generally directly involved in fighting, child TBOs were frequently brought to the battlefield and thus were exposed to physical danger. At the very least they lived in difficult conditions and were prey to mistreatment by soldiers. Children also had an important role in the Resistance, both in fighting for the Armed Forces for the National Liberation of Timor Leste (Forças Armada de Libertação Nacional de Timor Leste, Falintil) or as part of the clandestine movement. Finally, children were recruited into the militias that terrorised Timor-Leste in 1999. Often they joined the militias as a result of intimidation that seriously violated their human rights, and then went on to commit grave human rights violations themselves.

* When calculating proportional responsibility for violations, some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared among perpetrators.

29. The following section looks not only at cases of forced recruitment but at the broader experience of children involved in the conflict either as TBO for the Indonesian military, as militia in 1999 or as part of the Resistance, either through the clandestine movement or Falintil.

Children as TBOs and on operations

30. The main form of involvement of East Timorese children with the Indonesian military was as TBOs. The Indonesian military used both adults and children, primarily males, as TBOs from immediately after the invasion as porters, servants and general assistants in military operations. TBOs were kept in military camps but would often accompany soldiers into the field. The immediate purpose of recruiting TBOs was to provide operational logistical support. Recruitment was therefore often undertaken when a need arose to move supplies through unfamiliar territory. A secondary purpose, according to Indonesian military documents in the hands of the Commission, was to encourage children to become supporters of integration.

31. For the children, the motivation to become a TBO was complex. Many were overtly coerced by threat of force against themselves or their families. Others became TBOs in order to get food to survive, or provide a measure of security for their families. This was particularly evident during the late 1970s when food was scarce and families were vulnerable. Some children joined precisely because they or their families were suspected of being supporters of the Fretilin (Frente Revolucionaria de Timor Leste Independente, Revolutionary Front of Independent East Timor). Some also joined voluntarily.

32. According to the Commission's research and secondary source material, including military documents, most child TBOs were recruited in the early years of the conflict, 1976-1981. Although there are cases of TBOs as young as six,* male teenagers appear to have been the most heavily represented group among children.[19] This finding is consistent with the statistical patterns resulting from the Commission statement taking process, which suggests that forced recruitment mostly affected young males between the ages of 19 and 34. Of the children forcibly recruited, almost all were adolescent. Periods of service ranged from a few weeks to more than a year. In most cases, TBOs were awarded certificates at the end of their service and returned to their homes, sometimes in large groups after a battalion shipped out. There are also cases of TBOs who returned to Indonesia with the particular soldier they had served, joined another battalion or remained in Dili.

33. It is clear from the testimony of former TBOs that they were put at risk by being forced to carry ammunition, to guide soldiers to find Fretilin supporters in the forest, and to gather water and firewood in combat areas.

* The database includes one first-person account of a boy recruited by ABRI Airborne Infantry Battalion 700 in Ainaro in 1978 "at the age of about six years old" (HRVD Statement 3242). Eurico Guterres also claims to have begun working as a TBO at age six.

Patterns of recruitment of TBOs

34. The Commission was not able to make direct statistical measurements of TBOs because TBO cases were documented as child recruitments in the statement-taking process. The bulk of child recruitment cases documented by the Commission occurred between 1975 and 1983, so it is likely that the use of TBOs was also most frequent between those dates. Military documents and individual cases show that TBOs continued to be recruited in the mid-1980s, albeit at lower levels, and there are isolated cases into the 1990s.[20] The decline in child recruitment can be explained by the scaling down of military operations and increased regulation of the recruitment.

35. In the period immediately following the invasion, Indonesian battalions forcibly recruited large numbers of people of all ages to help carry ammunition and supplies for short periods. Community Profiles indicate that short-term, large-scale recruitments, including of children, continued throughout Operation Seroja (Lotus) to fulfil immediate operational needs between 1975 and 1979.

36. Albino Fernandes, for example, reported that he was forcibly recruited in Lebos (Alas, Manufahi) in September 1978 when he was 15 years old, together with all children in the village over the age of 12. He served for more than a month and escaped before his unit in the ABRI (Angkatan Bersenjata Republik Indonesia, Armed Forces of the Republic of Indonesia) was able to carry out its plan to send him by ship to the eastern region to serve as a TBO.[*] Bonifacio dos Reis reported that as a 17-year-old, he and many others were captured and forced to carry military supplies from Letefoho (Ermera) to Hatolia (Ermera) for three days and three nights without food.[21] A 14-year-old was also among a large group of civilians captured and then held at the Maubara Koramil (Komando Rayon Militer, sub-district military command) in February 1977.[22] He was one of five youths forced to be a TBO for one month by Battalion 310.

37. Other TBOs were recruited on an individual basis to provide assistance to a particular soldier, and this was increasingly the pattern following the end of Operation Seroja. These TBOs not only assisted in transporting goods, but would also undertake domestic or other duties as required by the soldier that they served and would live with their soldier in the camp and accompany them into the field. The relationship was personal enough that in several cases the Commission heard that a TBO accompanied his soldier to the hospital in Dili by helicopter after he was wounded.[23] Initially, such recruitment was undertaken by individual soldiers on an ad hoc basis. By 1982, if not earlier, this form of recruitment was recognised and regulated and soldiers seeking TBOs were required to approach the local Village Guidance Officer (Bintara Pembina Desa, Babinsa).[24]

* CAVR Interview with Albino Fernandes, Alas, Manufahi, 6 March 2003. See also HRVD Statement 06117,in which Agusto Guterres told the Commission that in 1978 in Baguia, Baucau, he saw many youths recruited as TBOs when he surrendered.

The status of TBOs in the military

TBOs were not part of the ABRI/TNI in that they were not given a rank, a uniform or a salary. Nevertheless TBOs were recognised as a specific category of assistant, and were distinguished from other civilians recruited for operations, such as Operation Keamanan (Operation Security, also known as Operation Fence of Legs [Operasi Pagar Betis]) conducted in 1981. The following factors suggest that the recruitment of TBOs was official military policy:

- The various roles and tasks undertaken by TBOs were common across battalions and over time.
- Although not paid a salary, TBOs generally received food and board for their services.
- According to Operational Instruction 15, by 1982 TBOs were a formal and regulated part of the military structure.[25] Each Kodim (district-level military command) was instructed to: "provide TBOs for combat units, territorial forces and police forces and carry out the monitoring and administration of TBOs recruited".
- This document also directed units needing TBOs to make a request to the local Village Guidance Officer - the village-level military representative. Although this may not always have been followed, it implies that the military had a system in place for the recruitment of TBOs from their home villages.
- Operational Instruction 15 also directed Kodims to screen TBOs in order to provide formal recognition of those who were killed, compensation for those injured and awards in deserving cases. Other military documents mention awards for bravery and even posthumous elevation to the rank of private for TBOs killed in battle.
- TBOs received certificates signed by the Battalion commander at the end of service, sometimes accompanied by modest amounts of money.

38. The ways in which TBOs were selected varied greatly. Research interviews and statements taken by the Commission suggest that in the 1970s many children were recruited following their surrender or capture by the invading forces. Others were selected because they were presumed to be sympathetic to the Indonesian cause. The Commission received testimony about one supporter of the Timorese Democratic Union (União Democratica Timorense, UDT), who was detained by Fretilin. The invading Indonesian army freed him and he became a TBO.[26] In another case, Antonio da Costa reported being among very large numbers of TBOs recruited by landing parties in areas of Manatuto known to have little Fretilin support, though few of them were children.[27]

39. In a few cases, TBOs were recruited after other members of a group with whom they had been caught were killed. Cipriano de Jesus Martins reports that after his older sister and her child were shot by ABRI in Riheu (Ermera, Ermera) in January 1976, he was forced to become a TBO for one year.[28] The Commission received two statements about another incident from Eurico de Almeida and Marcos Gusmão. They described how a group of their family members were seeking food outside the camps in Venilale (Baucau) on 12 October 1979 when they ran into three platoons from Battalion 745. Three male adults were reportedly shot and killed, three young children were sent home, and one ten-year-old child, Manuel de Almeida, was recruited as a TBO.[29] In a third such case, Marcos Loina da Costa told the Commission that when he was 12 years old in Laleia (Manatuto), he went looking for food and met up with two men who turned out to be former Falintil members. The group was captured by the Indonesian military and taken to the post at Larimasa (Laleia, Manatuto). The two men were killed, while Marcos was forced to become a TBO.[30] [*]

The number of child TBOs

40. As mentioned above, TBOs were not specifically documented through the statement-taking process so the Commission was not able to make direct statistical measurements of TBOs. However, other sources including interviews conducted by the Commission, military documents and Community Profiles suggest that large numbers of TBOs were recruited.

41. A conservative estimate of the number of TBOs overall can be derived from military documents. By 1982, guidelines for the mobilisation of civilians limited the number of TBOs to 5-7% of a unit's total strength, while recognising that in practice the number generally reached 10%, suggesting that about 80 TBOs served each battalion. A 1984 military document restricted the numbers further, allowing battalion-sized units to recruit just 15 TBOs, or five per company. [†] These overall quantities are significantly lower than those estimated by former TBOs who spoke to the Commission. [‡] The number of battalions fluctuated over time. At the peak in 1976 and 1978 up to 30

* Augustinho Soares remembers that after a mass capture at Letefoho, many suspected Fretilin or Falintil members were trained as Ratih or Hansip, including some who were 14 and 15 years old. CAVR Interview with Augustinho Soares, Ermera, Ermera,13 August 2003.

† A battalion of about 800 soldiers is generally made up of five companies, each of which has five platoons of about 30 men, further divided into three squads (regu).

‡ João Rui recalls that after Battalion 121 left Timor-Leste in 1980, 200-300 TBOs who had served with the Battalion were sent by ship from Dili to their homes in the eastern districts, suggesting that up to 40% of the Battalion was comprised of TBO's. (CAVR Interview with João Rui, Dili, 5 May 2004.) Another source recalls that in his experience a platoon of about 30 soldiers had 10-15 TBOs, or one per two soldiers. (CAVR Interview with Alfredo Reinado Alves, Dili, 5 March 2004.) Albino Fernandes, however, recalled that in 1978 in his Battalion each company (about 150 men) had a total of about ten TBOs. Hence there appears to have been significant variation in the number of TBOs in a battalion. (CAVR Interview with Albino Fernandes, Alas, Manufahi, 6 March 2003.)

battalions operated in Timor-Leste, but it is not clear whether all battalions had TBOs, or how many TBOs served on different occasions, or whether TBOs were "rotated" out of service more frequently than battalions, as appears to be the case from the lengths of service described by former TBOs. Nevertheless, if it is assumed that the Indonesian military's guidelines on TBO recruitment were broadly followed and not exceeded, It is clear that the use of TBOs was a common and widespread practice by Indonesian military units. The Commission recommends that further research be undertaken to determine the extent of the practice.

42. It is also difficult to calculate the proportion of TBOs who were children. Anecdotal evidence suggests that while children made up a minority of TBOs, the overall numbers were still quite large. The Commission has received reports of child TBOs in every district except Oecussi. However, some units may have recruited few or none, while others recruited many minors as porters for days, weeks or years. One source recalled that, of a group of 200-300 TBOs serving Battalion 121, there were about seven children who were aged below ten in the group, including himself. He estimated less than 30 children were aged 12-13 years, and up to 60 were aged 14-17 years, whom he considered no longer children. Taken together, from one-half to one-third of the TBOs in this battalion were aged under 18.[31] Consistent with these figures, another former TBO reported that in his experience a platoon of about 30 soldiers had 10-15 TBOs and in his platoon there were seven children. That figure included two young children, who had been picked up during operations and did not have work duties.[32] However, another person who had been a TBO in 1976 recalled that his whole battalion had just 18 child TBOs.[33]

Why ABRI recruited children as TBOs

43. The primary purpose of the recruitment of TBOs appears to have been operational: transporting supplies and providing for the day-to-day needs of soldiers. In some cases TBOs were used to guide soldiers, help locate both civilians and guerrillas in the forest or to carry ammunition, equipment and supplies during combat. There are also reports of TBOs being deployed in front of units in the field.

44. The question remains why children and youths were selected for service. There are several possibilities: indiscriminate demand for unpaid labour, a hearts-and-minds tactic, or a perception that young TBOs posed a lower risk of betrayal or escape.

45. There is some evidence that the recruitment of youths was driven by the need to satisfy the military hunger for free labour in support roles. This seems especially likely in the early years after the invasion when larger numbers of TBOs were recruited for short-term, ad hoc tasks. One source describes children as young as 11 being pressed into service from the local population to replace some adult TBOs who had fled, either due to simple availability or perhaps because they were preferred as easier to control than adults.[34]

46. There is evidence that once individual soldiers had the main responsibility for the recruitment of TBOs, children were specifically targeted as recruits. A 1982 military document details the roles of the various civilian paramilitary groups particularly with regard to Operation Kikis (see section below, Children on operations par. 87 ff). In an illuminating passage, the document lists the strengths and weaknesses of TBOs. The strengths, derived from spending time with Indonesian soldiers, include the ability to speak Indonesian, good health and loyalty to the particular soldiers they served. Of greatest relevance to this part, the final strength listed is "[r]elatively young age, between 12-35", although the passage does not explain why youth was regarded as a strength.[35]

47. It may have been assumed that children were easier to influence ideologically than adults and would therefore go on to support Indonesia. There are several cases in which children who served as TBOs subsequently joined paramilitaries, or even the Indonesian military, as adults.* The 1982 handbook for the Village Guidance Officers (Babinsas), provides advice about former TBOs:

> Those of school age should be encouraged to go back to school, while those who meet the criteria and are aged between 18 and 25 can become members of Ratih units† and then members of ABRI.‡

48. Leaders of the militia groups in 1999 who were previously TBOs include Joanico Cesario Belo of Tim Saka militia, Cancio Lopes de Carvalho of Mahidi militia (Mati Hidup Demi Integrasi, Live or Die for Integration) and Eurico Guterres of Aitarak militia (Tetum for "thorn").[36]

49. Some children were forcibly recruited as TBOs precisely because of their real or suspected ties to Fretilin, and thus as an effort to control them. According to Father Locatelli, the recruitment of TBOs was also a strategy by the military to prevent youths from becoming involved with Fretilin.[37] Adults, including Falintil members, were often forced to become members of the Civil Defence (Pertahanan Sipil, Hansip), Trained Civilians (Rakyat Terlatih, Ratih), People's Resistance (Perlawanan Rakyat, Wanra) or members of other paramilitaries.

50. Finally, children may have been preferred over adults as they were less likely to desert or betray their units. One former TBO told the Commission that of the three TBOs in his unit, an adult ran away one night with TBOs from other units, while he

* See CAVR, Children and Conflict: Submission to CAVR by Helene van Klinken. Case Summary Collection, 2003. See also, CAVR, Community Profile of the aldeia of Vaviquinia, Maubara Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 3 July 2003, which notes that twelve villagers of unknown age captured in 1976 by Infantry Battalions 403 and 401 and Secret Warfare Command (Komando Pasukan Sandhi Yudha, Kopassandha), were made to serve as TBOs and then recruited into Civil Defence Force (Pertahanan Sipil, Hansip) at the end of their service.

† Indonesian civilians were regularly selected to undergo basic military training, after which they were referred to as Trained Populace (Rakyat Terlatih, Ratih). Further selections may be made from the ranks of the Ratih to form (a) the Civil Defence Force (Pertahanan Sipil, Hansip), responsible for protecting civilians in case of natural disaster or war, (b) the People's Security Force (Keamanan Rakyat, Kamra).

‡ ABRI, "Petunjuk Teknis tentang Kegiatan Babinsa" [Instruction Manual: Village Guidance Officer/TDP Activity in developing and phasing out Trained People's Resistance Forces], Juknis /06/IV/1982, (Korem 164, Wira Dharma, Intelligence Section, Williem da Costa [Chief of Intelligence]) translated in Budiardjo and Liong, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, pp. 223-227; see also ABRI, "Komando Pelaksana Operasi Timor Timur" [Military Command East Timor Operations], Rencana Operasi No. 01/Bayu, Lampiran D (Rencana Teritorial), [Operational Plans No. 01/Bayu. Attachment D (Territorial Plan) p. 5. which directs forces to "assign TBOs from returned Battalion to strengthen Wanra in the Tactical Resistance bases, PPT."

and the other under-age TBO did not know the way home and so were afraid to flee.[38] However, as noted at par. 123 ff below, children in the clandestine network in fact played an important role in providing intelligence and supplies to the Resistance, and there are several cases of child TBOs being killed or disappearing because they were suspected of communicating with Falintil.*

51. Indeed, several 1982 military documents warn that the knowledge gained by TBOs could easily fall into the wrong hands. One warns:

> As a consequence of [TBOs] accompanying members of ABRI, they will learn much of the strengths and weaknesses of ABRI members. If not guided, they may turn around and pass on information to the GPK for its use. A number of cases prove that the GPK has sent its people to become TBOs and then return to the forest with equipment, logistics and the most important thing, information.[39]

52. Another document warns that the Security Disturber Movement (Gerakan Pengacau Keamanan, GPK) "can also disguise themselves as, or infiltrate into the ranks of, TBOs attached to ABRI units".[40] To guard against this risk, another document from 1982 instructs Babinsas on how to handle ex-TBOs: "Give them continual guidance so that they are not influenced by the GPK."[41]

Reasons for joining

53. The Commission's research suggests that TBOs were recruited by a variety of means, which varied depending on the individual and the broader military and socio-economic situation.

54. In many cases recruitment was undertaken forcibly, but other children chose to join for material benefit or security, and others because they enjoyed the work. João Rui who served as a TBO four times as a child explained his reasons for joining each time: the first time he was forced; the second time he was persuaded by the promise of food, sweets and friends; the third and fourth times he joined voluntarily because he was used to the work and did not enjoy the heavy farm work that he was doing at home with his uncle. He was also hoping to receive an education, although that never happened.[42]

Coercion

55. José Pinto, who in 1977 at the age of 16, became a TBO for Infantry Battalion 724 said:

* See HRVD Statement 04435, in which João Pinto describes the killing of his son, Domingos Mario, a 17-year-old TBO who was forcibly recruited on 4 December 1979 by the Koramil in Luro (Lautém). After it was learned by ABRI that he had been writing letters to a Falintil member in the forest for 4 months, Domingos was brought by ABRI force 305 to Nundelarin, Luro, where he was beaten, stabbed in the chest with a bayonet and burnt on the cheeks with cigarette butts. After he had been detained for nine days he went home for three days. A Hansip called Pedro along with ABRI then came and took Domingos to the Koramil in Luro and he never returned.

When they came into the house, [the Indonesian soldiers] would always bring their weapons with them. So whatever they wanted my parents had to agree to. We couldn't say whether we wanted to or not.[43]

56. As seen from the above stories, in many cases children were openly forced to become TBOs, for example after capture or surrender. Domingos Maria Bada told the Commission that after several years in the mountains, he and his family were captured by the army and Hansip members in Faturasa (Remexio, Aileu). While the rest of his family were taken to the town of Remexio, he and a friend were kept at the army post in Faturasa as TBOs. Domingos explained that he did not want to become a TBO but was threatened with a weapon and so had no choice. He joined the army and was ordered to carry their knapsacks into the battlefield.[44]

57. Some of the coercion was directed at those suspected of supporting Fretilin. For example, Luis Soares told the Commission that when he was 16, he was captured in 1976 by a Hansip in Ermera and turned over to Yonif (Infantry Battalion) 412, because he had helped Falintil. He was forced to serve as a TBO in Aileu and Same for one year.[45] The Community Profile of Aidabaleten (Atabae, Bobonaro) states that in one year around 300 young men who were considered to be members of the traditional forces (Armas Brancas)* or Fretilin militias, were arrested and detained for three months. Following their release, those who were still adolescents were forced to undertake military training and were then made TBOs.

58. Coercion also took place in the broader context of military control over the civilian population. One former TBO pointed out:

No civilian could oppose a soldier. People were afraid. Even a Bupati [district administrator] didn't dare oppose a soldier…Not joining was dangerous - we would be dead, no problem.[46]

59. The persuasive approach was used with Oscar Ramos Ximenes, who became a TBO at the age of 12 in 1980 in Cairui (Laleia, Manatuto):

I couldn't go to school because I was hungry, so I gave myself up to become a TBO, just so I could survive.[47]

60. The Indonesian military also used more subtle methods of recruiting boys and young men to work as TBOs.

61. Gil Parada Martins Belo told the Commission that when he surrendered in 1979 and began living in Lacluta (Viqueque), the Indonesian military approached him regularly to persuade him to become a TBO, even though he was only ten years old at the time:

They were always trying to persuade me, that's why I went [with them]. They brought me cakes, clothes, trousers. They didn't threaten me. I didn't feel comfortable though because there were always soldiers coming and calling for me. They always waited for my father, and that is why I left in the end...At that time it was very difficult to get food. Many people died. This is what made me think that it would be better for me to join with them.[48]

* Armas Brancas was an unofficial term for civilian forces charged with helping Falintil forces in the battlefield by providing food and other supplies. Armas Brancas forces were armed with swords, spears, or bows and arrows but only for self-defence. They were not involved in direct combat.

62. In his autobiography Eurico Guterres writes of becoming a TBO to survive:

Although I was only six years old, I joined in helping out the TBOs at the Battalion 502 Base Camp at Burkaila [Uatolari, Viqueque]. Although working as a TBO was looked on with contempt, I had to work hard at it to lighten the load of my mother. Becoming a TBO meant that, at the very least, I could eat.[49]

63. Once in the camps the promise of extra food allowed TBOs to help feed their families. Agustinho Soares reported that even though TBOs usually received only what was left over from soldiers' meals, at times he was able to get some food to his family: "If I hadn't become a TBO, then my whole family might have died. We had a bit of luck because I was a TBO."[50]

64. Because of the material benefits that could come from serving as a TBO, there are also cases of families pushing their children to join. After three years in the mountains, José Viegas and his family surrendered in 1978. Despite their strong Fretilin background, his family pressured him to become a TBO:

Most people knew that my father had been armed, that my mother was a delegate and that I was an estafeta [courier]. In 1978, our family's movements were watched and monitored, so it was very difficult for my father to find the basic necessities to satisfy his family's needs. We couldn't event plant vegetables...As a way out, my mother begged me: "Join as a TBO so we can get food from [ABRI]." But I didn't want to, even though my mother insisted on it until she had to beat me. I ran away from home and wandered around in the forest for a week.[51]

Duties

65. A 1984 military document states that TBOs may be deployed only as guides, only in their home areas and only with knowledge of the territorial command.[52] However, this does not seem to have been general practice. Information that the Commission received from former TBOs indicates that the duties of TBOs were varied and often involved moving around with troops to wherever operations were being conducted.*

* For example: Mário dos Santos told of travelling with the military from his hometown in Bazartete (Liquiçá) to Fatulia (Ermera) then to Dili and Ainaro, and back to Bazartete over a nine-month period (CAVR Children and Conflict Research Team, Research Paper, "Forced Recruitment", 31 August 2003). Albino Fernandes told of the TBOs from Lebos (Bobonaro) travelling in 1978 through the mountains of Bobonaro, Ainaro and Manufahi. (CAVR Interview with Albino Fernandes, Manufahi, 6 March 2003.)

66. Many TBOs were used for logistical purposes during military operations such as carrying army supplies or the packs of individual soldiers containing items needed on the battlefield.[53] In the base camps, TBOs were used for domestic tasks such as cooking, laundry, and finding water and firewood. José Pinto reported that he became a TBO for four months when he was 16 years old. He would draw water from a well 10-20 times a day using a 15-litre container. Because he was also attending school at the time, he would draw the water in the mornings and evenings. If the army post was at the top of the mountain, he would have to walk more than 100 metres up and down the mountain with the water.[54]

67. TBOs were also used as guides or scouts which could involve the dangerous task of walking ahead of the frontline to check that the path was clear.* Statements received by the Commission indicate that the role of guide was often linked to a role as a courier for ABRI to make contact with members of the Resistance, or calling on people living in the forest to surrender. Domingos Maria Bada, who served as a TBO for eight months for four members of Battalion 410, told of his experiences during an operation in Fahinehan and Turiscai in Manufahi District:

> But there was one thing that was important, which was that when there were operations held in the forest, TBOs had to form the frontline as guides for the soldiers. And TBOs had to go and look for and call to people still in the forest to give themselves up.[55]

68. Belchior Francisco Bento Alves Pereira testified to the Commission Public Hearing on Children and Conflict about his forced service as a TBO in 1990 in Manutasi (Ainaro, Ainaro) after being detained for clandestine activities:

> If we were doing an operation in the jungle I was told to carry the packs, weapons and bullets. They gave me new army clothes and I became their bait in the forest. First I was with [Infantry Battalion] 613, then [Infantry Battalion] 641, [Infantry Battalion] 642 and, finally, with [Infantry Battalion] 643.[56]

69. The Commission has also heard that TBOs would be forced to provide support once battle had been joined. Alfredo Alves testified to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict that at the age of 11 he accompanied Battalion 725 into battle, mainly to refill magazines.†

Conditions and treatment

70. Although in many cases TBOs received more food than average members of the population, their conditions could also be difficult. At best they were expected to live

* See statement of Leoneto Martins, who was forced to walk ahead of the frontline when he worked as a TBO for Infantry Battalion 410. (CAVR Interview with Leoneto Martins, Saburia, Aileu, 15 October 2003.)

† See also HRVD Statement 09081 by Cipriano de Jesus Martins: "As long as I was with ABRI Iwas forced to carry their combat equipment such as bullets and food into the field of battle between ABRI and Falintil."

in conditions that were as harsh as those of the soldiers they served, even though the soldiers had been trained to deal with physical deprivation. Former TBOs have reported suffering from exhaustion, hunger and thirst. Several former TBOs reported that they ate only what was left over after the soldiers finished, or in some cases rice that was already rotten.[57] If helicopter supply drops were delayed, there were food shortages for everyone. However, when the supplies arrived the TBOs had heavy loads to carry, often over long distances. Alfredo Alves told the Commission that on two occasions all TBOs with his Battalion were given injections in their legs before carrying heavy packs, in order that they would not feel the weight or become tired.

71. Marcos Loina da Costa from Cairui (Laleia, Manatuto), who was only 12 when he was forced to become a TBO, said he found it very difficult to carry the heavy loads:

> Throughout the journey we felt as if we were almost dead because what we carried was so heavy and so much. Whoever was no longer strong enough to carry their loads would just be left behind.[58]

72. Domingas Freitas told the Commission of her younger brother, Rai Ano, who was recruited with a friend, Zeca, in 1978 in Ossu (Viqueque), by a member of Battalion 744. Zeca later told the family that Rai Ano had died in Uatolari (Viqueque) because he was not strong enough to carry the heavy military equipment.[59]

73. The treatment of TBOs by the military, including incidences of the physical abuse, seems to have depended on the personality of the soldier to whom each TBO was assigned.

The everyday life of a TBO

"If we died, it didn't matter"

One young boy was recruited by soldiers from [Infantry Battalion] 121 who gave him sweets and asked him to carry a backpack for several kilometres. By the time they had arrived at their destination it was dark and he was afraid to go home. They took him with them to the forest where he collected firewood and water, pitched tents and cooked:

[W]e would walk for up to 12 hours a day. We would leave at 5.00am and walk until 12.00 when we would have a break and eat lunch, then we were off again until it was dark. The next morning we would set off again and we went back and forth through the forest like that. I was already carrying heavy loads then…We climbed up [Mount] Matebian, it rained the whole time and I couldn't sleep because everything was wet. Sometimes we would go to the towns to get rice, sometimes by helicopter. The soldiers would send smoke signals or use a radio. They would give us food and milk. We were on Matebian for two months going back and forwards. I thought we would go to the towns but we couldn't - we didn't go into any towns, we were in the forest the whole time.

One mountain that we climbed was extremely difficult; there were some who fell off…at the border of Uatolari, at the base of the mountain, we rested for two days but it was raining heavily and the helicopter couldn't get to us for two days and two nights. We ran out of rice and cigarettes, everything ran out. They were stressed and were only drinking tea. When the sun set we would go looking for fruit, coconuts, anything. Then before we knew it a helicopter landed. The soldiers had sent smoke signals and the helicopter came down to us and gave us rice. Suddenly, all of the bigger TBOs ran away. They knew the way and so ran back to their villages. It was harder for us [little ones], we were in the middle of the forest, how would we find the way? That night when the company commander ordered us to get rice, it was discovered that two TBOs had gone. One other TBO then ran away from our regiment, leaving just two of us. The other TBO was 16 or 17, but I was just eight or nine.

The next morning we were moving again. There was a lot of rice now and the sacks were wet…Usually if we were staying in one place we could receive rice twice a week. But when we were moving we received [supplies] maybe once a week … For nine people, that is a lot of rice at once. There were about 50 kilos in the sacks…So we left carrying all of that but there were no more TBOs so in Uatolari [Viqueque] we called more people to join. There were some older ones, I saw one even given bullets to carry. That area was still dangerous and there were some people called up who were too scared to join. We weren't careful either, if we died, it didn't matter. There were tens of people [who joined] including children around 11 years old. We left directly from there into the forest to climb Matebian again. Some of the bigger TBOs became annoyed because the bags were heavy and then they were given bullets. We were at a river called Uaibobo and they were so annoyed they threw all of it into the river…We were told to climb back up into the forest and we stayed in an area near the border between Venilale (Baucau) and Ossu (Viqueque) near a river. We were there for maybe six months or more…Then we moved again to a town, which was nicer but we had to work every day: cooking, collecting water and washing clothes.[60]

Fatalities

74. Qualitative sources, such as interviews and community profiles, suggest that many TBOs, including children, may have been killed in combat. However, more focused data collection and research is required to make a finding on this issue.

75. Testimonies received by the Commission also indicate a high level of fatalities. One TBO, who began service in 1976 and spent time with three different battalions over two years, finally ran away with several others because of the high casualty rate in the eastern districts:

> When there was an operation in the forest, we would always be in the frontline. So there were TBOs that were shot by Fretilin because TBOs were used as guides each time there was an operation. Of nine TBOs, three died and others were wounded. My TBO friends were wounded or died just because they were always ordered by the soldiers to walk in the frontline.[61]

76. Evaristo da Costa reported to the Commission that in 1983 nine boys, including Aureliano da Silva (ten years), Bonifacio da Silva (ten years), Domingos Mendonca (11 years), Ernesto Amaral (14 years), Jacinto Amaral (14 years) and Domingos Mesquita (14 years), were forced by Infantry Battalion 514 to carry packs full of rice from Liurai village (Remexio, Aileu) to Hera (Dili). When they arrived in Ailibur/Pamketaudun, Ernesto Amaral was reportedly shot by an Indonesian soldier named C2, because he could not carry his pack any further. The other boys fled to Dili or to their home villages, where ABRI members went looking for them until a soldier from the Remexio Koramil called off the chase.[62]

77. Several cases were reported to the Commission of child TBOs who were not seen again after being recruited. In one case, Apolinario Soares reported that his younger brother, João Soares, was ten years old when he was caught by Battalion 745 and forced to become a TBO in 1980, because the family was suspected of supporting Fretilin.[63] In another case, Costavo da Costa Ximenes told the Commission that his younger brother, ten-year-old Avelino Pinto, was taken by ABRI in November 1982 from his home in Alaua Atas (Baguia, Baucau). Ostensibly, he was to be adopted but actually he was made a TBO and was not seen again.[64] One man from Atsabe (Ermera), Eduardo Casimiro, remembers several children from the area dying after being recruited as TBOs.[65]

78. Some children may have died in combat, but the Commission has also been told of several incidents in which TBOs were killed or threatened with death by the Indonesian military. Alfredo Alves remembers the killing of a TBO by Infantry Battalion 725 in Fatubolu (Maubisse, Ainaro) in 1977:

> One day a TBO refused to increase the load of goods he was carrying, which made the commander angry. When we reached the camp, all soldiers and TBOs were gathered together and the commander said: "TBOs are not allowed to refuse to carry goods because the military has come here to help and give you independence." Then that TBO was called to the front and shot dead. We were then given a clear reminder that if there was someone who refused [to do what he was told], his fate would be the same.[66]

79. According to Marcos Loina da Costa, a former TBO from Cairui (Laleia, Manatuto), another TBO in his unit was nearly killed by a soldier because he could not carry a heavy load of rice, bullets and mortar shells, but was saved at the last minute by another soldier.

He remembered that after that incident "every load that I carried felt light because of my fear".*

80. As noted above, the Commission has received information that a 17-year-old TBO, Domingos Mario, was tortured and disappeared after writing a letter to Falintil.[67] Another statement reports the case of a 14-year-old, Teodoro de Oliveira, who was shot and killed on Christmas Day 1984 by Infantry Battalion 131 in Serelau (Los Palos, Lautém) for reasons unknown.[68]

Payment

81. In general, TBOs received food for themselves or to take home to their families in return for their services. No former TBOs reported receiving a regular salary, and no mention of payment is made in the military documents. This is unlike members of Wanra or Ratih who were either paid salaries monthly or for the duration of operations (see the section on the militarisation of East Timorese society in Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation).

82. Many former TBOs reported receiving small amounts of money at the end of their service. Domingos Maria Bada reported that after six months of service in 1978, mostly searching for civilians in the forest, his work with Infantry Battalion 410 ended and he was given Rp6,000 (equivalent to about US$14 at the time). Another former TBO reported receiving Rp20,000 (about US$32 at the time)[69] at the end of nine months of service with Infantry Battalion 133 in 1981, and Rp25,000 (about US$23 at the time) in February 1985 after a year serving with Infantry Battalion 507. Each time he was demobilised, this TBO received official certificates with the heading "Letter of Appreciation" (Surat Tanda Penghargaan) (1981) and "Statement of Gratitude" (Ucapan Terima Kasih) (1985) signed by the battalion commander.† Gil Parada Belo Martins received Rp25,000 and a certificate from Airborne Infantry Battalion (Lintas Udara, Linud) 401, or Banteng Raiders, which he was told would be helpful in getting employment.[70]

Post-service

83. In many cases, a TBO was returned to his village following completion of his service. The Village Guidance Officer (Babinsa) handbook specifically requires that TBOs be sent home and encouraged to return to school, and one TBO remembers hundreds of TBOs travelling home by ship to the eastern districts after their battalion left Timor-Leste. He also remembered:

> Some stayed in Dili, since the economy was bad at home. I was given Rp9,000 and a certificate. We stayed at the Dili Kodim and were then moved to the Becora Koramil. We were left by the soldiers. Little kids were threatened by the bigger kids and there was a risk of being robbed. It was chaotic and sometimes I was harassed. But we felt free: no more cooking,

* CAVR Interview with Marcos Loina da Costa, Manatuto, 24 June 2003. Da Costa added that the Battalion commander ordered that all TBOs be sent home because of the unfair way they were treated by his men.

† CAVR Interview with João Rui, Dili, 5 May 2004. He told the Commission that he was also able to save up another Rp25,000 running errands or doing other tasks for soldiers.

collecting wood, or washing. I was given a military uniform, which went down to my knees like a dress.[71]

84. In some cases, TBOs were taken back to Indonesia when the soldier returned after his tour of duty. The case of Alfredo Alves, who was tricked into boarding the ship in a box, illustrates that this was not always a voluntary arrangement (see section on the transfer of children to Indonesia, par. 343 ff).

85. As noted above, for some TBOs the experience led to a long-term relationship with the Indonesian military through joining the army, or becoming a member of the Wanra or other paramilitary groups. However, in many respects service as a TBO does not carry the same stigma as becoming a militia member. It is understood that many were compelled to join, that they often performed only menial work and that they were victims in other respects.

86. Military documents from 1982 captured by Falintil specifically instruct soldiers to return children to the classroom after their tasks were completed and at least some TBOs were able to return to school only slightly older than their classmates due to their fluency in Indonesian.[*72] However, there were limited educational opportunities during the early years of the conflict when the use of child TBOs was at its height. Serving for a year or more in the military camps or in the forest meant that child TBOs missed out on what opportunities existed.

Children on operations: Operation Security

87. In mid-1981, the Indonesian military conducted an operation in which tens of thousands of Timorese were moved across the territory as a human fence in an attempt to capture Fretilin and its members. This tactic was used on several occasions in operations generically referred to as Operation Kikis. The operation that took place in mid-1981 was called Operation Keamanan and was the largest Operation Kikis ever conducted in Timor-Leste (for detailed accounts of this operation, see the section on Operation Keamanan in Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation and Vol. III, Part 7.5: Violations of the Laws of War).

88. Although TBOs were deployed in Operation Keamanan, several thousand ordinary civilians, both children and adults, were recruited specifically for the operation. There was some regional variation, but in many areas all males over the age of 12 were assembled by local administrators or military personnel and assigned to a military unit involved in the operation. Helio Freitas recalled that in his village an order came from the military through the village chief for all males to join without specifying age. The heads of the neighbourhood associations (rukun tetangga) and sub-neighbourhood associations (rukun warga) made sure that all the males in the village were recruited. There was no formal registration or checking of ages:

The liurai*, Koramil and Hansip members gathered together the whole community, all men, and assessed their condition. Small children were separated and assessed for their condition, not their age.*

* When Osorio Florindo returned to school, after missing three months because of Operation Kikis, he discovered that the school rewarded those who participated by promoting them to the next class. (CAVR Interview with Osorio Florindo, Dili, 31 May 2003.)

89. The youngest of those selected to join the operation were aged about ten.*

90. Eduardo Casimiro from Atsabe (Ermera) told the Commission that soldiers came to his school to take pupils to the Kodim before leaving for Ainaro, but as a 12-year-old he was considered too young to be recruited for the operation.[73] Osorio Florindo also told the Commission that 1,000 residents from Luro Sub-district (Lautém) joined the operation, including all the boys from his elementary school, their teachers, and children of the same age who were not in school.[74]

91. The minimum age for recruitment varied widely. The Community Profiles suggest that many school children were forced to take part in Operation Keamanan. In Pairara (Moro, Lautém) all children aged 17 and above were recruited and in Vatuvou (Maubara, Liquiçá) around 600 people were involved, including children. In Vemasse Tasi (Vemasse, Baucau) the community remembers that throughout the operation, only women, babies and the elderly were left at home. In Aissirimou (Aileu, Aileu) and in some villages in Liquiçá, all school children were forced to take part. In Lospalos and Tutuala (Lautém), all male residents above the age of 15 were forcibly recruited and in Quelicai (Baucau) and Viqueque (Viqueque) males as young as 13 took part.[75]

92. There were also areas where only adults were recruited. In the village of Parlamento (Moro, Lautém) only those older than 17 years were taken on the operation and in Seloi Malere (Aileu, Aileu), in 1979, mothers and children stayed at home while all adult males joined the operation.[76]

93. Local civilian administrators, such as sub-district administrators and village heads, directed the recruitment process in coordination with local military commanders. In some cases they may have been able to influence the minimum age of recruits. For example, in Railaco, Ermera, the sub-district head, Francisco da Conceicão Guterres, was required to provide 500-600 people to join the operation. He remembers telling the sub-district military commander that there were enough adults to fill the quota and asked him who would be responsible for the children if food ran out. In the end, only those over 30 were registered.[77]

94. While there are few reports of recruits being caught in crossfire, those forced to join suffered from disease and hunger, in some cases resulting in death.† Several participants reported that soldiers gave them a small amount of corn each week. According to Osorio Florindo, who was 15 years old at the time, people survived by finding food in the forest. Each morning they prepared their food for the day and then walked without stopping for any reason. If there was no track, they cut their way through the forest.[78]

95. The mass recruitment of men and boys for the purpose of this operation was a different phenomenon to the general recruitment of TBOs. However, a large number of

* CAVR Interview with Helio Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2003. Several sources (including one former sub-district administrator [Camat]) point to the sub-district administrator as having a lead role in enlisting participants under the direction of military authorities. (CAVR Interview with Francisco da Conceição Guterres, Toculul, Railaco, Ermera, 17 June 2003.)

† HRVD statement 05785 records that five friends of the deponent died because there was a shortage of food and medicines on the operation in Manatuto. In the database there is also second-hand evidence regarding a 15-year old boy called Januario Mendes who was shot dead in a camp during Operation Kikis by a Hansip in the presence of two witnesses (HRVD 03943).

TBOs also took part in the operation. While TBOs did not receive special training, they were differentiated from other Operation Kikis recruits by the fact that they served with particular soldiers or in some cases with Hansip. In 1982, one military document notes that from the start of the operation every unit used TBOs, estimated to have totalled 1,200, or 10% of the total force (exceeding the permitted 5-7%).* It is not known what portion of these 1,200 TBOs were minors, although the document describes TBOs as ranging in age from 12 to 35 years and statements from participants say that children as young as 11 took part.

96. One 11-year-old, Helio Freitas, was not at first selected for the operation but joined voluntarily as a TBO to a Hansip who knew his family. Helio explained to the Commission that he asked to join because he was afraid that soldiers would punish him if he stayed in the village. His group climbed Mount Matebian with the combat force (barisan tempur) out in front, consisting of Hansip members, soldiers and their respective TBOs. There were about 15-20 Hansips and a platoon of 30 soldiers. Most Hansip members had one TBO each, whereas the soldiers shared several TBOs between them. One or two kilometres to the rear were more military, Hansip, TBOs and civilians. Helio was the only child TBO on the frontline, but there were other TBOs his age in the rear and many children among the civilians. All children were over ten. His responsibilities were similar to those of the TBOs used in regular operations: cooking, washing and setting up camp. His group saw no Falintil and captured only two civilians, one of them a child.[79]

Children recruited by pro-autonomy militias

97. Although paramilitaries had existed since the earliest days of the Indonesian occupation, a new variety appeared in 1998-99. These were created in response to the political climate in Timor-Leste created by the fall of Soeharto and indications from President Habibie of a shift in policy towards the territory, which culminated in his announcement of a referendum in January 1999. There had already been signs of the mobilisation of militia groups in the months preceding this announcement, but from early 1999 the number of new militias mushroomed and they moved quickly to recruit thousands of members. Established militias, such as Tim Saka (Saka Team), Tim Alfa (Alpha Team) and Halilintar (Lightning), also sought to expand their membership base. The militias recruited members from civil defence organisations, such as Ratih and Hansip, as well as from criminal, youth and other gang networks, West Timorese, and active duty soldiers. They also recruited many youths, including an unknown number of children. (Membership lists and other records are thought to have been removed or destroyed in 1999; see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation, for more information on the 1999 militias).

98. In the child recruitment cases documented by the Commission, 6.2% (9/146) were attributed to the pro-autonomy militias. All of these cases occurred in 1999. Six of the nine cases involved children 15 and over. The other three cases involved children of unknown ages. These figures do not suggest that children were targeted for recruitment into the militias. However, neither do they suggest that children were given sufficient protection from recruitment.

* Operation Instructions No:INSOP 03/II1982I, p. 7: "From the beginning of Operation Keamanan, each unit used TBOs. The number of TBOs permitted was between 5% and 7% of the force. But most units increased their numbers by giving support not to the unit but to each person, so that it became around 10% of the force. In the early period of Operation Kikis in mid-1981, 15 battalions were operating with 1200 TBOs."

99. This analysis is supported by other sources that suggest that militia members were for the most part young men and teenagers. An East Timorese reporter told a United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF) researcher that Red and White Iron (Besi Merah Putih, BMP) had as many as 100 members under 18 when she visited them in Liquiçá in April 1999:

> I spoke with a few of them and they were young, very young. Some of their weapons were almost the same size as they were.[80]

100. In September 1999, another journalist reported that most were teenagers and in some cases, children appeared to be as young as 12.[81] One child militia member from Atabae (Bobonaro) reported that about 60 other children, including 20 girls, had been recruited into ARMUI (Atabae Rela Mati Untuk Integrasi, Atabae Would Die for Integration), an offshoot of the longer established Halilintar paramilitary in Atabae.[82]

101. Militia groups were subdivided into smaller quasi-military groups such as platoons and companies. For example, a child member of the ARMUI militia reported to UNICEF that it had 20 platoons, each with about 40 members.[83] Although few child-militia members have been interviewed, those who have report that there were other children in their groups. One clandestine member, who was forced to join Red and White Whirlwind (Dadurus Merah Putih) in Maliana (Bobonaro), reported to UNICEF that there were more than ten young boys in his group participating in guard duty and house burning, some as young as ten.[84]

Methods of recruitment

102. According to a report issued by the HAK Foundation (Yayasan HAK) several months before the referendum, there was a "wave of coerced membership" in December 1998 and January 1999 as the militias began to recruit ordinary civilians.[85] Recruitment was reportedly based on targets established by government and military authorities - typically ten people per village.[86] The BMP militia, established on 27 December 1998 in Maubara, Liquiçá:

> Recruited its members from ordinary peasants, old people and boys younger than 18. According to some sources, the process of recruitment was done through terror, intimidation, death threats and stigmatisation as "pro-independence" people. Those who finally agreed to join the gang were promised a wage of Rp25,000 per day. This group is one among those who are very active in terrorising, intimidating, wounding and killing civilians.[87]

103. Testimony, news accounts, statements provided by perpetrators in the Commission's Community Reconciliation Process (CRP)* and Community Profiles[88] indicate that many children joined the militias due to coercion and intimidation, including death threats towards them or their families. All of the children interviewed for the UNICEF study and many of those who gave statements to CRP claimed to have been forcibly recruited. While these claims seem credible and are supported by the documented recruitment of members of clandestine groups,[89] the fact that these samples include only those who chose to return to Timor-Leste must be considered in evaluating these statements. This is particularly the case given the ostracism experienced by former militia members.

104. Rofino Mesak sought to undertake the Commission reconciliation process in his village of Abani (Passabe, Oecussi) following his involvement in the Scorpion (Sakunar) militia when he was 17 years old. He claimed to have been forced to join by C3, the head of the militia group, under threat of death.[90]

105. Antero joined the Sakunar militia for one month just before the referendum in 1999 when he was 17 years old. Interviewed in the Becora prison in Dili, he told a researcher:

> The militia threatened to kill me if I didn't join them - that's why I became involved with them…The leader of Sakunar told us that all the young people had to be involved in the militia and that if they refused, they would be shot. I obeyed their instructions because I was afraid to die. Their instructions were that we had to burn houses because the owners were from pro-independence groups…In Kefa [Kefamenanu, in West Timor] there were many under-18s in the Sakunar militia. There were 50 to 60 youth, from 14 years upwards, mainly from Kefa. Most of them looked afraid. Their commanders could order them to do anything, and if they did not do it they were beaten badly…Since I became involved in the militia I didn't learn anything valuable. I only learned about cruelty - the way to kill, destroy and burn everything in Timor-Leste.†

106. Venancio, from the village of Lauhata (Liquiçá, Liquiçá), joined the BMP militia four months before the referendum when he was 16. His family was pro-autonomy, but he reported to UNICEF that he joined the militia due to threats and intimidation:

> The militia came in April 1999 after they had attacked the church. I was shocked and afraid because they came here with machetes covered in blood. They said, "If you don't come with us then we will kill you." There were older ones and young ones. They had been drinking and some of them covered their faces and looked like ninjas…Sometimes when the militia came they offered money and other times they threatened us.

* The Commission created a database of statements given by perpetrators seeking to be reintegrated into their villages. Forty seven (47) of the 1,543 statements were from children. See Vol. IV, Part 9: Community Reconciliation.

† It was later determined that there was no evidence against him. UNICEF, pp. 56.

> They said we had to join the militia and that the Indonesians would give us money, but after that we did not receive anything…Many of the other children in the militia were orphans, from broken homes, those who didn't attend school and those who were involved in gambling rings.[91]

107. He reported that every night he had to serve on guard duty and that there were seven other children working at his checkpoint.

108. In some cases youths were captured and beaten before being forced to take part in militia activities. Mundus de Jesus testified during his community reconciliation hearing in his aldeia of Caicassa (Maubara, Liquiçá) that, although he ran from the militia, the BMP militia caught him on 23 April 1999. He then joined because he was afraid he would be killed. He was 15 years old at the time and was given a gun.[92] The Commission also heard of other cases of forced recruitment of youths, for example in Covalima to the militia group Laksaur.

109. In another case, which also indicates the close cooperation between the TNI (Tentara Nasional Indonesia, Indonesian National Army) and the militias, the Commission heard from Santiago dos Santos Mendes. Santiago was a 17-year-old boy in Vaviquina (Maubara, Liquiçá) when he was beaten and then forced to guard a militia post before being sent home due to the severity of his injuries. He told the Commission:

> When my story happened I was 17 years old. On 8 April 1999, BMP [Besi Merah Putih] militia C7 beat, punched, slapped and kicked me in Lisalau, Maubara. After I was treated in this way I was taken to the town of Maubara but on foot. I walked while C7 [from] BMP followed by motorbike.
>
> When we reached Maubara, C7 told me to report to the Maubara Koramil, which I obeyed because I was threatened that I would be killed if I didn't report. When I got to the Maubara Koramil I was interrogated by a TNI member [Indonesian] C8. After I was interrogated, C8 ordered me to guard the BMP post.
>
> This didn't happen because there was a BMP member called Jorge who rejected the idea and said I was not allowed to do the watch because my condition was so bad - [I was] black and blue. So Jorge took me to my home in Pukulete [Maubara, Liquiçá]. I was at home for only two weeks because C7 then forced me to go to Atambua [Belu, West Timor]. I refused but C7 wanted to kill me and threatened me with a homemade weapon. So in the end I just did what he told me. This all happened because I was a clandestine member.[*]

110. Vasco told UNICEF that he was 14 years old when he was recruited by BMP in Maubara (Liquiçá) for eight months in 1999, one of 15 children in his group:

* HRVD Statement 05859. See also HRVD Statement 07239 in which a 15-year-old boy is repeatedly assaulted and submerged in water by Mahidi members in Nunumogue, Hato Builico, Ainaro and then forced to join overnight guard duty in the aldeia of Lelo-moo for one night before he was able to escape.

> The militia first came to my village in early January. When they came they beat many people and killed some people in my village. They told us that if we did not join them we would die. They said, "autonomy is the best", and that to stay with Indonesia is the right way, and if we followed CNRT [Conselho Nacional de Resistência Timorense, National Council of Timorese Resistance] or Falintil, they would kill us. We were so afraid and we had to join them or they said they would kill us. They said that if we did not do what they said, they would murder us. The commander came with a group of BMP militia. When the militia came my parents were very afraid and they said to me: "If the militia ask you do anything, just do it or they will kill us." They were afraid. My parents told me to hide at first, but later the militia found me. The first time the militia caught me in January, they said to me: "Now you are a militia!" They promised to give me money and rice and they gave it to me. Sometimes they gave me Rp250 [US2 cents] and 10 kg of rice.[93]

111. Girls were also forcibly recruited, sometimes being forced to cook for militia members. Verónica do Rosário reported to the Commission that she was 17 when she was detained with six friends in Umenoah (Cunha, Oecussi) in April 1999 by the Sakunar militia. The militia tortured her and forced her to cook for them for several days.[94] A child member of the ARMUI militia in Atabae, Bobonaro, told a researcher that about 20 girls were forced to cook for militia commanders.[95]

112. As late as 4 September 1999, the day the results of the referendum were announced, a 16-year-old boy, Feliciano Machado was reportedly forcibly recruited into Mahidi after being told that any young person who did not join would be killed. He was forced to guard a militia post and to burn houses in Beicala (Hatu Udo, Ainaro).[96]

113. Coercion also operated through families. The UN High Commissioner for Human Rights found that:

> Parents were threatened and bribed to coerce the young men, and the youths were harassed and intimidated into becoming members of the militia.[97]

114. Not all recruits were forced to join, however. Other motives included promised material rewards (though the promises were rarely kept) and in some cases the desire to escape from poverty or abuse at home. Some recruits also came from families who supported or benefited from the Indonesian occupation, including some who had family members killed by pro-independence groups.[98]

Activities

115. Once in the militia, children report participating in guard duty in villages and at checkpoints on the main roads, as well as in the widespread burning and killing of livestock. Vasco described his tasks as carrying messages, cooking, gathering information on the local CNRT, building a checkpoint and carrying wood. But he was also ordered to participate in more serious crimes:

The first time they took me from my house, we had to rape a woman and then kill anything we could find like animals and people. They ordered us to rape. We did this together. Everyday we were taken with them by car to burn houses, kill animals and harass people…They threatened me and told me that I had to kill people and rape women. They gave us training in how to use guns and knives, also how to attack and how to kill. We were given training at Kaekasain [Maubara, Liquiçá] at a house - the headquarters of BMP militia. An East Timorese militiaman was our teacher. We were also trained by the Indonesian military. Every week we were trained twice a week for two hours…If I cried in front of them, I would die. I would cry only in my home.[*]

116. Nine months before the referendum, Francis [pseudonym], 17, was recruited by ARMUI. UNICEF reports that his father had asked him to join ARMUI in December 1998, after the militia began systematically beating suspected independence supporters in his village. He was forced to take part in attacks on suspected clandestine members:

> I was forced to go from house to house and find members of a clandestine group. We found members of the Jesus Homen Salvador (JHS) clandestine group. We knew where they were because the militiamen had made lists of all the clandestine members in our village…When we found JHS members they beat them and demanded their lulik (a sacred object, in this case a red cloth belt). They took their lulik belts to the post and waited for the owners to come and get them, and then beat them again.[99]

117. Francis' stepfather was beaten and a friend from the JHS group was taken to the beach and killed after he was seen with a Timorese flag.

Child militia members killed or disappeared

118. The Commission has not received any reports of child militia members killed in Timor-Leste. However, some may have died in the refugee camps of West Timor, Indonesia. It was quite common for child militia members to be forced over the border with their militia commanders.[100] The Commission heard of at least one case where the child then disappeared. Alda Martins reported that her 17-year-old son, Agustinho Martins Trinidade, was forcibly recruited from Railaco (Ermera) by an Aitarak militia commander named C9 in 1999. C9 forced Agustinho to flee to Atambua with him but then returned home alone. Alda later heard from a third person that Agustinho died in Atambua but she was not told how.[101]

Impact

119. The greatest impact on child members of the militia is thought to relate to their emotional well-being. Not only have they experienced the usual trauma associated with witnessing and participating in violence, but they must now also suffer the lasting stigma that some members of the community attach to those seen to have been on the "wrong side". Many former militia members have not returned from West Timor because of the fear of retribution or ostracism. These fears are compounded by militia propaganda and continued coercion by militia leaders in the refugee population in West Timor.

* He later denied direct participation in the rape. UNICEF, p. 65.

120. Those who have returned also face serious challenges. While there have been few cases of violence against former militia, especially young rank-and-file members, the fear of social ostracism is well-founded. According to the UNICEF study:

> The radicalisation of pro-autonomy youth brought few positive effects. In some cases children were given a sense of community. However most of the effects were negative. Most children who joined the militias report feeling guilt and shame, and appear extremely traumatised by their experiences. Many also have been desensitised to committing extreme acts of violence. Most, like the pro-independence child soldiers, expressed distrust in authority, particularly government institutions.*

121. Venancio, a 16-year-old recruit from Liquiçá, told UNICEF:

> Often I had bad dreams that the militia would kill me. When I woke up I was afraid and felt depressed. The other young ones woke up after having bad dreams at the checkpoint too. I get headaches since I came back to Timor-Leste. I try to forget that time but sometimes the bad stories come back, so I try to do things to forget. Often I feel sad. Sometimes others at school accuse me of being a militia and this makes me very upset - I had to stay with the militia. Sometimes I think people are talking about me and I feel very sad. I am afraid that the militia will come back here.[102]

122. Similarly, Vasco told a UNICEF researcher:

> I had bad dreams and I woke up thinking that somebody wanted to kill me. Now I still wake up from bad dreams. I don't remember my dreams but I feel afraid when I wake up. At this time, I am still constantly afraid. Sometimes I change from feeling happy to feeling sad very quickly.[103]

Children in the clandestine network

> Five- to ten-year-old school children in our Homeland know as much as the adults about the subordination tactics of the enemy, of counter-information, of bribery and about the persecution of the clandestine

* UNICEF p. 19. A UNICEF official told a reporter: "Among the former militia youth, of the few who returned to their villages and towns, most have been ostracised and branded by their communities", Christine T. Tjandraningsih, "Child soldiers, the story behind East Timor's freedom", Kyodo (news agency), 13 September 2001, pp. 3.

organisation. These children, born during war, make war; a war that is not just of their parents, a war that is not just theirs - a war, a resistance, of an entire people against a foreign occupier.

Xanana Gusmão, "A History that Beats in the Maubere Soul: Message to Catholic Youth in Timor-Leste and Students in Indonesia", May 1986.[104]

123. One of the pillars of the Resistance against the Indonesian occupation was the Clandestine Front (Frente Clandestina). This underground network maintained links with Falintil, the Armed Front (Frente Armada), providing support and acting on their instructions. It also acted as a conduit between the Frente Armada and the Diplomatic Front (Frente Diplomatica) of activists working for independence overseas. In the beginning, the clandestine network worked simply through direct links between Falintil commanders and smaller groups. However, by the early 1990s, the clandestine movement was developing into a nationwide network and its activities had become more centrally organised.[*]

124. Children were involved in social and political activities during the years that Fretilin controlled territory and a sizeable part of the population, although these activities were not necessarily of a clandestine nature.[†] After the last of the Free Zones (Zonas Libertadas) were destroyed in 1979, the clandestine network began operating and involved children in its activities from the beginning. The main roles they played were as couriers (estafeta), spies and information dissemination. There was no clear distinction between these activities, and often a child would begin as an estafeta and later become involved in other clandestine activities.

How children became involved

125. The Commission has found no evidence that the Resistance had an explicit policy on the involvement of children in the network. Nevertheless, in practice children became involved because they could be useful. There was an assumption that children were less likely to be suspected by the Indonesian military than adults. The involvement of children was also seen as a necessary measure to ensure the continuity of the Resistance through what was expected to be a long, hard struggle (luta dura e prolongada).[105] According to the former Falintil chief-of-staff, Taur Matan Ruak (José Maria de Vasconcelos):

* CAVR Interview with Aitahan Matak (Antonio Tomás Amaral da Costa), Dili, December 2003; CAVR Interview with Francisco Guterres, Lú-Olo, Dili, 28 March 2003. Former Falintil commander Eli Foho Rai Boot (Cornelio Gama, L-7) described the development of the clandestine movement in the following terms: "And so from year to year, little by little, there were changes. This group was increasingly well known in each district. The reputation of this group in each district showed that the number of groups working for independence was growing, although each group in each district did not know of the existence of the others. But they had the same vision and mission, namely the way that the [Fronts] could support each other for the sake of the closeness of their relationship, for the sake of the single goal of independence." CAVR Interview with Eli Foho Rai Boot (Cornelio Gama, L-7), Former Deputy Commander Region III, Laga, Baucau, 9 April 2003.

† CAVR Interview with Virgilio Guterres Silva, Dili, 25 May 2004: "Those aged below 17 years were more likely to be involved in activities in the aldeia such as cultural activities. Those already in class 3 in primary school were recruited to give training in literacy, health and politics. This was handled by Manual e Programa Politicos Fretilin e Cartilha Política."

If we didn't prepare other people, and we died only partway through our journey, our struggle would end. If that was to be the case, what were we suffering now for?…It could be said that this strategy made many leaders aware of the fact that the next generation was the determining factor in the process of struggle. Victory or defeat depended on them. If we were successful in engaging the youth, we could say that victory was certain. If not, the struggle would weaken and we could not guarantee that it would continue. Therefore, the youth were a fundamental factor. To that end every Timorese family had a very important role to play, from the father, to the mother and the child, to make the family the nucleus of resistance.[106]

126. From the beginning, the Resistance used family relationships to approach children. For example, fathers, uncles and brothers in the forest contacted their young relatives to take messages or bring food. Before long, the search was extended through the Catholic Scouts (Escuteiros), Church youth groups in each parish, and other groups of young people.* With the formation of the National Council of the Maubere Resistance (Conselho Nacional da Resistencia Maubere, CNRM) in 1987, the role of clandestine youth was more formally recognised and the Executive Committee appointed a special person to deal with youth, including children.†

127. From 1988, increasing numbers of high school students became involved in the clandestine networks. Students in the Catholic, Portuguese language school in Balide, Dili, the Externato de São José, began organising and their movement spread through sporting events or through former students who had become teachers at other schools. Leaders of the intra-school student organisations (Organisasi Siswa Intra Sekolah, OSIS) often met with other youth organisations, discussing political issues at sporting events between schools. Eurico Guterres was an OSIS head and was a clandestine member at the time he was arrested in 1988; his successor as chair of the school OSIS, Ricardo da Costa Riberio, was also involved in clandestine activity.[107]

128. There is no indication that there were explicit efforts by Falintil to recruit students into the clandestine network. One student felt the impact of the occupation when his uncles were killed while he was in elementary school, and remembers fights in junior high school between Timorese and Indonesian students sparking nationalist feelings. But it was not until high school that he became formally involved with the clandestine movement after receiving a message from Falintil:

* Maria Teresa dos Santos was a former leader of the youth in Baucau and of Mudika (an official Church youth group established in the late 1980s). She states that much of the work of the group was carrying letters and raising money for Falintil by asking for church donations. Girls were chosen for this work over boys because it was harder for soldiers to search them. CAVR Interview with Maria Teresa dos Santos, Baucau, (undated). The Resistance also worked through another youth group, Sagrada Familia. It was already part of the clandestine network and so it did not have the same legal staus as that of Mudika.

† Each high school had its own OSIS (Organisasi Siswa Intra Sekolah, Inter-school Students Organisation) and clandestine groups tried to infiltrate each high school's OSIS group. As early as 1979 in Baucau, clandestine leaders establishing the network recognised the potential for church youth groups. According to Marito Reis, "At that time we planned to build a network through the church because we understood that the church had youth organisations." CAVR Interview with Marito Reis, Baucau, 17 November 2002.

I went to high school and there I met many of my friends who were involved in a kind of clandestine, underground movement. I started to feel that I had an obligation to contribute, something like to donate money to the forest. One of my relatives was in the military and we stole his uniforms and sent them to the forest to give to Falintil. I was about 14 or 15 years old… Actually at the time I didn't know much about the clandestine movement, but my friend got a letter from Falintil and he showed me the letter…There was a message from Falintil saying: "You are the future of this country. You have to study hard but you also must find ways to help us in the forest." So it inspired me to do something.[108]

Reasons for joining the Resistance

129. As mentioned above, children often became involved in clandestine activities through contact with family members who were living in the forest or were members of Falintil. Ricardo da Costa Ribeiro told the Commission that he began to contact his uncle in Falintil in 1984 at age 13 after he heard about Resistance figures from classmates and his priest, Father Locatelli. He describes his communications with his uncle:

I often had contact with my uncle, Rodak, who was in the forest, not through letters but through cassette recordings he sent me to listen to. I was 15 then and in my first year of junior high school, and he would always give me guidance on politics and the objectives of the Resistance. I was already becoming aware and knew exactly about this, because in the Fatumaca junior high school almost everyone was the child of a "GPK". Everyday we would ask each other: "Where is your father?" And everyone would say, "My father is in the forest", "My father has been killed by the Indonesian military."[109]

130. Experiencing or witnessing violations committed by the Indonesian military also encouraged children to join the clandestine network. For example, Naldo Gil da Costa told the Commission that he became active as an estafeta (courier) at 11 years of age when his father was executed by Indonesian soldiers after a Falintil attack on an ABRI post in Lospalos (Lautém) on 11 March 1985.[110]

131. Aquilina Imaculada explained that she became an estafeta through both her family relationships and negative experiences at the hands of the Indonesian military. She and her family were forced by ABRI to persuade other family members fighting with Falintil to surrender. After this led to the deaths of several members of her family, she said that she was instructed to become an estafeta by her uncle, Falintil Commander of Region I, Paulino Gama (Mauk Moruk) to assist her family.[111]

132. In the cases considered by the Commission, children joined the network voluntarily. No cases were received in which children say that they were forced to join, however, given that many children joined to help family members, they may have felt a sense of obligation or felt they could not refuse. There are some who were recruited by chance and their political awareness developed later. For example, Mateus da Costa was reportedly 17 when he had a chance meeting with Falintil members in 1983 while hunting in the forests near Ainaro. They persuaded him to work as an estafeta which then led to organising clandestine groups.[112] Other cases indicate that children were used without their clear consent or knowledge of the risks involved. Francisco da Silva Guterres from Becusi, Dili, told of the day that he was handed a letter to deliver by a stranger:

> He told me that I had to go and watch TV at the Koramil and there would be someone meeting me to pick up the letter. Before I left, he said, "You must dress according to what they had planned", which meant that I must wear a white uniform. That person placed an envelope in my back pocket to deliver to a person, whom I also didn't know, who would come that night to the Koramil when I and other people were watching television. The person who told me to do this instructed that when the person came: "You should not turn around to look. Do not do that." So I followed these instructions. And the person came and took the letter from my back pocket and took it away, and I never knew who it was that took the envelope.[113]

Impact

133. As earlier parts on killings, detention, torture and sexual violence reveal, there were enormous personal risks in becoming involved with the clandestine movement. The military, the police and other agencies targeted members of the clandestine movement to break their lines of support to the armed Resistance. They also wanted to get information on the networks, on the armed Resistance and on the location of Falintil leaders. Children were not treated exceptionally by the Indonesian authorities. Many cases of the abuse of child clandestine members are set out below.

134. Like children's involvement from a young age in the Indonesian military, those with active involvement in the clandestine networks also suffered disturbances to their education. Alexio Cobra stated that after the closure of the Externato de São José in Dili, a clandestine centre, some students who had been regularly detained decided to stop attending formal classes and to concentrate on the movement.[114] João Sarmento, who was studying at the Nossa Senhora de Fatima Seminary next to the school at the time, said he stayed away from school for six months because there were rumours that Externato and the surrounding schools were going to be attacked and closed down.[115]

Estafeta

135. The term estafeta was given to the couriers who carried information and correspondence for the Resistance. They also supplied food, medicine and other items to those living in the forest. As the above examples demonstrate, many children entered into the clandestine movement through working as an estafeta. Estafeta activities often depended on family connections and began soon after the invasion when guerrillas tried to communicate with their family members in areas controlled by Indonesia. For more information on the emergence of the clandestine front, see Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy.

136. Gregorio Saldanha stated that he was 13 when the conflict broke out and he fled with his family to Karau Maten, a mountainous region near Dili. They returned to Dili three months later after the Indonesians dropped pamphlets from the air that called on people to surrender. Francisco Lobo, Gregorio's eldest brother, continued as a guerrilla in the forest:

> We agreed that I would return to the city and my brother, Francisco Lobo, would stay on as a guerrilla. My uncle, Mau Tersa, who lived on the outskirts of the city, acted as an estafeta, delivering letters in and out…I myself would meet my big brother [Francisco Lobo] in the years 1977-1978…Their presence in the forest was a big motivation for us, knowing that the Resistance still existed, so throughout the 1980s I played an active part in the extensive and systematic clandestine network.[116]

137. As the clandestine movement became more organised and structured, it established formal, highly secretive information delivery systems, which were managed by estafeta. Naldo Gil da Costa described the work of an estafeta as follows:

> When I was an estafeta*, in my first days I was given directions on how to carry letters in and out of the town and forest. When encountering the enemy or soldiers on our way, we had to get rid of the letters we were carrying by swallowing them. We were trained by Falintil members who were given this special assignment by the Commander…I, as an* estafeta, was assigned to organise the caixa geral [general box, the centre for clandestine networks in a certain area] to deliver letters between Falintil members and those working as clandestine members in towns. I never gave any oral and written information to anyone for whom the information was not intended.[117]

138. Not all estafeta were children. However, there were tactical advantages to using children to carry out this work. Analysis of the statements taken by the Commission shows that the majority of violations committed by the Indonesian security apparatus were committed against those between 18-40 years old, suggesting that this group was the focus of their attention.

139. Children were less likely to be suspected. Aquilina Imaculada told of her experiences as an estafeta between 1990 and 1993 when children were being used to avoid suspicion:

> At that time, freedom of movement for adults was limited so us children were taught to play a role as contacts, although it was very risky because if others found out it could be fatal to the safety of our entire family. Because of that, we had to think creatively, to operate like mice in grass. If we came from one direction, we must return from another direction. We often stole time while drawing water…or collecting firewood or while we fed the cattle. Sometimes we went out at night and sometimes at dawn before people were awake.[118]

140. As the cases above demonstrate, working as an estafeta was often the first entry point into the clandestine movement and in many cases led to other clandestine activities. Ricardo Ribeiro, for example, went on to organise young people in both Sagrada Familia and youth groups. It was precisely because of the support that civilians gave their Falintil relatives that the Indonesian military began moving the families of Falintil members away from their home villages, and eventually to the island of Ataúro (Dili) in the early 1980s.[119]

Children as spies and lookouts

141. In the 1990s, adults involved in the clandestine front began to involve children as lookouts and as security for Falintil and Fretilin leaders when they entered towns.

142. Naldo Gil da Costa, a son of a pro-independence family, had tried to flee to the forest when his father was killed:

I wanted to run to the forest, but Larimau did not agree with my request and he suggested that because I was still small I needed to study while also finding a way to work for the Resistance.[*]

143. Later, he gained the trust of Resistance leaders, including Xanana Gusmão, and took part in organising the clandestine network in the Central Region (Região Centro). At the time Naldo was 14:

In 1990, Sabalae instructed me to organise a caixa [box/group] in Ponte Leste…In June 1991, I took Commander Xanana to Lospalos to meet with Falintil in Ponta Leste along with Sabalae, Inácio Bernardino [alias Adik, younger brother], Acacio Bernardino [alias Moris Nafatin, continue to live], Americo, and my older brother [alias Doben Hadomi Timor, darling loves Timor].[120]

144. A teacher from Ermera told the Commission how he instructed his own children to ensure the safety of Konis Santana when the Resistance leader stayed in his house in 1993:

In the beginning it was kept a secret from the children. But after Konis came to stay at our house, we had to teach the children to keep it a secret and we gave them the responsibility of acting as security guards. Their task was to guard the places that had clear views so that they could watch the situation clearly. They had to communicate with us using codes that we agreed beforehand, such as by coughing three times or shouting according to code.[121]

* Naldo Gil da Costa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004; Larimau was the clandestine name of a political cadre working with Falintil in Region 1 - Lospalos, Lautém.

145. Similarly, the children of Gil Araújo from Ainaro were given the task of entertaining Xanana as well as acting as lookouts. In Soibada (Manatuto), Bibrani organised his nephews and nieces to guard the hiding place of Francisco Guterres (Lú-Olo), Virgilio dos Anjos (Ular Rheik), Domingos Raul (Falur Rate Laek) and Americo Ximenes (Sabica Besi Kulit).[*]

Campaigning

146. The clandestine network was also involved in information dissemination on a community level to broaden support for the Resistance and on an international level to raise awareness of Timor-Leste. Campaigning was generally carried out by groups of young people, including high school and university students, as well as members of church youth groups such as Mudika. Some of the individuals mentioned above as estafeta were involved in setting up this aspect of clandestine work.

147. Aquilina Imaculada, for example, joined the clandestine network as an estafeta and later became a leading campaigner. In 1995, at the age of 17, she organised several clandestine groups in Baucau. Going by the clandestine name Peregrina, she was an intermediary between L-7 and the Sagrada Familia, which was one of the largest clandestine networks in Baucau. Peregrina then moved into organising "door-to-door" campaign activities among youth, women and the elderly. This campaign method was undertaken through secret discussions, often held at birthday parties or other gatherings to avoid suspicion.[122]

148. Gregório Saldanha, also an estafeta, later went on to become a leader of the clandestine youth organisation Ojetil, as well as becoming a member of the Executive Committee for Clandestine Affairs.

149. Visits by foreigners in the 1990s, although limited and closely supervised, provided new opportunities for campaigning. Public demonstrations, usually organised and attended by students and youth activists, began to be used as a tactic to attract international attention. The activists used techniques such as throwing stones, asking Indonesians nearby "When are you going home?", writing anti-integration graffiti or posting flyers and posters in public places.[123]

---

* See also, UNICEF, p. 44. One case study is Luis, aged ten when he joined the clandestine movement as an estafeta and spy: "I had to find information for Falintil. I had to listen to other people talking and report on this to my brother Fabio. When I did this I was afraid. I watched the houses of certain people. My brother asked me to go and do this and I told him what they said and did. There were no other youth who had this job in the village. I also brought water and vegetables to Falintil in the fields behind the village. I pretended that I was going to work in the fields. I did my clandestine duties after I had finished school in the day."

150. Between 1989 and 1999, the independence movement organised at least 60 demonstrations in Timor-Leste and Indonesia* Some demonstrations were spontaneous. Belchior Francisco Bento Alves Pereira told the Commission:

> On 17 March 1990, there was an incident near St. Paulus School in Dili. We didn't know what had happened, but in the morning when we came to school the flag and the rope [from the flagpole] had been stolen by someone. There was graffiti on the walls of our school. There was writing that integration was no good. We didn't pay attention to the writing and we continued on studying. Later, many "intels" [people associated with the Indonesian intelligence network, formal or informal] showed up around our school and so we reacted. We came out of the school and threw [things] at them. I was the first to start throwing. I was only 13 or 14 then.†

151. However, most demonstrations were carefully planned to coincide with international visits. Youth activists were often involved in planning or organising these actions‡ but in many cases they were guided by senior figures in the Resistance who sent instructions through the clandestine networks. Mateus dos Santos, for example, was involved in the activities of the Aleixo Cobra clandestine cell in the early 1990s and was given information and instructions through the network every time a demonstration was planned to take place.§

152. The largest demonstration during the occupation occurred on 12 November 1991. A demonstration had originally been planned to coincide with the visit of a Portuguese parliamentary delegation scheduled for early November, but their visit had been cancelled at the last minute. However, on the night of 28 October, a group of thugs, apparently backed by ABRI members, raided the Motael church and killed 18-year-old pro-independence activist Sebastião Gomes. A demonstration was then planned to follow a memorial mass that was to be held on 12 November two weeks after Sebastião's

* "Because the actions were quite open, the strategy could be called 'semi-clandestine', although these actions were planned by clandestine groups.", Vitorino dos Reis, interview with Gregório Saldanha, Talitakum Magazine, Vol. 38, 25 March–1 April 2002, pp. 24-25.

† Belchior Francisco Bento Alves Pereira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004. See Vol. III, Part 7.6: Political Trials. In another incident, a spontaneous demonstration began following comments by an Indonesian official at a junior high school (SMPN 4) on 17 March 1990. Carolino Soares, 15 at that time, remembers that the official said that, "if we couldn't even make a single matchstick, Timor-Leste could not be independent. The feeling in the school grounds of Junior High School 4 caused students to react by holding a demonstration. A moment later a Brimob unit came to the place of the incident. When the Brimob police arrived, students threw things at them. My cousin, Ana Maria Soares, was killed when the police shot her on the road near SMPN 4, Dili", HRVD Statement 00195-1.

‡ For example, the Catholic scout organisation, the Escuteiros, played a central role in the demonstration held in October 1989 at Tacitolu, Dili, during Pope John Paul II's visit to Timor-Leste. It was also the first major public demonstration since the invasion. Constancio Pinto and Matthew Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle, South End Press, USA, pp. 108-109.

§ CAVR Interview with Mateus dos Santos, Suai, Covalima, 31 October 2003; see also text box of Naldo Gil da Costa in the following section Arbitrary detentions, killings and sexual violence perpetrated against children (par. 189 ff). In August 1992, Xanana requested him to organise a demonstration in Dili to coincide with the Non-Aligned Block meeting in Jakarta scheduled for September 1992.

funeral and while the UN Special Rapporteur on Torture, Pieter Kooijmans, was visiting Dili.

153. João da Silva, a youth leader in Becora, Dili, at the time, recalls that, "all information about every aspect of preparation always went through the clandestine networks."[124] Constancio Pinto, from the Executive Committee of the Clandestine Front, recalls that Xanana Gusmão endorsed the demonstration, but it was clear that the Dili clandestine youth leaders were ready to organise their own action should there be no decision from above.

154. In the end, many children paid heavily for their involvement in what came to be known as the 12 November Massacre or Santa Cruz Massacre. From the 271 registered as having been killed at the Santa Cruz cemetery, 42 were under 17 years old, including some as young as ten years of age.[125] As explained in following sections, students were specifically targeted by the security forces after the massacre at the cemetery and the Externato de São José School was closed down the following year. In addition to raising the visibility of Timor-Leste internationally, the 12 November Massacre fostered even stronger nationalist sentiment among young people who had seen friends, classmates, brothers and sisters killed during and after the massacre.*

155. The important part played by students and youth in demonstrations can perhaps be explained by their greater willingness to be detained or take other personal risks for the cause. However, as can be seen in the Santa Cruz case, their involvement often had a heavy personal cost, ranging from expulsion from school, to detention, torture and even death. It is clear that the security apparatus saw demonstrations as a threat and the participants as a suitable target. A student who was 15 at the time recalls:

> I took part in a demonstration for the first time during the visit of the US ambassador...to Dili, specifically to Hotel Turismo, in 1990. After the demonstration we were chased by [Indonesian] security forces. I ran to the beach, where many demonstrators were beaten and arrested…I was wearing an SMP [junior high school] uniform, so I had to pretend that I was sitting on the beach taking off my shoes and playing in the water until I was sure the situation was safe.[126]

156. Alexandrino da Costa, who was 14 in 1991, was badly injured in the demonstration at Santa Cruz but took part in another demonstration in 1995. He was arrested by the police and the military and was threatened: "You're not afraid to die, you are still demonstrating?"[127] According to Xanana Gusmão:

> In the eyes of the Indo [sic] invaders, the youth then appeared to be the most dangerous segment of society.[128]

157. In following sections, the violations committed against children involved in the Resistance will be considered in greater detail.

* CAVR Interview with João Sarmento, Dili, 5 June 2004. João Sarmento, who was 16 at the time and 50 metres away from the cemetery when the shooting started, went on to help found the Timor-Leste Student Solidarity Council (Dewan Solidaritas Mahasiswa Timor Timur) which played an important role in the run-up to the Popular Consultation in August 1999.

Children in Falintil

158. Youths aged 17 and under joined Falintil and its militias from the time before the Indonesian invasion until just days before the Popular Consultation in August 1999. Children as young as 14 were recruited into the militia before the invasion and some of them were later enlisted as Falintil regulars. In 1976, some children as young as 13 reportedly joined Falintil but most child members were aged aged 15-18 years. This is not inconsistent with the first Additional Protocol to the Geneva Conventions* of 1977, which stipulates a minimum age of 15 years. A UNICEF study from 2000 found that most, but not all, child soldiers in Falintil were between the ages of 15 and 18.[129] Several of the youngest former child soldiers explained that they were first given less dangerous jobs, and then began taking part in military operations after a few years. Most child soldiers report being well treated.†

159. Children were among those soldiers who surrendered, or were captured or killed in the late 1970s, but there were also Falintil members who were recruited as children and continued to fight until Indonesia withdrew. As Falintil's strength in troops and weaponry shrank in the late 1970s, it is likely that the number of child soldiers declined. However, during the 1990s teenagers still occasionally joined Falintil, including members of the clandestine movement who fled the towns and villages after being targeted.

160. In addition to exposure to danger during combat, many of these youths experienced a variety of difficulties after their service. After surrender or capture they, like older Falintil members, commonly became victims of human rights violations. Those who were demobilised after lengthy service with Falintil could face problems adjusting to civilian life.

Recruitment

1975–1979

161. Even before the party conflict, young men, although not necessarily children, were involved in Fretilin through its village-level security organisation (Organização Popular de Segurança, OPS).‡ After UDT was defeated, Fretilin established militias, which,

* The 1977 Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions states: "The Parties to the conflict shall take all feasible measures in order that children who have not attained the age of fifteen years do not take a direct part in hostilities and, in particular, they shall refrain from recruiting them into their armed forces." (Protocol I, Art. 77). An Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Rights of the Child came into force in 2002, increasing the minimum age from 15 to 18 for soldiers taking a direct part in hostilities.

† The children in the UNICEF study, the majority in FDTL, explained that they were treated better by Falintil than by their own families. One said: "The commanders treated us very well. They helped us when we had to fight and they treated us better than our parents did." (p. 27). But there were also those who told of detention if they wanted to surrender or didn't follow the rules, see HRVD Statements 02160-01 and 04846-01. In 1977 one person recruited who was 16 years old was intending to surrender, but a Falintil commander [C10] gave the instruction to arrest him. He was tied up and detained for seven days in Gua Batu, HRVD Statement 02160-01. HRVD Statement 04846-01 describes how in 1977 a soldier aged 16 was arrested in Bemalae (Manufahi) by a Fretilin Commander, because he was accused of being ABRI intelligence. He was detained in an empty house without a roof under tight surveillance for a week.

‡ OPS was a security group at the community level that was founded by Fretilin before the invasion when the infiltration began, in order to guard the community.

especially in the run-up to the invasion, included boys under the age of 18, some of whom were under 15.

162. As a result of border infiltration by ABRI and the Partisans beginning in August 1975, Falintil began to organise militias on the instructions of the Fretilin Central Committee.* Recruitment into these militias was generally voluntary, but child recruits were not always made fully aware of the risks involved. One participant remembers that all people aged 14 and above were invited to join. Jaime Ribeiro was 17 years old at the time. He told the Commission that he fled from Bazartete (Liquiçá) to Tibar (Liquiçá) with his family and was recruited together with other youth into the Falintil militia:

> The security branch [Falintil] called us to receive weapons. But I didn't know what was happening…[They said] Now our country is safe and we are free. Starting from people aged 14-15 up to 18, if it was felt that we were able, we could join training to guard national security because we were already free.
>
> At that time we were militia, not soldiers! Recruitment had not even finished. On 7 December 1975 the Indonesian invasion happened. We didn't know - what were we supposed to do? Even the soldiers would shoot once and then run and hide because they didn't know what to do. This was a problem. Even the military police, but especially the militia, ran away and threw away their weapons.
>
> Before, I thought that fighting was a good thing. It turns out now we faced a war. If I knew, I definitely would not have wanted to receive a weapon and could have saved myself and my family.†

163. Like other members of the militias, Jaime Ribeiro went on to become a member of Falintil after the invasion. L-7 explained:

> From among the militia members, there were some who became Falintil after going through a selection process.[130]

164. Faustino Cardoso Gomes is another example of a militia member who went on to join Falintil. He told the Commission that he joined the militia at the time of the UDT coup on 11 August 1975, when he was 15 years old. He worked first as a typist recording

---

* "Fretilin already had an armed force (Falintil) and clear lines of command under Nicolau dos Reis Lobato and his deputy. And this was strengthened by the militias created by the Fretilin Central Committee. The militias at that time were formed by Camacho on a large scale across the entire territory of Timor-Leste which then became one of the forces in the defence of independence.", CAVR Interview with Eli Foho Rai Boot (Cornelio Gama, L-7), Laga, Baucau, 9 April 2003; see also Vol. I, Part 5: Resistance: Structure and Strategy; see also James Dunn, A People Betrayed, ABC Books, Sydney, 1996, pp.128, which shows young boys training with guns in the western region in October 1975.

† Jaime Ribeiro became famous as Samba Sembilan and held out as a Falintil fighter for 26 years until the formation of FDTL on 1 February 2001. "Samba" means fish because his movements were as slippery as a fish. "Sembilan" (nine) was the number which he was given after the shots from his gun succeeded in wounding or killing nine opponents in one military operation; Jaime Ribeiro, oral history, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 9.

the distribution of uniforms at a base in Taibessi (Dili). When Indonesia invaded, he went to the forest and served as a Falintil soldier for four years until his capture.[131]

165. After the invasion, Fretilin also recruited new members without experience in the militia, including children and young people.* From information given to the Commission, in general, new recruits were aged 15 and above. Manuel Alves Pereira Morreira remembered recruiting individuals who were aged 15 and over in 1976, when he was a deputy commander. He explained that recruitment was done on the instructions of Falintil leaders, including Hermenegildo Alves as the Deputy Minister of Defence and Chief-of-staff, and that it was voluntary.[132]

166. For example, recruitment of young people was carried out at Cailalui (Laleia, Manatuto) on 14 June 1976. Acccording to one person recruited at age 17, this recruitment was done on the direct instructions of the Regional Commander (Comandante Região, at that time Tomás Anucai), through the village head of Busa Kuak, (Laleia, Manatuto). Around 20 young people were recruited aged between 15 and 20 years.[133] Manuel dos Reis, who was 15 at the time, remembers:

> In 1975 I ran to the forest, until I reached a place called Fatululi. I received a weapon, a Mauser, to fight the war.[134]

167. However, the Commission has received a number of first-hand accounts from individuals who were recruited as soldiers by Falintil when they were not yet 15 and these children remember others their own age. Felix do Rosário was aged 13 when he was recruited in Alas (Manufahi). He told the Commission that many who evacuated to the forest with Falintil between 1976 and 1977 were recruited to fight. Anyone who was able to hold a weapon was recruited without regard to their age and many children were willing to join; there were many children aged 13 or 14 who became Falintil soldiers at that time.[135]

168. Constancio Pinto states that he joined Falintil in 1977, at age 13, with his parents' permission. His unit was mostly aged between 15 and 18 years old, and he knew other children as young as 12 who joined their brothers or fathers on the frontline. Young girls sometimes took food to the fighters but were rarely on the frontlines. He writes of his experience:

> It was not because I wanted to prove that I was no longer a young boy; at that time I already felt like a man. War makes young people become adults very quickly.[136]

169. Some of the younger recruits were given less dangerous jobs, although conditions meant that they were never completely excluded from combat. When Evaristo de Araújo, then about eight years old, came down from Mount Kablaki (Manufahi) with his family

* HRVD Statement 06942 describes a 16-year-old who became a soldier after fleeing the invasion: "I ran away to the forest in the area of Laclubar because I was afraid to face the Indonesian forces. In Laclubar, I received a weapon from the Fretilin commander to join in defending our land against the ABRI."

to look for food, he says that a member of Airborne Infantry Battalion (Lintas Udara, Linud) 100 shot him in the leg. He was saved by a member of Falintil and nursed for a year:

> In the afternoon Antonio de Araújo and Ernesto came and brought me medicine…After one year my leg was healed. We continued to fight on Kablaki and in 1977 the military started operations on Mount Kablaki. Then even I held a weapon and guarded the security post.[137]

170. In 1979, aged 16, Evaristo was shot again and captured.

171. There is a similar pattern in the UNICEF case studies from the 1980s in which the youngest soldiers were given less dangerous jobs but still occasionally took part in both offensive and defensive operations.

172. Those with skills were quickly promoted, regardless of age. Gabriel Ximenes was a 17-year-old literacy teacher who joined Falintil after the invasion:

> When the enemy entered the region of Ermera in 1976, I was 17 years old and with my family we evacuated to the forest around the area of Fatubessi. Then I joined the Fretilin forces, holding a weapon to fight the enemy. Not long after in 1977, the commander of the Ermera western central sector promoted me to platoon commander of the northern border area. I took that position and led a platoon with a strength of 100 weapons.[*]

173. While most former child guerrillas describe their participation as voluntary, one deponent reports that at 17 he was forcibly recruited in 1976:

> In 1975, when we ran to the forest and heard that the Indonesian forces had entered Timor-Leste, a friend of ours of the same age - he was already a commander - forced me to join with Fretilin as a night watchman. They ordered other Fretilin [members] to capture me to join as a Fretilin member. After that they brought me to the military barracks, then they gave a weapon to me and I became a member. I didn't know how to hold a weapon then, so I pressed [the trigger] while on watch and the weapon went off. They came and caught me and then punished me by tying me up from night until 4.00am the next day before they let me go. The people that caught me were from the Fretilin military command. They caught me in Nakroman [Lacluta, Viqueque]. They took back my weapon and gave it to someone else and then sent me to look for food.[†]

* CAVR Interview with Gabriel Ximenes, Ermera, 13 August 2003. He surrendered to Infantry Battalion 611 in 1979 with a large group after an intra-Fretilin conflict and spent several months in starvation conditions in Fatubessi and Ermera. After briefly being allowed to go home, he was detained by ABRI and Hansip members in a group of 100 men from Ermera, Sakoko and Ponilala and moved to the future site of the town of Gleno to clear the land for four years.

† HRVD Statement 04845. One community profile from Clalok, Welaluhu, Manufahi 10 February 2004 reports that in 1981 "children were arrested by Falintil to be used as guards but never came back."

174. The reorganisation that took place after the meeting of the the Fretilin Central Committee (CCF) at Soibada (Manatuto) in April-May 1976 had created three main forces: combat troops (Forças de Sector),and Self-Defence Troops (Força Auto Defesa, FAD) and forces armed in the traditional way (Armas Brancas, White Forces). The Commission did not receive any information that children were included in the concept of "people's defence" implemented by Fretilin from the zona down to the aldeia level. According to Virgilio Guterres, a former activist, Armas Brancas was to include all those aged 17 and over, both men and women, as part of the concept of "people's war".*

1980–1989

> When I first joined Falintil [in 1983] I saw many under-18s but many of them were killed and now there are only a few of us left.[138]

175. In the early 1980s, Falintil continued to recruit soldiers under the age of 18. The UNICEF study includes the case of 12-year-old Bersama, who was taken in by Falintil after his father, a clandestine leader, was killed in the forest by the Indonesian army. Commander Ular remembered: "There was no choice. We could not leave Bersama behind when we withdrew."[139] Bersama was given the job of writing first lists and inventories and later letters and histories of the war. After two years he also began to take part in combat operations:

> I did not hold arms when we first joined Falintil…Our job was to hide and not to fight. I officially joined Falintil in 1987 and before that I had carried a gun. Those who could use a gun were able to get arms from Falintil, and could also join Falintil. I was 14 the first time I held a gun. At the time, my father was sick so I had to take his place. My first gun was an FBP [a small rifle]. The other soldiers tried to get the gun back from me but I wouldn't give it to them and I told them that I really liked this gun!
>
> When I had to fight, I didn't go to the frontline because even though I loved to hold guns, I was scared, so I stayed in the rear and supported [them by] screaming and yelling…They asked the young people to hide when our group became caught up in fighting – but when the enemy became stronger than us, each had to find a way to save himself.[140]

176. There are indications that in the 1980s, when both its manpower and equipment were low, Falintil refused children who wanted to join up. According to Commander Ular, by the mid-1980s Falintil did not want as many young people joining its forces for three reasons:

* CAVR Interview with Virgilio Guterres Silva, Dili, 25 May 2004: "All people aged over 17, without considering gender or their situation in any way, were given night watch duty. Those given this duty were each individuals not families. Included in those given night watch duty were the Zone Secretary and Adjunto, people in the highest positions in the government and party structure. In one night, the watch was changed twice."

1. The strategy of guerrilla warfare then being pursued required small groups to be effective;
2. The urban youth were rarely strong enough to endure conditions in the mountains; and
3. It was more important to a future independent Timor-Leste that the children stay in school.[141]

177. As an illustrative example, Naldo Gil da Costa told the Commission that after Infantry Battalion 503 killed his father, José da Costa, on 3 March 1985, he tried to join Falintil without success:

> When I ran to the forest I met with Falintil Adjunto Larimau. I asked Larimau if I could stay with him, but Larimau said I was too young and needed to go to school to fight for the Resistance. But I still held the principle that I must work with Falintil for the sake of the independence of Timor-Leste.[142]

1990–1999

178. In the 1990s, there was increasing opposition to the Indonesian administration through public demonstrations, often organised or attended by East Timorese youth and student groups. The response by the Indonesian military caused many young people to flee to the forest. Some became soldiers, while others simply stayed with Falintil until they felt it was safe to return.[143] Julio José Exposto Gago was in the last year of secondary school in Hatolia, Ermera, when he took part in the Santa Cruz demonstration in Dili. On his return to Hatolia from Dili he was arrested and asked to explain his absence. He then fled to the forest. Julio José estimated that about 70 people joined Falintil as a result of the post-Santa Cruz crackdown; all except one were young people, although it is not clear how many were under 18.[144]

179. The UNICEF report on East Timorese children in armed conflict notes that Mausina was accepted as a soldier on 20 August 1999 at the age of 17 - the last recruit in Region II before the referendum. He was one of many youth who fled to Falintil areas as violence surged in 1999. He explains:

> I didn't think about becoming a Falintil soldier before I had joined the clandestine movement, but after working for the underground groups for some time, I decided that I wanted to. I already had contact with Falintil before I came to them. At that time I heard that Falintil needed youths to work with them and that was another good reason to join.[145]

Training

180. The amount and type of training provided to child soldiers in the Resistance varied markedly. Some former child soldiers report receiving training in both the militias and in Falintil. For example, Joaquim Simião says that after he was recruited in 1976

he met the Regional Commander and was given a weapon and training. He received combat training in how to use a weapon, how to run and how to hide. Afterwards he was immediately sent to fight in Manatuto. Joaquim explained that young people were recruited in order to take over from Falintil members who were considered to be too old.[146]

181. However, others say that the only training they received was gained through experience. Several of the former child soldiers interviewed for the UNICEF study stress that they had little training before their first combat experience:

> I didn't have any military training before. When I shot at the enemy for the first time, that was training for me…I was scared all the time when I first came to the forest but after one year I didn't feel fear any more because I thought even if we are afraid, there is nowhere for us to go. This is our land.[147]

> I didn't have any military training - the only training that I had was how to clean guns, pull them apart and put them back together. The only thing that I learnt from Falintil about fighting was "if you see [the] enemy shoot him. If you don't shoot him, you will be killed".[148]

182. Children also learned about politics and human rights from their commanders, including the protection of civilians. Felix do Rosário told the Commission that when he was recruited by Commander Manuel Adão in Labok (Alas, Manufahi) in 1977 at age 13, he received political instruction from a member of the Fretilin Central Committee. He was also given the opportunity to attend school to learn how to read and write.[149]

Risks involved in joining Falintil

183. Like all Falintil members, children were combatants and therefore legitimate military targets. They faced not just the risk of serious injury but also death, particularly in the early years. Their living conditions were extreme and no different from those of the adults they were with. One statement taken by the Commission tells of a soldier who was shot and killed accidentally by his own side at the time of the invasion.[150] Cisto Fernandes (Helio Espirito Santo) was recruited by Falintil headquarters at Bika Lari in Uatolari Sub-district (Viqueque, Zona 17 de Agusto) when he was 15 years old and from 1975 he joined military operations. He told the Commission that he was not forced to take part but rather was interested in Fretilin's political agenda. In 1978, his right arm was seriously injured when a grenade exploded prematurely. He was evacuated by Falintil and treated in Osoleru (Quelicai, Baucau).[151]

184. The risks following capture by the Indonesian army were considerable. These risks included execution, detention, subjection to physical and mental abuse and torture, and compulsory recruitment as a TBO.*

* For example, there is the earlier case of Faustino Cardoso Gomes who was made a TBO after he was captured fighting with Falintil. CAVR Interview with Faustino Cardoso Gomes, Dili, (undated).

185. There were also risks in surrendering. In one case, Marito dos Reis explained how on 1 November 1978 he surrendered in Hauba (Bobonaro, Bobonaro) after he had been detained by Fretilin for seven days on suspicion of planning to surrender. He was then arrested by ABRI and interrogated and beaten before he was taken to the Koramil in Bobonaro and detained for a further three months. After his release he became a TBO and joined an operation in Hedalau (Cailaco, Bobonaro). During the operation he was shot by Falintil, along with several other Timorese members of the Indonesian military, and seriously wounded.*

186. Felix do Rosário described how, following the destruction of the Resistance bases, the CCF and senior Falintil commanders, instructed Falintil and Fretilin members and the community still living in the forest, to take whatever steps they could to save themselves, including surrender. He surrendered to Hansip members on 13 September 1979 along with other guerrillas and was subsequently arrested. He was punished for his membership of Falintil by being forced to clean the streets of Same and work on the construction of the Ainaro-Alas road. He was also placed in a tank filled with dirty water and snakes. His punishment lasted for one year until the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) intervened on his behalf.[152]

Demobilisation and conversion to FDTL

187. It is not known how many of the 750 or so Falintil solidiers cantoned in Aileu in November 1999 were under 18. In 2001, Falintil was demobilised and the Timor-Leste Defence Force (Força Defesa de Timor-Leste, FDTL) was created, with a minimum age for recruits of 18. One former child soldier told UNICEF that:

> A good age to join the army is over 18 years old because new under-18 recruits are still just kids and they can't make their own decisions properly.[153]

188. Like former members of the clandestine movement, many members missed out on their schooling because of the time they spent in the forest. In his message to Catholic youth in Timor-Leste and Indonesia in May 1986, Xanana Gusmão refers to the guerrillas "many of whom are your age and have never sat on the school bench".[154] As a result, they now do not have the education or skills to find work in the newly independent Timor-Leste. Some may also have injuries from their time in the forest which limits the kind of work they can do. Annas Nasution's story is an example of this. He was a child clandestine member and from 1995 a member of Falintil. Although he then applied to join the FDTL, he was not selected. He now says:

> I have decided that I will live in Timor-Leste forever. But I still have doubts because I still do not have a proper place to live, even though I already have a family. I can't do heavy work now because I get sick a lot

* HRVD Statement 02160-01. HRVD Statement 03758 includes an incident in which the deponent, Antonio Maria, and a 15-year-old Falintil member, João, were captured in November 1979 in Haefu-Madabenu (Aileu) then tied up, beaten, burned with cigarettes and taken to be killed. When they reached the middle of the road the deponents tried to run away but were captured again together with civilians by ABRI.

> with cholera. With a situation like this, I often cry just thinking about it - sometimes until I am stressed…Everything is so difficult. I have tried applying for work all over the place, even as security, but the results are nil.[155]

Arbitrary detention, killings and sexual violence perpetrated against children

Arbitrary detention and torture

Introduction

189. Detention of children was undertaken by all sides to the political conflicts in Timor-Leste and over the entire period of the Commission's mandate.

190. The rules relating to arbitrary or unlawful arrest and detention and torture are closely examined in Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-treatment. Those rules apply also to children. However, as noted above with regard to children, the parties were obliged to provide additional protection to children under both international law and, in the case of Indonesia, domestic law. Most of these protections were of a general nature, requiring, for example, that children be treated humanely in all situations and that their rights to life, liberty and security of person should be respected. As far as arrest, detention and torture were concerned, the parties' obligations towards children were the same as for adults. However, as a result of its ratification of the Convention on the Rights of the Child on 5 September 1990, Indonesia did take on additional obligations with regard to the detention of children.

191. Thus, when considering depriving a child of liberty, Indonesia was bound to bear in mind the best interests of the child as a primary consideration in its actions (Article 3(1)). Indonesia's obligation under Article 37 of the Convention was to ensure that no child was deprived of his or her liberty unlawfully or arbitrarily. The arrest, detention or imprisonment of a child had to have been in conformity with the law and only as a measure of last resort and for the shortest appropriate period of time. Every child deprived of liberty had to be treated with humanity and respect because of the inherent dignity of the human person, and in a manner which takes into account the needs of persons of his or her age. More generally, under Article 38, Indonesia was obliged to "take all feasible measures to ensure protection and care of children who are affected by an armed conflict". Under Article 39, Indonesia was bound to assist the physical and psychological recovery and social reintegration of child victims of conflict, rather than exacerbating their situation through arrest, detention or torture.

Patterns of detention of minors

192. During the internal party conflict both UDT and Fretilin detained young supporters of the opposing side, as well as under-age family members of such supporters. Of those detentions of minors reported to the Commission, 2.9% (42/1,426) were attributed to UDT whereas 11.3% (161/1,426) were attributed to Fretilin and Falintil forces. Those figures include the period 1975-1979, when Fretilin had control of parts of the territory and population. During this period Fretilin detained children, both alone and with family members, for infractions of Fretilin rules or on suspicion of collaborating with the Indonesian authorities.

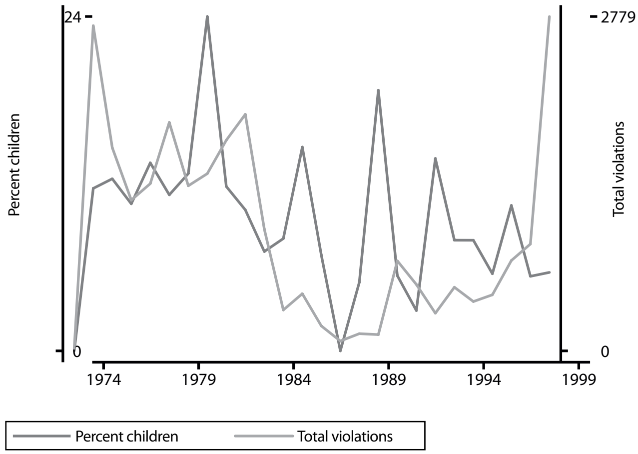
193. The Indonesian authorities were responsible for the vast majority of reported cases of the arrest and detention of minors. Of those detentions of minors reported to the Commission, 73% (1,043/1,426) were attributed to the Indonesian military. They generally detained children for one of two reasons: because they or their family were suspected of having contact with Fretilin/Falintil members still in the forest; or particularly in later years as a result of their involvement in clandestine activities.

194. The Commission received very few reports of the torture of minors by either UDT or Fretilin, although children were often kept in very harsh conditions. The Indonesian authorities, however, used torture and mistreatment regularly in their dealings with children throughout the occupation.

195. In the Commission's quantitative analysis of narrative reports of arbitrary detention, 45.1% (38,910/86,263) of cases record the age of the victim. There were 1,426 clear cases of arbitrary detention of a minor. The figure below shows a large number of detentions of children throughout the late 1970s, reaching a peak for both boys and girls in 1981.* This peak reflects the rise in statement-collection about the detention of whole families on Ataúro, which began in that period.† Reported violations fall to low levels after 1981, with smaller peaks in 1986 and 1991, before increasing again in 1997–1998, and finally returning to 1970s levels in 1999.

Arbitrary detentions of children over time, 1974–1999

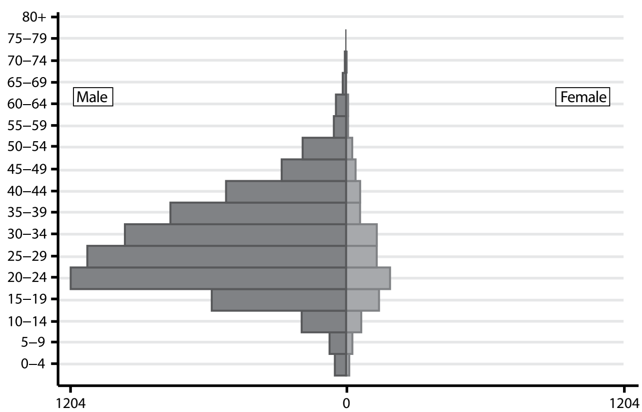


Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

* Detentions for the general population peak in 1982 after the attack on Mau Chiga and there is a less pronounced peak in 1980 after the fall of Matebian.

† The peak in 1981 could be related to Operation Keamanan or may simply be an artifact of data collection.

196. The majority of detentions of minors occurred between 1975 and 1983 and in 1999, as can be seen in the figure below. Whereas, torture of minors is predominantly concentrated in 1999.



Torture of children over time, 1974–1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

197. Of the children detained, children in their teenage years were the most frequently reported victims documented by the Commission. As the figure below shows, by far the largest age-category of victims of detention were in the 20-24-year age group and persons aged between 15 and 19 years were only the fifth largest age category of victims.

Number of reported acts of detention, by age and sex, 1974–1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

Note: 47.8% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

198. Children (persons aged 17 and under) account for 5.2% (577/11,135) of torture cases and 5.6% (1,426/25,383) of arbitrary detention and kidnapping incidents.* Most members of this group are aged between 12 and 17 years (three-quarters of under-age torture victims and two-thirds of under-age detentions fall into this age group). The average age of detainees across the 1,426 reported cases of child victims of detention is 12, the median age is 14.†

199. Males make up the large majority of victims in both categories and the age distribution of male victims, therefore, more or less mirrors the overall age distribution of all under-age torture victims and under-age persons held in detention. As in the case of killings, female victims are slightly younger than their male counterparts in both categories, with children accounting for 12% (108/857) of all female torture victims and 11.6% (408/3,521) of female detention victims, again mostly in the 12-17-year range. In the case of detention of females, girls aged 12-17 years are the fourth largest group, behind the three groups in the 18-35-year range.‡

200. Dili reports the highest incidence of under-age arbitrary detentions accounting for 18.0% (257/1,426) of under-age detentions, followed by Bobonaro 14.0% (203/1,426), Lautém 13.3% (189/1,426) and Baucau 11.2% (160/1,426).

Detentions by the Indonesian authorities

1975–1979

201. In the first years after the Indonesian invasion, the Indonesian authorities detained children for a variety of reasons, but usually with their families. Many of the cases of child detention reported to the Commission from this period relate to the concentration of recently captured or surrendered civilians to isolate them from those still in the forest.

202. The vast majority of people, including children, who surrendered or were captured in this period were held in various types of camps where they were subject to numerous restrictions on their freedom of movement (described in detail in Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). However, some, including children, were separated from others who surrendered and were placed in detention centres. In one such case, Pedro Alexandre Belo reported that, as a 16-year-old, ABRI captured him and seven of his family members in the forest on 11 August 1976. They were detained at the former Hotel Flamboyan in Baucau. Pedro was tortured for several weeks and then held for a further six months.[156] Damião da Silveiro from Lupal (Lolotoe, Bobonaro) reported to the Commission that when he was 12 years old, he was arrested with a large group on 7

* Many entries in the database have incomplete or missing information on ages and are not included in this analysis.

† These statistics are based on data from the CAVR's Human Rights Violation Database (HRVD).

‡ Romesh Silva, Sex-Age Distributions of Victims of Reported Human Rights Violations, CAVR HRVD, 21 May 2004. These frequency distributions show only age-sex distributions for victims for whom age information was reported to the Commission as part of its statement-taking process. Reported age for each victim was deduced from the actual age reported to the Commission statement-taker or, if this was not transcribed/coded into the HRVD, from the victims reported birthdate and violation date information.

May 1978 by Infantry Battalion 131. He was held for seven months at Lolotoe Koramil (Bobonaro) where he was forced to work on the construction of a building.[157] Igidio Corte Real, was 16 years old when he surrendered in Letefoho (Same, Manufahi) on 25 August 1979. He was detained by an ABRI member and three members of Hansip for 14 days and beaten.[158]

203. As already noted, child guerrillas were among those detained and tortured after surrendering. In one case, José da Conceicão Carvalho, a 15-year-old Falintil member, surrendered in Dili in 1977. He was detained for 12 days by two members of ABRI intelligence, C11 (Indonesian) and C12 (East Timorese), because he did not bring his weapon with him. He was released after revealing its location.[159]

204. Apart from children detained in the context of surrender or capture, other children were detained when family members were arrested in this period. Sonia, a 1-year-old child from Quelicai (Baucau) was detained with her mother, Domingas Morreira, on 1 November 1976. They were held in the Flamboyan in Baucau town for one week in a dark cell before being interrogated about Domingas's activities in the forest. They were finally released on 4 May 1978 with orders to report weekly.[160]

205. Indonesian authorities killed at least one child in detention in this period: Jaquiel da Costa Ximenes reported that a four-year-old, Joaquim Ximenes, from a family of seven, was detained in Afaça (Quelicai, Baucau) on 14 April 1979. According to Jaquiel, Joaquim was beaten to death in detention by members of Infantry Battalion 321 and Sukarelawan (The Volunteers, a force made up of Timorese ex-partisans).[161]

206. In other cases, adults with whom children were arrested were killed in detention, after which the children were either kept in detention or released. José Pereira reported that in 1976 when he was aged 12 and living in Babulu (Same, Manufahi), he was called with five adults to help load rice at the Same Kodim. On arrival, they were accused of working with Fretilin and the five adults were executed. José was detained in a cell at the Kodim for nine months where he was threatened, questioned and forced to work on the grounds of the military base.[162] Duarte Ximenes reported that in 1979, a ten-year-old, Domingos Ximenes, was captured by ABRI in Tequinomata (Laga, Baucau) with his father. The military took them to Quelicai (Baucau). The father was killed and Domingos was later returned to his family.[163]

207. Children were also detained for the purpose of gathering information about others. Juliana de Jesus told the Commission how on 20 October 1979, when she was 11, the military detained her twice at the Infantry Battalion 745 post at Liurai, Fuiluro (Lospalos, Lautém) with her sister and another male child. They were interrogated about a local man's alleged contact with his son, a member of Falintil.[164]

208. Indonesian authorities arrested whole families on suspicion of helping Falintil or during the search for information about the guerrillas and the developing clandestine networks. Isabel dos Santos Neves testified that she was arrested in Maubisse (Ainaro) in 1979, when she was aged 16, because her brother was known to be a member of Fretilin still living in the forest:

I was arrested with my older brother. When we were interrogated we were beaten and two of my younger siblings, still small children, were forced to confess to Fretilin being in the forest. My older brother was taken away at night by the military. In the morning a member of Hansip who witnessed the killing of my brother told my father that my brother had already been killed by the military. The Hansip only had [my brother's] ring and hat to show to us. When he heard this my father was silent, but he always said that it was a consequence of war.[165]

1980–1988

209. As late as 1981, children were still being detained after capture in the forest. However, most incidents of the detention of minors in this period occurred as part of a broader response to uprisings or because the child was suspected of having contact with Falintil. The most common form of detention during these years was the transfer of whole families to the island of Ataúro (Dili) to separate them from relatives still in the forest. While public demonstrations of support for independence had not yet begun, clandestine groups were becoming more widespread and sophisticated. Indonesian attempts to control them also led to the detention and sometimes torture of young members of these networks.

210. By the early 1980s, Indonesian counter-insurgency tactics mainly took the forms of crack-downs in response to specific resistance activities and measures to close down sources of material, information and political support for the guerrillas, particularly the developing clandestine networks in the towns.

211. Following the Falintil attack on the broadcasting station at Marabia and the Infantry Battalion 744 arsenal in Becora, Dili on 10 June 1980, at least two teenagers were detained for short periods. Luis de Jesus, 14 years old at the time, reported that he was arrested on 10 June 1980 and held briefly in the Becora Koramil before being transferred to the Comarca prison in Dili.[166] Alberto de Deus Maia, 11 at the time, reported that Infantry Battalion 744 and Mobile Police Brigade (Brigade Mobil, Brimob) arrested him on 11 June 1980 and held him in Balibar, just south of Dili, where he was forced to haul water.[167]

212. Adelino Araújo was detained and tortured along with many others after the uprising (levantamento) in August 1982 in Mau Chiga, (Hato Builico, Ainaro). This military crackdown encompassed a wide range of human rights violations:

At the time of the uprising of 20 August 1982, in Mau Chiga [Hato Builico, Ainaro], I was 14 years old. This leader's movement or revolt brought Fretilin activity back to life. In the uprising many people were killed by the military. Because I was still a child the military took me prisoner [in the Hato Builico Koramil]. I was tied up and beaten until I had no more life in me. I was burnt with cigarette butts and I could only hang on and cry. I saw how the army raped the women that were there [in the courtyard at the Mau Chiga village office].[168]

213. Sometimes challenges to Indonesian rule during this period resulted in the collective punishment of whole communities, including the detention and torture of children. Residents of Porlamano, Mehara (Tutuala, Lautém) reported that in 1983, after Hansip and youths ran off to the forest, members of Infantry Battalion 641 detained and tortured their wives, children and female relatives at the military post. Another aldeia in the village reported that, in the same year, soldiers from Infantry Battalions 745, 321, 641 and Airborne Infantry Battalion 100 forced children aged 15 and older to gather in an open field where they were tortured and submerged in water.[169]

214. Clandestine activity in the 1980s was often based on family ties and the Indonesian authorities used arrests and detentions to disrupt these lines of support. Francisco Soares told how in 1982 he was 14 years old and suspected of bringing food to his father in the forest. He was arrested by a Hansip member called C13 on the orders of Koramil Commander Rifai (Indonesian), C108 (member of the Indonesian legislative body) and C15, the Hansip commander. He was brought to the Koramil in Iliomar for questioning. He was released after a week, with the requirement that he report for one year. The family was later moved to Ataúro for one year because the father refused to surrender.[170]

215. In an attempt to separate Falintil troops from their family members thought to be supporting them, thousands of people were sent to Ataúro in the early 1980s.[*] The spike in the graph above of under-age detentions in the 1980s can largely be attributed to this policy.

216. Some children sent to Ataúro were separated from their parents or had already been orphaned (see text box below), though most went with their families:

> My name is Rosalina José da Costa and I was brought with my parents to Ataúro because when we were in Viqueque we always gave food to Fretilin in the forest. We were found out by the military and so my family was moved to Ataúro as prisoners. I was just ten years old. We were taken by an ABRI car to Laga and then went by army boat, number 509. It wasn't just us, there were other families with their children. When we arrived on Ataúro as prisoners it was really hard to find food and many people died of disease, especially children. Every day at least one, sometimes up to seven, children died.[171]

217. Others lost their parents on the island, including Mario Correia, who told the Commission that, when he was 12, his parents died of starvation; it was another two-and-a-half years before the rest of the family was allowed to return home.[172]

218. Individuals suspected of clandestine activity were also sent to Ataúro and some of these were teenagers. Armando de Jesus Barreto reported that Kopassandha arrested him in West Dili on 10 June 1980 when he was 17 years old. He was held at the Comarca Balide Prison, tortured at the sub-regional Command (Korem) headquarters and then sent to Ataúro for four years.[173]

* The 1982 Korem instruction manual suggests those in Falintil's support network should be transferred to Ataúro: "In this way we can cut ties between the support networks in the settlement and the Nureps"; ABRI, "Petunjuk Tehnis tentang Kegiatan Babinsa" ["Instruction Manual: Village Guidance Officer/TDP Activity in developing and phasing out Trained People's Resistance Forces"], Juknis /06/IV/1982, (Korem 164, Wira Dharma, Intelligence Section, Williem da Costa [Chief of Intelligence]) translated in Budiardjo and Liong, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, pp.181.

A child on Ataúro

Joana Pereira was detained on Ataúro from 1 September 1981 until November 1982. In 1978, Joana's parents had died in the forest and Joana and her younger brother, Mateus Pereira, surrendered to the Indonesian military. They lived with their older siblings in Lacolio (Quelicai, Baucau). Meanwhile, their older brother, Pascoal Pereira, was a member of Falintil in the forest under the nom de guerre Nixon.

According to Joana, on 29 August 1981, when she was 13, the Quelicai Koramil announced to the community that people with family members in the forest would be punished. Some plywood was placed in front of the village office on which was written the names of people to be punished on Ataúro. Joana and Mateus's names were on the list. Mateus was only nine years old.

On 30 August 1981, Quelicai Koramil transported the prisoners in four trucks to the Laga harbour. The next day, around 7.00 in the morning, all prisoners who had been gathered from Seiçal, Buibau, Quelicai and Laga, were transported by war ship 502 to Dili. The war ship arrived in Dili at around 7.00 at night. On 1 September 1981, at 8.00 in the morning, the prisoners left for Ataúro by war ship 511.

They arrived on Ataúro at midday. They were met by prisoners already on the island who unloaded the boat. Newly arrived prisoners, after their names were checked one-by-one, were each taken to individual places of punishment. Joana was placed in house No. 22 along with 60 people, while Mateus was put in house No. 24 with 70 other detainees.

The prisoners received no food on their arrival on Ataúro. Joana and Mateus had only the food that they brought with them from Quelicai. After a month, each family received three cans of corn from ABRI, twice a month. Because of the hunger, some people stole papaya and cassava from the fields of the local population. But many people died, especially children and the elderly. Joana remembers mainly detainees from Los Palos and Viqueque dying. Each day, between two and five people died.

The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) was allowed to visit Ataúro in 1982 and gave food aid such as rice, green beans, soybeans, dried fish, sugar, salt and canned fish. The ICRC aid allowed the prisoners to hold on to life and nobody else died after they came.

In October 1982, Eduardo Freitas's brother visited Ataúro. After he returned to Dili, he reported to the Kodim. In November 1982, Joana was brought home to Dili by boat. She lived with her uncle Paulo in Fomento (Comoro, Dili) and had to report to the police every day. Mateus had been brought to Dili earlier and lived at the Motael Orphanage.[174]

219. The purpose of the arrest of some children was to obtain information about their relatives. Aida Maria dos Anjos was 14 years old in 1983 when she was interrogated in Viqueque about the whereabouts of her brother, Virgilio dos Anjos (Ular), one of the organisers of the Kraras levantamento:

> In the interrogation [special forces] forced me to give them information about the whereabouts of Commander Ular. The interrogation was always done by five members of [special forces]. C16 was the administrator of Viqueque Sub-district while C17 was the secretary of the entire Viqueque District. They actively attended every one of my interrogations.[175]

220. As the clandestine networks developed, children were detained and sometimes tortured as a consequence of their own activities, rather than their family ties. In 1982, a 14-year-old was detained in Ainaro on suspicion of making contact with Falintil and then tortured:

> In 1982, I, Pedro dos Santos, was a young person involved in carrying out clandestine activities with Falintil. Because of that, one day (I forget the date) a member of "intel", C18, came to the house and took me to the aldeia of Tatiri [Hato Builico, Ainaro]. When we arrived, C18 tied my feet and hands with plastic cable and hung me from the roof of the house. He then beat me with a stick for two hours, making my whole body swell up. The next morning C18 took me to Dare, Mau Chiga [Hato Builico, Ainaro]. *I was detained there for two days. Then C18 took me for detention in Kasi Satu, Ainaro. Because I didn't give him any answers, I was slapped twice across the face and then given electric shocks on my thumbs and ears for half-an-hour. This has damaged my hearing now…After that I was held with a lot of people whom I did not know for four months.

221. In August 1983, as part of the crackdown after the Kraras uprising, several young girls were among those detained in Viqueque. Adelgisa Ximenes, who was 14 years old at the time and active in a clandestine network, was held for six months

* HRVD Statement 07180. In a similar case five years earlier, an 11-year-old suspected of providing supplies to Fretilin was among a group of 11 detained and tortured by Special Forces Command (Komando Pasukan Khusus, Kopassus) at Sang Tai Hoo (a former Chinese shop which was used by the Indonesian military as a place of torture) in August 1977. She was then sent to an unlit cell in Balide Prison and then held in a regular cell for six months, HRVD Statement 05679.

and interrogated by the Kodim Commander, Major C20. She and her friends were arrested without their parents' knowledge on 7 August 1983 on suspicion of working with Fretilin in the forest. She was interrogated by the military, sometimes until the early hours of the morning, and threatened that she would be killed if she did not tell the truth.[176]

222. Children were also detained for violation of the strict controls on civilian life at the time. Maria Amaral from Tutuloro (Same, Manufahi) reported that in 1983, when she was 15 years old, she was one of a group of people detained and tortured by ABRI at the Manufahi Kodim for one week. They were arrested because they had left to work in the family's garden without a travel permit and so were suspected of assisting Falintil.[177]

223. From late 1983, Indonesian authorities began to charge and bring to trial some political detainees. However, this mechanism does not seem to have been used extensively with children in detention; of the 267 political trials identified through court records from the first and busiest four years of prosecutions (1983-1987), only two were of minors.* Both were convicted of treason.†

224. Detention and torture were also used by the Indonesian authorities to recruit informants and paramilitaries. Lucas da Silva reported that in 1986, when he was 17 years old, he was among a group of four detained by two special forces members, one of whom was called C21, a Sergeant-Major (Serka). They were detained and tortured at the house of the neighbourhood chief in Venilale (Baucau). The four were taken to Uatuhaco (Venilale, Baucau) where they were questioned while being choked with a chain and given electric shocks. In the end, they were forced to become informants, and after three years, were recruited to Team Sera, an early militia group.[178] More famously, Eurico Guterres was a 19-year-old high school student in 1988 when he was arrested for membership in the quasi-religious, clandestine group, Santo Antonio. He was sentenced to four months imprisonment for membership of an illegal group. In the 1990s, he joined the Youth Guard Upholders of Integration (Garda Muda Penegak Integrasi, Gadapaksi). He gained notoriety in 1999 as the commander of the Dili-based militia, Aitarak, and deputy commander of the militia umbrella organisation, Defence Force for Integration (Pasukan Pembela Integrasi, PPI).

---

* It is also possible that this number is small because from 1983 trials of minors were conducted differently to those of adults. This included the Court being closed during the trial and the records of these cases, like many other court records, may have been lost. See the Regulations of the Ministry of Justice, Number M.06-UM>01 Year 1983, Indonesia. for more information about the procedure and the court.

† However, according to one statement, legal mechanisms were eventually used in the case of under-age members of a clandestine group. On 2 February 1986 in Baucau, two 15-year-olds in a clandestine group were arrested after one member was accidentally shot by Falintil and then captured by ABRI. They were held first in the Kopassus Post in Baucau where they were given shocks to the hands, ears and nose, stripped naked, and beaten for one week. They were then taken to Balide Prison in Dili where they were held for one month, some of that time in a darkened cell. They were then brought to the office of the Department of Social and Political Affairs (Sospol) where they were interrogated for one day. After that they were then taken to court and sentenced to one year's imprisonment. HRVD Statement 4199.

1989–1998

225. With the limited opening of Timor-Leste to outsiders in 1989, the independence movement began to use public demonstrations against the occupation as a form of resistance. This method relied heavily on the involvement of students. Demonstrations were usually followed, in some cases preceded, by the arrest of suspected organisers.

226. In October 1990, international human rights organisations reported over 100 arrests. Many of those arrested were secondary school students detained for short periods, and tortured. The methods of torture used included electric shocks, burning with lit cigarettes, and severe beatings. The arrests followed the assault of an Indonesian soldier by East Timorese youths, the taunting of an Indonesian official at a junior high school, and the appearance of anti-Indonesian graffiti on the walls of the Externato de São José.[179] Belchior Francisco Bento Alves Pereira told the Commission how he was detained and tortured at the Joint Intelligence Force (Satuan Gabungan Intelijen, SGI) house in Colmera, Dili, in 1990 because he was involved in the St. Paulus case (see par. 123 ff, children in the clandestine network, above) He spent four years in Balide Prison, Dili, before being released in 1995.

227. Students were especially targeted in the crackdown that followed the Santa Cruz Massacre. Mateus dos Santos was involved in clandestine activities at this time and was informed by the network every time a demonstration was to be held. He remembers the Indonesian military heading straight to senior high schools after the massacre to identify the demonstrators:

> When we heard the shooting, we went back to school but ABRI had already surrounded the school grounds with their Hino cars parked in front of every doorway. Those wearing uniforms were members of the BTT [Territorial Combat Battalion]. They were from Java and had taken over from [Infantry Battalion] 508. I don't remember their number.[*] We were surrounded and the school was closed. They already knew, knew exactly. They were scared of a riot so they checked the school attendance list. That was an order to the teachers, they told me personally. After they came to the school, [Special Forces (part of Kopassus)] intelligence and police intelligence were ordered to keep an eye on all of the people that hadn't been to school on that day, 12 November 1991.[†]

228. Recognising the threat posed by these actions, the Indonesian authorities carried out pre-emptive detentions connected to foreign visits or suspected demonstrations (see box below). João Baptista Monis reported that in March 1992, at the age of 15, he was detained in Dili along with a friend. Both had participated in the Santa Cruz demonstration. Intelligence agents took them first to the Caicoli village office then to the

* CAVR research suggests that the battalion may have been Infantry Battalion 516.

† CAVR Interview with Mateus dos Santos, Dili, 31 October 2003; see also HRVD Statement 02726 of a 16-year-old detained for 3 months after Santa Cruz.

Dili Kodim and finally to Taibesi where there were many other detainees being punched and kicked by soldiers.[180]

229. Naldo Gil da Costa told the Commission at the National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict about his arrest and torture in advance of a planned demonstration when he was 16 years old:

The testimony of Naldo Gil da Costa

On 28 August 1992, Xanana sent a letter and a cassette telling us to organise a demonstration in Dili to coincide with the High-Level Conference of Non-aligned Nations in Jakarta, from 3-6 September. The demonstration was to protest the Santa Cruz incident. We explored the possibility of doing this but we were too closely monitored by intelligence (SGI). We wrote to Xanana saying it would not be possible to hold a demonstration. However this caused a lot of fighting amongst the youth. Some of them said that because Commander Xanana had ordered it we must have the demonstration. So in the end there were about 20 of us who went ahead.

However, in the end all 20 of us were captured by the SGI. I was chased and caught. They handcuffed me, blindfolded me and beat me incessantly. They stuck a pistol into my mouth and tortured me until I was about to collapse. Then they threw me into a car and took me to the SGI in Farol. In Farol I was blindfolded and my hands were handcuffed. My feet were tied to a chair and an SGI officer beat me with an iron rod. My entire body was given electrical shocks. C108 and his ten men interrogated me. I remained silent which made him angry. He taunted me, saying over and over again "Hey whore-child, where do you come from?" All the while I was beaten and beaten. Our bones were broken and blood flowed from our wounds.

On 6 September two soldiers and four civilians took me to the primary school building in Tacitolu. They stripped me naked and tied me to a car. I was dragged behind the car for about 200 meters. I was taken to Fatuk, Dili, which was a place where they killed people. They forced me to dig my own grave and get into it. They told me to pray as I was about to be killed. Then, just as they were about to shoot me dead, one of the soldiers suddenly said, "If we shoot this child we won't go to heaven. This child is innocent. We should let him live." They pulled me out of the hole and instead of killing me the SGI beat me with a crowbar and shovel and tortured me all the way from Tacitolu to the SGI Colmera office.

I was held at the SGI for one week where I was beaten and interrogated. Then I was moved to Balide Prison with some other prisoners. At the Balide Prison we were handcuffed and then kicked and beaten by 50 soldiers. Then our handcuffs were released and we were put into cells. The cell had a toilet which was full and overflowing with human faeces and urine. It completely filled the toilet and covered the floor. As well as that we were all naked. One of the other prisoners, Marcos, and I laughed at ourselves as we sat naked in the shit covering the floor. On 16 September 1992, soldiers from Battalion 745 in Lospalos took Marcos from the cell and he has not been seen since.

230. Alexandrino da Costa told the Commission about his arrest and detention after a demonstration in 1995:

> On 9 January 1995 the students of the University of East Timor [Universitas Timor Timur, Untim] held a demonstration and I was involved. So I was arrested again by the military and the police. They said to me that I obviously wasn't afraid of dying because I was attending another demonstration. One of them beat me and kicked me while dragging me and throwing me into their Hino car. I was taken to the Polwil [Kepolisian Wilayah, sub-regional police headquarters] in Comoro, Dili, for interrogation. At the Polwil I was interrogated, beaten, kicked and given electric shocks. My whole body was given shocks, even my genitals. All of my clothes were taken off. There were around 20 of us who had been arrested and we were held at the [sub-regional police headquarters] for nearly a year. Then around 1995 we were moved to the prison in Becora, Dili. We were tried and given a sentence of three years although, in the end, we were in Becora for about two years and eight months.[181]

231. The demonstrations and the arrests continued throughout the 1990s. On 15 November 1995, a group of high school students marched to join a demonstration on the University of Timor-Leste campus. They were surrounded by two trucks of riot police near the Mahkota Hotel in Dili. Many escaped but some 30 were reportedly beaten and taken to police headquarters before being released.[182]

232. Children also continued to be detained in the 1990s for suspected contact with Falintil. Zeca Soares reported to the Commission that when he was a 16-year-old estafeta he was brought by the village secretary to the SGI post in Letefoho (Ermera). He was held there in a darkened cell and beaten by three civilians on orders from the SGI. He was released after two months but several months later he was re-arrested by SGI members in the area of Asulau (Ermera) and brought to Tata Hatolia (Ermera). On the road he was put into a sack and thrown into a ravine. Still alive, he was brought to Rajawali forces, Infantry Battalion 713 (Kostrad) in Suai and held for one week where he was repeatedly beaten.[183]

1999

233. In 1999, there was a fresh wave of detentions by the military and their militia proxies (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment). Children were among those detained. For example, in April 1999 the SGI commander, C22, at Marco

(Cailaco, Bobonaro) ordered the TNI and Halilintar militia to work together to identify the killers of local pro-autonomy figure, Manuel Gama. Soldiers and militiamen carried out a sweep in nearby villages detaining about 30 residents, including women and children. They were forcibly marched to the Cailaco Koramil in Marco where they were held for up to four days.[184]

234. Detentions were sometimes followed by forced recruitment. For example the Commission heard testimony describing the process of forced recruitment of youths to the Laksaur militia in Covalima.[185]

235. Also, Florentino Nunes told the Commission that on 8 April 1999, when he was 17 years old, he was suspected of being a CNRT sympathiser. He was beaten by BMP militia in Leopa (Liquiçá, Liquiçá) and held at the house of the District Administrator of Liquiçá for several days. He was then held at the fort in Maubara (Liquiçá) for another two months.[186]

236. Another 17-year-old was in a group of four junior high school students (SMP Negeri 2 Beco, Suai, Covalima)) detained by a Mahidi member named C23, a soldier named C22, and others. They were taken to the Mahidi headquarters in Zumalai (Covalima) and held overnight for questioning. The next day they were returned to their homes, which were searched for evidence of Fretilin involvement and weapons, and they were beaten and burned with a cigarette. They were then taken to the house of the local Mahidi commander, C24, and held for another three days of questioning during which they were given no food or drink.[187]

Detentions by UDT

237. The Commission has found that UDT carried out a large number of arrests in August 1975 (see Vol. III, Part 7.4: Detention, Torture and Ill-Treatment). The Commission received two statements describing cases of UDT detaining teenage Fretilin supporters, each for approximately one week, during the "coup" of August 1975. Bernardino da Costa reported that he was nine years old when he was arrested by a UDT member called C25 in Atudara (Cailaco, Bobonaro).[188] João do Carmo de Araújo told how he was arrested by UDT in Ataúro Vila (Ataúro, Dili) together with three others, including a 15-year-old called Agostinho.[189] Luis de Jesus Guterres told how a one-year-old child, Filomeno de Jesus Pereira, was one of a group detained by UDT on 11 August 1975 in Ailoklaran (Dili).[190] There is also a report from Domingos dos Santos that three Portuguese soldiers detained him in Dili in July 1975 when he was 16 years old. The youth was taken to the UDT office in Palapaço where he was held for three days before escaping.[*]

* See also HRVD Statement 04677, "In July 1975, I was arrested by three members of the Portuguese military, whom I did not know, in front of the Dili helicopter pad where I happened to be waiting for a car to go to Liquiçá. After I was arrested, they [the Portuguese soldiers] started beating me until I lost consciousness for five minutes. Then I came to and they tied my hands and took me to the UDT political party office in Palapaço, Dili. When we reached the office they handed me over to C26 (East Timorese). He ordered his men to untie the ropes around my hands then put me in a room or cell for three days and three nights without food or drink. I escaped from the UDT office when the situation in Dili became chaotic."

Detentions by Fretilin

238. In 1975-1976, Fretilin usually detained children with their adult relatives for reasons related to political party conflict. Later, children were detained due to infraction of the rules, suspicion of being a "traitor" or as part of the intra-party conflicts.

239. Children were detained with their parents by Fretilin during the party conflict. One UDT supporter, João da Costa, told the Commission how he was detained and tortured for five months from September 1975 along with his three month-old daughter, Saturnina, his friend, João Castro, and João Castro's six-month-old child. João da Costa and his wife and baby had fled to Venilale (Baucau) at the time of the Fretilin "counter-coup" but were captured there along with other UDT supporters. João da Costa and João Castro were beaten while Saturnina and João Castro's baby were stabbed with a knife. Fretilin then took the families to Viqueque where they continued to be tortured.[191]

240. Some older children were detained during the conflict without their families because of their, or their families', political affiliation. For example, Antero Soares testified that Fretilin detained him in 1974 when he was 16 years old and living in Mindelo (Turiscai, Manufahi) because his father was a supporter of the Timor Popular Democratic Association (Associacão Popular Democratica Timorense, Apodeti).[192]

241. Family connections continued to play an important role in rivalries within and between parties, and there are several accounts of children detained by Fretilin with their extended families. Constantinho Ornai told the Commission about his detention in 1976 when he was 11 years old because of conflicts within Fretilin:

> In October the Comissão Região [Regional Commission]...wanted to arrest us in Uato Carbau [Viqueque]. Early one morning we were captured and taken to Iliomar [Lautém]. In Iliomar we were tied up and taken to Salari [Iliomar, Lautém]. There we were tied up and put into a pig-pen. We were interrogated in turn, beginning with the adults and then the children, including me. We were tied up there for several days. We were only given food once a day. We were tied with rope taken from sugar palm and sago palm trees. Our hands were tied behind our back at three levels, first at our palms, second at our elbows and third at our upper arms, and then we were hung from a tree. Meanwhile our feet were locked between two pieces of wood.
>
> Then C27, the operational Commander, interrogated me while guarded with a G-3 weapon. Commander C28 and C29 interrogated me. After the interrogation I was made a prisoner with freedom to move so that I could work in the general kitchen. My jobs included drawing water and collecting firewood. After one night I became a detainee in the general kitchen. My uncle together with some other people were killed by Fretilin, led by C28 and C29, around 16 November 1976.[193]

242. Families were in danger of being suspected of planning to surrender or of contacting the enemy, if they were caught looking for food without permission. Isabel Amaral reported that in 1976 when she was 17 years old, she was briefly detained with her family by Fretilin because they had been trying to return to where they had hidden food.[194] The Commission also heard from Luzia de Jesus Barreto, the mother of Bastião, that in 1978, when Bastião was 14 years old, he went looking for food in Remexio (Aileu) and was detained on suspicion of being a traitor. He later died from illness in a Fretilin National Rehabilitation Camp (Campo de Rehabilitacão Nasional, Renal).[195]

243. There are also several cases, as noted in the section headed Children in Falintil (par. 158 above), of under-age guerillas detained for disciplinary offences. Ijaias da Costa testified that when he was 17 years old in 1976 in Berelau (Liquidoe, Aileu), he was detained for two days for accidentally discharging a weapon.[196] The period of detention for breaches of discipline could reach one year or more, for example for allowing a prisoner to escape. Jaime da Costa told the Commission how in June 1977, when he was a 14-year-old Falintil member, he allowed a prisoner to escape after falling asleep on guard duty. He was detained in Laclo (Manatuto) on 19 June 1977 on the basis of an "arrest warrant" issued by the comandante da região. He was held for one year and three months, some of that time in a hole, and was forced to work in the fields.[197]

244. Children detained by Fretilin were held in a variety of conditions. Constantinho Ornai spent some time as a formal detainee before being given the status of a "detainee with freedom to move" (tahanan bebas luar) and was required to work.[198] Sometimes children were detained for short periods and then given work for periods ranging from just days to several years. Paulino Laserdo da Costa told of when he was 16 years old, in 1976, and was arrested in Cairui (Laleia, Manatuto). He was held only 30 minutes before he was given the status of "detainee with freedom to move" and required to collect salt from the ocean which he traded for food for Falintil.*

245. Twelve-year-old José dos Santos and his family experienced much more difficult conditions. His father was a UDT supporter but José lived in Fretilin territory in Manatuto with other members of his extended family, some of whom were active in Falintil and Fretilin. Due to suspicions about contact with their father and the distribution of the family's wealth, the whole family was detained in late 1976 or early 1977. Over the next 18 months they were moved around Manatuto with Fretilin until they were finally surrounded and captured by Infantry Battalion 315 on 20 July 1978. First, the family was held in Welihumeta (Laclo, Manatuto) for three or four months. Here, José and other family members were kept in a hole in the ground, while others, including his 13-year-old and two-month old brothers, were kept in a hut. Next, they were taken to Hatuconan (Laclo, Manatuto) where the local Fretilin leadership was based. Children under ten were held in a small structure that served as a crèche, while José, his 13-year-old brother and three unrelated boys aged 10-12 stayed with the Fretilin leadership, washing clothes and helping distribute supplies. José was once sent to a Renal (a Fretilin "rehabilitation" camp) where he was held in a hut for four days before being sent back to Hatuconan.

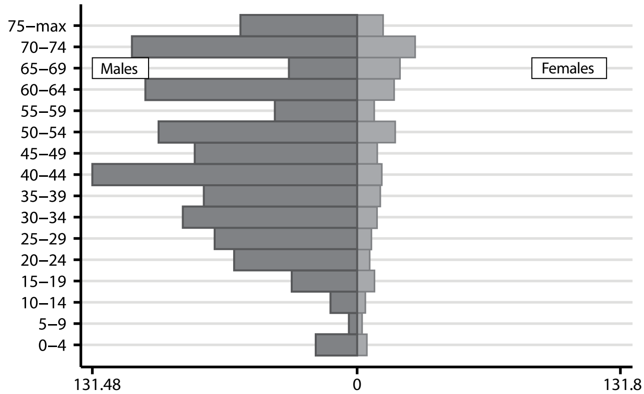
* HRVD Statement 05226. In another case in Manatuto, Sebastião da Silva told how when he was 12 years old he was detained and forced to work. He was captured with his older sibling in Bariqui (Manatuto) by Fretilin because they were ex-UDT supporters and Fretilin was afraid they were "two-headed". He was forced to process sago for Falintil for three years. (HRVD Statement 06513.)

After a year there, followed by three months in Manalete (Laclo, Manatuto) they were moved around frequently until their capture.[199]

246. After the destruction of the zonas libertadas (liberated zones) in early 1979, Fretilin no longer controlled sufficient territory or population to allow for detentions and although a few cases continued to be reported, their number was small and none of those known to the Commission involved children

Killings and disappearances

Introduction

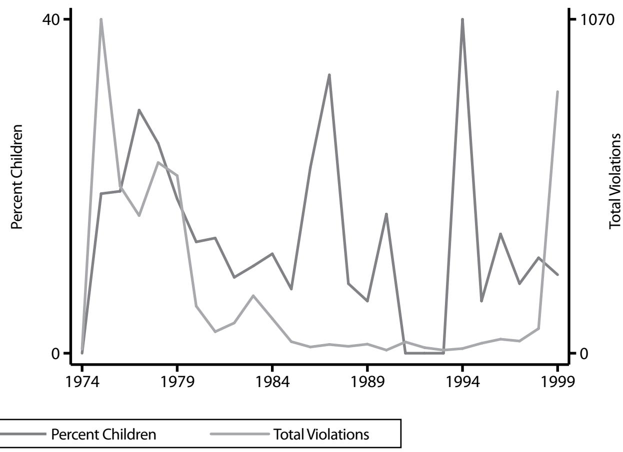


247. Children died as a result of the political conflicts in Timor-Leste, from the first days of the party conflict in 1975 to the last days of Indonesian rule. However, the contexts in which children died changed over the period. After the Indonesian invasion in 1975, large numbers of children died of deprivation (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine) but many were also killed in targeted and indiscriminate military attacks, and also individually executed. In the 1980s cases identified by the Commission tended to be of children killed with adults in mass killings such as those at Kraras, Bibileo (Viqueque) or on Mount Aitana (Laleia, Manatuto). There are also isolated cases during this period of children singled out for suspected pro-independence activities. In the 1990s, this latter trend continued, particularly in connection with public demonstrations, of which the most notorious example was the Santa Cruz massacre of 12 November 1991. In 1999 there was a surge in killings of children, many of them clandestine members or from pro-independence families or communities. These killings frequently occurred as part of indiscriminate attacks on groups that had taken refuge in churches and private houses, but there were also instances where children were knowingly executed with other family members or as proxies for them. While most killings of children were at the hands of ABRI/TNI and the paramilitary bodies it created, Fretilin and Falintil were also responsible for killing children.

248. The Commission has not found through its research that children as a group were specifically targeted by any perpetrator group over the period of the Commission's mandate. Nevertheless, the children who died during this period should be acknowledged and remembered. The following discussion is therefore an outline of the causes and contexts in which children were killed as a result of political conflicts.

Profile of violations

249. Of the 5,120 reports of civilian killings received by the Commission, 7.1% (362/5,120) of civilians killed were reported to be minors, although only 41.4% (2,120/5,120) of cases included the age of the victim. This suggests that children were not singled out as targets of killings, especially when the proportion of the total population who were minors is considered. However, as there should be a greater inhibition on killing children than adults and children were generally less well represented on both the political and military frontlines (despite their involvement in both), these figures suggest that children were in fact over-represented among the victims of civilian killings.



Age-sex specific violation rate of civilian killing (per 10,000 persons), 1974–1999

Sources: (1) Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR; (2) 1990 population census, statistics Indonesia
Note: 59.6% of the violation records are missing age or sex of the victim

250. The figure below shows the pattern of civilian killings of children over time. It is apparent that the bulk of child killings occurred during the periods in which overall numbers of killings were relatively high. Furthermore, 63.3% (229/362) of documented civilian killings were attributed to the Indonesian military. Hence, the Indonesian military appears to have carried out large-scale killings in a manner that reveals inadequate measures were taken to prevent the killing of children.

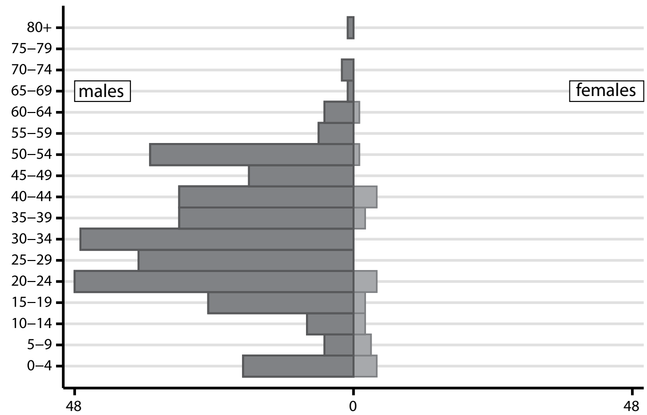
Violations over time, 1974-1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR

251. The largest numbers of child killings occurred in the 1975-1979 period (especially 1975 and 1978) and in 1999. After a lull in 1980, the numbers of children killed rose slightly in 1981-1982, and in the second half of the 1990s. These patterns are roughly consistent with those for the adult population (with the exception that the number of children killed declined in 1983). Males were reported as the victims in 77.6% (281/362) of the civilian killings of minors, whereas in 21.0% (76/362) of cases female children were the victims.

252. The Indonesian military was attributed responsibility for the killing of a minor in 63.3% or reported cases, Fretilin/Falintil in 27.6% (100/362), the Indonesian-backed militias in 11.9% (43/362) and UDT 1.9% (7/362).*

253. Within the category of under-age child civilian killings, older children 15-19 years were the chief victims, with nearly twice the number of killings as the next largest groups, 10-14 years and 0-4 years. The least number of child killings were reported within the 5-9 years age group, with only 10.5% of total civilian killings being minors. The median age of victims reported to the Commission through the statement-taking process is 14, and nearly one quarter of the total are 16-17 years old.



254. The picture for boys as a percentage of all males killed mirrors the general profile, not surprisingly since boys make up the overwhelming majority of total cases (77.6%, 281/362). The largest group of men killed were in the 30-35 age group. Females killed, however, tended to be younger. In all cases of females killed the 0-17 age group accounts for more than one-quarter of cases. The 12-17 age group is second only to the slightly older 18-23 age group. It appears that women in these two age groups were the most vulnerable to other crimes, such as rape, which in some cases were linked to killings, although support for this link is scant.[200]

255. Disappearances show a similar age pattern to killings, with 7.1% (59/835) of victims of disappearances within the 0-17 age group and 32.3% (23/59) of those aged 12-17.

256. The demographic profile of age-sex of reported disappearance victims is similar to that of civilian killings. In particular, most disappearances reported to the Commission were against young males between the ages of 20 and 34. Of the reported disappearances of children, almost all of them were of older boys in the age group 15-19, as shown in the following figure.

* When calculating proportional responsibility for violations, some violations may be counted more than once because responsibility may be shared amongst perpetrators.

Number of reported acts of disappearance, by age and sex, 1974–1999

Source: Database of narrative statements given to the CAVR
Note: 59.6% of the records are missing age or sex of the victim

Invasion and military operations

1975–1979

257. As previously noted, many more children were killed in the period from 1975 to 1979 than other periods in the Commission's mandate. This pattern is consistent with the total numbers of people killed. These figures suggest that children were not targeted but were caught up in the violence and chaos along with adults. A qualitative analysis of the Commission's research also suggests that in this period children were killed for the same reasons as adults and often at the same time as adults.

258. Some children died in the fighting during the Indonesian invasion or later military operations against Falintil. However, it is often unclear from the statements received by the Commission whether a killing was caused by indiscriminate attack or targeted execution. For example, in 1978 four children in a family from Lupal (Lolotoe, Bobonaro) were killed when their refuge on Mount Manulor was attacked by the Indonesian military. Santina da Costa was seven at the time. She explained:

> During the two weeks on the mountain, my younger brothers and sisters, Lesu Bere [age unknown], Olandina [aged five] and Olosili [aged two], died after being hit by bullets from the Indonesian forces, while another called Olasila died because she was hit by shrapnel.[201]

259. A second pattern of child fatalities in the 1970s is that of children killed when they were part of a group looking for food. The Commission received a number of reports describing how people searching for food risked attack either by ABRI (and its auxiliaries, such as members of Hansip) or by Fretilin/Falintil. The former regarded the presence of such groups in the forest as suspect because they might be intending to make contact with the Resistance or even be members of the Resistance themselves. Fretilin/Falintil targeted such groups as either spies or potential "surrenderers" (see below).

260. This pattern highlights one of the hallmarks of the political conflict in Timor-Leste: a general failure to distinguish between civilians and combatants. This failure could be the result of military doctrine, as in Fretilin's "people's war" strategy and ABRI/TNI's equivalent, Hankamrata, which provided the justification for the grouping of paramilitaries and civil defence units. It could also have been caused by the suspicion of all civilians found in a contested area, which marked them as valid military targets. Children were not exempt or protected from this failure.

261. The Commission heard testimony describing civilian casualties at the hands of ABRI and civil defence units.[202]

262. The Commission received testimony about how Hansip members in Uai-Oli (Venilale, Baucau) killed a six-year-old girl called Kenauatu and her father. Her younger brother, José Ximenes, explained how they were killed and how he was taken and raised by the perpetrators:

> In 1978 we came down from Matebian to Uai-Oli, the aldeia of Ibihae [Venilale, Baucau]. All of my family left for Venilale but my father, Uatusu'u, my older sister, Kenauatu, and I stayed in Uaibae Uai-Oli. After around one week, a Hansip commander called C36 and his men: C37, C38, C39 and others found our hiding place in Nabolo. They captured my older sister and my father and took them about 200 metres away from me. Then they killed them and threw their bodies away in Nabolo, Uaile, Uai-Oli. But because I was only about five years old C36 and C37 took me with them to Ossu [Viqueque]. When we reached Ossu I lived with Antonio who looked after me until I was an adult. In 1995 my family found me and took me back to Venilale [Baucau] to live with them.[203]

263. Children who remained behind when others fled to the forest were also at risk. According to a relative, Felicidade Ximenes, one man stayed behind with his 15-year-old sick daughter, Helena, in Uai-Oli (Venilale, Baucau) in 1979, while the rest of his family fled to the forest. Members of Battalion 745 arrived in the area and reportedly forced the man to kill his daughter.[204]

264. Children were also killed in other contexts during this period. As noted in the section on TBOs, there are several suspected cases of under-age TBOs killed in combat operations or by soldiers in their own units. Other killings were linked to human rights violations such as rape. For example, according to Pãolo da Costa Soares, an Indonesian soldier and a Hansip member from Atabae (Bobonaro), C40 and C41, captured two sisters under 18, one of whom was six months pregnant. After the two soldiers had raped the sisters for six hours, the girls tried to escape. One sister was shot and killed while the pregnant sister suffered a miscarriage.[205] Gaspar Dias reported a seemingly random case. He stated that in 1975, Albano Dias, 15 years of age, was working in his field in Fatlau, Aileu, and was shot dead by an unidentified ABRI soldier.[206]

1980–1988

265. By 1980, Indonesia had consolidated its control over the territory. Many civilians had surrendered or been captured, and had been relocated to towns or villages. Falintil attacks continued and retaliatory measures by ABRI and other operations were often so broadly targeted as to include children among the dead. As in the previous period, children were not specifically targeted but rather were killed as members of a group that included adults. However, the context of these killings was no longer the invasion and air attacks, as it had been in the earlier period. Instead, people were killed in retaliatory measures taken by ABRI in response to continued active resistance to the occupation. There were also new types of military operation such as the various "fence of legs" operations known as Operation Kikis involving mass mobilisation of the civilian population to flush out Resistance fighters. The best known of these operations occurred in July–September 1981 (see Vol. I, Part 3: History of the Conflict, and Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).

266. Children were often caught up in group killings perpetrated in this period. For example, children were reported to be among the victims of the killing that occurred at Uaidada in Cairui Village (Laleia, Manatuto) at the end of Operation Kikis in September 1981.[207] In the village of Leuro (Lospalos, Lautém) the community described the situation toward the end of Operation Kikis:

> The community was more and more afraid, traumatised and nervous. We weren't free to go about our day-to-day needs because ABRI was always guarding the posts.[208]

267. The community said that ten people were shot dead at this time, including a 15-year-old child called Jepokilu.

268. Many children were also killed during the series of killings in Viqueque District by ABRI and Hansip members in retaliation for the killing of 14 soldiers in the village of Kraras on 8 August 1983. The Commission has received information that at least 26 of the victims were 17 years old or younger, of whom more than half were ten or under.* Silvino das Dores Soares describes how in the weeks following the ABRI deaths, the military patrolled nearby mountains and a number of executions were carried out in these operations, including that of a 15-year-old in Uma Qui'ic (Viqueque) around 12 September 1983.[209]

269. In one of the retaliatory actions after the Kraras uprising, the killings in the aldeia of Fahite-Laran, Caraubalau (Viqueque, Viqueque) on 16 September 1983 included many women and young children. Former Hansip commander, Jeronimo da Costa Amaral, told the Commission:

> One day at around 2.00 in the afternoon, 12 soldiers called us, I don't know which unit they were from...I and three of my members...brought along

* HRVD Statement 02130501, List of victim's names in Victims report; HRVD Statement 4146 also identifies two children among those killed in one Kraras-related incident on 17 September 1983 at Sawah Tahu-Bein, Baha Fou (Buicaren, Viqueque): Eugenio (14) Abilio Gomes (16).

> 18 people [civilians]. There were some in late stages of pregnancy, some children and some old men. We brought them up to Karuik. Indonesian forces from another place then came and picked them up. I saw written on the arm of their uniforms that they were from [Infantry Battalion] 312. Then the soldiers told us that they were taking the people to meet with their families [still in the forest] to convince them to surrender. The soldiers and the 18 civilians hadn't gone far before we heard the sound of gunshots.[210]

270. Other witnesses put the number of victims at between 26 and 54, but all agreed that there were many women with young children in the group. The Commission has found that 14 children were killed in this massacre, aged between one and 17 years (The Caraubalau and Tahu Bein massacres are described in Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances). The following day in Tahu Bein (Viqueque) the military rounded up and shot all males, including adolescents, from the village of Bahalarauain. Nine of the reported victims were minors, one aged ten and the remaining aged 15-17.

271. During the 1980s, clandestine networks expanded rapidly. Children became involved in the networks' activities as estafeta or messengers. This placed children at increasing risk of capture and harm by the military. The earliest reported clandestine child fatalities occurred after the Resistance attacks in Marabia and Becora, Dili, on 10 June 1980. Following the attacks, the Indonesian authorities launched a wave of arrests and detentions. Filomeno Ximenes reported that among those who were arrested and disappeared or who were killed while in custody, were three prisoners aged 15-17 who disappeared from the Comarca prison. They were Sancho Sarmento (17 years) and two brothers, Cesmundo (15 years) and Edmundo (16 years), identified as members of the clandestine movement. According to Filomeno, they had been arrested by Kodim 1627 in the Old Market area of Dili.[211]

1989–1998

272. The clandestine network expanded further after 1988 and new groups emerged among high school and college students. The holding of public demonstrations from 1989 required the mobilisation of large numbers of people willing to face the risk of detention and violence. Children and youths were heavily involved. When the demonstrators encountered violence, as in the Santa Cruz Massacre of 12 November 1991, the number of under-age victims was high. From the 271 listed as killed at Santa Cruz, 42 were aged 17 years and under, including several aged ten.[212] There is an indication that some of these victims were specifically targeted during the violence. According to Belchior Francisco Bento Alves Pereira:

> Not long after we arrived in Santa Cruz the Indonesian military started shooting at us so I hid near the wall of the cemetery. I saw policemen come in and look around the Santa Cruz cemetery. I could see the soldiers stabbing people blindly. Then I heard Alau calling out my name, Abessy, and saying that he wanted to find all of the children from Santo Paulus school. He called me out and forced me to sit on a grave and then a policeman beat me black and blue.[*]

273. Both girls and boys were involved in public demonstrations and suffered injury. In June 1998, a series of demonstrations, counter-demonstrations and clashes occurred at the time of the visit of a EU delegation. Two young men were killed in separate incidents. Two girls, Dirce Elisabet do Rosário (15) and Maria Imaculada do Rosário (17), were among five seriously wounded when security forces opened fire on demonstrators outside Bishop Basilio Nascimento's residence in Baucau (where the EU delegation was going to meet the bishop) after an Indonesian intelligence vehicle was mobbed.[213]

1999

274. The violence committed by ABRI/TNI and militias in 1999 intensified patterns established earlier: children were killed in massacres, as members of communities that were suspected of being pro-independence, or as pro-independence supporters in their own right. Killings also occurred during incidents of collective punishment meted out for helping Falintil or for attacks on the ABRI/TNI.

275. Many children were killed in the violence that occurred in 1999, both before and after the referendum. Raimundo Sarmento, a Resistance leader from Laclubar (Manatuto), described the retaliation following the killing of a TNI soldier by the Resistance. He told how the military (Marines, Rajawali and Battalion 741), together with the militia, went to every household that they suspected might be hiding Raimundo and eventually caught and killed Marcelino, a Resistance figure, and his younger brother, who was in junior high school:

> [O]n 24 April 1999 at 10.00am, they had already gone in [to the place where Raimundo was]…they passed a river and the hiding place. They then came in from below and arrested my leader, Marcelino, and a boy called Mateus. Marcelino and Mateus were buried. They were killed, their heads were cut off and exchanged before they were buried in a sitting position with their bodies around each other.[214]

276. Other testimony received by the Commission cites the presence of top militia leaders at the site of killings.[215]

277. Many youths escaped to the mountains in the run-up to the Popular Consultation or during the violence that followed. As food became scarce there was a return, after two decades, to the pattern of killing those who had fled to the mountains and then returned to look for food. Jorge Ximenes told the Commission about the killing of a 17-year-old male:

* Belchior Francisco Bento Alves Pereira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004. The section on Children in the clandestine network (par. 123 ff, above), notes that in the aftermath of Santa Cruz under-age demonstrators were sought at their schools and homes and detained.

On 21 September 1999, I, with my friends Felix da Costa, Horacio Pinheiro, Olivio, Joanico, Elias, Alfredo Araújo and Calisto Rodrigues [17 years] with 20 other friends, went looking for food in Ira Ara, Parlamento Village, Moro [Lautém], because the food was limited in the place we had fled to. We never expected that a group of Team Alfa militia under Commander C109 would shoot us. We ran away and my friend Alfredo Araújo was shot dead with Calisto Rodrigues. Only after ten days could we collect their bodies and lay them to rest.[216]

278. In some of the most notorious killings that took place in 1999, adult males were the targets and were separated from the women and children before the killings took place. This is what happened when, on 5 September, militia forced out people who had taken refuge in the Dili Diocese compound.[217] Women and children were also separated from the men at Passabe (Oecussi) where at least 47 young men were killed by the Sakunar militia on 10 September.[218]

279. However, during the Suai Church Massacre on the 6 September this was not the case and children were also killed. When 27 bodies were exhumed from three mass graves containing victims of the Suai (Covalima) Massacre in November 1999, the remains of a child of about five and a teenage woman were found.[219] In another well-known case, the killings were perpetrated by the Team Alfa militia in Lospalos (Lautém). On 25 September 1999, Team Alfa attacked a car, killing two nuns, three brothers, a lay-woman, an Indonesian journalist and their driver. Two boys pushing a cart along the road just prior to the attack were chased. Izino Freitas Amaral did not escape. He was tied to a tree where he witnessed the executions of those in the car and was then killed.[220]

280. In one of the reported cases of child killing in 1999, the victim was specifically targeted as a proxy for an adult parent. In the mass execution at the Maliana Police Station (Bobonaro) on 8 September 1999:

> Among the first victims was a 13-year-old boy, José Barros Soares, who was hacked to death by militiamen while his younger sister looked on. But the violence was not as random as that scene suggested. The attackers were clearly singling out well-known pro-independence figures for execution. The victims included a number of CNRT leaders, a Sub-district Administrator, two village heads and several civil servants with pro-independence sympathies.
>
> The militias also targeted the families of such figures. According to one report, for example, the militias who killed the young boy, José Barros Soares, told his sister that they were killing him because they could not find his father, a known independence figure.[221]

281. According to other information received by the Commission, José Barros Soares' father, a CNRT official from Manapa (Cailaco, Bobonaro), was being hunted by members of the Dadurus Merah Putih militia and the TNI, but he had in fact fled to Dili. They killed his son instead.[222]

282. In another case in Bobonaro, two boys were killed when they refused to leave their father who had just been shot dead by TNI members from the Maliana Koramil. On 10 September 1999, the TNI came to the house of Duarte Gouveia Lopes, a CNRT official in Holsa, Maliana (Bobonaro) and shot him dead in front of his two sons, Viriato aged 17 and Vitorino aged 12. The soldiers told the two boys to leave but when they refused, saying that they preferred to be killed too rather than live without their father, they were also murdered.[223]

283. Some children were killed with their family members who were known pro-independence supporters. Maria Santina Tilman Alves told how her younger sister, Georgina Tilman, was killed with five of her children, the youngest only two years old. Georgina's family was known to support independence. Their house in Ermera was burnt by the militia after the referendum. Georgina fled with her husband and children to Dili. She and five of her children were taken to the Regional Police (Polda) headquarters where many others were assembled awaiting deportation, and then sent to Atambua (Belu, West Timor). Her husband had lost contact with Georgina and the five children. He later found out that after reaching Atambua, TNI and militia members (C47 and C48, two members of Ermera Kodim 1637 as well as C49 and C50) drove Georgina and her children back into Timor-Leste to Manduki (Atabae, Bobonaro). He later learned that they had been shot in Manduki and their bodies left unburied. The parents-in-law of the driver of the car then went to bury the bodies, leaving the children's clothes as a marker. It was they who told Georgina's husband what had happened to her and the children.[224]

Killings of children by Fretilin and Falintil

284. Fretilin and Falintil account for about one-quarter of the killings of children reported in statements given to the Commission, 38 victims in 20 incidents. As with the Indonesian military killings, most children were killed as part of larger groups of adults. In addition to these statements, there are other credible accounts of teenage party activists killed by both Fretilin and UDT.

The period of party conflict

285. An unknown number of children were killed by members of the political parties before and after the invasion, due to their family connections or their own political affiliation. Angelo Araújo Fernandes, a UDT supporter, told the Commission about the killing of his extended family in 1976 by Fretilin members from his own village. After being held by Fretilin for several days he witnessed the killing of his brother but managed to escape. According to Fernandes:

> They came and shot dead all of my relatives, 37 people, in Lahiria Village, (Lore I, Lautém) including children and pregnant women. I only heard the sounds of the guns from the direction of Lahiria, where they were.[*]

* For a more detailed account, see text box in Vol. II, Part 7.2: Unlawful Killings and Enforced Disappearances, entitled Testimony of Angelo Araújo Fernandes: Killings by Fretilin in Lautém.

286. Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes was a UDT activist from a family that included Fretilin and Apodeti supporters. Together with his father, an Apodeti leader, he was detained in Dili and taken to Aileu after the invasion:

> I didn't know exactly why I was a political prisoner, or whether I was made a prisoner just because of my parents. On the night of 26 December 1976, we heard the sound of guns. After we had confirmed that this is what it was, we found out that my father along with 75 other prisoners had been killed at Mantane [Aileu Town]. Among those massacred, the youngest was Antonio Pinto and Rui Maia. They were both just 15 years old. Jeronimo Maia and I were 16 years old. The four of us were the youngest.[225]

287. There is also evidence of the killing of under-age Fretilin supporters by UDT supporters during this period. Ijidio Maria de Jesus spoke at the CAVR National Public Hearing on Massacres about the killing of his father José Maria and ten others by UDT members. Six of those killed on 27 August 1975, at Wedauberek (Alas, Manufahi) were members of the Fretilin-affiliated student organisation Unetim, including the younger brother of Nicolau Lobato, Domingos. They were detained on 11 August and held in Alas and Same (Manufahi) and Natarbora (Manatuto), before returning to Besusu (Alas, Manufahi) on 27 August, where Ijidio saw his father pass by in the back of a truck.

288. At 2:00pm Ijidio and his mother, fleeing to the forest, heard the sound of shots from Meti-Oan. Four days later he heard the news that residents of Besusu had found 11 corpses near Meti-Oan, including his father's, and he went to see. The hand of one of the students, Domingos Ribeiro, had been severed from his body. Apart from Domingos Ribeiro the students included the Unetim chairman, Domingos Lobato, and four other Unetim members, Chiquito Kaduak, Francisco, Alexandre da Costa and Domingos Ribeiro's 17-year-old brother, Tonito Ribeiro.*

289. In another case, Vicenti Rosário told how UDT members from Baltalde-Merkoluli (Turiscai, Manufahi), C109 and C110, killed his family because they were Fretilin members. Among the six victims, three were still children: Dau Mali (seven years), Malolo (six years) and Luru Leki (five years).[226]

290. Some statements suggest that during this period there were children killed who were as much victims of long-standing personal and family disputes as of political differences. According to the statement of Manuel da Silva concerning an incident in Aitutu (Maubisse, Ainaro):

> In 1975, I was UDT but I didn't do anything against Fretilin. Members [of Fretilin] came and took Koli-bere I [aged 16] and Koli-bere II [aged 16]… [The perpetrators] were C51, C110 and C111. Those three men took the two prisoners and handed them over to the Fretilin delegate, C112, who ordered C113 to kill both of the Koli-beres. They hadn't done anything wrong, but they were killed out of revenge because they had joined UDT and because of traditional family law reasons.[227]

* CAVR, Ijidio Maria de Jesus, Case Summary Collection, 2003. While only the age of Tonito is given, Unetim was an organisation of secondary school students and several of the others were likely to have been under-age.

1975–1979

291. Killings of children by Fretilin and Falintil after the invasion fall into three main categories: killing connected to inter- or intra-party conflicts, killing of people suspected of helping the Indonesians (including deaths in custody and people killed while looking for food) and military attacks.

292. Statements indicate that the repercussions of the party conflict were being felt well after the invasion and that children continued to be its victims. Lourenço Ximenes told how his family, who were Apodeti members, was captured in Baucau in October 1976:

> My family and I fled to Nai Naha [Quelicai, Baucau] because we were afraid we would be attacked by the ABRI. In Nai Naha we were arrested by Falintil forces because we were suspected of having contact with ABRI. Our hands were tied to a big piece of wood for three days while we were interrogated. We were then released and forced to work lifting and carrying earth to make foundations for a house. Then on 2 November 1976, the family was forced to dig a hole around five metres [deep]. After they had finished digging Lourenço Ximenes hid and saw Falintil kill three people: his child Filomeno [Ximenes, aged 12], his nephew Quii Quele [aged 20] and his younger brother Laca Labi [age unknown]. After they had been killed, the three bodies were put into the hole that had just been dug.[228]

293. The Commission has also received statements about several incidents in which Fretilin/Falintil killed persons suspected of helping the Indonesians. In some cases the deaths occurred in custody, in others after groups out looking for food encountered Falintil soldiers. Well after the invasion, Fretilin detained suspected collaborators and political prisoners at Fretilin rehabilitation centres (Renal). Deaths in detention resulted from execution and torture as well as from deprivation and exposure (see case of Bastião da Silva described above in the section on Detentions by Fretilin, footnote to par. 244).

294. In April 1976, Mariano Lopes was ten years old when he and his family fled from Koliate-Leo Telo (Hatolia, Ermera) to Letefoho (Ermera) ahead of the invading Indonesian army. The next month the family went to their gardens to harvest sweet potatoes:

> In May 1976, we were afraid because we were hungry. Myself, my mother, Bimori, my older brother, Lakamau, my Aunt Sara, my brother-in-law, Afonso, with my sibling, Joaquina, left Letefoho for our gardens to dig up some potatoes. While we were in the garden a Fretilin member, C52, arrested my mother and female family members and myself and brought us to Hauhei…When we reached the gorge at Manufunu they started shooting blindly. The bullets hit Joaquina and she fell into the gorge. I lay face down on the ground but a bullet hit my right cheek and tore it.

*My mother Bimori and older brother Lakamau were killed immediately where they stood. They thought that we were all dead and they just got up and left. My Aunt Sara and brother-in-law Afonso had been able to run away as soon as they heard the sound of the weapons. When they saw that everything was quiet again they came back and carried me and Joaquina back to Letefoho. We stayed in Letefoho for two years before we went back home again.

295. There were other reasons Fretilin or Falintil members killed children. People, including children, were sometimes killed as examples to the community. Bernardo Rodrigues reported to the Commission that his younger brother, Abrão (17 years), was killed with another member of the family in front of the community in March 1978 in Lequidoe (Aileu). The two youths had attempted to steal corn belonging to a man named C53. C53 caught them and held them for a night, then handed them to the Fretilin forces. They were shot publicly on the orders of Assistant C54.[229]

296. In another case, Armindo Barreto told how a Falintil member attempted to kill his one-month-old child, Domingas, in 1978 in Zumalai (Suai, Covalima) because she was crying and could alert the military to their location:

My child was cold and hungry and started to cry. Her mother carried her. She was only just one month old and her name was Domingas. Falintil member C55 soon called out to us but we just kept on walking. He called out again and we did the same three times and [then] I said to my wife: "Rather than you being killed by Falintil, it's better that we let him kill the child." We walked another 100 metres and then that Falintil member came up to us and took the baby from her mother's arms. He strangled Domingas and then threw her body into the river at Bemean. We were afraid so we just kept on walking. We had already walked far away but I could hear that the baby had not died, it was still crying. I ordered a Falintil member, Olivio dos Santos, to take some sarong material and wrap up the child. We kept on walking. I don't know if my baby lived or died. We couldn't know any more because we were already far away, nearly at Mount Kolimau and were heading on towards Fatubessi (Hatolia, Ermera).[230]

Falintil attacks

297. There is one account of a child killed in a Falintil operation. Paterno Soares reported to the Commission that his younger sister, Ines Soares, was 14 years old in 1982 when she was killed during a Falintil attack on the village of Carlilo (Manatuto, Manatuto). The soldiers burned down houses in the village, including Paterno's house. Ines, together with her parents, was thrown alive into the flames.[231] While Falintil did occasionally kill civilians manning local ABRI security posts, the Commission has little evidence that children were victims of such attacks.

* HRVD Statement 06221; there are five cases from 1976-78 involving 13 victims from Aileu, Ermera and Manufahi in which the victims were part of a group looking for food, see HRVD Statements 02056; 04095; 04604; 04992.

Sexual violations

298. The incidence of sexual violations during the Commission's mandate, its causes and consequences, are considered in detail in Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violence of this Report. However, cases in which victims of sexual violence were children are considered separately in this section of the Report in order to highlight the particular experience of children. Sexual abuse is perhaps the cruellest and most emotionally and psychologically damaging of violations that a child can be made to endure, a betrayal of innocence.

299. In the section on sexual violence the Commission adopted a working definition of sexual violence as all forms of "violence, physical or psychological, carried out through sexual means or by targeting sexuality."[232] This definition includes the crime of rape, which is the physical invasion of a sexual nature, committed on a person under circumstances that are coercive. It is the act of sex that occurs without the consent of the victim.[*] Sexual enslavement is also included in this definition.[†]

300. The Commission's research has found that women were almost exclusively the victims of reported sexual violations related to the political conflicts, particularly rape and sexual slavery. Like many other communities, sexual violence against women and girls in Timor-Leste can be closely linked to their position in society. This includes rigid sexual stereotyping of men and women, and the general lower social status of females that encourages the attitude that women are objects that can be possessed and used by men at will.

301. In relation to children, the effect of such attitudes is compounded by the child's greater physical and emotional vulnerability. The context of violent conflict without functioning rule of law meant that individuals in positions of power over children could act opportunistically in an environment of impunity. Thus again children were pushed to the frontlines of the conflicts.

302. Of all documented cases of sexual violations, 14.9% (127/853) were committed against minors. Of these sexual violations against minors, 98.4% (125/127) were committed against girls. However, it should be noted that in 33.9% (289/853) of sexual violations reported to the Commission, the age of the victim was not provided.

303. As explained in the previous part on sexual violence, there is a strong stigma

* Rape is the sexual penetration, however slight: (a) of the vagina or anus of the victim by the penis of the perpetrator or any other object used by the perpetrator; or (b) of the mouth of the victim by the penis of the perpetrator; by coercion or force or threat of force against the victim or a third person. This is the definition of the act of rape from the Furundzija case of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia (ICTY).

† Sexual slavery arises where women and girls are deprived of liberty, forced into "marriage", domestic servitude or other forced labour that ultimately involves non-consensual sexual activity, including rape by their captors. The entire situation has to be examined to ascertain if powers of ownership are being exercised over another human being.

attached to victims of sexual violations, which means that too often the conduct of such acts is hidden behind a wall of fear and silence. In a culture where virginity is highly valued, this is particularly the case for child victims. It is therefore highly likely that the incidence of sexual violation of children has been significantly under-reported.

304. Finally, it is important to note that sexuality is bound up with cultural and social norms. There is no international age of consent but under the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) a child is generally considered a person younger than 18 years. This is the age of majority that is used in this Report.

305. Since 1990, Indonesia has been a party to the CRC, but its ratification is subject to its own law. The Child Welfare Law No. 4/1979 came into effect on 23 July 1979 and defines the Indonesian child as anyone under 21 years and not yet married. The legal age for marriage is 16 years for females and 19 years for males. In Timor-Leste, a woman is considered to be an adult once she is married. However, the Commission believes that consent to sexual acts is negated by any form of captivity or duress, whether physical, psychological or circumstantial. The age of consent has not in fact had any bearing on the types of sexual violence the Commission has investigated.

Patterns of violations

306. Of the sexual violations against minors reported to the Commission, 41.0% (61/127) were rapes, 35.4% (45/127) involved sexual slavery and 16.5% (21/127) were other acts of sexual violence.

307. In 72.8% (91/125) of documented cases of sexual violations against girls, the victims were between the ages of 14 and 17 years. Of all sexual violations against children documented by the Commission, 68.5% (87/127) were concentrated in five districts namely Ermera, 19.7% (25/127), Ainaro, 15.0% (19/127), Manufahi, 13.4% (17/127), Bobonaro, 10.2% (13/127), and Aileu, 10.2% (13/127).

308. The bulk of reported sexual violations against children occurred during periods of the conflict in which other physical violations, killings and disappearances were also frequent. For instance, 70.9% (90/127) of sexual violations against minors occurred between 1975 and 1983, and 12.6% (16/127) in 1999. The temporal pattern of sexual violations against adults and children are positively correlated. When sexual violations against adults rose or fell so too did sexual violations against children.[*] This pattern suggests that sexual violations against children were driven by the same factors as those against adults.

309. The Indonesian military was named as the perpetrator in 72.4% (92/127) of reported sexual violations against children. Thirty four point seven percent (34.7%) (44/127) were attributed to Timorese associates of the Indonesian military and 2.4% (3/127) were attributed to Fretilin/Falintil forces. No cases of sexual violations of children were attributed to UDT.

* Based on annual figures of sexual violations, the correlation coefficient of offences against adults and children is 0.61.

1974–1979

310. The majority of sexual violence cases against children reported to the Commission occurred in the period of violence and chaos in the second half of the 1970s. Rape of minors reflected similar patterns to the rape of adult women. Girls were raped after they and their families surrendered; they were raped in military headquarters, at home, while in detention or at the time of their release.

311. The first notable pattern of this period is the number of sexual violations that occurred in camps and villages where members of the population who had recently surrendered or been captured were resettled. Following surrender or capture, children were placed under the direct control of guards and other military personnel.* Eufrasia de Jesus Soares told the Commission that she was captured with her family by Infantry Battalion 721 on 13 October 1979 and placed in a camp in Railaco (Ermera). She described the treatment of girls in the camp:

> [T]hey would choose a girl who they thought was beautiful, tell her to bathe and then take her away for a week or two, finally bringing her back to her family.[233]

312. There are also cases reported of girls forced into sexual slavery in the resettlement camps. CM reported that in 1978 when she was 14, she was captured with her family and placed in a camp in Soro (Ainaro). After five months, a Babinsa named C56 threatened to shoot the girl, her father and her older brother if she did not agree to become his "wife". She had one child with him before he left Timor-Leste and she continued her clandestine activities.[234]

313. A second pattern in this period was sexual violence committed against young girls to punish their family members who were believed to be involved in Fretilin/Falintil: targeting by proxy.† For example, the Commission heard several accounts from former TBOs about sexual violations committed by troops in their units against women and children as a form of psychological torture of prisoners. Alfredo Reinado Alves, a TBO from 1978-1982, gave testimony to the Commission as follows:

> I saw how the prisoners were tortured, their daughters and wives raped in front of them...I witnessed how they treated women aged 15 and above…I

* Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violations documented similar cases in the camps: "When we arrived in Dotik (Alas, Manufahi), there were no houses there…[ABRI] told the community to build their own houses. After staying there one month, we were still under their control. At nights they would come up with a strategy, they would pretend to call on the girl they like. The same thing happened to me. One night they called me, for what purpose I didn't know. They brought me to a place with tall grasses around. They started threatening me, 'If you don't give in, then you'll die right here. You did it with the Falintils, but why won't you do it with us?' Being threatened by them, I just did what they asked", HRVD Statement 07241; see also CAVR Interview with EM, Mau Chiga, 31 May 2003 for another case of internment in the Dotik camp; see also Vol. III, Part 7.7: Sexual Violations, section E Case Studies: Rape and sexual slavery about the internment in Dotik (Alas, Manufahi).

† As explained in the part on sexual violations, proxy violence is "violence committed because the main target is not there...with the purpose of destroying/conquering the enemy", Galuh Wandita, "Sisa dari mati": Violence Towards Women and Transitional Justice, Centre of Human Rights Studies, Surabaya University, Surabaya, 2000.

saw how they were treated. From then on I understood the meaning of violation… Around the afternoon they took the women as they pleased. There are things I couldn't reveal because it happened to people with whom I'm close.[235]

314. The Commission's research with women in Lalerek Mutin (Viqueque, Viqueque) discovered a number of cases of sexual slavery of children in this period. In 1978, DM was 15 years old when she and her mother surrendered and lived in Beobe (Viqueque). Her brother and father remained in the forest and DM became suspected of contacting them. She was interrogated in the Kodim for ten days. After her release, a soldier named C57 began to come to her house. DM tried to avoid him by sleeping at her neighbour's house but she was then accused of going to find her family in the forest. When she hid inside a pile of maize in the attic of a traditional house, C57 found her:

Then he climbed up into my hiding place. I was scared so I ran down but I fell and couldn't run because I was too badly hurt. He came down and picked me up and carried me into the room. From then on we lived as husband and wife and I gave him a child. He promised me that he would come back after three years but I never saw him again.[236]

315. FM, also of Beobe, was 14 years old when she was suspected of involvement in a minor incident and subjected to a long period of sexual slavery. In 1978, FM was arrested on suspicion of blocking roads and obstructing ABRI patrol vehicles. She was taken to the Beobe village office and interrogated by the Village Guidance Officer C58, Deputy Village Guidance Officer C59 and a member of Infantry Battalion 330 named C60. During the interrogation C60 started undressing FM. She cried because she was having her period but was threatened; "If you don't do what we tell you, we'll cut you up right now."[237] All three men then raped her.

316. FM was held at the village office for three days and raped repeatedly by the three men. After her release, Kodim members took her from her home to the Viqueque Kodim where she was locked in a room for three months and raped repeatedly by the Kodim Commander C61, the radio operator and the driver. A month after her release, FM was taken by the Koramil Commander and kept as his "wife" for 18 months and forced to provide sexual services on call. She eventually bore him a child.

317. As the above case demonstrates, once violated, girls became vulnerable to long-term exploitation, leading to an extended period of sexual slavery or other forms of repeated sexual violence.* The statement of GM, identified as a member of Falintil, tells of her arrest in 1976 when she was 16 years old in Hato Builico (Ainaro) by the Mulo village chief and C63, a Koramil soldier:

The company commander, Hansip C64, and Koramil [soldier] C63 interrogated me about Commander Hauta-Lafera. After the interrogation…

* See HRVD Statement 08736 about a 17-year-old girl investigated on 28 March 1979 by ABRI Kasi 1, C69, in Lospalos because she had family in the forest. She was then forced to be a "mistress" for two years.

C65 took off my petticoat and underpants and burnt them, leaving me naked. Then C65 raped me first - he threw me to the floor and spread my legs apart. I screamed and cried but they kept on violating me.

Then, that same year, Hansip C66 sexually violated me. He forced me to become his "wife" under threat of his Mauser [rifle]…he stripped me naked and then called his Hansip friends to come and look at me and they all just laughed…then they took me to the Maubisse Koramil. He came and violated me until at last I gave birth to a child.[238]

318. A 14-year-old Fretilin member reported that she was detained with her cousin in Letefoho, Ermera in 1977. They were taken to a room, threatened with death and raped by soldiers from Letefoho Sub-district military command. After four days she was taken to the Ermera District military command for one year. During that time she was raped repeatedly, prevented from meeting her family and forced to "marry" a First Lieutenant. She had two children over the next two years. She knew of two other women who suffered the same fate.[239]

319. Sometimes officials cooperated with the military in subjecting girls to sexual slavery for themselves or the military. In 1979, in Betano (Same, Manufahi), the head of the village C67 wished to marry three women active in the Popular Women's Organisation of Timor (Organização Popular da Mulher Timor, OPMT) that had recently surrendered. They included HM, a 16-year-old.* HM states that because he was rejected, he gave their names to the Kodim. They were arrested by the District Military Chief of Staff (Kasdim), C68, and interrogated, and C67 then forced them to be his "mistresses".[240]

1980-1989

320. Besides overt force and threats of violence highlighted by the cases above, there are also cases of girls involved in sexual relations with individuals in positions of power. Although some cases appear to have the consent of the child, legally their consent is not regarded as valid. Therefore sexual relations with a minor, with or without their apparent consent, is an illegal act.† Mario Carrascalão, former Governor of Timor-Leste, told the Commission of the difficulties of bringing young male teachers from Indonesia without sufficiently overseeing their conduct:

When, in 1983, the system of compulsory schooling in Timor-Leste began, not only children aged six started attending school, but also youth aged up to 16-17 years old attended primary school. [From] a small number of East Timorese primary schools, teachers were appointed to select a large number of Indonesian teachers. Only male, unmarried (or if they were married their wives stayed in Indonesia) teachers were sent to Timor-Leste. The East Timorese that were recruited to teach at primary schools were also, mainly, male, young and had just finished their education…The outcome of this situation reached the Government in the form of stories about the involvement of "Bapak" [Indonesian] or East Timorese teachers with their female students. The Districts of Covalima, Maliana, Liquiçá and Baucau were ones that registered more cases. In Baucau, a teacher from Indonesia raped 22 of his female students. The case was taken to court and the rapist was sentenced to only two-and-a-half years in jail.[241]

* Ages of other victims not stated.

† KUHP (Indonesian penal code Article 287. The Indonesian penal code implies that the age of consent is 15 years.

Prosecution of rape of a minor, Dili Court, 1982

In 1982, a Hansip by the name of C111, aged 17, was convicted by the District Court of Dili of the rape of a 12-year-old girl IM. In his Record of Interrogation (Berita Acara Pemeriksaan, BAP)[*], C111's recollection of the event was as follows:

> On 22 June 1982, I was on duty as Hansip at the Mercado Dili (Dili Market) with the responsibility to check the papers of all the people who came to the market and stayed overnight. By chance I examined the papers of a [girl] IM who had just come down from Baucau. When I asked her for her travel documents, she said that her 'surat jalan' was with her brother who was staying in Becora. Because of this, I detained IM at the post where I was on duty. At 4.00am I asked her again about her travel documents, and she gave the same answer. At the time, I had the bad intention to have sexual intercourse with her because everyone else was asleep. I brought IM to the police post to make her scared, so she would have sexual intercourse with me. When we came to the back of the market I forced IM to sit on the grass. She refused and I hit her twice. She was scared and lay down on the grass.

C111 proceeded to describe the rape and how he then released her to return home. However, IM immediately reported the incident to the Hansip Commander. The following day, C111 was arrested by another Hansip and taken to the police. C111 immediately confessed to the crime and was detained by the police. C111 was tried and convicted of rape in November 1982 and sentenced to 1 year and 6 months imprisonment. The conviction was made on the basis of his confession, together with written statements from the victim, two witnesses and the doctor who examined the victim and confirmed that her hymen had been torn. Neither the victim nor the witnesses attended the hearing. The judgment noted that the girl's hymen had been torn but made no references to the fact that the victim was a minor. The court stated that C111's abuse of his position of authority pointed against mitigation of his sentence.

* Berkas Pengadilan No: 17/PID.S.B/1982/PN.DIL, Hakim: Doris A.A. Taulo, SH, Panitera: Petrus Lamapaha, Penuntut: M. Darwin, Putusan: 19 November 1982. CAVR has not undertaken research into all the records in the Dili District Court and cannot say if this case is exceptional or not. However it is the Commission's impression that cases of sexual violence were often dealt with by the court.

321. JM reported to the Commission that in 1982, in Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) when she was 14 years old, a soldier from Infantry Battalion 744 forcibly took her from her home to an empty field and raped her. JM states that she knows of five other women who suffered the same fate. The rapes took place every night for a week.[242]

322. In another case, KM gave a statement revealing she was raped in 1982, when she was a ten-year-old second grade student in Ossowalu (Vemasse, Baucau). One day, two members of Infantry Battalion 328 came to her home. One of them was a soldier called C70. KM recalled: "He held my hand and then said, 'will you do it with me?' I replied, "I am too young". But he took hold of KM, undressed her and raped her. KM's genitals were bleeding from the violent penetration. The following day KM's parents returned from their garden and were shocked to hear what had happened. For three days ABRI members of Infantry Battalion 328 came to their house accusing them of hiding Fretilin members. KM was raped repeatedly until eventually she became pregnant.[243]

323. The case of LM also highlights the vulnerability of school children, as well as the involvement of government officials in allowing the military to commit violations against children. LM told the Commission that in September 1983 when she was 13, members of the Viqueque Kodim 1630 came into her classroom and took away some of her female friends with no explanation. When LM came home after delivering food to her aunt, who was detained in Viqueque, she ran into the chief of the village of Waimori, C71. The Village Chief told her to come to his house in Beobe the next day and also to bring along her classmate NM:

> Right away that night I had to serve the Kodim Commander C72, NM served the Koramil Commander C73, and OM served Kraras [Village Guidance Officer] [Bibileo, Viqueque], who was C74. Every night I was picked up and brought to the Kodim to serve them and then in the morning I left for home but OM and NM never came home from the Kodim. This went on for three months until both OM and NM got pregnant, and they both had an abortion.
>
> After three months the Koramil Commander was inaugurated as the District Administrator of Viqueque and brought his wife from Java to Viqueque. From then on I never served the Koramil Commander again. Luckily I didn't become pregnant…at nights we would be picked up and brought to the Kodim, some school friends saw us, and I was so ashamed. I finally ended up leaving school.[244]

324. The pattern of clandestine members being targeted by the Indonesian military in sexual violations cases continued in the 1980s. No distinction seemed to be made between female clandestine members that were adults and those who were still children.

One source told the Commission that a 12-year-old girl was held captive for three months in 1980 at the Special Forces headquarters in Farol, Dili. She was subjected to sexual slavery by special force members, who took turns with her. This occurred because the victim's house was known to be a clandestine information point.[245]

325. PM was 17 years old in 1980, when ABRI took her and her husband from their home in Macadiqui village (Uatolari, Viqueque) to the Uatolari Koramil. PM had been involved in clandestine activities such as providing food to Falintil. At the Koramil, she was stripped naked and her clothes urinated on. Then three Hansips raped her, C75, C76 and C77, in front of her husband. Although her detention period is unclear, PM says that the Hansips raped her each night.[246] QM, another 17-year-old, from Dare, Mau Chiga (Hato Builico, Ainaro) had helped an injured Falintil soldier in August 1982. As a result she was taken by soldiers at the Dare Koramil and handed over to an ABRI unit operating on Mount Kablaki. They raped her every day until she escaped in October of that year.[247]

326. RM reported that she was 12 years old when she was captured in 1980, together with her father, RM1 in Suhurama, Dili, by two members of special forces. They were taken to Mandarin, a detention centre in Dili where the special forces soldiers, assisted by an interpreter called C78, interrogated them. During interrogation RM was burnt with cigarettes on her face and hands, and they lit her hair with a gas lighter till they scorched it. RM was held in a toilet. She was brought back to the sitting room where she witnessed her father and her uncle, RM2, being stripped, electrocuted and beaten with an iron bar. She also saw several girls being raped by members of Special Forces. After three weeks in Mandarin, RM and her father were moved to Balide Prison. When she was finally released, RM was raped by a member of Special Forces in Pantai Kelapa, Dili. She was released on condition that she reported regularly to the authorities for one year.[248]

327. In another incident the Commission heard that 19 clandestine members from around Viqueque were picked up by Kopassus in May 1986 and taken to the Kopassus headquarters in Baucau where they were interrogated and tortured about their activities. One of the group, Caetano Alves, described what he saw happen to four young women clandestine members: SM (14 years), TM (16 years), UM (ten years) and VM (16 years):

> I stood outside and looked through the window and saw that my friends were being treated in the same way as I had just experienced. No exception was made for my female friends who were stripped naked and then electrocuted on their breasts and genitals. In fact some girls were burned with cigarette butts on their body and on their genitals. As well as this mistreatment the girls were sexually harassed, such as through dirty language or being invited to sleep with them. Every day for five days, we were interrogated and treated in this way.[249]

328. The early 1980s saw strong military crackdowns on areas where Falintil uprisings had been staged. Sexual violence, including towards children, was part of the crackdown strategy. WM was born in 1966 and was about nine years old when she fled to Mount Kablaki with her family. Although her family later surrendered in Ainaro, they continued to assist Falintil soldiers. In 1982, following the levantamento in Dare (Hato Builico, Ainaro), WM was captured and tortured. She escaped death only because someone suggested using her as a kitchen maid and sex slave. WM was 17 years old at the time:

> [The soldiers] said "the Koramil Deputy Commander is an evil man, it would be better to take and kill her in Maumeta-Kio in the middle of Kali, than to let her live." But some disagreed and preferred that we stay in the Koramil and work in their kitchen. And then, every night we would be fetched…they said at the request of the Kodim Commander...Aware of our status as women prisoners, we just submitted to everything in despair. This went on routinely, then it was every two or three days we were fetched late at night.[250]

329. Like many other victims of sexual violence, WM became pregnant to her captors. She had a child to a member of ABRI named C79.

330. After the Mau Chiga (Ainaro) uprising, several young women from the area were arrested and then forced to "marry" a soldier. XM, a 15-year-old, was imprisoned in the Ainaro Kodim where she was repeatedly raped by intelligence agents on duty there: Kasi I C80, Sergeant-Major (Serka) C81, and Sergeant (Sersan) C82. XM was then moved to the Dare Koramil and was then forced to live in Seargeant C83's house until he returned home in 1999.

1990-1998

331. The number of incidents of sexual violence against minors declined in this period, perhaps as community life became more normalised and the opportunities for random acts of rape or molestation diminished. From the statements and research of the Commission, only one case from this period related to a child, although again it should be noted that 33.9% (289/853) of cases were missing data on the victim's age.

332. The incident reported to the Commission indicates that rape was still used to punish young female members of clandestine networks. YM was 15 in 1993 and living in Malabae (Atsabe, Ermera). She reported that she was caught returning with two other women from a meeting with Falintil and was later detained and raped at Polsek Atsabe by a police officer named C84 (currently serving in the National Police Force of Timor-Leste, PNTL).[251]

1999

333. In 1999, cases of sexual violence against women reported to the Commission occurred in the chaos and violence following the ballot. Villages were burnt and children separated from their families during the forced displacement of the population to West Timor. This left children vulnerable to violence and abuse.

334. Perhaps the most infamous of such cases is the story of ZM who was taken with a member of the militia to West Timor when she was 15 years old and has not returned home since.

ZM
(As told by her aunt, ZM1, in November 1999)

ZM's father ran to the mountains after the ballot. On 5 September 1999, ZM and her younger brother, ZM2 [13 years old] had run to the church in Suai [Covalima] with me, their aunt, ZM1, to be together with Father Hilario. On 6 September 1999, at about 2.45pm the church was attacked by the Mahidi and Laksaur militias, along with TNI and government officials. The attackers shot, bombed, tortured and burned. ZM saw her brother, ZM2, killed in the attack.

We were forced to leave the church and were made to divide into two groups - one group staying at the junior high school, the other group at the Kodim. We were at the Kodim for one week, from 6-12 September. While we were there, in front of my very own eyes and also in front of District Administrator Herman, a Laksaur militia man named C86, took away ZM. He said, "You are a gift from the war to me." From this time ZM was taken from her family and brought with C86 wherever he went to do his acts of violence.

C86 brought ZM to the Laksaur headquarters in Raihenek refugee camp in Betun (Suai, Covalima) with his two other wives. ZM was guarded by Laksaur militia wherever she went, even to the bathroom. She was made to sleep in the middle with C86's wives. When I first met her, she only cried and did not say anything because we were being watched. She was once so sick she had to be put on the drip. I was allowed to see her once, guarded by Laksaur militia.

She is now two months pregnant (November 1999). She is still in the hands of the Laksaur, specifically C86. The family wants her return, but we fear for her life.[252]

At this point, ZM remains with C86 in West Timor, Indonesia.

335. Following the massacre in the Suai Church, the women and children and Suai were held captive in a junior high school building. AN was 17 years old at the time. She remembers each night the women being taken outside individually. She told of her turn:

> On 11 September 1999…the Laksaur militia shone a torch into my face and then opened my sarong…They ordered me to wake up and threatened that, if I didn't…they would shoot everybody lying near me. I was forced to get up and then they dragged me outside and a militia member called C87 took me away. I was raped and then taken back to the building. All I could do then was cry.[253]

336. Following this, the women were taken to another building. AN was raped again on 14 September; this time by a policeman who was also a member of the Indonesian Intelligence.

337. Several cases from Aileu District are also indicative of events at the time. In September 1999, BN was 14 years old when she was moved from her home in Liquidoe (Aileu) to Aileu town in preparation for flight to Atambua. She and her elder sister stayed in the local health centre building. BN was called to the house of the sub-district head and on the way was raped by militia member C88 from the Aileu Strengthen Integration (Aileu Hametin Integrasi, AHI) militia and then by a member of the Mobile Police Brigade (Brimob). She described:

> But then, when we were half-way there, C88 forced me into an empty house near the Aileu football field. When we got there C88 threatened me with a knife to let myself be raped by him. Because I was afraid, I let him do what he wanted with me. The next night, I was taken again by three members of the mobile police brigade [identities not known] to an empty house near the Aileu community health centre where one of them raped me. The other two didn't join in but guarded the door with their weapons.[254]

338. On 1 September 1999, CN, a 12-year-old girl, attended a traditional dance practice for the CNRT campaign in her village of Namleso (Lequidoe, Aileu). On 9 September, the AHI militia came and burnt the houses in her village. The next day they returned and started shooting and CN and her family ran away. When they reached the main road, a militia member C89 approached her, slapped her in the face, grabbed her breasts and buttocks and threatened to kill her with his gun.

339. Also in Aileu, on 4 September 1999, DN fled to Aileu town with her mother because they heard their village of Seloi Kraik was to be burnt down. DN was 17 years old at the time and stayed with her uncle in Aileu but after several days a member of the militia, C90, threatened her mother to give DN to him. He held DN for one week, raping her at night time. When she tried to escape she was threatened with death. On 14 September, C90 took DN with him to Dili and then she travelled with his family to Atambua. DN lived with C90's family in Atambua for two weeks until his wife became suspicious and DN admitted that she had been taken as a second wife. She was thrown out of the house and eventually made her way back home.[255]

340. EN has a similar story from Ainaro. She told how on 23 September 1999, when she was nine years old, the Mahidi militia came and burnt her village and forced the population to walk with them to Atambua. EN walked with her mother but her mother fell too far behind and was shot by C91, a member of the Mahidi and a relative of her father's.

341. When they reached Betun (West Timor), C91 took EN to live with him and his wife. She was kept in a room with no door for one week and raped each night by C91. She explained:

> At night C91 would take the opportunity while his wife was sleeping to come into my room. I wanted to scream but C91 would put his hand over my mouth. Then he would force off my clothes and he would sleep on top of me. My body was not covered by a single thread. C91 kissed me and raped me three times, although not for long because he was afraid his wife would find out.[256]

342. After one week EN was collected by her uncle, a member of the TNI.

The transfer of children to Indonesia

343. From the first years of the occupation until the arrival of peacekeepers in September 1999, several thousand East Timorese children were taken or moved to Indonesia. Although some of these children maintained contact with their families and were eventually able to return, others never came back to Timor-Leste and their fate or whereabouts are not known to their families.

344. In the early years after the invasion, most cases of children taken to Indonesia involved individual soldiers who took children opportunistically, usually without family or other consent. As time went by, the practice of transferring children became more officially regulated. However, in practice children continued to be abducted or else parental consent was obtained through overt or more subtle forms of coercion.

345. Government officials, and later government departments, were also involved in the movement of children. From the late 1980s religious institutions assumed an increasingly large role in the practice. They sent East Timorese children to institutions in Indonesia to live and to study, in some cases without the consent of their families, or without providing a mechanism for families to remain in contact with their children.

346. Following the referendum in 1999, a new wave of transfers took place, driven by the dislocation of tens of thousands of families and a rearguard attempt by pro-integrationists to continue the struggle for Timor-Leste's future by other means. Most were children removed from camps in West Timor, often with the permission of parents or guardians seeking a safer place for the children in their care. However, some parents who agreed to the temporary removal of their children have found it difficult to bring them home again or even to contact them.

347. Writing about the 1999 period, the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) noted that:

> The wider struggle over East Timorese independence was to an extent projected onto and played out through the attempts to control the children.[257]

348. This statement is equally true for the entire period of the occupation. The widespread practice of removing children displayed a mindset that by taking control of Timor-Leste territory, Indonesia also gained unfettered control over its children. This was manifest throughout the New Order regime period in Indonesia. ABRI members and other individuals with power in Timor-Leste felt that they were entitled to take an East Timorese child home without their parents' permission.

349. There also arose the public display of East Timorese children at the Presidential Palace in Jakarta in 1977 (see the section below entitled Transfer by government officials and charitable organisations, par. 375-377). The practice, particularly as it became institutionalised during the course of the occupation, was often allied to the pursuit of wider political, religious or ideological objectives. The military, the government and religious bodies frequently acted in unison.

350. International standards govern how children, particularly children not in the care of a family, are to be treated by the state, both in situations of armed conflict and in peacetime. Under Geneva Convention IV, Indonesia as an Occupying Power had responsibilities towards Timor-Leste's children throughout the mandate period. Indonesia was required to:

- evacuate children from the field of conflict (Article 17);
- ensure that members of the same family were not separated (Article 49);
- ensure that children under 15 who were separated from their families or orphaned were not to left to fend for themselves (Article 24);
- ensure children were reunited with their parents or placed with family or friends (children should be placed in an institution only as a last resort);
- ensure all necessary steps were taken to identify children and register their parentage (Article 50) (the state cannot change a child's personal status); and
- ensure that education was provided, as far as possible, by persons of the same nationality, language and religion (Article 50).

351. By ratifying the the Convention on the Rights of the Child in September 1990 and as the effective state power in Timor-Leste, Indonesia accepted an obligation to give priority to the best interests of the child when making decisions in relation to children. This means that during the period of occupation Indonesia was required to:

- ensure that the child's views were taken into consideration where possible (Article 3(1);
- regulate adoption processes and ensure that adoption was undertaken by competent authorities according to the applicable law (Article 21);
- combat the illicit transfer of children abroad (Article 11);
- combat the abduction, sale or traffic of children (Article 35);
- ensure children were at all times free to choose their religion and other beliefs (Article 30);
- ensure that, where a child was separated from his/her family, the state provided care that took into account the child's cultural background (Article 20); and
- protect children from any kind of exploitation (Article 36).

352. Unlike the other sections in this part, the removal of children from Timor-Leste to Indonesia was not the subject of statistical research or analysis. Rather, the Commission's findings are drawn from extensive anecdotal evidence collected through interviews conducted by the Commission and independent researchers, both in Timor-Leste and in Indonesia, as well as secondary sources. The Commission has not heard any reports of, but has also not made specific inquiry into, children being involuntarily removed to other countries besides Indonesia.

The number of children sent to Indonesia

353. Because the removal of children from Timor-Leste to Indonesia was almost totally unregulated over the period of occupation and was carried out through a variety of different channels, it is impossible to determine the number of children removed with any precision. However, estimates can be made on the basis of various pieces of information. The ICRC told the Commission it had received just over 4,000 reports of missing people over the period, most from the late 1970s and 1980s. Hundreds of these were minors at the time of their disappearance and include children taken by soldiers after serving as TBOs.[258] Mario Carrascalão also told the Commission that over the ten years between 1982 and 1992 that he was Governor of Timor-Leste, 20-30 children were reported missing to him each year.[259]

354. The highest figure suggested was from a retired officer, who was stationed in Timor-Leste for nearly a decade in the late 1970s and early 1980s, and who served on the staff of General Benny Moerdani. He stated that soldiers took thousands of children from Timor-Leste. His estimate does not include children transferred by religious or charitable institutions over this period.[260]

355. When the children who were removed in 1999 are included, the total estimated number of children taken to Indonesia clearly rises but the figures cited vary markedly. A study undertaken jointly by the International Refugee Council (IRC) and UNHCR with the Student Solidarity Council in late 2001, after many refugees had returned home, estimated that a total of 2,400 children had been sent to Indonesia during the years of the occupation. A UNHCR representative told a public hearing that between 1976 and 1999 as many as 4,534 children may have been removed from Timor-Leste.*

356. Based on these estimates, the Commission is confident that several thousand children were sent to Indonesia from Timor-Leste. However, it is important to recognise that the removals took place along a spectrum from unregulated transfers of young children without consent being sought, to coercion of children and parents, to informed consent.

357. As well as the overall figures, the number of unresolved cases is also difficult to determine as different agencies use different criteria in deciding whether to keep a case open. A workshop organised by UNHCR, held in Dili in May 2003,[261] identified 770

* UNHCR testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, 29-30 March 2004. The figures indicate the total number of cases registered with UNHCR. From 1999 to 31 December 2004, 2,365 children were reunited with parents or guardians and 2,062 cases were closed due to transfer of responsibility for the children. There are still 107 cases pending; CAVR Interview with Manuel Carceres UNHCR, Dili, 28 March, 2005.

outstanding cases from the entire period of the occupation.* According to UNHCR, as of 29 February 2004, there were still 221 children in Indonesia separated from parents in Timor-Leste, down from 600 in June 2003. At the closure of UNHCR's reunification programme on 31 December 2004, there were still 107 cases pending; 72 children remain in Indonesia (Java and Sulawesi) and 27 children whose locations are unknown.[262] However, the UNHCR's mandate is limited to 1999 separations, does not include cases where both parents and children are in Indonesia and considers any case closed once the child turns 18. The number of children removed who have not yet returned is therefore certainly much higher.

Patterns over the mandate period

1976-1979

358. The majority of cases of children removed from Timor-Leste to Indonesia occurred in the period between 1976 and 1979. This was a period of massive disruption to East Timorese family and community life arising from the Indonesian invasion and the ensuing military operations. The prevailing climate of chaos, coercion and impunity, and the high numbers of children orphaned or separated from family members, created the conditions for widespread removal to take place.

359. Two patterns emerge from the Commission's research into this period. The first is that of low to middle-ranking officers either taking children found alone in combat areas or taking children directly from their families. Most such cases reported to the Commission occurred without parental or other consent. The second pattern is of children sent to Indonesia by government officials or high-profile charities. These patterns raise different issues of consent and state responsibility, and are considered separately below.

Children taken by individual soldiers

360. The Commission has received first-hand reports from both parents and children, and from members of the military, of children being taken from Timor-Leste by individual soldiers. As cited above, a retired officer in the Indonesian military estimates that thousands of children were taken in this way. The majority of these cases involved lower-ranking soldiers bringing children home with them when they returned home. One man, who left voluntarily by military ship in 1976 at the age of 18, remembers seeing a number of children on board:

> At that time there were 21 children on the boat. There were perhaps two who were in the same good situation as I was. There were others working for the company. There were also maybe some who had been abandoned…

---

* United Nations High Commissioner For Refugees, Evaluation And Policy Analysis Unit, Evaluation of UNHCR's repatriation and reintegration programme in East Timor, 1999-2003, prepared by Chris Dolan, Judith Large, Naoko Obi, UNHCR, Geneva, 24 February 2004, pp. 61; the breakdown was 508 male and 262 female children, with 29 aged 0-5, 262 aged 6-12, 228 aged 13-15 and 251 aged 16-18.

some didn't have parents so they had been brought along. Maybe some of [the soldiers] didn't have children.[263]

361. Children taken in this way were usually found in combat areas after their parents had been killed or they were separated from their families. The Commission heard evidence from the employees of two institutions where soldiers sometimes left these children pending their return home. According to one man who worked at the Wirahusada Hospital, the military hospital in Dili, in 1976 soldiers brought many small children from outside Dili to be cared for in the hospital. The children were usually very weak and underweight and many died. The same soldiers often took the survivors to Indonesia when their tours of duty ended. If they could, Timorese staff brought the children home with them from the hospital so that the soldiers would not take them.[264]

362. Soldiers also placed children in the care of the Seroja Orphanage in Dili.

The Seroja Orphanage

The Seroja Orphanage (Panti Asuhan Seroja) was opened by soldiers from Kodam (Regional Command) VIII Brawijaya on the site of an existing orphanage in Bairro Formosa, Dili, on 1 April 1976, shortly after the Indonesian invasion.

At the time of its opening there were 26 children at the orphanage, but the numbers quickly grew. Soldiers brought in children from combat areas.*

According to Guilherme dos Reis Fernandes, who worked at the Seroja Orphanage for many years and was its head from 1988 to 1990, the institution accepted not only orphans but also children who had lost one parent, had parents in the forest or whose parents could not afford to pay the fees at ordinary schools. He also remembers:

Many children were brought from the districts without explanation, and there were often parents who came looking for their children and took them back.

One of his former colleagues at the orphanage added that the children were often dropped off with little or no information about where they had been found or the circumstances that had led them to being brought there. Language barriers frequently compounded these problems. According to one resident:

Sometimes our names were changed to the name of the soldier that brought us to the Seroja (Orphanage).[265]

* CAVR Interview with Maria Margarida Babo, Dili, [undated], who worked at the Seroja from 10 days after its opening.

In addition to caring for children until soldiers were ready to take them to Indonesia, Seroja played a direct role in the transfer of groups of children from Timor-Leste. Guilherme dos Reis Fernandes was told that, in the two years when Seroja was in military hands (before he began working there) about 60 children were sent to Indonesia from the orphanage. Among them was the group known as "the President's Children", of whom Petrus Kanisius Alegria was one (see box following par. 377, below). Mario Carrascalão told the Commission that under his predecessor, Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, the orphanage also organised the transfer of children to Bandung (West Java) and Semarang (Central Java).

In August 1978, Kodam Brawijaya handed the orphanage over to the provincial Social Services Department. Soldiers still came to visit the approximately 80 children on holidays or to celebrate unit anniversaries. One former resident recalls that after the arrival of a group of 15 children from Ataúro in about 1983, soldiers came regularly to check if the children had had any contact with their parents.[266]

After the handover to Social Services, one staff member remembers an oral directive that East Timorese children were not to be adopted by people from outside the territory, especially soldiers.

363. Other soldiers took children who had served them as TBOs. Alfredo Reinado Alves recalls his departure from Dili by ship:

> I saw many other children on the boat though I don't know how many. We had seven children with our platoon. An Indonesian battalion had four companies and three platoons to a company. If we make a rough estimate that there were 3 to 4 children per platoon, then altogether there might have been about 30 to 40 children. But there may have been platoons where the commander followed instructions and did not allow his men to take children home with them.[267]

364. Alfredo Reinado Alves' story also demonstrates how children were tricked into leaving Timor-Leste (see text box following par. 419, below).

365. The Commission also heard of a number of cases in which soldiers abducted children from their families. In Ponilala, Ermera, a child named Veronica was taken from her mother in 1977 when she was eight months old. Manuel Martins worked at the time as a TBO for an Indonesian soldier he remembers as C92, a member of the military police. He recalls that he saw C92 giving clothes and milk to Veronica, bathing her and carrying her around. C92 said he had no daughters and that Veronica looked just like his own child. On the day that C92's tour of duty in Ermera ended, he came to the house and took Veronica, leaving a bag of rice. He promised to educate her and send her back to Timor-Leste but the family has had no contact with Veronica since, even though her mother has asked the ICRC for help in tracing her daughter.[268]

Yuliana (Bileki)

Another account may have a happier ending. A five-year-old girl, Buileki, from Dare (Hato Builico, Ainaro) was taken to Jakarta in 1978 by a Kopassus soldier, who had befriended her with chocolate and gifts. After five days with his family she was passed on to two other families. The last one proved to be a good home for her and she was re-named Yuliana. As an adult and married with three children of her own, Yuliana tried unsuccessfully to find her family in Timor-Leste through the newspaper. She met a Commission researcher in Jakarta and successfully found them through the Commission radio.[269] Yuliana was brought over to Timor-Leste by the Commission in July 2004 and was reunited with her family in the mountains of Ainaro. She told her story at a public hearing of the Commission.

One Sunday after the first mass, a soldier chased me and when he caught me he took me to the airfield in Ainaro. I was put on a helicopter and taken to Dili. As I was about to be taken, my uncle didn't want to let me go because C93 was not my father and at the time [because] there was a war on, I was separated from my parents. In Dili I lived with the military wives in a boarding house. I was almost lost in Dili once when I tried to run away and find my parents, my uncle and the rest of my family.

After three or six months in Dili, when the war in Ainaro was over, C93 came back to Dili and then straight away I was taken to Jakarta. In Jakarta I lived with C93 for a bit less than a year and then I changed hands several times. From C93 I went to live with Mr Ordin, and then finally I lived with my adoptive father, Tatang Yogosara. I was so sad because I was still little. I was so lonely when I lived with Mr Tatang Yogosara's family. At the time, all I could remember was my parents' names, Kuilbere and Maria, and my older brother, Maumali, as well as my real name, Bileki.

For the time I lived with Mr Tatang Yogosara's family I didn't feel like I was treated differently because I was an outsider. I lived with a family that loved each other. Now I have my own family and three children. My husband, Petrus Tapis, is from Tanah Toraja in Ujung Pandang, Sulawesi. My three children are Veronika Ratu Rosari, Klara Monika Misi, and Abraham Moris.

Actually, in 1999 before the destruction in Timor-Leste, I was already looking for my family through the newspaper Suara Timor Timur. I put a notice in the paper…I almost had an answer…the newspaper told me that my older brother Maumali had looked for me. But after [the ballot] I didn't hear anything more until I met Mrs Filomena and Mrs Helena [a researcher who worked for the Commission].

My husband is a good citizen who values peoples' rights, he knows my nationality, he knows I am Timorese and that I have to go to Timor not to leave behind my family, no! It's just that heaven forbid if God called me before I had met my own family.[270]

366. Maria Legge Mesquita was taken by soldiers after her father was killed in the forest. She and other kidnapped children were rescued by one resourceful family just as they were about to leave for Indonesia:

> When the army was ready to leave, after their tour was over, they took five children, including me, and put us in crates. We were put in crates, one per crate, like chickens. I remember there was one family, who worked for the Red Cross, who searched for their children - they were afraid their children had been taken by the soldiers. They found us and we were all let go. Members of that family were then beaten but we weren't found again and we didn't end up leaving.[271]

367. Maria's story demonstrates that children were not only abducted but families that resisted were punished.

368. QN's story is similar:

Abduction of a baby in Ermera

QN's mother told her how she was almost abducted by a member of the military. Virginia was born in 1978 and lived with her family in a concentration camp in Kota Lama (Old Town), Ermera. A company commander at the camp, C94 from Sulawesi,* forced her older brother to become a TBO. He also wanted to take Virginia, but her family resisted. Then QN was put into a box by the officer and taken to Dili.

Her mother immediately reported the kidnapping to the pastor in Ermera, who contacted nuns and pastors in Dili. A TBO who was working at the Kodim reported to the nuns that there was a baby from Ermera in a box at the Kodim. Virginia's mother came straight away to Dili and challenged the soldier who had taken her child. She was kicked a number of times but finally, because she refused to back down, he let her see the baby. Fortunately, she was able to prove it was her daughter because she was able to show that the baby had a birthmark on the back of her neck and Virginia was returned to her mother.

* Virginia remembers the company commander coming from Infantry Battalion 152 but the Commission's research indicates that it was more likely to have been Infantry Battalion 122.

But there were grave consequences for QN's family as a result of this confrontation and the officer still managed to take a baby away with him. Back in Ermera, C94 shot at QN's mother and arrested QN's 18-year-old brother and beat and tortured him. He was put in a hole full of filth, where his mother found him a few days later. Two of QN's older sisters were also tortured and raped by C94, and one became pregnant and gave birth to a baby daughter. C94 came back to Ermera and took this baby girl with him back to Indonesia. No news of the child's fate has ever been received by the family.[272]

369. QN's story is one of many in which soldiers asked (or pressured) parents or guardians for permission to take their children back with them to Indonesia.

370. Domingos de Deus Maia, a priest who was working in the Letefoho (Ermera) concentration camp in 1977, remembers soldiers asking him to sign a letter releasing a child so that they could take the child home to Indonesia with them. He refused. Not long after, the parents of two other children told him that the army was going to forcibly take their children. He immediately complained to the commander, a Christian, who then went over to a truck that was being loaded ready to leave Letefoho. The commander unloaded the truck and found a child hidden inside a case. A shouting match then started among the soldiers.[273]

371. Sometimes, parents were asked to sign adoption papers. They agreed for a variety of reasons. In some cases they gave in to outright threats and coercion. The Commission also heard of cases in which the pressure was more subtle, stemming from a climate in which it was virtually impossible to refuse a soldier's request. Others believed that their children would be safer or better educated outside of Timor-Leste. In the latter situation, many parents were told that their child would be returned home one day, a promise that was rarely kept.

372. In some cases formal adoption documents were drawn up and signed by military officials. One set of adoption papers consists of a handwritten agreement witnessed by the Bobonaro Koramil Commander, the Sub-district administrator and several others, together with a printed statement naming the natural and adoptive parents and their respective witnesses.* However, again agreements to give up children for adoption were not always made freely.

* This document is in the CAVR Archive. The document also has signatures from the Company Commander of the headquarters for Battalion 507 and the head of Bobonaro Village (Bobonaro).

Forced adoption: Aida's story

In 1975 I had just come out of the forest and was living in a camp in Bobonaro. My husband had died but I had one girl child named Constantina, who was about three years old. While we were living there, [an Indonesian soldier] called C95 used to take my child over to the military post. Every morning he would come and take her and in the afternoon he would bring her back. He always said it was just for fun. This happened for quite a long time, although I never went to the military post because we were scared of soldiers. There was always a question in my mind about why that soldier would come and take my child so often.

One day he came to me and said: "I like your child so much because I don't have any children myself." It's true that he was not very young - already old enough [to have had children]. He went on: "I would like to take her home. I want to give her an education and after that she can come back." He said that as a single woman I would not be able to send her to school.

He said I had to go with him to the Koramil to put my name down. My father and uncle were also called to come with us. There were people at the Koramil but I don't know who they were and I can't read. I don't know if the commander was there or not. I don't know if everyone who signed was actually there. Temukung (the head of my village) also couldn't read the documents and didn't know what they said because we didn't know Indonesian and they didn't tell me what they were. C95 just said that he wanted to send her to school and then she would come back. He gave me some money but nothing more than that.

It turned out that C95 was ready to leave. His bags were already packed. After he left, my family said that I had left my thumbprint [on the documents] and so we couldn't do anything about it. I only gave away my child because I was afraid. They had guns and I felt like I didn't have a choice. But I live now with the hope of that man's promise that one day my child will come back to me…I often go to the edge of the sea, breathe in the fresh air and remember my child taken from me across those waters.[274]

Was the removal of children official military policy?

373. The Commission has found little evidence that the taking of East Timorese children to Indonesia was official military policy.* Indeed, the evidence suggests that, at least when lower-ranking personnel were involved, higher-ranking military officers did not approve of the practice. A pattern common to several of the cases cited above is that the children were taken surreptitiously - packed in boxes and smuggled out by ship. Alfredo Alves (see text box following par. 419, below) remembers being hidden in a box after hearing the military police say that the soldiers were not allowed to take children home to Sulawesi. Domingos de Deus Maia's account of soldiers being reprimanded by their commanding officer for taking children is additional evidence that soldiers acted on their own initiative.

* Although there are persistent rumours of military documents instructing soldiers to take children to Indonesia to educate them as Muslims, the Commission has not been able to locate them.

374. There is evidence that after a few years the military attempted to regulate the removal of children by requiring, for example, both parents' and the authorities' consent.* However, there is not enough evidence to determine whether these measures were sufficient to reduce the number of children taken to Indonesia. In practice, in the prevailing climate of coercion, such measures could not guarantee that parental permission was freely given. There is considerable evidence that soldiers evaded the regulations, as in the numerous cases of children being smuggled out of Timor-Leste aboard ships. Moreover, there could be no certainty that once in Indonesia, a transferred child was looked after by the family of the soldier who had signed an agreement or that the child received an education. Indeed there is abundant evidence that children were given to families who wanted children, or that they were placed in an institution. There is no evidence to suggest that the practice of passing children on in this way fell within any system of regulation.

Transfer by government officials and charitable organisations

375. It was not just soldiers who took children from Timor-Leste to Indonesia in the years immediately after the invasion. Government officials and charitable foundations, including President Soeharto's family, were also involved. Their activities were generally better organised and they purportedly offered to provide East Timorese children with an education. However, again regulation was lacking, children were taken without parental permission and parents' right to maintain contact with their children was often ignored.

376. The Commission heard of a member of the Indonesian Legislative Body (Dewan Perwakilan Rakyat, DPR) in Jakarta who came to Timor-Leste and sought to convince parents to send their children to Indonesia where they would be sent to school. C96 was originally from West Timor, but before the Indonesian invasion lived in the village of Boebe (Viqueque). She then became a member of the DPR, representing Timor-Leste. In 1977, she approached a number of parents, including a woman named Ana Maria, and promised them that their children would receive an education in Java. Ana Maria agreed to send her son Cipriano. A few days later, C96 came and collected Cipriano along with four other children from his village and three more from another village,

* Permission may not have been difficult to obtain. A member of the Seroja Orphanage staff told the Commission about a boy named Thomas who was living at Seroja. Representatives of an Association of Military Wives (Persatuan Isteri Tentara) came to the orphanage with a letter of recommendation from their organisation and permission from the Department of Social Services to adopt the two-year-old boy, CAVR Interview with Maria Margarida Babo, Dili, [undated].

and took them with her by army helicopter. According to his uncle, Duarte Sarmento, Cipriano and his cousin were given to C96 with their parents' permission because of the difficult circumstances at the time but they were told that they would be given their children's address in Java. Cipriano's cousin returned to Timor-Leste for the first time in 1984 but without Cipriano. He told his family that the wife of a soldier had visited the Seroja Orphanage and taken two children with her, Cipriano and a girl from Ainaro.*

377. Soeharto family foundations played a major role in funding institutions engaged in finding, transferring, accommodating and educating East Timorese children in this period. The retired military officer, already quoted on the numbers of children taken by soldiers, explained that most children were placed in private educational institutions run by Muslims, Catholics or Protestants. Their fees were usually paid by 11 March Decree Foundation (Yayasan Supersemar), a foundation funded and managed by the Soeharto family.[275] The perceived propaganda value of this arrangement is illustrated by the high-profile transfer to Java of a group of children known as "The President's Children".

"The President's Children"

In 1977, a group of 20 children were sent to Java, apparently in an effort to improve public perceptions of Timor-Leste. Petrus Kanisius Alegria, one of several "representatives" from Aileu District, was the oldest member of the group:

> On 1 September 1977, I and some other children were taken to Jakarta. We were brought by Lieutenant-Colonel Mulyadi [from Sulawesi]. The Governor of Timor-Leste at that time was Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo. He also came along with us to Jakarta. Our families weren't told that we were being brought to Jakarta. We arrived in Jakarta on 6 September 1977.[276]

Petrus Kanisius Alegria had been brought to the Seroja Orphanage in April 1977 by soldiers from the Aileu Kodim. His parents had died before the invasion and he was living with an older brother in Aileu when a soldier from the Kodim told his brother that they were looking for children aged 10-11 whose parents had died in the forest to send to Dili to study.[277] His brother was not told about, and therefore did not consent to, Petrus being sent to Indonesia.

The children, whose average age was ten and who came from the western and central districts, were sent in a military Hercules transport plane.[278]

* CAVR Interview with Duarte Sarmento, Kupang, West Timor, 8 February 2004; CAVR Interviews with another child [name withheld], Bandung, Indonesia, 28 and 31 January 2004. Another child went with soldiers voluntarily and was given several opportunities to visit her family in Timor-Leste but always chose to return to Java. CAVR Interviews with Achmad Viktor da Silva, Jakarta, Indonesia, March 2003 and 22 January 2004.

On arrival in Jakarta they were taken to tourist sites such as Taman Mini (East Jakarta) and attended a welcoming ceremony attended by President Soeharto and the vice president, Sultan Hamengkubowono IX. The President told them:

> You are our children, owned by the state, and we will be responsible for your welfare. From now on your food, clothing and schooling, including your advanced education, is the state's responsibility.[279]

The children's transfer was supported by a Soeharto foundation, Yayasan Dharmais.[*] Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, the Governor of Timor-Leste, sent a letter dated 25 August 1977 to Dharmais. There was a signed agreement between Dharmais and the Saint Thomas Orphanage in Unggaran (Semarang, Central Java), dated 4 September 1977,[†] in which Dharmais promised to fund the children's food, clothing and education.[‡]

Soeharto told the media that his foundation would provide Rp150 a day for each child. Despite this assurance, according to Petrus Kanisius Alegria, the orphanage did not receive sufficient funds to care for the children properly.[280]

1980–1989

378. In the 1980s, the practice of soldiers bringing children home with them to Indonesia continued. Often these children were orphaned or had been separated from their parents. The number of orphans in Timor-Leste at that time was certainly high; Mario Carrascalão commissioned a study and arrived at a figure of over 40,000, many of whom were in institutions:

> The problem was those who were not in the care of the Catholic Missions. This was used by the military. There were some who liked white-skinned children. They liked children with mixed blood. They were the ones they took to Indonesia.[281]

379. In the 1980s, there emerged a new pattern of children being taken by high-level civilian and military officials. According to Mario Carrascalão:

* The Governor's letter was copied to the Ministers of Internal and Social Affairs in Jakarta and the head of Social Welfare (Dinas Kesejateraan Sosial) in Dili. It was also given to the District Coordinator (Kordinator Wilayah, Korwil) and the Commander of the Regional Defence and Security Command (Kodahankam) as well as the Commander of the Korem Territory of Defense and Security (Danrem Dahankam).

† It was witnessed by the District Administrator (Bupati) of Semarang, Iswarto and the head of the Social Welfare Department in Semarang, Kardoyo Karjosoemarto. For the St. Thomas Orphanage it was signed by Sister Petrona and for Dharmais by Soedardi.

‡ "Children are dropped off…therefore they receive care, service and a good education. The cost of the children's food, clothing and education is the responsibility of the Foundation and is in accordance with the cabability and regulations of the Dharmais Foundation."

When Indonesian armed forces personnel returned to Indonesia, they always took children with them. All the high-ranking officers, like [Brigadier-General] C101 [Commander of Kolakops [Komando Pelaksanaan Operasi, Operations Implemenation Command from 1990-91] and [Brigadier-General] C102 [Commander of Kolakops, 1987-88] took children home with them.[282]

380. TNI Major-General C103 served as a Kopassus intelligence officer in Timor-Leste in the 1980s and returned in 1999 as the TNI representative on the Indonesian Task Force for the Implementation of the Popular Consultation in Timor-Leste. He had about ten young boys living in his Jakarta house at one time. They included the cousins Mario Freitas and Hercules, whose parents were killed during bombing attacks in 1978. They worked in his garden, cleaned and did guard duty. Mario Freitas ran away after being pressured to convert to Islam and was educated by Catholic priests in Jakarta and Bali, while Hercules became a gang leader in Jakarta.[283] C104 also "adopted" ten East Timorese youths.*

The case of Thomas da Costa

Thomas da Costa was born in Lospalos (Lautém) on 3 April 1980. When ABRI attacked Fretilin in the forest, his father, a Fretilin member, was shot dead. Thomas, who was around five years old at the time, and his family were arrested by the Indonesian military and taken to the Koramil at Iliomar (Lautém). The soldiers separated Thomas from his mother and other family members and brought him to the Infantry Battalion 745 barracks in Lospalos where he was handed over to Major C105 from Battalion 745.

After a number of days of interrogation, Major C105 started giving jobs to Thomas such as collecting firewood, cooking, drawing water and washing clothes. Thomas spent several months with Battalion 745 before C105 told him that he was to start attending the elementary school nearby. He went to school but kept up his work with the military.

Around 1989, Major C105 returned to Indonesia and took Thomas with him to his village of Bantul (Yogyakarta, Indonesia). C105's family took Thomas in and he went to school at the Bantul elementary school for another year before graduating. He then continued on to junior high school but around this time C105's wife started beating him and treating

* Keith Loveard, "Rising 2-Star", Asiaweek, 18 April 1997. Mario Carrascalão heard that when Prabowo's wife, the President's daughter Titiek Suharto, came to Timor-Leste in the early 1990s, she asked the Deputy Governor, Brigadier-General AB Saridjo, to find her a child whose parents were fighting in the mountains and could not claim him or her back. According to Mario Carrascalão, a child from Lospalos was sent to Jakarta but he does not know what happened after that, though he did hear that Prabowo's wife wanted to return the child. CAVR Interview with Mario Carrascalão, Dili, 12 September 2003.

him like a servant. After one incident in which Thomas was mistreated by C105 and his wife, they yelled at him, "You are a Fretilin child! Go home to your own place!" Thomas ran away and found a boat that could take him home. He arrived back in Dili on 11 May 1998 and caught a bus to Lospalos where he was reunited with his family.[284]

381. There were several possible reasons why high-level civilian and military officials supported the transfer of children. The public "adoption" of children was probably intended to reinforce the impression that Timor-Leste was part of Indonesia. The promise to care for them was an illustration of the Indonesian assertion that it was developing the territory, in contrast to Portugal, and the belief that this would strengthen Indonesia's claim to sovereignty over Timor-Leste. It is unknown if any of these children experienced any form of slavery in Indonesia.

Religious institutions and the transfer of children

382. In the 1980s, Indonesian religious institutions also began to be active in Timor-Leste. One important aspect of their activity was the transfer of children to religious schools in Indonesia. One of the most important of these religious institutions was a missionary body called the Indonesian Islamic Missionary Council (Dewan Dakwah Islamiyah Indonesia, DDII). According to the head of the DDII-affiliated Sultan Alauddin mosque in Makassar (South Sulawesi), there were DDII missionaries working in Timor-Leste from 1983. However, because the missionaries could not conduct their activities freely, DDII organised the transfer of children from Timor-Leste to Makassar between the late 1980s and early 1990s. Reportedly, these transfers were carried out in collaboration with members of the military's "Spiritual Guidance" section.[285]

383. In 1982, the Nasrullah Islamic Welfare Association (Yayasan Kesejahteraan Islam Nasrullah, Yakin), was established on a large plot of land in Culuhun (Dili). The organisation built primary and secondary schools, including a technical senior high school and an Islamic school (pesantren) with accommodation for students from the districts.* Yakin recruited students from poor families in Lautém, Baucau, Viqueque and Same, not all of them Muslim.

384. Between 1983 and 1999, Yakin organised the transfer of some of these children, who included orphans, to pesantren in Indonesia. Most of these children were aged ten or above.[286] Salim Sagran, the head of Yakin, reported to a Commission researcher that the Foundation received the formal consent of the parents. However, the Commission was unable to verify this as it was told that all of its records had been lost in 1999.* Interviews by Commission staff and independent researchers with parents of children taken to Indonesia through the Yakin network have failed to confirm that parents did indeed sign consent forms. Other foundations which are reported to have sent children to study in Muslim schools were Hidayatullah, An-Nur and the Lemorai Foundation.[287]

* Indonesian Islamic Missionary Council [Dewan Dakwah Islamiyah Indonesia, DDII] established Yakin on 18 July 1981, George J. Aditjondro, Suharto's Foundations: the Scope, the Impact and the Responsibilities [Yayasan-yayasan Suharto: Cakupan, Dampak, dan Pertanggungjawabannya], 31 January 1998, pp. 134, <http://www.geocities.com/CapitolHill/Senate/4427/mpr.htm> at 30 March 2005.

385. East Timorese children recruited by organisations such as DDII and Yakin went to study in Islamic institutions throughout Indonesia. The largest groups were probably those in South Sulawesi and Bandung, but there were others in schools in the Greater Jakarta area (Jakarta, Bogor, Bekasi and Tangerang), Central Java (Salatiga) and East Java (Surabaya, Jombang and Malang). An independent researcher told the Commission that the coordinator of the East Timor Muslim Students (Mahasiswa Muslim Asal Timor-Timur, Mamtim) told him that it was very difficult to keep track of the identities or numbers of the children as no records were kept. The children were not supervised by any one organisation and on arrival in orphanages and pesantren, many changed their names. Yakin and Al-Nur reportedly funded their studies with the intention that they return to Timor-Leste to spread Islam after they graduated.[288]

1990–1998

386. The practice of soldiers taking children to Indonesia apparently continued in the 1990s. Leonel Guterres remembers children being taken away from Quelicai (Baucau) by soldiers in the years 1993-1995. One group of 13 children, aged five to ten, were all from poor families. The soldiers asked the parents if they could take their children but Leonel said that with soldiers there was no choice. Some of these children have since come back to their homes in Quelicai.[289]

Children taken by religious institutions

387. In the 1990s, there was an increase in the number of children moved to Indonesia sponsored by religious institutions. In the early years of the Indonesian occupation, the activities of Islamic organisation were restricted but the rise in the influence of Islam in Indonesia in the mid-1990s made it possible for these organisations to operate more openly in Timor-Leste and for Timor-Leste based institutions and national organisations to continue the recruitment of children to study in Pesantren and other institutions throughout Indonesia.

388. Most, but not all, of these children were from either long-standing or recently converted Muslim communities. Frequently, East Timorese, who had been taken to Indonesia to study in earlier years, returned to Timor-Leste after graduation and recruited a new generation of students. Some students approached in this way were non-

* "Yakin found students according to the profiles [numbers, age and sex] of the requesting institution in Indonesia. If they had them already in the institution in Culuhun in Dili, those students were sent; otherwise they sent a representative or member of staff to the districts to inform the ustad, religious teacher at the mosque, of requests for children. He collected them and brought them back to Dili." Interview with Salim Sagran as quoted in Helene van Klinken, Islamic Children Educated in Indonesian, Submission to CAVR, 2003, pp. 5.

Muslims but saw an opportunity to receive an education. Once in Indonesia, they were given new names and encouraged to convert. Muslim institutions also went to poor and remote areas to recruit children, promising their parents that they would provide their children with a good education and then return them.

389. It appears that both Muslim and non-Muslim families had difficulty maintaining contact with their children and securing their return. When one student who had completed his studies in such an institution was due to return home in 2000, many of his fellow East Timorese students asked him how they too could return to Timor-Leste. Most of them originated from Manufahi, Viqueque, Baucau and Lautém; some do not know their parents because they were taken away when they were very young.[289]

Programmes of the Ministries of Education and Culture and Manpower

390. In the 1990s government departments also implemented programmes in Timor-Leste involving the transfer of children to Indonesia. These programmes were ostensibly created to increase education and employment opportunities for East Timorese youth and in that sense were not a violation of children's rights. The Commission has heard, however, that children were forced to participate in the programmes, which constituted a restriction on their freedom of movement. Further, it demonstrates that the forced transfer of children was becoming official government policy for political and security objectives.

391. The Ministry of Manpower (Departemen Tenaga Kerja, Depnaker) programmes seem to have had the primary objective of reducing the pool of unemployed youths prone to participate in demonstrations or other forms of political activity. The Ministry of Manpower launched its first programme in 1990, working together with the Tiara Foundation headed by Siti Hardiyanti Rukmana, President Soeharto's daughter, to bring young East Timorese to work in Indonesia. The children were sent to work in factories linked to the President's family, such as the Indocement factory in Cibinong (Bogor, West Java), the two textile plants, Kanindotex in Bawen (Semarang, Central Java) and Sritex in Sukoharjo (Solo, Central Java), and Barito Pacific's sawmill in East Kalimantan.[291]

392. The launch of these programmes came soon after the decision to open Timor-Leste. Perhaps more significantly, it coincided with the beginning of the wave of demonstrations, protests and general social unrest that was a persistent feature of the last decade of the Indonesian occupation. Some of these manifestations of unrest, such as the ethnic and religious tensions that flared up across Timor-Leste in January 1995, were clearly linked to the mounting frustrations of unemployed East Timorese youth.

393. Often the promises of well-paid jobs that drew young people to Java and other parts of Indonesia were not fulfilled. A 1992 Asia Watch report found that the young people who left Timor-Leste as part of the programme generally did so voluntarily but:

> because they were deceived as to the true nature of the jobs and training they would be getting, and because they did not have the money to return, the whole project became tantamount to forced labor.[292]

394. First-hand accounts indicate that the military was heavily involved in the recruitment of young workers, including coercing youths into joining the programmes. João da Costa, from Baucau, was 17 years old and involved in clandestine activities when a relative serving with the Indonesian military pressured him to join a Ministry of Manpower (Depnakar) programme. He was one of a group of 75 youths recruited to work in Indonesia at that time. Some members of the group were younger than him, all but five of them were male and nearly all of them were from Dili or Baucau. The military organised their transportation to Dili, where they stayed in military accommodation, and then interviewed the youths. João was asked whether he knew about Fretilin or was involved in the Santa Cruz demonstration. They also received military-style training, referred to as Physical, Mental Discipline (Fisik, Mental Disiplin, FMD), from Infantry Battalion 744.[293]

395. On his arrival at his destination, Makassar (Sulawesi, Indonesia), João was given an allowance and undertook a building course and work experience organised by the Ministry of Manpower but did not receive a job as promised. He eventually found work but in March 1999 he returned to Timor-Leste to campaign for the referendum, along with most of the others in the group.[294]

1999*

396. There are many reports of children being taken to Indonesia after the referendum. Some of these cases occurred in the context of evacuations of children out of the territory for the children's safety. For instance, the Seroja Orphanage evacuated the children in its care in September 1999 after militias took Seroja's vehicles and threatened that they would attack the Orphanage with grenades if staff did not evacuate its residents.[295] Taking the route followed by many of the people who were being forcibly evacutated from Dili at the time, the 74 children then living at Seroja, as well as staff members and their families, were taken to the police station and then to the Dili port where they boarded a boat to Kupang (Indonesia). After ten days, officials from the Kinderdorf headquarters in Bandung (West Java) helped them go to a Kinderdorf orphanage in Flores (East Nusa Tenggara, Indonesia). On 4 November 1999, the children were handed to UNHCR, which brought them back to Timor-Leste. They stayed with the Carmelite Sisters until they could be returned to their families. Several could not find their families and remained at the convent.[296]

397. The anarchy of the weeks following the referendum fostered a climate that encouraged the movement of children out of West Timor. Many children were separated from their families, either as their parents went into hiding or as they lost them in the chaos. Many were taken under the wing of self-appointed guardians. Parents and guardians living in conditions of deprivation and military and militia intimidation in camps in West Timor found offers to care for and educate their children outside the camps attractive, and might sign in haste an agreement with institutions offering safety and sustenance to their children. In such conditions, it could not be said that parents always gave their consent freely or fully understood the consequences of their decisions.* Further, as the cases below illustrate, the conditions in which children were kept was not always as institutions had promised.

* Many of the children taken from camps in West Timor and sent to institutions in Indonesia were separated from their parents after October 1999, the end of the period of CAVR's mandate. However, because the separations took place as a result of the events of September 1999 and represent a continuation of practices established in earlier years, this section would not be complete without at least a brief consideration of this practice.

398. The Indonesian Protestant Foundation Love Peace (Cinta Damai), had worked in Matata in Ermera District during the occupation. The foundation had approached parents asking for permission to take their children to Kupang (West Timor, Indonesia) for further studies under its care. When the children arrived in Kupang, they were firstly taken to the orphanage Oebaha Church before they were delivered to other families. Because some families did not take good care of the children, some returned to their own families in Timor-Leste though some stayed in Kupang. After the Popular Consultation, parents in Timor-Leste reported their missing children to the UNHCR and the Jesuit Refugee Service (JRS) in Kupang.[297]

399. Other organisations, with no history of transferring children from Timor-Leste, became active only after the referendum. The best known of them was the Heart Foundation (Yayasan Hati), which sent some 150 children from camps in West Timor to Central Java. They were placed either in Catholic institutions or in a private institution in Wonosari, 45 km east of Yogyakarta. Wonosari was founded by a former Indonesian Government official who had worked in Dili as head of the local branch of the Department of Education and Culture.[298]

400. The chaotic conditions surrounding the removal of children to Central Java have continued to cloud their hopes of rejoining their families. The bitter legacy of the Indonesian withdrawal from Timor-Leste is a further complication. In November 2000, the children were the topic of an inter-agency meeting that shed some light on their situation. JRS told the meeting that of 118 children in institutions in Central Java, the families of 83 were believed to still be in West Timor. Many were in Tuapukan Camp Kupang (East Nusa Tenggara, Indonesia) and were thought to be intending to remain in Indonesia. The majority of these families are reported to be from Beobe (Viqueque).[299]

401. UNHCR and the IRC travelled to Viqueque to trace family members and found that, in some cases, it was not parents who arranged for the children to be sent to Java but guardians (including extended family members with whom the children might have lived all their lives). Eight parents in Timor-Leste requested help from UNHCR to bring back their children.[300] Some of the children in Central Java have said that they want to rejoin their families after finishing high school. Some families in West Timor have visited their children.

* "On the other hand, it appears that some parents were under pressure to release their children without knowing the full consequences of the supposed agreements. Some were forced to sign a consent form, giving up their parental custody and visiting rights to their children. In some cases, after parents returned to Timor-Leste and sought to get their children back, the caretakers have refused to allow children to return or have demanded financial compensation for their return.", United Nations High Commissioner For Refugees, Evaluation and Policy Analysis Unit, Evaluation of UNHCR's Repatriation and Reintegration Programme in East Timor, 1999-2003, prepared by Chris Dolan, Judith Large, Naoko Obi, UNHCR, Geneva, 24 February 2004, pp. 60.

402. Reuniting parents with their children after their removal from the camps has been difficult as many parents do not know which person or institution took their child. Children were sent to places all around the archipelago. A representative of Indonesia's National Commission on Child Protection (Komisi Nasional Perlindungan Anak) told the Commission that it had found many cases of children being taken by unknown persons from camps in West Timor to Jakarta, West and Central Java, Palembang (South Sumatra), Denpasar (Bali), and Sulawesi with the promise of scholarships but who had then lost contact with their parents.[301]

403. Some cases suggest that institutions deliberately keep children from contacting their parents or returning to Timor-Leste. An NGO that worked in the West Timor camps on behalf of Yayasan Hati reported that representatives of Yayasan Hati and another NGO, Geni, went to the camps and asked parents to send their children to Central Java. In Noelbaki camp (Kupang, East Nusa Tenggara, Indonesia) one of these representatives reportedly promised parents that the government would fund their child's studies to university level and put them up in hostels. He also promised that the children would visit their parents in the camps after three years. None of these promises was formalised in a written agreement. The Hati contact person in Tuapukan camp (Kupang, East Nusa Tenggara, Indonesia) reportedly insisted that parents should not send letters to their children in Java. Some families do not know the address of their children.

404. The children were brought to Semarang by ship. The organisation Yayasan Sosial Sugijopranoto, working with the Semarang diocese, housed them for a few days before distributing them to local institutions. Among other places, eight were sent to Boro (Central Java), 84 to Jimbaran (Denpasar, Bali), 21 to Temanggung (Central Java) and others to Wonosari.[302] According to Yayasan Hati, 164 children were sent to Java in three groups in November 1999, December 1999 and May 2001.[303]

405. The chairperson of Yayasan (Foundation) Hati, Natercia Soares, has claimed that these children are Indonesian because she regards Timor-Leste's integration with Indonesia as still valid. She has asserted that:

> Until now the government has not annulled regulation No. 7/76, which recognises East Timor as an Indonesian territory and automatically recognises all East Timorese as Indonesian citizens [*304]

406. The Al Anshar organisation in South Sulawesi also resisted returning children. In its dealings with both agencies and parents, the institution continually changed its position on whether and under what conditions it would give up children. The successful return of two children from Al Anshar received very critical press coverage in Indonesia and the head of the institution accused UNHCR of kidnapping the children and demanded more than US$5,000 in "compensation".[305]

* On 17 July 1976, the Indonesian Legislative Body passed Law 7/76, declaring that Timor-Leste was the 27th province of Indonesia. The law was never recognised by the United Nations. On 25 October 1999, the U.N. Security Council passed Resolution 1272 establishing the United Nations Transitional Administration of East Timor (UNTAET), thus separating Timor-Leste and Indonesia by international law [see also Vol 1 Part 2: The Mandate of the Commission].

407. In November 1999, a foundation in South Kalimantan, Germination Foundation Kalimantan (Yayasan Tunas Kalimantan), sent staff to refugee camps in West Timor camps with an offer of education in Banjar Baru. About 19 children were brought to South Kalimantan; three of the older ones managed to get back to Atambua on their own. They reported being forced to study Islam, saying that food was withheld if they refused. All the children had parents in West Timor or Timor-Leste. As in South Sulawesi, efforts to return the children were sometimes frustrated by the changing demands of the institution.[306]

408. Even when children were given a choice about whether to remain in Indonesia or not, their decision may not have been freely made or reflected their true wishes. Zacarias Pereira saw this situation in a pesantren in West Java, where he was sent by the Lemorai Foundation in 1999. After three years, during which he converted to Islam, Zacarias was able to contact his father through UNHCR. UNHCR brought his father to the pesantren to collect him. He described the UNHCR visit:

> My father came to Bandung with UNHCR between 7-11 October 2002… together with a policeman and a government official. Hasan Basri asked: "Who wants to go back to Timor?" Only two children raised their hands. There was a mother there and one of her three children wanted to go home. This mother, Domingas, was the older sister of Hasan Basri's wife. No other children were brave enough to raise their hands. But if their parents had come to pick them up, I think they would have wanted to go.
>
> Beforehand, Hasan Basri had said to me that, even though my parents had come to get me, I didn't need to go back to Timor now, it was better for me to finish [school] first. But he didn't tell me not to go. As the UNHCR car drove away another child, Abe from Ossu [Viqueque] ran and hid on the road going out. He stopped the car and asked them to take him home… So three children went home in the end.[307]

409. Zacarias stayed at the pesantren along with 20 other East Timorese children, many of whom were from Basri's extended family. Of these some had returned to Timor-Leste and some were still in Java. His story indicates that while the children were not physically prevented from leaving, they were not given the opportunity to make a decision privately. The fact that one child hid outside and approached the UNHCR vehicle indicates a strong degree of pressure not to go home.

410. Basri told a journalist in September 2002:

> No matter what, even if they come with signatures or photos of parents, I won't give them up…I won't give them up. Not even if the UNHCR come with the police. I won't give them up.[308]

Conditions for children living in Indonesia

411. The circumstances that children found themselves in and the conditions they experienced once they were transferred to Indonesia, varied considerably. Children were sent to all parts of Indonesia, sometimes alone and sometimes in groups. Some were sent to state or private institutions, some to schools or religious colleges, some were adopted by families as children or to work as servants. However, a number of common themes run through the children's stories of their experiences.

Loss of cultural identity

412. Most children report losing their sense of cultural identity, to varying extents, through loss of language, being renamed or being forced to convert to another religion. In some cases children taken as babies were never told that they were East Timorese. During his term as Governor of Timor-Leste, Mario Carrascalão visited the approximately 45 East Timorese children living in two institutions in Bandung: Kinderdorf and the State Orphanage for Young Children (Panti Penyatunan Anak Turuna Negara, PPATN). The majority were from Apodeti families. He found the children to be well cared for, but it was clear that the children knew nothing of their culture and language.[309]

413. One of the children remembers that before Mario Carrascalão visited them, they had never spoken about Timor-Leste. Afterwards they started to talk about their families and where they were from. Mario Carrascalão took the step of organising some visits home[310] and eventually a home visit was organised.

414. The impact of a home visit is described by one boy who had been brought to the Seroja Orphanage in Dili by relatives when he was five. He was one of ten children sent to PPATN in Bandung in 1979. He recalls:

> In Bandung I was living in a foreign environment although most of the Timorese children lived in one building of PPATN. We never spoke about Timor, we couldn't speak Tetum, and we didn't send letters to Timor. We were brought up as Sundanese children in Java. I didn't know why I was there, just that there had been a war in Timor.
>
> I was happy to get an education in Bandung but I felt in my heart that I would always be someone wondering who he really was. I actually felt like I had been brainwashed. Eventually I made friends from Timor but I felt backward and embarrassed around them because I couldn't speak Tetum. I often had to leave the room or more often I was silent. I tried to study my own language and culture.
>
> Living without my family was also very bitter for me. Very bitter … Even now if I see a picture of a mother holding her child, tears well up in my eyes. It is so sad that I cannot ever feel close to my family.[311]

415. After leaving the orphanage in 1990, one girl visited Timor-Leste again, in 1995 and 2003, but had a difficult time adapting. She still lives in Bandung with her brother, although three other relatives who left with her in 1976 have moved back home.[312]

Mistreatment

416. The Commission heard a number of reports of children who were mistreated by the people or organisations that took them into their care. Some, like Alfredo Alves or Thomas da Costa, report being beaten to the point that they ran away from their new homes. In other cases the mistreatment is more subtle.

417. Children who became "The President's Children", for example, speak of feeling discriminated against at the Catholic orphanage in Unggaran where they lived. Although they report receiving adequate care for the first three years, they began to feel discriminated against compared with the Indonesian children at the institution, many of whom paid high fees to attend. When several East Timorese children ran away and there was no reaction, Petrus and others protested to the local Social Services Office without result. According to Petrus "I felt like they saw our lives as if they were worth nothing. Just like an animal."[313] In 1982 the children "went on strike" for one week in protest at the discrimination. Some of the children returned to Timor-Leste in 1994. A philosophy student studying in Yogyakarta visited Ungaran (Semarang, Central Java) in 1983 after hearing stories of protests by the children. He found them very dissatisfied with their conditions, especially with the inadequate, low-quality food.[314]

418. According to Sudirman, who was part of a group of children transferred to a pesantren in Makassar (South Sulawesi), many of the children at the pesantren complained of neglect, beatings and homesickness, and wanted to go back to their families in Timor-Leste. He also remembers parents coming for their children, but being prevented from taking them home.[315]

419. In many of the cases reported to the Commission, whether there was mistreatment or not, promises made to children and their parents were not kept. Educational opportunities and jobs did not materialise. Children were put in institutions rather than kept with families or vice-versa. Communication between children and their parents was foreclosed and children were not returned home as agreed.

Alfredo Reinado Alves' story

After the operation, we returned to Aileu where our battalion was preparing to go home. I and 5 other TBO's…were brought to Taibessi in Dili. We did not know why we had been brought there. One day I overheard the army commander say that the soldiers were not allowed to bring children home with them to Indonesia.

After a few days, the soldiers were packing their things to go home. C107 [the soldier Alfredo served] said to me, "You can come along to look at the port, but it's best if you get inside a box so that the police don't see you." I thought it was strange but I couldn't do anything about it. When we reached the port I felt myself being lifted up. I tried to see out and saw that I was on the ship. Other friends were also there on the boat. They said that they had also been hidden inside a box. And the soldier had also said to them that they must hide because the army police might come. Then I heard the ship sound and it started to move.

After half an hour we were allowed to get out of our boxes and I saw Dili fade into the distance. I felt very sad because I had not seen my mother since I was taken (by the military) from the school yard in Maubisse [Ainaro]. This happened in February 1980 when I was 13 years old.

C107 took me to his parent's village in Lamikonga [Kolaka, Kendari] in southeast Sulawesi. C107's parents and family treated me like a slave. After a few years C107 married and moved out and I lived with them. C107's wife was very kind to me and treated me like family, but C107 wanted me returned to his parents' home.

I didn't want to go back to C107's parents' house. I and my friend from Timor-Leste, Afonso, made a plan to escape…Our plan failed - we were caught at the port. C107 was very angry and hit me until my eyes and mouth were swollen and black. I was returned to C107's parents' house. One night I visited a friend's house and, without getting permission, didn't go home that night. C107 beat me again. That night I left the house only with the clothes I was wearing and caught a bus to the port. From there I caught a boat to Samarinda, Kalimantan. I met somebody who worked on the ship who paid for my ticket - perhaps people pitied me because my face was still black and blue. Finally, when I was still 16 years old, I arrived in Samarinda.

I worked and attended junior high school in Samarinda for almost two years. I heard that from Surabaya there was a ship to Timor-Leste. One day I heard that there was a ship leaving for Surabaya. I left my job and my girlfriend, and headed to Surabaya with only the money that I had received that day.

When I arrived in Surabaya I tried to find the boat to Timor-Leste but a customs officer arrested me. After four days I made a decision to contact the commander at the Regional Military Command in Surabaya. I waited two days and then thanked God because my requests were received. I told the commander my entire story from the beginning. The commander wanted to help me and he gave me a letter. I took that letter back to the port and after that I was treated very well.

I caught a ship to Dili and I was so happy when I arrived. I left straight away for Maubisse [Ainaro]. When I was asked for a travel letter I was confused so I just showed the letter I had received from the Regional Commander. Every security agent was very surprised to see that letter. I did not have any difficulty all the way to Maubisse. I went straight to my mother's house but there was somebody else living there. I met with an uncle but he had forgotten about me and was suspicious. But finally a friend called Tomás recognised me. I was very happy and finally I was taken to the house of my mother who was still alive.

After a while, my mother suggested that I try to look for work with an uncle that lived here in Dili. This uncle eventually gave me work as a truck driver. In 1987, I became a member of the clandestine movement. I had always liked boats at the port. I was given the job of sabotaging an Indonesian war ship. On 22 July 1995, I became a captain and took 18 people by boat who were fleeing to Australia. That was the only group of boat people successfully to reach Australia. The group that followed was caught and after that there were no more.[316]

Findings and conclusion

420. The struggle for control of Timor-Leste was partly played out in the battle for its children. Children became victims, perpetrators, assistants and observers in the political conflicts that engulfed Timor-Leste from 1974. The obligation of all parties to put the best interests of children first was widely ignored.

421. Children are owed special protections under international legal principles that arise out of the acknowledgment of children's particular vulnerability. The responsibility of all parties to fulfil their duty of care towards children is particularly urgent during periods of conflict when the imbalance of power between children and adults is most pronounced. The Commission finds that all sides to the conflicts failed to take these protections into account, but the most reprehensible violations of all kinds were committed by Indonesia.

422. Indonesia, as the effective state power in Timor-Leste, had a clear duty to respect the rights of children. These duties arose under international humanitarian law as contained in Geneva Convention IV. Apart from its specific obligations, it had a general duty to protect children and not endanger them by exposing them to dangerous situations. It failed to fulfil this obligation most graphically when it treated children as chattel that could be deployed on the battlefield and when it separated children from their families and sent them to Indonesia where their cultural identity was not recognised.

423. Throughout the course of the occupation, Indonesia was also bound by human rights standards as set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. These were consistently breached in a variety of ways, including by forcibly recruiting children to assist its armed forces, by violating children's rights to life, liberty and the security of person, and the right to freedom of conscience and expression. Even after Indonesia ratified the Convention on the Rights of the Child in September 1990, Indonesia failed to meet its legally binding obligations. In general terms, it failed to live up to the obligation to give priority to the best interests of the child when making decisions in relation to children and where possible to take the child's views into consideration (Article 3(1)). It also violated many of the specific obligations relating to sexual violence and obligations regarding freedom of expression and choice.

Children in armed conflict and the clandestine movement

424. Children were used by all sides to the political conflicts in Timor-Leste over the mandate period of the Commission.

Children used by the Indonesian military as TBOs (Operations Assistants)

425. The Commission finds that:

1. The Indonesian military recruited several thousand children as TBOs.
2. TBO's were recruited throughout the period of occupation but numbers peaked during the period 1976-81 when military operations were at their height.
3. ABRI used a variety of methods to recruit children as TBOs, ranging from outright coercion to the offer of inducements. Some children enlisted as TBOs voluntarily. However, in the desperate circumstances of the time, the dividing line between voluntary and forced recruitment was never clear-cut.
4. The Indonesian military preferred to use children as TBOs and actively sought to recruit minors as opposed to adults.
5. The recruitment of children by individual soldiers was known about at the highest levels of the military structure. No attempt was made to prevent this occurring; rather attempts to regulate the practice indicate that it was condoned.
6. Although officially recognised, TBOs were not members of the armed forces and did not enjoy the perquisites of regular soldiers, such as a salary, a rank or a uniform.
7. Child TBO's received no salary from the Indonesian military for their services. Although they often received food and board, this was not a fair wage.
8. There was no regulation of the treatment of child TBOs by individual soldiers.
9. The relationship between child TBOs and the soldiers they served was wholly unbalanced. In some cases, soldiers treated their TBOs as if they had rights of ownership over them. They controlled their movement, duties, living conditions and, ultimately, whether they lived or died. Sometimes these soldiers retained control over their TBOs after their tour of duty ended; sometimes they passed them on to other soldiers; sometimes they were simply left to fend for themselves.
10. Child TBOs performed tasks, which, although not usually involving them directly in fighting, exposed them to physical danger. At the very least, the conditions in which they worked put their health at risk and jeopardised their educational chances. In many cases, the work undertaken by child TBOs was not in proportion to their physical and intellectual capacities.

11. Aside from their recruitment as TBOs, children were also enlisted with adults for military operations. In the case of the Operation Kikis of July-September 1981, in some areas children as young as ten years old were among the tens of thousands of East Timorese recruited to converge on Falintil strongholds.

426. On the findings above, the Commission is satisfied that the Indonesian military's practice of using child TBOs:

- Amounted to a form of enslavement. This was a violation of the fundamental customary prohibition against enslavement, as well as a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions (wilfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health: Geneva Convention IV (Article 147)) and a violation of the laws and customs of war.
- Was a form of forced labour in violation of Article 51 of Geneva Convention IV, which requires that, if an Occupying Power uses the labour of the civilian population of the occupied territory, it is obliged to pay them a fair wage and "the work shall be proportionate to their physical and intellectual capacities".

Children in Falintil and in clandestine movement

427. The Commission finds that:

12. Children under 15 served as guerrilla soldiers with Falintil. However incidences were not widespread.
13. There is no evidence that children were forcibly recruited to Falintil. Several former child recruits to Falintil have testified that they eagerly enlisted to support Timor-Leste's struggle for independence; others have said their efforts to join the guerrilla force were rebuffed on the grounds that they were too young. This distinguishes child members of Falintil from child soldiers in other parts of the world who are forcibly recruited for their obedience and willingness to commit atrocities.
14. Recruitment appears to have been ad hoc, informal and not centrally controlled. Some children left their homes to join up, others were formally "recruited", others were living with the communities that fled to the forests and got involved by merely being present.
15. The treatment of those who were recruited was generally good, although they were subject to the same harsh treatment as other recruits. Cases of mistreatment were related to disciplinary procedures, the intra-Fretilin conflict or to prevent surrender.
16. Service was not without its costs. Aside from being exposed to the danger of losing their lives during combat, many of these youths experienced difficulties after their service, including being targeted as pro-independence sympathisers by the Indonesian security forces and finding it difficult to adjust to civilian life after demobilisation.

428. The Commission is satisfied that:

- In accepting children under 15 into its guerrilla forces, Falintil violated the standards of international humanitarian law set out in 1977 Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions.
- The voluntary recruitment of those aged 15-17 was not a violation of human rights instruments or humanitarian law.

429. The Commission finds that:

17. Children were an essential part of the clandestine component of the Resistance to the Occupying Power, whether as estafeta, participants in demonstrations or providing other kinds of support.
18. The leadership of the Resistance recruited children and youth into the clandestine movement precisely because of the unique contribution they could make.
19. There is little evidence to suggest that children participated in clandestine activities other than voluntarily. Indeed, direct experience of human rights violations committed by members of the Indonesian security forces against themselves or close family members was often their motive for working with the Resistance. It is difficult to assess the extent to which the choice to take part in clandestine activities was an informed choice. However, children of sufficient age and maturity do have a right to freedom of expression and to act in accordance with their conscience.
20. East Timorese children participating in the clandestine movement were placed at grave risk of punishment by the Indonesian military and/or agents. Many suffered because of their involvement.

430. The Commission is satisfied that:

- Although the recruitment of children into the clandestine movement by a non-state actor does not constitute a violation of international law, it is contrary to the human rights standard that the best interests of the child must be prioritised.
- The draconian response of the Indonesian military towards children involved in the clandestine movement was a breach of the rights of all people to enjoy freedom of conscience and expression and which are enshrined for children specifically in Articles 12 and 13 of the CRC.

Children recruited by pro-autonomy militias in 1999

431. The Commission finds that:

21. From late 1998 children were recruited into the militias that terrorised Timor-Leste.
22. Almost all child recruits were forced to join through intimidation of either themselves or their families. Some children joined out of their own free choice, usually because they or their families were pro-integration and agreed with the objectives of the militias.
23. Child members of the militia were involved in the commission of grave human rights violations including killings, physical assault and rape as well as in the widespread destruction of property.

24. Recruits were only sometimes paid, either with small amounts of money or in food.
25. Indonesia did nothing to protect children from this forced recruitment into criminal gangs; in fact, members of the military were closely involved in the activity.
26. The practice of forced recruitment of children into pro-integration militias appears to have been, in part, designed to create the impression of a mass of youth who were fanatical in their support for integration and to draw these youth into criminal activities that would destroy the family and communal ties that sustained the pro-independence movement.
27. Those recruited often came from the most disadvantaged segments of Timorese society, were brutalised by their participation in, and witnessing of, violence and incurred the stigma of having been on the wrong side. There is some evidence that, of all the children recruited by the parties to the 25-year conflict, those who joined the militia may have been the most severely traumatised by their experience.
28. The Commission did not find any evidence that Indonesia took steps to support the physical and psychological recovery of these children or their social re-integration.

432. The Commission is satisfied that:

- Forcing a child to join a militia and then making him or her take part in criminal acts, sometimes against his or her own community, amounted to inhuman treatment and/or caused great suffering or serious injury to the body or health of the child involved. This is in violation of Article 147 of Geneva Convention IV and the laws and customs of war. This also constitutes a violation of Indonesia's human rights obligation under Article 38 of the CRC to ensure respect for the child-specific rules on international humanitarian law.
- Using children to achieve political goals amounts to exploitation. Indonesia thus violated the rights of such children to be protected from exploitation prejudicial to their welfare - in contravention of Article 36 of the CRC.
- Indonesia failed to fulfil its obligation to take all steps to promote the physical and psychological recovery and social reintegration of these children under Article 39 of the CRC.

Inhuman treatment of children

Arbitrary detention

433. The Commission finds that:

29. Children were subject to arbitrary detention throughout almost the entire period of the Commission's mandate. Members of UDT arbitrarily detained children during the party conflict. Fretilin representatives were responsible for such detentions during this period and also in the years after the Indonesian invasion. Indonesian security forces engaged in the arbitrary detention of children on a much larger scale. Their treatment while in detention involved systematic violations throughout the 25-year period of the occupation.

30. Throughout the occupation, agents of the Indonesian government arbitrarily detained children and were responsible for widespread and systematic violations of the rights of children while they were in custody. From 1975 to 1999 children were commonly bound, beaten, kicked, raped, electrocuted, burnt with cigarettes, immersed in water, held in isolation in dark cells, threatened with death and otherwise terrorised by agents of the Indonesian security forces. Some children died as a direct result of this maltreatment. The Commission knows of no case in which perpetrators of these violations were subject to punishment or discipline.

31. In the years after the invasion, children were detained on a massive scale following capture or surrender and were subsequently placed in "resettlement camps". The food, shelter and healthcare they received were seriously inadequate, and their restricted movement limited their own, and their families', ability to supplement what little food they received. Children were sometimes also detained in formal detention centres and military facilities after surrender or capture. Children also constituted a significant portion of those detained on the island of Ataúro between 1980 and 1986, either with family members or separated from them. Several thousand children died as a result of the harsh conditions in the resettlement camps and on Ataúro.

32. The reasons for the detention of children by the Indonesian military were similar to those for the detention of adults: namely, their involvement in clandestine activities, to break off support to members of Falintil and to gain information about Falintil or the clandestine movement. Children were also detained because of the actions of their parents or other family members.

33. Students and schoolchildren were targeted for arrest and detention when public demonstrations began to be held in the 1990s. Indonesian authorities detained children during and after demonstrations, and sometimes to prevent demonstrations taking place. Many of those detained were subjected to severe violations, including torture. Children were also arrested and detained by members of the Indonesian security forces and their militia agents during the violence surrounding the Popular Consultation in 1999. Sometimes these arrests were used to force children to join a militia.

34. Following the coup of 11 August 1975, children were among prisoners detained by UDT at locations designated for this purpose. The Commission did not receive evidence of torture or other serious maltreatment of children detained by UDT.

35. During the period of the party conflict, children were among those arbitrarily detained by members of Fretilin, because they or family members were believed to be affiliated with political opponents. Torture and maltreatment of children in Fretilin custody occurred, but it was not widespread or used systematically.

36. After the Indonesian invasion, children continued to be detained arbitrarily by Fretilin but this was mostly incidental to the detention of adults. However, there are also cases of children being arrested as proxies for relatives belonging to other parties who were outside Fretilin's control and for alleged breaches of discipline by the child. Despite evidence that "warrants" were produced in some cases, the arrests, torture, denial of due process and use of children as hostages, which often followed, had no legal basis.

434. The Commission is satisfied that:

- The detention of children by members of the Indonesian security forces involved multiple and repeated violations of Indonesian law, human rights standards and international law. Arrests were commonly made by persons who lacked the legal authority to carry out such actions under Indonesian law.
- The widespread torture and mistreatment causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health constitute grave breaches of Geneva Convention IV (Article 147) which applies to Indonesia as both customary and treaty law.
- The failure to provide adequate food and medical supplies to children in detention was a breach of Article 55 of Geneva Convention IV.
- Failure to permit free passage of all consignments of essential foodstuffs, medicine and clothing intended for children under the age of 15 was a breach of Article 23 of Geneva Convention IV.
- The widespread failure to inform children arrested of their rights and reasons for arrest was a breach of Article 71 of Geneva Convention IV.
- Indonesia was in breach of its specific obligations under the Convention of the Rights of the Child, which it ratified in 1990, in particular Article 37, which provides a duty to ensure that no child is deprived of his or her liberty unlawfully, and that the arrest, detention and imprisonment of a child are in conformity with the law and take place only as a last resort and then only for the shortest possible time.
- The actions of representatives of both UDT and Fretilin during the party conflict were in breach of human rights standards, applicable Portuguese laws and international law. Representatives of neither party had any legal authority under Portuguese law to arrest, detain, assault or maltreat individuals.
- Representatives of both parties breached their obligations under Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions, which prohibits violence to life and person and outrages against personal dignity, such as humiliating and degrading treatment and the taking of hostages.
- Torture, illegal detention and use of children as hostages by Fretilin during the period following the Indonesian invasion constituted grave breaches of Geneva Convention IV.

Arbitrary killing of children

435. The Commission finds that:

37. The general failure by all sides to distinguish between civilians and combatants extended to children. Children were generally killed for the same reasons as adults and often in similar circumstances. There is therefore insufficient evidence to say that children were specifically targeted. At the same time, children were generally not specifically protected or treated with exception in the violence of the political conflicts.

38. Children were killed in a wide variety of contexts, including during open armed conflict, in mass killings, in custody and in summary executions. In the early years of the conflict many were killed together with their families during military operations or when caught in contested areas. In later years, under-age victims were likely to be teenagers targeted for suspected pro-independence activities.
39. During the period of the internal armed conflict, children were killed by both Fretilin and UDT. They were killed when in the custody of the other side, either because of their own or their family's political affiliations. Most often, they were killed in groups rather than individually and with other family members.
40. Indonesian forces and agents killed children in the period 1975-79 within the wider context of the Indonesian campaign to bring Timor-Leste under its control. It did not distinguish children from adults in this regard. Children out looking for food, either on their own or in the company of adults, ran the risk of being shot by ABRI or Hansip members. Groups of unarmed civilians, including children, living outside Indonesian-controlled resettlement camps, could be randomly executed.
41. From 1980, children were killed when ABRI undertook wide-ranging and often indiscriminate reprisals in response to attacks by the Resistance. Children were among the victims killed in the large-scale crackdowns that followed the Falintil-led attacks on Dili in June 1980, on the Mau Chiga Koramil in August 1982 and on the Zeni unit in Kraras in August 1983. In these cases, children were killed in indiscriminate attacks on groups of civilians and because they themselves were suspected of giving support to Falintil.
42. In 1999, children were killed during operations looking for members of the clandestine network or Falintil, during militia attacks to punish communities who supported or assisted the Resistance, or during mass killings following the announcement of the results of the Popular Consultation or when children were out looking for food. Children were also easy targets during attacks on refugee encampments. The perpetrators were militia associated with the Indonesian military or TNI itself.

436. The Commission is satisfied that:

- The killing of children is a breach of their right to life, one of the most fundamental of human rights. In many cases, they were killed as a result of unlawful actions amounting to war crimes, whether in violation of the laws and customs of war or as grave breaches of the 1949 Geneva Conventions.
- The killing of children by UDT and Fretilin was a breach of Portuguese law, which provided no basis for either party, as non-state actors, to take the lives of any person, let alone children, in any circumstance.
- The killing of civilian children during the period of the internal armed conflict constituted a breach of Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions of 1949, which expressly prohibits parties from killing persons who are not taking an active part in hostilities.

- Once the internal conflict became internationalised, the rules governing international armed conflict applied in Timor-Leste to regulate the activities of the UDT, Fretilin and Indonesia. The protections afforded to children under the International Law of Armed Conflict were greater, but their protections in relation to the right to life were the same as those for adult civilians.
- The killing of child civilians by the Indonesian military or its agents during the period of international armed conflict amounted to war crimes under the laws and customs of war and Geneva Convention IV.
- Children killed for their connection with the clandestine movement or during searches for the Resistance were also unarmed civilians not engaged in military conflict. Such killings would appear to fall within the generic war crimes category in violation of the laws and customs of war as well as Geneva Convention IV.

Sexual violence committed against children

437. The Commission finds that

43. The Indonesian security forces, their East Timorese auxiliaries and other persons in positions of authority used sexual violence against children both strategically and opportunistically, throughout the occupation.
44. Strategic sexual violence was used to establish control through terror, whether as a form of punishment of the victim, as a means of extracting information or with the wider aim of undermining family ties.
45. The scale of opportunistic sexual violence reflected a climate of impunity that extended from the higher reaches of the military, to their East Timorese auxiliaries, to civilians in positions of authority.
46. Sexual violence against girls often appears to have been motivated by a desire to punish family members involved in resistance activities.
47. Girls and adult women were subject to the similar forms of sexual violence throughout the mandate period. Both were at particular risk in resettlement camps or while detained by Indonesian authorities.
48. Once violated, girls became vulnerable to long-term exploitation, leading to an extended period of sexual slavery or other forms of repeated sexual violence.
49. The practice of sexual violence against children was, in most cases, conducted openly without fear of sanction by both lower ranks of the military and their superior officers, as well as persons in positions of civilian authority such as village heads, police and teachers.
50. Most of the cases of sexual violence that the Commission has examined took place in military custody or on military premises or other locations that could be considered official.
51. Although senior members of the Indonesian and civilian hierarchies would certainly have known of the unlawfulness of such conduct, the Commission has found only one case in which an agent of the government was prosecuted. It is noteworthy that this case involved a low-ranking member of Hansip.

438. The Commission is satisfied that:

- On the basis of the nature of the sexual crimes committed against children and the impunity which perpetrators enjoyed, there existed an environment in Timor-Leste where sexual violence against children was condoned, even encouraged.
- Rape and other forms of serious sexual violence are devastating assaults on a person's security; they may also be cruel inhuman and degrading treatment that in some circumstances amounts to torture. These egregious crimes are further aggravated when the act is committed against a child, whose vulnerability requires particular protection. These principles are universally enshrined in international law as well as in Indonesian law, including in Indonesian law (KUHP Chapter XIV).
- Some of the sexual violence examined by the Commission amounted to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment or torture. Torture in the circumstances outlined amounted to grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and violations of the laws and customs of war, as well as violation of the customary prohibition against torture.
- In the circumstances of invaded-and-occupied Timor-Leste, many acts of sexual violence against children, including rape, were grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions (Article 147 of Geneva Convention IV for civilians) for causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, or for amounting to inhuman treatment.
- These acts constitute violations of the laws and customs of war for being ill-treatment of civilians and an outrage on personal dignity and honour (Common Article 3 and Article 76(1) of the Regulations Annexed to Hague Convention IV as custom).
- Sexual enslavement and other slave-like practices, such as being made to provide sexual services on call, committed against child civilians constituted a violation of Article 27 of Geneva Convention IV and were grave breaches of that convention (Article 147). These practices involve multiple violations of human rights standards including unlawful confinement, causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, torture or inhuman treatment.
- As almost every act of sexual violence considered by the Commission was committed by officials or agents of the Occupying Power, Indonesia was responsible for the suffering that resulted (Articles 29 and 32, Geneva Convention IV).
- Indonesia failed to fulfil its customary and treaty obligations under the Geneva Conventions to protect child civilians from sexual violence and to take steps to investigate, prosecute and punish individual perpetrators of grave breaches (Article 146, Geneva Convention IV).
- After September 1990, Indonesia failed to meet its obligation under the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) to protect children from sexual exploitation and abuse (Article 34).

- After September 1990, Indonesia failed to fulfil its obligation under the CRC to assist the physical and psychological recovery and social reintegration of child victims of sexual violence (Article 39).

The transfer of children to Indonesia

439. The Commission finds that:

52. East Timorese children were frequently removed from their families and homeland to Indonesia throughout the period of occupation.
53. The transfer of children to Indonesia took many forms, ranging from abductions by individual soldiers to government-sponsored education programmes.
54. Although the degree of coercion exercised by persons and institutions in effecting the transfer of children varied, there was almost always an element of duress and, sometimes, outright force.
55. In the first years after the invasion, regular soldiers were the main perpetrators of the removal of East Timorese children. As in the case of child TBOs (some of whom were also transferred to Indonesia by the soldiers they had served at the end of their tours of duty), children who were removed to Indonesia were frequently treated as chattel by being removed forcibly, transported in boxes and required to perform menial tasks for the families with whom they lived.
56. Institutions, including hospitals and the Seroja Orphanage facilitated the removal of children by Indonesian soldiers. Although individual staff members expressed to the Commission that they had concerns in relation to the process, there is no evidence that the institutions refused to take part.
57. Religious institutions were also directly involved in taking children out of Timor-Leste. Although the Commission recognises that these transfers were considered to be charitable by the institutions, there was a clear lack of information provided to parents and children.
58. Efforts to regulate the practice were instituted in the early 1980s but the Commission heard little evidence that the regulations were followed or that there was monitoring of the way in which they were applied. Where consent was sought from parents, parents were often not given complete information or were openly lied to. Further, there are cases of forced "consent" under threat of violence.
59. East Timorese children taken to Indonesia at a young age suffered a loss of their cultural identity, a cause of great suffering both to the children and their families. In many cases this was as a result of the policy of the religious institution involved, the decision of persons entrusted with the care of the child, or simply as a result of children being deprived of their cultural roots by their distance from their homeland.
60. The Commission heard of no case in which an attempt was made to provide education to East Timorese children by people of the same nationality, language or religion. Rather, the Commission heard of many cases in which there were explicit attempts to transform the child's religion or in other ways become more Indonesian.

61. There is insufficient evidence to determine whether the large-scale removal of East Timorese children was official Indonesian government or military policy. Nevertheless, there is clear evidence of high-level involvement in some of its manifestations, extending to President Soeharto and his family.

62. The Indonesian government made no genuine attempt to regulate the practice of the removal of children through the institution of adoption policies undertaken by competent authorities according to the applicable law.

63. There is little evidence that the Indonesian government made a genuine effort to meet its obligations under international law regarding the care of East Timorese children by non-family members or by institutions, their transfer to Indonesia or the conditions under which they were kept.

64. The decline in the number of children who were abducted after 1981 seems to have been related more to the changing military situation and the normalisation of the occupation than to effective measures taken by the Indonesian authorities.

65. The Commission finds that programmes of the Ministries of Education and Culture and Manpower under which children were sent to Indonesia to study or to work had underlying political and security motivations. These included encouraging a commitment to Indonesian integration and removing possible trouble-makers from Timor-Leste.

66. Even where the transfers were motivated in part by humanitarian concerns or where parental consent was sought, little effort was made to ensure that children maintained contact with their families or to ensure that children were able to choose freely whether or not to return to Timor-Leste. The Commission has received numerous reports of children being removed and never seeing their families again, as well as of persons who were removed as children returning as adults and being unable to locate their families or even their home districts. Testimony provided to the Commission reveals that parents who tried to trace their abducted children could be obstructed by Indonesian officials.

440. The Commission is satisfied that:

- The abduction of East Timorese children by soldiers is both a crime under Indonesian law (Chapter XVIII of KUHAP dealing with crimes against personal liberty), as well as being in breach to the duty of an Occupying Power to respect family rights and not to intimidate civilians (Articles 27 and 23 of Geneva Convention IV).
- The separation of a child from its true identity, culture, ethnicity, religion or language may amount to a grave breach of Geneva Convention IV in so far as it constitutes inhuman treatment or causes great suffering to the child.
- The imposition of an alien culture was a violation of customary human rights law, which obliged Indonesia to respect the child's rights to freedom of thought, conscience and religion.

- Indonesia's failure to ensure that children's personal status was not changed by its soldiers or institutions was a breach of its obligations under Geneva Convention IV (Article 50).
- Indonesia's failure to ensure that education was provided, as much as possible by persons of the same nationality, language and religion, was a breach of Geneva Convention IV (Article 50).
- Indonesia's failure to adequately regulate the practice of the transfer of children constitutes a breach of its obligations under Article 21 of Geneva Convention IV.
- Indonesia's failure to combat the illicit transfer of children abroad constituted a breach of Geneva Convention IV (Article 11) and its failure to prevent the abduction, sale or traffic of children was a breach of its obligations under Article 29.
- Indonesia did not take sufficient measures as an Occupying Power to fulfil its obligations to the children of Timor-Leste under Geneva Convention IV to evacuate children from the field of conflict (Article 17), take all necessary steps to ensure that members of the same family were not separated (Article 49), ensure children were reunited with their parents, or placed with family or friends, or ensure they were identified and their parentage registered (Article 50). There was no attempt to ensure that children should be placed in an institution only as a last resort. The failure to reunite separated families after 1990 constituted a violation of the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC).
- Making students from occupied Timor-Leste swear an oath accepting the integration of Timor-Leste into Indonesia contravened Article 45 of the Regulations Annexed to Hague Convention IV which prohibits making the population of an occupied territory swear allegiance to the Occupying Power.
- It was unlawful for Indonesia to have forced anyone under 18 into any kind of work or to force any civilian from an occupied territory to work outside of the occupied territory (Article 51, Geneva Convention IV).

Endnotes

1. International Convention Concerning the Laws and Customs of War on Land, opened for signature 18 October 1907, (entry into force 26 January 1910), Article 23 (H) of Regulations Annexed to Hague Convention IV; see also [Fourth] Geneva Convention relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War, opened for signature 12 August 1949, UNTS 75, pp. 287, (entry into force 21 October 1950). Article 51(Section III Occupied Territories) of Geneva Convention IV.
2. Geneva Convention IV, 1949, Article 147.
3. Geneva Convention IV, 1949, Article 17.
4. Geneva Convention IV, 1949, Article 49.
5. Geneva Convention IV, 1949, Articles 24 and 50.
6. Geneva Convention IV, 1949, Article 50.
7. Geneva Convention IV, 1949, Article 50.
8. Geneva Convention IV, 1949, Article 50.

9. Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), opened for signature 20 November 1989, UNTS 1577, pp.3, (entry into force 2 September 1990), Article 3(1).
10. CRC, 1989, Articles 19, 34 and 36.
11. CRC, 1989, Article 27.
12. CRC, 1989, Article 21.
13. CRC, 1989, Articles 11 and 35.
14. CRC, 1989, Article 20.
15. CRC, 1989,Article 39.
16. CRC, 1989, Articles 38(2) and (3).
17. CRC, 1989, Article 38(3).
18. CRC, 1989, Article 32; see also International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, opened for signature 19 December 1966, UNTS 993, p. 3, (entry into force 3 January 1976), Article 10(3).
19. See for example, CAVR, Community Profiles of Lalawa, Iliomar Sub-district, Lautém District, 29 May 2003; Alawa Kraik, Baguia Sub-district, Baucau District, 6 October 2003.
20. Belchior Francisco Bento Alves Pereira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
21. CAVR Interview with Bonifacio dos Reis, Hatolia, Ermera, 13 August 2003.
22. HRVD Statement 05646.
23. CAVR Interview with Francisco Soares, Laleia, Manatuto, 26 June 2003; CAVR interview with João Rui, Dili, 5 May 2004.
24. ABRI, "Petunjuk Tehnis tentang Kegiatan Babinsa" ["Instruction Manual: Village Guidance Officer/TDP Activity in developing and phasing out Trained People's Resistance Force"s], Juknis /06/IV/1982, (Korem 164, Wira Dharma, Intelligence Section, Williem da Costa [Chief of Intelligence]) translated in Budiardjo and Liong, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, pp. 226-227.
25. ABRI, "Tentang Perlawan Rakyat Terlatih" ["Secret Document Operation Instructions"], No: INSOP 03/II/1982.
26. HRVD Statement 09081.
27. CAVR Interview with Antonio da Costa, Dili, 4 January 2004.
28. HRVD Statement 08366.
29. HRVD Statements 03819; 03879.
30. CAVR interview with Marcos Loina da Costa, Laleia, Manatuto, 24 June 2003.
31. CAVR Interview with João Rui, Dili, 5 May 2004.
32. CAVR Interview with Alfredo Reinado Alves, Dili, 5 March 2004.
33. CAVR Interview with Francisco da Silva Guterres, Dili, 4 June 2004.
34. CAVR Interview with João Rui, Dili, 5 May 2003.
35. ABRI, Tentang Perlawan Rakyat Terlatih [Secret Document Operation Instructions] No:INSOP 03/II1982, Indonesia pp. 7.
36. Geoffrey Robinson, "People's War: Militias in East Timor and Indonesia", South East Asia Research, Vol. 9, No. 3, 2001, pp. 292; Doug Carmen, Jerry van Klinken, Masters of Terror; Melintas Badai Politik Indonesia, Pustaka Sinar Harapan, Jakarta, June 2002, pp. 41-42
37. CAVR Interview with Fr Eligio Locatelli, Fatumaca, Baucau, 8 April 2003.
38. CAVR Interview with João Rui, Dili, 5 May 2004.
39. ABRI, "Tentang Perlawan Rakyat Terlatih" ["Secret Document Operation Instructions"], No:INSOP 03/II/1982 pp. 7.
40. ABRI, "Procedur Tetap, Protap" [Established Procedure on Intelligence], PUBLICATION No 01/IV/1982, (Commander A. Sahala Radjagukguk), Dili. Translated in Budiardjo and Liem, The War Against East Timor, Zed Books, London, 1984, p. 227.
41. ABRI, Juknis /06/IV/1982, in Budiardjo and Liem, p. 226.
42. CAVR Interview with João Rui, Dili, 5 May 2003.
43. CAVR Interview with José Pinto, Viqueque, 18 July 2003.
44. CAVR Interview with Domingos Maria Bada, Turiscai, Same, Manufahi, 14 October 2003.
45. HRVD Statement 02207; see also HRVD Statements 02146; 02048.
46. CAVR Interview with João Rui, Dili, 5 May 2003.
47. CAVR Interview with Oscar Ramos Ximenes, Laleia, Manatuto, 24 June 2003.

48. CAVR Interview with Gil Parada Belo Martins, Lacluta, Viqueque, 15 July 2003.
49. Eurico Guterres, Melintas Badai Politik Indonesia, 2002, pp. 41-42.
50. CAVR Interview with Augustinho Soares, Ermera, 13 August 2003.
51. CAVR, "Edition 53, Special Report on the Public Hearing held in Ataúro, Dili", Dalan Ba Dame [Road to Peace], Radio Timor-Leste, Dili, 5 December 2003.
52. ABRI, "Prinops No. 2/Kilat-I Kolakops Tim-Tim Lampiran F" ["Operation Order No: 2/Lightning-I Operations Implementation Command East Timor, Attachment F"], p. 5.
53. CAVR Interview with Domingos Maria Bada, Same, Manufahi, 14 October 2003.
54. CAVR Interview with José Pinto, Viqueque, 18 July 2003.
55. CAVR Interview with Domingos Maria Bada, Same, 14 October 2003.
56. Belchior Francisco Bento Alves Pereira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
57. CAVR Interview with Marcos Loina da Costa, Cairui, Laleia, Manatuto, 24 June 2003 and CAVR Interview with Augustinho Soares, Ermera, 13 August 2003.
58. CAVR Interview with Marcos Loina da Costa, Manatuto, 24 June 2003.
59. HRVD Statement 03101.
60. CAVR Interview with João Rui, Dili, 5 May 2004.
61. CAVR Interview with Francisco da Silva Guterres, Dili, 4 June 2004.
62. HRVD Statement 04876.
63. HRVD Statement 02048.
64. HRVD Statement 06054.
65. CAVR Interview with Eduardo Casimiro, Dili, 6 August 2003.
66. Alfredo Reinado Alves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
67. HRVD Statement 04435.
68. HRVD Statement 07801.
69. CAVR Interview with Domingos Maria Bada, Same, 14 October 2003.
70. Certificate filed in CAVR Archive.
71. CAVR Interview with João Rui, Dili, 5 May 2004.
72. ABRI, Juknis /06/IV/1982, in Budiardjo and Liem, pp. 226-227.
73. CAVR Interview with Eduardo Casimiro, Dili, 6 August 2003.
74. CAVR Interview with Osorio Florindo, Dili, 31 May 2003.
75. CAVR, Community Profiles of Pairara, Moro Sub-district, Lautém District, 28 March 2003; Vatuvovo, Liquiçá Sub-district, Liquiçá District, 26 June 2003; Vemasse Tasi, Vemasse Sub-district, Baucau District, 28 March 2003; Aissirimou, Aileu Sub-district, Aileu District, 27 March 2003; Ossu Desima, Ossu Sub-district, Viqueque District, 20 March 2003; CAVR Reseach Team, Lospalos Chronology; CAVR Interview with Leonel Guterres, Quelicai, Baucau, 8 April 2003 and 24 April 2003; CAVR Interview with José Pinto, Viqueque, 18 July 2003.
76. Community Profiles of Parlamento, Moro Sub-district, Lautém District, 6 March 2003; Seloi Malere, Aileu Sub-district, Aileu District, 8 May 2003.
77. CAVR Interview with Francisco da Conceição Guterres, Toculul, Railaco, Ermera, 17 June 2003.
78. CAVR Interview with Osório Florindo, Dili, 31 May 2003.
79. CAVR Interview with Helio Freitas, Dili, 19 May 2003.
80. UNICEF, East Timorese Children Involved in Armed Conflict, Case Studies Report: October 2000-February 2001, UNICEF East Timor, Dili, pp. 63.
81. D. Jimenez, "Timor se convierte en un immenso campo de refugiados" ["Timor becomes a huge refugee camp"], El Mundo (Spain), 10 September 1999 in Coalition to Stop the Use of Child Soldiers, Child Soldiers Global Report 2001, London, June 2001,
82. UNICEF, pp. 70.
83. UNICEF, pp. 70.
84. UNICEF, pp. 78.
85. Yayasan Hak (The Rights Foundation), Terror, Violence and Intimidation: ABRI and the Pro-Integration Militia in Timor-Leste: Report on the Human Rights Situation in Timor-Leste for the period January to March 1999, Dili, April 1999, p. 3.

86. Geoffrey Robinson, East Timor 1999: Crimes Against Humanity, A Report commissioned by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, July 2003, p. 98.
87. Yayasan Hak, p. 3.
88. CAVR, Community Profile of Lebos, Lolotoe, Bobonaro District, 9 September 2003.
89. UNICEF, pp. 75-84.
90. Rofino Mesak, Statement provided 18 September 2003, Oecussi, Statement CAVR CRP Database.
91. UNICEF, p. 61.
92. Mundus de Jesus, Statement provided 9 June 2003, Caikasa, Maubara, Liquiçá, Statement CAVR CRP Database.
93. UNICEF, pp. 64-65.
94. HRVD Statement 02947.
95. UNICEF, p. 70.
96. HRVD Statement 01351.
97. United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (UNHCHR), Human Rights Situation in East Timor, (UN Doc: UN Doc. E/CN.4/S-4/CRP), UNHCHR, 17 September 1999, p. 56.
98. UNICEF, pp. 10-11.
99. UNICEF, p. 69.
100. UNICEF; HRVD Statements 03513; 05859.
101. HRVD Statement 03513.
102. UNICEF, p. 62.
103. UNICEF, p. 65.
104. Sarah Niner (Ed), Resistir E Vencer! (To Resist is to Win!): The Autobiography of Xanana Gusmão, Aurora Books, Richmond, Victoria, 2000, p. 107; Xanana Gusmão, Resistir é Vencer! Unpublished document.
105. CAVR Interview with Caetano de Sousa Guterres, Dili, 22 May 2004.
106. CAVR Interview with Falintil Commander, Brigadier-General Taur Matan Ruak (José Maria de Vasconcelos), Quartel Geral F-FDTL, Caicoli, Dili, 14 June 2004.
107. CAVR Interview with Ricardo da Costa, Ribeiro, Dili, 13 May 2004.
108. CAVR Interview with Francisco Amaral, Dili, 5 June 2004.
109. CAVR Interview Ricardo da Costa Ribeiro, Dili, 13 May 2004.
110. Naldo Gil da Costa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
111. Aquilina Imaculada, oral history, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 16.
112. Mateus da Costa, oral history, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 5.
113. CAVR Interview with Francisco da Silva Guterres, Dili, 4 June 2004.
114. Ibid.
115. CAVR Interview with João Sarmento, Dili, 5 June 2004.
116. Gregório Saldanha, oral history, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 25.
117. Naldo Gil da Costa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
118. Aquilina Imaculada, oral history, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 16.
119. CAVR Interview with Rosalina José da Costa, Dili, 30 November 2003.
120. Naldo Gil da Costa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
121. Eduardo de Deus Barreto, oral history, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 13.
122. Aquilina Imaculada, oral history, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 16.
123. Constancio Pinto and Matthew Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle, South End Press, USA, 1997, pp. 118-119.

124. João da Silva (João Becora), testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
125. Peace is Possible in Timor-Leste [A Paz e Possivel em Timor-Leste], (Portuguese solidarity group), Casualities of the November 12, 1991 Massacre at Santa Cruz Cemetry in Dili, East Timor: 271 Killed, February 1992, Dili and Lisbon, <http://www.etan.org/timor/KILLED.htm>, at 30 March 2005.
126. CAVR Interview with Horacio de Almeida, Dili, 1 June 2004.
127. Alexandrino da Costa, testimony to CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
128. Xanana Gusmão, Speech at Symposium on Reconciliation, Tolerance, Human Rights and Elections, National Council Timorese Resistance, Dili, 12 February 2001, p. 3, in UNICEF, p. 8.
129. UNICEF, p. 18.
130. CAVR Interview with Eli Foho Rai Boot (Cornelio Gama, L-7), Laga, Baucau, 9 April 2003.
131. CAVR Interview with Faustino Cardoso Gomes, Dili, [undated]
132. CAVR Interview with Manuel Alves Pereira Moreira, Baucau, April 2003.
133. CAVR Interview with Joaquim Simião, Laleia, Manatuto, 24 June 2003.
134. HRVD Statement 02160.
135. CAVR Interview with Felix do Rosário Alas, Manufahi, 3 June 2003.
136. Constancio Pinto and Matthew Jardine, East Timor's Unfinished Struggle, 1997, pp. 50-54.
137. HRVD Statement 07244.
138. UNICEF, p. 27.
139. UNICEF, p. 24.
140. UNICEF, pp. 37-38.
141. UNICEF, p. 25.
142. CAVR Interview with Naldo Gil da Costa, Dili, 11 November 2003.
143. UNICEF, p. 46.
144. CAVR Interview with Julio José Exposto Gago, Hatolia, 13 August 2003.
145. UNICEF, p. 33.
146. CAVR Interview with Joaquim Simião, Laleia, Manatuto, 24 June 2003.
147. UNICEF, p. 38.
148. UNICEF, p. 37.
149. CAVR Interview with Felix do Rosário, Alas, Manufahi, 3 June 2003.
150. HRVD Statement 01475.
151. CAVR, Inter-Party Conflict, Case Summary Collection, 2003.
152. CAVR Interview with Felix do Rosário, Alas, Manufahi, 3 June 2003.
153. UNICEF, p. 39.
154. Niner (ed), To Resist is to Win, p. 86.
155. Meaeini Calado, "Saya Mengenal Clandestina dari Kawan-kawan Pribumi: Profil Annas Nasution" [I Know the Clandestine Movement from my Indigenous Friends: A Profile of Annas Nasution], Talitakum¸ 12 February 2002, pp. 25-26.
156. HRVD Statement 07671.
157. HRVD Statement 05615.
158. HRVD Statement 05443.
159. HRVD Statement 01469.
160. HRVD Statement 07813.
161. HRVD Statement 00572.
162. HRVD Statement 04093.
163. HRVD Statement 02363.
164. HRVD Statement 07586.
165. Isabel dos Santos Neves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
166. HRVD Statement 05679.
167. HRVD Statement 02094.

168. CAVR Interview with Adelino Araújo, Hato Builico, Ainaro, 29 May 2003.
169. CAVR, Community Profile of Mehara, Tutuala Sub-district, Lautém District, 10 September 2002.
170. HRVD Statement 03921.
171. CAVR Interview with Rosalina José da Costa, Ataúro Vila, Dili, 30 November 2003.
172. HRVD Statement 07701.
173. HRVD Statement 03686.
174. CAVR Interview with Joana Pereira, Dili, 10 June 2003; Joana Pereira, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Forced Displacement and Famine, Dili, 28-29 July 2003.
175. Aida Maria dos Anjos, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
176. CAVR Interview with Adelgisa Ximenes, Dili, 26 November 2003.
177. HRVD Statement 04789.
178. HRVD Statement 09038.
179. Human Rights Watch, World Report 1990: Indonesia and East Timor, <http://www.hrw.org/reports/1990/WR90/ASIA.BOU-05.htm>
180. HRVD Statement 3212.
181. Alexandrino da Costa, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
182. Sidney Jones, (Executive Director of Asia Watch), testimony to the US Senate Foreign Relations Committee, 21 February 1992, <http://www.hamline.edu/apakabar/basisdata/1992/02/21/0002.html>
183. HRVD Statement 01690.
184. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, pp. 197-198.
185. HRVD Statement 06278.
186. HRVD Statement 05854.
187. HRVD Statement 03212.
188. HRVD Statement 04355.
189. HRVD Statement 07008.
190. HRVD Statement 05062.
191. CAVR, Inter-Party Conflict: Case 10, Case Summary Collection, 2003.
192. HRVD Statement 09045; see also HRVD Statement 09081.
193. Constantinho Ornai, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, 29-30 March 2004.
194. HRVD Statement 06546.
195. HRVD Statement 02056.
196. HRVD Statement 04845.
197. HRVD Statement 06541.
198. Constantinho Ornai, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
199. CAVR Interview with José de Jesus dos Santos, 28 June 2004, Dili.
200. HRVD Statement 03501.
201. HRVD Statement 05640.
202. HRVD Statement 00406.
203. HRVD Statement 03828.
204. HRVD Statement 03887.
205. HRVD Statement 03501.
206. HRVD Statement 02101-01.
207. CAVR Interview with Sebastião da Cunha, Sau, Manatuto, 12 May 2004.
208. CAVR Community Profile, Leuro, Lospalos, Lautém District, 27 January 2004.
209. CAVR Interview with Silvino das Dores Soares, Viqueque, 10 March 2004.
210. CAVR Interview with Geronimo da Costa Amaral, Viqueque, 10 March 2004.
211. HRVD Statement 08108.

212. Peace is Possible in Timor-Leste, 1992, <http://www.etan.org/timor/KILLED.htm>, at 30 March 2005.
213. Yayasan HAK, From the road to Dili to the shootings in Baucau, Dili, 1 July 1998. [East Timor International Support Centre, ETISC] <http://www.etan.org/et/1998/july/01road.htm>, at 31 March 2005.
214. Raimundo Sarmento, testimony to the CAVR Laklubar Sub-district Hearing, Manatuto, 2 October 2003.
215. HRVD Statement 03684.
216. HRVD Statements 02285; 04060.
217. Deputy General Prosecutor for Serious Crimes v Eurico Guterres et al, Paras 51-58.
218. Prosecutor of the UN Transitional Authority in East Timor v Simão Lopes et al.
219. Robinson, East Timor 1999, OHCHR Submission to CAVR, p. 228.
220. Ibid, pp. 245-247.
221. Ibid, pp. 231.
222. CAVR Interview with Adriano João, Dili, 21 September 2004.
223. Ibid.
224. CAVR Interview with Maria Santina Tilman Alves, Ermera, 10 October 2003.
225. CAVR Interview with Filomeno Pedro Cabral Fernandes, Dili, 5 May 2004.
226. HRVD Statement 06639.
227. HRVD Statement 04915.
228. HRVD Statements 07784; 04915.
229. HRVDStatement 05783.
230. HRVD Statement 05120.
231. HRVD Statements 07840; 06639.
232. United Nations, Contemporary Forms of Slavery: Systematic Rape, Sexual Slavery and Slavery-like Practices during Armed Conflict, (E/CN.4/Sub.2/1998/13), Final Report submitted by Gay J. McDougall, Special Rapporteur, United Nations: New York, 1998, pp.7-8.
233. CAVR Interview with Eufrasia da Jesus Soares, Ermera, Ermera, 22 December 2003.
234. HRVD Statement 03334.
235. Alfredo Reinado Alves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
236. CAVR Interview with DM, Luca, Viqueque, 1 June 2003.
237. CAVR Interview with FM, Beobe, Viqueque, 31 May 2003.
238. HRVD Statement 07209.
239. HRVD Statement 01022.
240. HRVD Statement 04080.
241. Mário Viegas Carrascalão, "Violence against Women" and "Family Planning" that took place in Timor-Leste during the Indonesian occupation, from 1982-1992, Submission to CAVR, 28 April 2003.
242. HRVD Statement 07196.
243. HRVD Statement 02321.
244. CAVR Interview with LM, Bilileo, Lalarek Mutin, Viqueque, 24 March 2004.
245. HRVD Statement 05775.
246. CAVR, Women: Case 4, Case Summary Collection, January 2004.
247. CAVR, Women: Case 5, Case Summary Collection, January 2004.
248. HRVD Statement 05777.
249. HRVD Statement 04198.
250. [Name withheld], oral history, Archives of the Tuba Rai Metin Oral History Project, Submission to CAVR, CD No. 3.
251. HRVD Statement 04482.
252. Fokupers, Gender Based Violations of 1999, Submission to CAVR, July 2004, HRVD Statement No #99COV004.
253. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement No#99COV010.
254. HRVD Statement 08980
255. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement No#99AIL001.

256. Fokupers, 2004, HRVD Statement No.#99AIN007.
257. United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), Evaluation and Policy Analysis Unit, Evaluation of UNHCR's repatriation and reintegration programme in East Timor, 1999-2003, prepared by Chris Dolan, Judith Large and Naoko Obi, UNHCR, Geneva, 24 February 2004, pp. 59.
258. CAVR Interview with International Red Cross, Dili, 7 April 2004.
259. CAVR Interview with Mario Carrascalão, Dili, 12 September 2003.
260. Helene van Klinken, East Timorese Children in Java: Submission II, Submission to CAVR, 2002, p. 4.
261. Manuel Carceres, UNHCR, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004; see also Office Of The High Commissioner For Human Rights (OHCHR), Quarterly Reports Of Field Offices, Geneva 3 June 2003.
262. CAVR Interview with Manuel Carceres, UNHCR, Dili, 28 March 2005.
263. CAVR Interview with Valderio de Araújo, [no location recorded], 22 October 2003.
264. CAVR Interview with [name withheld], Dili, 25 August 2003.
265. Petrus Kanisius Alegria, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.
266. Ibid.
267. Alfredo Reinado Alves, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, 28-29 March 2004.
268. CAVR Interview with Alexander dos Santos, Ermera, 10 September 2003; CAVR Interview with Manuel Martins, Poilala, Ermera, 10 September 2003.
269. CAVR Interview with Yuliana, Jakarta, 15 January 2004.
270. Yuliana, testimony to CAVR workshop on Children and Conflict, 15 July 2004.
271. CAVR Interview with Maria Legge Mesquita, Dare, Dili, 14 April 2004.
272. CAVR Interviews with QN, Ermera, 13 August 2003 and 1 April 2004.
273. CAVR Interview with Domingos de Deus Maia, Same, Manufahi, 20 April 2004.
274. CAVR Interview with Aida, Bobonaro, Bobonaro, 11 May 2004; see also CAVR Interview with Alexander dos Santos, Ermera, 10 September 2003.
275. Helene van Klinken, Submission II, 2002, p. 4.
276. Petrus Kanisius Alegria, testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, 29-30 March 2004.
277. Ibid.
278. CAVR Interview with Petrus Kanisius Alegria, Dili, 16 June 2003.
279. Helene van Klinken, Children and Conflict, Submission to CAVR, November 2003. pp. 23.
280. CAVR Interview with Petrus Kanisius Alegria, Dili, 16 June 2003.
281. CAVR Interview with Mario Carrascalão, Dili, 12 September 2003.
282. CAVR Interview with Mario Carrascalão, Dili, 12 September 2003.
283. CAVR Interview with Abel dos Santos, Dili, 7 April 2003.
284. CAVR, Thomas da Costa, Case Summary Collection, 2003.
285. Helene van Klinken, East Timorese Children in South Sulawesi. Submission to CAVR, March 2002, p. 2.
286. CAVR Interview with Abidin Arianto, Baucau, 9 April 2003.
287. Simon Elegant, "Timor's Lost Boys", TIME Asia Magazine. 23 December 2002,
288. Interview with Najib Abu Yasser, Voice of Human Rights Radio (Jakarta), April 2002, in Helene van Klinken, Submission II, 2002, p. 1.
289. CAVR Interview with Leonel Guterres, Quelicai, 8 April 2003.
290. CAVR Interview with Syamshul Bahri, [no location recorded], 9 April 2003.
291. George Aditjondro, Suharto's Foundations [sic], 31 January 1998, pp. 134.
292. Asia Watch, Deception and Harassment of East Timorese Workers, 19 May 1992, pp. 2.
293. CAVR Interview with João da Costa, Baucau, 23 April 2003.
294. CAVR Interview with João da Costa, Baucau, 23 April 2003
295. CAVR Interview with Maria Margarida Babo (Garida), Dili, [undated].
296. Ibid; see also Guilherme dos Reis Fernandes, to testimony to the CAVR National Public Hearing on Children and Conflict, Dili, 29-30 March 2004.

297. CAVR Interview with Reverend Agustinho de Vasconselos, CAVR National Commissioner, Dili, 7 August 2003.

298. Helene van Klinken, East Timorese Children in Central Java, Post 1999: Submission III, Submission to CAVR, July 2001, p. 9.

299. East Timorese Children on Other Islands, On a meeting between UNICEF Indonesia, UNICEF East Timor, UNTAET Social Services, IRC, JRSand UNHCR, Dili, 2 November 2000.

300. Ibid.

301. Arist Merdeka Sirait, National Commission on Child Protection, in Helene van Klinken, Separated Children Post-August 1999. Submission to CAVR, 2002, p. 1.

302. Jesuit Refugee Service, "The Lost Of East Timoresse Children [sic]", Terms of Reference, Family Reunification Visit of the Parents to the Children in South Kalimantan, Atambua, (draft 22/01/01), p. 2.

303. Natercia M.J.O.Soares, (Chair of the HATI Foundation), "Pendidikan Anak Asrama dan Tanggungjawab Orangtua" ["The Education of Dormitory Children and the Responsibilities of the Parent"], Kompas, Jakarta, 5 October 2001, <http://www.hati.or.id/kompas140901.html> at 30 March 2005.

304. Ibid.

305. Helene van Klinken, Separated Children Post-August 1999, 2002, p. 3.

306. Jesuit Refugee Service, p. 2.

307. CAVR Interview with Zacarias Pereira, Tibar, Liquiçá, 5 May 2004.

308. Dateline, "East Timor`s Stolen Children", SBS (Australia), 4 September 2002.

309. CAVR Interview with Mario Carrascalão, Dili, 12 September 2003.

310. Ibid.

311. CAVR Interviews with [name withheld], Bandung, Java, 28 and 31 January 2004.

312. CAVR Interview with Maria Floriana da Conceição, Bandung, Java, 31 January 2004,

313. CAVR Interview with Petrus Kanisius Alegria, Dili, 16 June 2003.

314. CAVR Interview with Domingos de Deus Maia, Dili, 20 April 2004.

315. CAVR Interview with Sudirman, Dili, 25 April 2003.

316. CAVR Interview with Alfredo Reinado Alves, Dili, 5 March 2004.

Chega!

Part 7.9.

Economic and Social Rights

Part 7.9. Economic and Social Rights

Tables:

Graphics:

7.9. Economic and Social Rights

Introduction

1. Under the Indonesian occupation the people of Timor-Leste were subjected to brutal forms of violation of their physical integrity and their civil and political rights, but the impact of the conditions in which they lived, while often less remarked on, was equally damaging and possibly more long-lasting.

2. The social and economic rights of the East Timorese were comprehensively violated during the Indonesian occupation. These rights are defined in a number of international instruments, including the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR), the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR), and, for children, the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC). Specific provisions of the Fourth Geneva Convention cover the obligations of an occupying power to protect the social and economic circumstances of civilians.

3. The rights protected by these instruments include:

- The right to the enjoyment of the highest attainable standard of physical and mental health (ICESCR Article 12 and CRC Article 24)
- The right to an education (ICESCR Article 13, UDHR Article 26 and CRC Articles 28-29)
- The right of an individual to undertake work freely chosen (ICESCR Article 6, UDHR Article 23 and CRC Article 32)
- The right to an adequate standard of living, including adequate food, clothing and housing, and the continuous improvement of living conditions (ICESCR Article 11, UDHR Article 25 and CRC Article 27).

4. During the Indonesian occupation, the rights that were often violated include:

- Rights to health (ICESCR Article 12, CRC Article 24) were violated in political prisons and through the use of torture and in the deplorable conditions of the relocation camps. In 1999, the TNI and the militias damaged 77% of health facilities and virtually all of the country's medical equipment and medicine was looted or destroyed.[1]

- Rights to education (ICESCR Article 13, UDHR Article 26, CRC Articles 28-29) were violated for those forced into resettlement camps and into military service as "operations assistants" (Tenaga Bantuan Operasi, TBO).
- Rights to work freely chosen (ICESCR Article 6, UDHR Article 23, ICCPR (the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights) Article 8.3a, CRC Article 32, 38.2) were violated by forced recruitment into military operations as TBOs, civilian militia or human shields and by forced labour of other kinds.
- Rights to housing (ICESCR Article 11, UDHR Article 25) were violated through forced evictions and mass destruction of houses (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine).
- Rights to an adequate standard of living (ICESCR Article 11, UDHR Article 25, CRC Article 27) were violated in the displacement of civilians to squalid detention camps.
- Both the ICESCR and the ICCPR also provide (in common article 1(2)) for the right of a people to freely dispose of its natural wealth and resources. This right is an aspect of the right to self-determination.
- The above mentioned right of the East Timorese people to freely dispose of their natural resources was violated by the Timor Gap Treaty signed between Indonesia and Australia dividing proceeds of lucrative oil and gas fields under Timorese sovereignty without consultation with the East Timorese people or their interests being taken into consideration.

5. A constant theme of Indonesian propaganda during the occupation was the supposed contrast between the backwardness that was said to be Portuguese colonialism's chief legacy and the rapid development that Indonesia brought to Timor-Leste. In the instances cited above Indonesia plainly failed to live up to its claims that its overriding concern was the well-being of the East Timorese people. Waves of violence and the extreme political and social repression and control exercised by the Indonesian military seriously hampered activities that were fundamental to making a day-to-day living, including movement, farming, and the ability to transport and market goods.

6. Violations of economic and social rights did not occur only as a by-product of military operations, however. Even at times of relative normality, security concerns, which sometimes became intertwined with private and corporate interests, took precedence over the well-being of the East Timorese people. The explicit use of education as a propaganda tool, rather than to meet basic learning needs, restricted children's development and future opportunities. The permanent resettlement of entire villages in areas that had previously been avoided because of their poor soils and malarial conditions endangered people's health. The manipulation of coffee prices to fund military operations and benefit military and civilian officials personally limited farmers' chances of making an adequate livelihood. The unsustainable and destructive extraction of natural resources by government officials and their business partners undermined survival strategies and depleted the "natural capital" on which East Timorese people had expected to draw for many years to come. The preoccupation with security biased state investment towards areas such as road-building and the development of the government apparatus at the expense of agriculture in which the vast majority of East Timorese were employed.*

7. Economic and social rights are definitively set out in the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR). Although Indonesia has not ratified the Covenant, its provisions set the standard by which Indonesian conduct in Timor-Leste during the occupation should be judged. In the Covenant itself and in its elaboration by the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, it is recognised that because they are at different stages of economic development, states are not equally able to realise fully all the rights set out in the Covenant. The obligation on states is therefore to take steps to achieve the progressive realisation of social and economic rights to the maximum extent that their resources allow. However, at the same time, states have core responsibilities, which they must always fulfil. These include responsibilities to provide for certain basic needs, such as food, shelter, essential medicines and basic education. It is also required that states not act in a discriminatory manner in the provision of economic and social benefits and that they not take retrogressive measures that cause people's enjoyment of these rights actually to deteriorate.

8. The Commission believes that Indonesia violated economic and social rights at all these levels. In many instances the state took extreme security measures that were at odds with meeting its core responsibilities. In these situations, the state failed to provide for the population's basic needs, and frequently took measures that were both retrogressive and discriminatory.† At the same time the Commission has also found that the Indonesian state failed to realise the economic and social rights of the East Timorese to the maximum extent possible, and that at the end of the occupation, Timor-Leste's development still lagged well behind that of even the poorest Indonesian provinces (see Table 5 par. 26). This conclusion might seem surprising. The scale of Indonesian investment in the territory was large and the GDP growth rates that it produced were high. Moreover, the low benchmark established by the Portuguese makes the progress achieved in some areas, such as health and education, look dramatic. However, the Commission has found that the allocation of investment, the distribution of GDP and the delivery of social services, including health and education, were all severely compromised by the Indonesian state's overriding preoccupation with security, by its authoritarian style of government and by its close collaboration with special interests.

9. This finding clearly demonstrates the close relationship between serious violations of civil and political rights and the deprivation of social and economic rights. In Timor-Leste, the denial of fundamental civil and political freedoms had many manifestations,

* These policies should also be seen in the context of Soeharto's New Order regime (1965-1998). For an overview of this regime, see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict and Part 4: The Regime of Occupation.

† Many of the violations discussed in this part are violations of these core obligations, often involving multiple breaches of a retrogressive nature. These extreme violations have been highlighted in this part by being placed in text-boxes.

but among them were the ones that fostered the factors identified by the Commission as preventing the realisation of the economic and social rights of the people of Timor-Leste.

The duties of an occupying power relating to social and economic conditions

As Indonesia had the status of an occupying power in Timor-Leste, the Commission has also considered the duties of occupying powers set out in the Fourth Geneva Convention of 1949 and the Regulations Annexed to the Hague Convention of 1907 that relate to economic and social conditions.

These rules include, among many others:

- The occupying power must meet the food and medical needs of the population to the fullest extent possible, and if the resources of the occupied territory are inadequate, it should import food, medicine and other necessary items. Food and medicine in the occupied territories can be requisitioned by the occupying power only if absolutely necessary for the occupying forces and only if the needs of the civilian population are met, and a fair value is paid. If necessary the occupying power must accept aid to meet these obligations. (Fourth Geneva Convention, Articles 55, 56, and 59-62)
- The occupying power is prohibited from confiscating private property or engaging in pillage, although some private property may be requisitioned in return for compensation. (Hague Regulations, annexed to Hague Convention IV of 1907, Articles 46, 47, 52 and 53).
- Certain property of the state may be used by the occupying power, and the natural resources of the occupied territory may be used to cover the cost of the occupation. However they should not be exploited for the general profit of the occupying state.
- Property for education, culture or charities, even if owned by the government, must be treated like private property and not taken or destroyed under any circumstances. (Hague Regulations, annexed to Hague Convention IV of 1907, Article 56)
- Civilians cannot be compelled to serve in the armed or auxiliary forces of the occupier, and propaganda aimed at encouraging voluntary enlistment is prohibited. Civilians over the age of eighteen can be forced to do non-military work to serve the immediate needs of the occupying power, but their pay and conditions must be adequate.(Fourth Geneva Convention, Article 51)

The Commission's work on economic and social rights

10. As its work in the area of truth-seeking progressed, the Commission increasingly found evidence of both direct violations of social and economic rights and of the close inter-relationship between the violation of those rights and the abuses of civil and political rights that had been the chief focus of its work. It decided that this reality should be recognised in its Final Report. At the same time it acknowledges the limitations of the analysis that follows. The Commission's staff conducted interviews when possible, but its work in this area has relied heavily on secondary sources. Because of the closed nature of Timor-Leste under the occupation and because research during that period focused on the urgent need to halt the massive abuses of civil and political rights, social and economic data are only spottily available. Economic data that are available vary widely in quality and need to be treated with caution.

11. The Commission's investigation of violations of economic and social rights has focused on the role of Indonesia. The Commission has looked only at the role of the Indonesian state, and not other actors such as Timorese political parties, because social and economic rights are assessed by looking at the policies and practice of an effective government, and can only be seen over the long-term. Social and economic rights are primarily rights of people to the progressive improvement of their economic and social situation. The Commission acknowledges that other actors, including East Timorese non-state actors, committed acts that harmed people's social and economic conditions. Many of these acts are considered in Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine and Vol. III, Part 7.5: Violations of the Laws of War, but are not included here because they were not the acts of an effective government with long-term control over the territory of Timor-Leste.

12. The limited resources available to the Commission have permitted it to consider violations of cultural rights provided for under the ICESCR only to the extent that they are inseparable from violations of social and economic rights. Throughout this part, evidence is presented that Indonesian practice in such areas as education, health and land rights violated the norms and integrity of East Timorese culture. However, the Commission has not been able to examine the impact of the occupation on East Timorese culture in a detailed and systematic way. The Commission regrets this omission and strongly recommends that it should be rectified by further study.

13. For all of these reasons, this part cannot be regarded as presenting the definitive truth about violations of economic and social rights. Rather, it should be seen more as a contribution to it and as a spur to further research aimed at truth-seeking and reconciliation.

Social and economic rights and other rights

14. The existence of the two separate international covenants, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social, and Cultural Rights, might appear to entrench the distinction between these two sets of rights. In fact, however, the preambles to both covenants recognise their indivisibility. Thus the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights notes:

> The ideal of free human beings enjoying civil and political freedom and freedom from fear and want can only be achieved if conditions are created whereby everyone may enjoy his economic, social and cultural rights, as well as his civil and political rights.*

15. This close relationship was affirmed in the Vienna Declaration adopted at the 1993 United Nations World Conference on Human Rights:

> Democracy, development and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms are interdependent and mutually reinforcing. Democracy is based on the freely expressed will of the people to determine their own political, economic, social and cultural systems and the full participation in all aspects of their lives.[2]

16. It is worth emphasising the implications of the lack of attention to social and economic rights by external observers and Indonesia, in comparison to the attention given to civil and political rights. The combination of social and economic rights violations under conditions of overwhelming poverty, such as that experienced by the people of Timor-Leste, is often used to explain why violations of these rights, in themselves, do not command our attention. Indeed, the very widespread and entrenched nature of social and economic violations often numbs us both to their seriousness and to their essential character as rights. The UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, in a statement to the Vienna World Conference on Human Rights in 1993, drew attention to:

> [T]he shocking reality that States and the international community as a whole continue to tolerate all too often breaches of economic, social and cultural rights, which if they occurred in relation to civil and political rights, would provoke expression of horror and outrage.
>
> Statistical indicators of the extent of deprivation, or breaches of economic, social and cultural rights have been cited so often that they have tended to lose their impact. The magnitude, severity and constancy of that deprivation have evoked attitudes of resignation, feelings of hopelessness and compassion fatigue. Such muted responses are facilitated by a reluctance to characterise the problems that exist as gross and massive denials of economic, social and cultural rights. Yet it is difficult to understand how the situation can realistically be portrayed in any other way.[3]

17. Further, the low value in monetary terms of assets lost by the poor is often an implicit reason for the lack of attention to the violations that occur when they are destroyed.

* The ICCPR has a nearly identical preamble.

For example, the International Committee of the Red Cross's (ICRC) chief delegate to Timor-Leste in 1975, in his assessment of the impact of the "civil war", dismissed the extent of property damage:

> There was no significant material damage…In the inside of the island, numerous villages were burned, particularly in the region of Maubisse, Ainaro but the reconstruction of straw huts is not a problem for the native population.[*4]

18. The monetary value of these simple huts may indeed have seemed inconsequential, and materials for reconstruction were available locally. However, the more fundamental point is that the less people have to lose, the more severe the impact of the loss of homes, property, and livestock. The repeated destruction and looting of the property of those who have so little – first by the Portuguese, then by the warring political parties, then by the Indonesian military, and then by militia – made recovery slow, and both economically and emotionally taxing. People who are already on the edge of illness, starvation and ignorance due to chronic poverty are that much more in need of protection of these rights. Indeed, the absence of rigorous monitoring of these rights is in itself an indication of the neglect of the social and economic welfare of the East Timorese people.

The right to an adequate standard of living

19. The right of each person to an adequate standard of living encompasses the right to be free from hunger, to have access to the economic means of survival and clothing and shelter. It is essentially about bringing people out of poverty and creating the conditions for them to live their lives to their full potential. These rights, and how they have been violated, are considered below.

Development and government spending

20. As already mentioned, Indonesia often cited its large investment in the development of Timor-Leste as evidence of its good will towards the East Timorese people. It is true that Indonesia committed more investment to Timor-Leste than to any of its provinces. It allocated some Rp1.3bn for development in the territory between 1976/77 and 1993/94 (the equivalent of US$960m), This was, for example, around 50% more than it allocated to the neighbouring Indonesian province of East Nusa Tenggara (see Table 1 & 2).

* While the intent of his comment is clear, it is also worth noting its context. It is clear from the ICRC internal reports, minutes from meetings and notes from phone conversations (on file at CAVR) that the ICRC delegate, André Pasquier, felt strongly that the situation in late 1975 (before the Indonesian invasion) in Timor-Leste was being exaggerated by other agencies and the press. He further felt that "80% of nutritional problems which at present exist in Timor are not so much the result of the war as from the economic system maintained by the Portuguese." Therefore, comments in his reports were often attempts to downplay the effects of the "civil war" and the need for outside assistance.

Table 1: Allocation of funds in Five-Year Development Plans (Repelita) for Timor-Leste and selected provinces, 1969/70–1993/94 (Rp b)

	Repelita I (1969/70-1973/74) (Rp b)	Repelita II (1974/75-1978/79) (Rp b)	Repelita III (1979/80-1983/84) (Rp b)	Repelita IV (1984/85-1988/89) (Rp b)	Repelita V (1989/90-1993/94) (Rp b)	Total (Rp b)	Total (US$ m)[a]
Timor-Leste	…	66,692	139,385	257,822	826,312	1,290.,81	960.2
East Nusa Tenggara	2,223	24,788	129,296	175,199	526,309	857,815	641.2
West Nusa Tenggara	1,728	22,826	111,765	151,629	332,782	620,730	494.7
Papua (Irian Jaya)	1,469	15,825	87,388	155,224	652,353	912,259	609.5

[a] Conversions calculated at annual average rate of the Rp:US$ during each five-year period of the Five-Year Development Plans.

Source: Rui Gomes, East Timor's Socio-Economic Development under Indonesia: (1976-1998), Phd Thesis, London South Bank University, 2002, p. 218.

Table 2: Budget and Inpres[a] funds allocated to Timor-Leste, 1976/77–1992/93

	Sectoral Projects (Rp m)	Routine Budget (Rp m)	Total Budget Funds (Rp m)[b]	Budget Line Item 16 (Rp m)	Inpres Funds (Rp m)	Sectoral Projects (US$ '000)	Routine Budget (US$ '000)
1976/77	232.8	1,475.6	1,708.4	…	552.0	561.0	3,555.7
1977/78	3,500.0	3,261.6	6,761.6	…	3,359.7	8,433.7	7,859.4
1978/79	4,333.5	3,134.5	7,468.0	…	3,997.0	8,824.1	6,382.6
1979/80	7,517.2	3,150.0	10,667.2	7,000.0	5,152.9	11,996.8	5,027.1
1980/81	12,415.7	6,954.4	19,370.1	6,000.0	9,087.5	19,801.8	11,091.5
1981/82	11,213.2	8,435.5	19,648.7	6,500.0	14,884.6	17,617.0	13,252.9
1982/83	28,220.9	8,846.8	37,067.7	n/a	19,113.9	41,864.6	13,123.9
1983/84	22,871.4	9,432.1	32,303.5	7,000.0	20,826.0	23,257.5	9,591.3
1984/85	23,694.8	20,015.1	43,709.8	8,135.6	22,940.8	22,577.2	19,071.0
1985/86	35,181.2	13,038.6	48,219.8	14,147.8	24,192.3	31,406.2	11,639.5
1986/87	25,555.6	13,071.3	38,626.9	7,512.7	22,735.2	18,116.8	9,266.5
1987/88	15,075.7	11,218.1	26,293.8	5,372.6	n/a	9,142.3	6,803.0

1988/89	14,285.8	11,516.3	25,802.1	6,379.7	n/a	8,371.4	6,748.5
1989/90	18,324.6	14,765.2	33,089.8	n/a	n/a	10,253.2	8,261.6
1990/91	25,641.3	17,037.4	42,678.7	n/a	n/a	13,720.0	9,116.3
1991/92	31,351.7	18,859.4	50,211.1	n/a	n/a	15,891.2	9,559.2
1992/93	40,093.4	18,932.6	59,026.0	n/a	n/a	19,674.8	9,290.7
Total	319,508.8	183,144.4	502,653.2	n/a	n/a	281,509.5	159,640.7

[a] Extra state budgetary funds allocated upon presidential instruction with parliamentary approval.

[b] Excludes Budgetary Line Item 16 (Special Funds for Timor-Leste), for which data are incomplete.

Source: Rui Gomes, East Timor's Socio-Economic Development under Indonesia, p. 218.

21. Indeed this investment did translate into rapid GDP growth once the major military operations had ended and something approaching normality had been created in the mid-1980s. According to the official data, GDP grew at an annual average rate of 8.5% between 1984 and 1997, exceeding both Indonesian national GDP and growth in any Indonesian province (see Table 5 par. 26). While there are technical and political reasons to believe that the data are seriously flawed,[5] the overall picture that they depict about Timor-Leste's economy during the occupation years is a convincing one. Growth was driven by construction, transport and communications and government services, all sectors related to the consolidation of the occupation. There was also rapid growth in the trade and manufacturing, although the share of both in overall output remained low, particularly in the case of manufacturing. Meanwhile, agriculture, which still employed 84% of the population in 1990,[6] recorded the lowest growth rate among all the main sectors.

Table 3: Sectoral shares of GDP and growth rates, 1984–1997 (%)

	Sectoral Shares			Annual Average Growth 1984-97
	1984	1993	1997
Agriculture	44.5	29.8	33.7	5.4
Manufacturing	1.4	2.9	3.1	13.7
Construction	11.4	21.0	18.1	12.7
Trade	8.4	9.3	9.1	11.5
Transport and Communications	5.4	8.6	9.7	14.9
Government Services	21.7	21.5	19.9	8.1
GDP	92,8	93,1	93,6	11,05

Source: Rui Gomes, East Timor's Socio-Economic Development under Indonesia, p. 218.

22. Clearly during the most intensive period of the war, from 1975-79, agricultural activity was almost totally paralysed. Then the confinement of much of the population in "resettlement" camps, where they continued to be held in some cases until the late 1980s and where their freedom of movement and ability to farm were both severely restricted meant that the recovery was very slow (between 1983 and 1986 the sector grew by less than 1% a year).[7] Output of the two main food crops, maize and rice, did not return to their pre-war levels until the late 1980s.[8]

23. Even after some degree of normalisation returned, conditions were not still conducive to agricultural growth. The massive disruption of traditional settlement patterns in the early years of the occupation had long-lasting effects. Much of the population continued to be forced to live in areas chosen with security rather than fertility in mind. Population movements and a new land regime cast land rights into uncertainty. Farmers were prevented from making the shift from subsistence to cash-generating agriculture by the iron grip of the military and their business associates over commodity production (see, in particular, par. 27-44).

24. No less important, agriculture suffered from low investment. Less than 10% of state investment was directed to agriculture, while over 50% went into just two sectors, transport and communications and the civil administration (see Table 4 below). Moreover, the main beneficiaries of what investment there was are believed to have been Indonesian transmigrants and the plantation sector.[9]

Table 4: Structure of state investment by sector, 1984/85–1993/94 (%)

Sector	% of Total
Transport and Communications	34
Civil Administration	20
Education & Youth	11
Agriculture & Irrigation	9
Health & Social Welfare	5
Regional Subsidies	5
Regional Development	4
Information	2
Religion	2
Natural Resources & Development	2
Defence	2
Industry	1
Other	3
Total	100

Source: Gomes citing KORPRI Timor Timur. Buku Dua Puluh Tahun Timor Timur Membangun, Dili, 1996, p. 139.

25. As a result of all these factors, agriculture's share of GDP was on a declining trend for most of the occupation. Such a decline is not unusual in a fast growing economy, but in Timor-Leste's case it was not accompanied by a compensating shift of the agricultural labour force into newly-emerging, more dynamic sectors. The manufacturing sector's share of output did rise during the same period (from 1.3% to 3.1%), but this was not enough to absorb much labour. Instead, at the end of the occupation, nearly three-quarters of the labour force remained in the countryside grinding out a subsistence living. During the same period the number of government employees soared (rising from just 780 in 1981 to 33,602 in 1997).[10] This bias was reflected in growth rates for Dili, which far outstripped those for any other district.[11] Excluded from the dynamic sectors, and confined to sectors that the government refused to dynamise, the majority of the population did not benefit from this growth.

26. In particular, slow-growing, low-productivity agriculture became synonymous with poverty: in the 1990s, 85% of heads of households belonging to the poorest half of the population were employed in agriculture, whereas more than 50% of the richest 20% of the population were working for the government or in the formal sector.[12] Timor-Leste's poverty cannot be blamed solely on Portuguese failures. After occupying Timor-Leste for nearly 24 years, Indonesia left a territory that was extremely poor by both Indonesian and international standards. [See Table 5 below] One calculation using East Timorese indicators to derive a Human Poverty Index showed that despite growing rapidly for much of that period, Timor-Leste in 1999 ranked among the poorest countries in the world (see Table 6).

Table 5: Comparative economic indicators: Timor-Leste and Indonesia

	GDP per head as % of Indonesia average	Average annual growth, 1983-96	Sectoral share of GDP			Illiteracy (%)	Infant Mortality[a]	Life Expectancy
			Agric	Manuf	Govt	1996	1996	1996
Timor-Leste	38.3	5.6	24.2	3.2	23.6	59.6[b]	135.0	53.9
NTT	35.3	4.6	38.1	2.4	19.8	21.1	51.0	64.4
NTB	41.2	4.9	36.3	4.8	16.6	32.0	75.0	58.9
Maluku	67.1	4.6	26.1	18.0	10.6	6.8	47.0	65.4
Papua	167.7	4.8	18.1	4.1	6.9	32.6	51.0	64.5
Indonesia	100.0	5.1	15.4	24.7	8.8	14.7	44.0	66.0

[a] Per 1,000 live births. [b] 2001

Sources: BPS 1999; BPS and UNDP 1997; and UNDP 2001

Table 6: Timor-Leste: income and poverty indicators, 1990–1999	1990	1995	1996	1999
Probability at birth of not surviving to 40 years (% of cohort)	22.7	28.5	41.1	35.6
Adult illiteracy rate (%, aged 15 and over)	59.8	54.7	59.6	59.6
Underweight average of deprivation (%)	…	…	49.0	45.7
Population not using improved water sources (%)	50.5	44.7	47.4	46.9
Underweight children under 5 (%)	…	…	50.6	44.5
Population without access to health services (%)	20.3	31.1	…	…
Human poverty index (HPI-1) value	46.4	43.0	51.0	49.0
Population below the national poverty line (%)	…	…	41.5	42.4

Source: Gomes, p. 208, based on UNDP and BPS data.

The coffee sector

27. Coffee has been Timor-Leste's single most important source of tax revenue, foreign exchange and local cash income since the late 19th century. It is still today Timor's most important export (in 2001 worth some US$13m, 75% of all exports),[13] and about 44,000 smallholder families (or some 200,000 people, 25% of the total population) are directly dependent on coffee for 90% of their cash income.[14]

28. The Portuguese are thought to have introduced coffee to Timor in the early 19th century. Sixty years later it had grown to become the territory's largest export. By 1925, when coffee prices were high and yields of valuable sandalwood had collapsed due to over-harvesting, coffee accounted for more than 80% of the value of Portuguese Timor's exports.* The production and export of plantation crops under Portuguese administration was dominated by a single company, Sociedade Agrícola Pátria e Trabalho (SAPT). SAPT was founded in 1900 by the then governor, Jose Celestino da Silva,† who was also responsible for the overhaul of Timorese village society in order to release land and labour for plantations (repovoamento).[15] Although founded as a private venture, SAPT behaved as if it were a state company by virtue of its association with the governor. Using the authority and resources of the state, SAPT seized the most productive land in Ermera District for coffee, and instituted a programme of forced cultivation, overseen

* Even at its peak, coffee probably produced only some Esc10.2m (US$380,000 at the current exchange rate). Moreover, coffee prices, like those of most tropical commodities, were unstable. Revenue from coffee was always insufficient to support the state, but it was the primary source of locally-generated financing for the poorly-funded Portuguese territory. Helio A Estevas Felgas, Timor Português, Agência Geral Do Ultramar, Lisbon, 1956, cited in João Saldanha, 1994, p. 65.

† Da Silva was a distinctive figure for other reasons as well. He put down the Dom Boaventura Rebellion of 1911-12 and then sought to reassert Portuguese control by reorganising local political structures. One of his innovations was to introduce the position of chefe de suco, thereby undermining the traditional authority of the liurai (except those who were loyal to the state). Some of the chief beneficiaries of this reorganisation were the plantation companies, which gained effective control over large areas of land.

by the military.* Later rebellions against the poll tax were punished by forced labour on coffee plantations, and those who were unable to pay the tax were also subjected to forced labour.[16]

Management of the coffee sector under Indonesian administration

29. The Indonesian state followed the pattern established by the Portuguese colonial government by putting management of production and trade in coffee into the hands of state proxies. These proxies had special arrangements with the Indonesian military, which gave them control of the coffee trade, and subsequently control of other sectors, in return for supplying "off-budget" funds for military operations and the civil administration. As part of this arrangement, local coffee smallholders were prevented from earning a decent standard of living or seeing the benefit of the enormous profits made by the trading company, the military, senior military officers and Indonesian businessmen. Even more seriously, the funds from coffee financed the military campaign in Timor-Leste as well the military's ongoing repression of the local population.

30. Major General Benny Moerdani, who was deeply involved in the planning and execution of Indonesia's Timor-Leste operations before and after the full invasion, initially as chief of defence joint intelligence and deputy head of Bakin and then from 1983 to 1988 as armed forces commander, described in an exclusive interview how he forged a partnership with the Indonesian entrepreneur, Robby Sumampouw.[17] Moerdani recalled how, on 11 December 1975, the two met in a Jakarta nightclub to arrange a business deal under which Robby Sumampouw would provide food and supplies to the invasion forces in exchange for the right to sell the coffee then stored in Dili. The Indonesian military had expected a quick victory in Timor-Leste, and had not planned or budgeted for a prolonged campaign:†

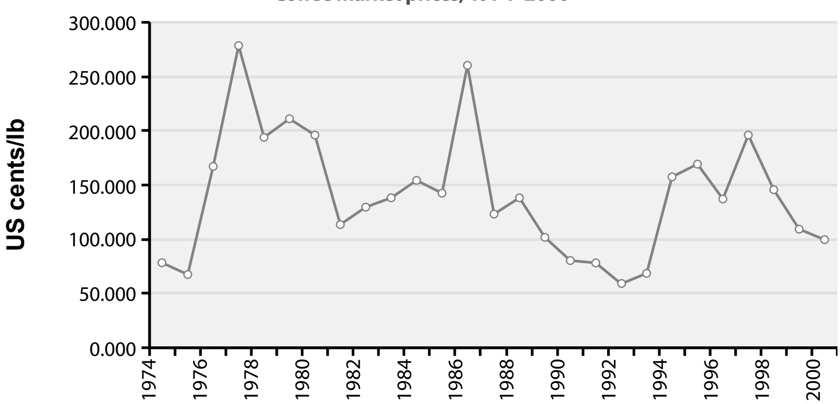
> This was a bloody expensive operation. The whole Timor operation was prepared in less than a year. And you know our budgeting system. You have to plan five years in advance. So if you start something in the middle of Repelita [the Five-Year Development Plan], you don't have money for it. ABRI was squeezing everything. It's unthinkable that a westerner would understand. If you tell this to the US Staff College, they won't understand; the Australian Staff College, they won't understand. How can you mount an operation without money? But we did it. Because we had to.[18]

31. According to Moerdani, Sumampouw offered to ship in US$1m worth of supplies for the troops – including food, tyres, motorcycles and Land Rovers. Moerdani recalled the conversation this way:

* SAPT later also formed subsidiaries that controlled cocoa and rubber plantations. SAPT, Business Plan, Dili, August 2000, p. 1.

† CAVR interviews with, among others, the former governor of Timor-Leste, Mario Carrascalão, corroborate that this was ABRI's view. Many sources have recalled the Indonesian boast that its troops would "have breakfast in Dili, lunch in Baucau and dinner in Lospalos", as well as the subsequent, less optimistic variants on this apothegm, as their hopes of a quick victory faded.

I said: “I won’t have one million dollars to pay you.” No, they [Sumampouw and his associates] don’t mind. “We know there is a lot of coffee in Timor-Leste, maybe 5,000-6000 tons…Well, we send one ship with all these goodies before Christmas. And then after it is off-loaded, we load coffee, as much as the ship can take. And we sail to Singapore to sell it…If the proceeds come to more than US$1m, we’ll take only one million to pay for the goods. If it comes to less than one million, you don’t have to pay us anything.” I said: “Very generous! What do I owe you for this?” “No, we just want to do something for the government.” I said OK. So, it started.[19]



32. Thus, the deal that was to establish the largest business in Timor-Leste was struck in Jakarta, just four days after the Indonesian invasion of Díli.

33. On delivery of the goods to Dili, Moerdani then introduced Sumampouw to Colonel Dading Kalbuadi, the then intelligence chief of the Seroja joint task force (Kogasgab) and Arnaldo dos Reis Araújo, the Indonesian-installed governor of Timor-Leste. Both agreed to issue Sumampouw a 20-year contract to buy East Timorese coffee and sell it abroad in return for the continued provision of supplies.[20] Sumampouw and his brother Hendro established PT International Denok Hernandes Indonesia as the sole buyer and exporter of coffee.

The value of the coffee sector

34. During the Indonesian occupation, coffee was more profitable than it had been under the Portuguese. For much of the occupation period prices were buoyant (particularly in 1977 and 1986) and production rose to over 13,000 tons. The deal therefore proved lucrative for Sumampouw and the ABRI generals. Sumampouw’s shipment of supplies arrived on 23 December 1975. In 1976, coffee prices rocketed to an all-time high (see Chart 1 below and Table 7 par. 38).

Coffee market prices, 1974–2000

Source: www.imfstatistics.org

35. The Commission was able to find sources referring to the sale of only two shipments, the first of 500 tons, the second of 800 tons, for a total sale price in Singapore of US$3.1m (US$1.27/lb*).[21] It is not known when the remainder of the coffee sitting in Dili warehouses was sold or at what price, and whether the remainder of the profit went to Robby Sumampouw or ABRI in Timor-Leste or both. However, according to Moerdani's account of the terms of his deal with Sumampouw, by mid-1976, even this partial sale of Timor-Leste's coffee stocks gave ABRI a US$2.1million windfall to finance its operations just when it was launching its advance into the interior of Timor-Leste (see Vol. I, Part 3: The History of the Conflict, section on Operation Seroja, 1976-79). If the Sumampouws traded the rest of the other shipments at the same price as the first two sales, the total profit would have been some US$14m.

36. Estimating exactly how much profit may have been made is complicated by several factors, including: the oscillating price of coffee on international markets, the difference between prices paid to producers and the international indicator price, the lack of systematic records on producer prices in Timor-Leste and West Timor, and currency fluctuations. Therefore, the data cited here on prices paid to producers in Timor-Leste and their comparison with West Timor prices (see Table 7, below) are indicative only.

37. In 1977, international coffee prices hit a new high. PT Denok was perfectly positioned to capture this upswing in the market. When prices fell again in 1978-79, Sumampouw was well-placed to expand his business in Timor-Leste into other, more lucrative sectors. When PT Denok's coffee monopoly was finally broken, in 1992 after the Santa Cruz Massacre, under pressure from US Senators, Moerdani was no longer commander of the Indonesian armed forces and coffee prices had fallen to their lowest level in 30 years. The end of the monopoly was therefore a relatively cheap concession to the international community, leaving those who had benefited from it to concentrate on the, by then, more rewarding monopolies in construction and import-export.[22]

38. East Timorese smallholders saw none of the profits earned by Sumampouw and the ABRI generals. Each year the local government issued a regulation that set the price to be paid to farmers.† In 1983 this price was one-sixth of the price paid in West Timor, costing East Timorese coffee farmers $2.50 in lost income for each kilogramme of coffee produced.‡ This meant that, in 1983, even when the international market price was not especially high, PT Denok was making some US$18 million just by underpaying East Timorese growers.

* IMF statistics cite coffee market prices in 1976 at US$1.67/lb.

† The Governor issued a decree concerning the order of the coffee trade. The last one was issued in 1993 when the monopoly had been broken. CAVR, interview with Sam Filliaci, Yogyakarta, Indonesia, 9 July 2004.

‡ An Australian Senate delegation to Timor-Leste was told that PT Denok paid producers Rp500/kg, (or US$ 50 cents) when the world market coffee price was Rp3000/kg. Official Report of the Australian Parliamentary Delegation to Indonesia July-August 1983, Australia, pp. 175 and 184.

Table 7: Coffee prices and production, 1975–1993
Year	Production (Tons)	Price paid to producer (Rp/kg)	International market indicator price (Rp/kg)	East Timor price source
1975	4,585	n/a	621	No price available, although some reported that coffee was traded for rice in the early years of the invasion
1976	2,510	n/a	1,525	No price available
1977	5,597	n/a	2,538	No price available
1978	3,547	n/a	1,887	No price available
1979	2,968	n/a	2,892	No price available
1980	4,600	100 – 300	2,704	CAVR interviews, Idelfonso (Fatubessi coffee farmer and former PT Salazar employee); Chung Ki Seng (aka Asengko, independent coffee trader)
1981	8,999	150 – 350	1,571	ACFOA Dossier, 9 March 1982, confidential interview with former driver for PT Denok in Ermera and Dili until December 1981. Also reported that army selling for Rp1,500/kg.
1982	8,009	375	1,892	Australian Senate Delegation, 1983, p. 175
1983	7,240	500	2,761	Australian Senate Delegation, 1983 p 175 and 184
1984	6,091	n/a	3,476	No price available
1985	8,275	500	3,469	CAVR interview, Idelfonso
1986	9,572	n/a	7,336	No price available
1987	9,448	800 – 1,500	4,448	CAVR interview, Arcanjo De Silva (Coffee Rehabilitation Project 1987-92). Also reports that the Denpasar and Sulawesi farmgate price was Rp7,000/kg
1988	9,428	1,200-1,500	5,119	Tempo, 9/3/88, p. 33. Also reports that the Atambua wholesale price was Rp4000/kg
1989	7,497	2,000	3,972	CAVR interview with Manuel Babo (coffee farmer in Aifu, Ermera). Also reports that Atambua price was Rp6,000/kg minus taxes and bribes
1990	7,348	4,000	3,243	CAVR interview, Idelfonso
1991	10,508	1,100-1,200	3,346	Mubyarto, et al., East Timor: The Impact of Integration

1992	13,288	n/a	2,635	No price available
1993	7,734	800-1,100	3,122	CAVR interview, Sam Filliaci (former Director NCBA, Dili)

Source for production: 1975-80 Saldanha; 1983 Soesastro; 1981-2, 1984-93 Timor Timur dalam Angka; Source for international market price: www.imfstatistics.org

39. The Commission received numerous reports of the Indonesian military interfering in the production and trading of coffee in order to protect PT Denok's privileged position.* Farmers reported that armed soldiers guarded the coffee, and that military vehicles were often used to transport it. The transportation of coffee (above a few kilogrammes for personal use) other than by PT Denok was strictly prohibited, and punishable by confiscation and possible imprisonment. Several independent Chinese traders did continue to operate. Some operated as local buyers in association with PT Denok; others did not have licences but simply bribed their way to Atambua to sell coffee at a higher price.[23]

40. Although the military initially may have needed Sumampouw's help to procure supplies for its operations, in later years the military's share of PT Denok's coffee profits appears to have been used primarily for the personal enrichment of a handful of top officials. The former governor, Mario Carrascalão, recounted how the profit from PT Denok was diverted:

> There were something called "coffee fee" funds. Farmers were paid 150, 200, 300 rupiah max [per kilo]. Then there was a "fee" paid directly to district and provincial level officials and the military (the Muspida Tingkat I and II and the Muspika). There was about Rp3bn from these fees that was divided up between the governor, the prosecutor, the military commander and so forth.[24]

41. PT Denok was a subsidiary of the Batara Indra Group which included ten other monopoly subsidiaries, including PT Salazar (to which the governor, Mário Viegas Carrascalão, granted sole ownership of 11,000 ha of coffee plantations seized from SAPT), PT Scent Indonesia (sole buyer and exporter of sandalwood), PT Watu Besi Raya (sole contractor for all civil construction) and PT Marmer (sole owner of all marble mining rights).[25] Given the large amount of funds allocated to Timor to develop infrastructure, a monopoly on these contracts would certainly have been highly attractive. PT Denok established two further companies, PT Gunung Kijang and Bakti Timor Karya (BTK), which were involved in the monopoly in the infrastructure sector during the occupation. At the time of writing these two companies continue to do business in Timor-Leste. The monopolies would therefore have provided a strong economic interest in maintaining military control in Timor-Leste.

* The seizure of large landholdings for coffee plantations had the effect of giving PT Denok control of both the purchase and sale of the product, although 60% of coffee still came from smallholdings. State-organised cooperatives, Kud, were nominally the buyers, who then supplied PT Denok, the sole exporter of "green" beans. However, interviews suggest that the cooperatives in fact served only to rubber-stamp sales by farmers, and that PT Denok actually bought its coffee directly or from independent traders.

Military involvement in the East Timorese economy

42. Military business involvement was not unique to Timor-Leste – the collection of "fees" and grants by the military for exclusive resource extraction rights were part of the endemic corruption that was a hallmark of the Soeharto Government. The "dual function" (dwifungsi) of the military in both civil administration and defence was an integral part of the New Order government's authoritarian control and therefore opened ample opportunities for the military to develop businesses.[26]

43. However, the degree of military control in Timor-Leste during the occupation was unusual even for New Order Indonesia (see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation). The military held key positions in the civil administration, especially in the early years of the occupation, giving it a stranglehold over Timor-Leste's economic and commercial activities and the power to protect army-related businesses and their patronage networks (see Vol. I, Part 4: The Regime of Occupation, section on Civil Administration):

> The head and secretary of the Regional Planning Board (Bappeda) occupy the strategic positions from which to control the use of resources and ensure that the proceeds of projects are distributed "fairly" among officers, officials and business enterprises in Timor-Leste and Jakarta. As a rule, all projects requiring more than Rp500m are assigned to businesses in Java as businesses in Timor-Leste are unable to provide the necessary capital. Bappeda has the power to allocate these projects.[27]

44. While the international laws of war allow a belligerent occupier to seize or otherwise make use of resources in order to fund the occupation, the military-controlled plundering of Timor-Leste's most valuable commodity served to enrich the military officers and civilian officials who were in positions to protect these investments. Given the extent of these patronage networks and the level of corruption in the territory, it is not credible that the military's control over Timor-Leste's economy and resource management was necessary solely to fund the occupation.

Right of a people to dispose of natural resources

45. In addition to control of coffee, the military was also involved in the looting of Timor-Leste's valuable natural resources including sandalwood, timber and oil.

Sandalwood

46. Timor's valuable aromatic sandalwood was the commodity that originally attracted the attention of European traders and the governments that sponsored them in the early 16th century, and was to play a central role in the structuring of power both within the colony and between the Portuguese, Dutch and British powers competing for ascendancy in the region. The Portuguese logged the sandalwood stocks relentlessly, roots and all, and production plummeted from almost 900,000kg in 1910 to a mere 20,000kg in 1926, when exporting sandalwood was officially banned to allow stocks to regenerate.[28]

47. After the Indonesian invasion sandalwood was again harvested at an unsustainable rate, either directly by, or under the orders, of the military. The Commission's research has uncovered cases of military personnel ordering local people to fell sandalwood trees of all sizes, including tearing out the roots.[29] Logged by or for the military, sandalwood was sold primarily through independent traders in the early years after the invasion. In October 1979, its removal was formalised by giving Robby Sumampouw's Batara Indra Group subsidiary, PT Scent Indonesia, exclusive export rights. By 1982, 240 tons of sandalwood and oil were being exported, rising to 328 tons in 1986. However, as the resource was depleted, yields began to fall, reaching less than 150 tons in 1988, less than 60 tons in 1990 and 11 tons in 1991.[30]

Forest cover

48. Abiding aspects of the East Timorese experience, including the harsh and uncertain climate and frequent waves of violence and instability, have given the forests a special value, whether as a source of food in lean periods or as places of refuge in times of instability. Wood is also a major fuel source and forest plants are used in traditional medicines.[31] In 1999, the UN Intergovernmental Panel on Forests established the concept of a forest per capita ratio to draw attention to the importance of forests for agrarian societies. A community with a ratio of 0.01 ha/per person was considered to be a population at risk because its members would not be able to use the forests to supplement their livelihoods. Researchers found that in 1999 most areas in Timor-Leste were at, or near, the at-risk threshold.[32]

49. The heavy toll taken on Timor-Leste's forests during the Indonesian occupation is demonstrated by two independent satellite photo analyses, which show a sharp decline in forest cover during the occupation, especially in the western districts.* The largest declines in woodland and dense forest cover, in same cases amounting to losses of up to 96%, were in Oecussi, Dili, Bobonaro, Liquiçá, Ermera, Lautém, Manatuto and Covalima. The data do not establish with any certainty the causes of this decline, but major contributors are likely to have been:

- Increased pressure on forested land arising from a variety of causes, including clearing for farming and firewood cutting and to accommodate a population that was growing as a result of natural increase and the influx of settlers, whether as transmigrants or to populate "guided" villages along the border areas for "security" purposes;[33]
- Commercial cutting of logs (including teak, iron wood [Ferro], and sandalwood), both licenced and unlicenced, for transport across the border. As in Indonesia, because the use of heavy machinery to cut trees and to transport logs were both easily monitored, illegal logging without the connivance of law enforcement officials would have been impossible;

* George Bouma and Halina Kobryn, "Changes in Vegetation Cover in East Timor (1989-1999)" Natural Resources Forum, Vol. 28, 2004, pp. 1-12; Lars Erikstad, Vegar Bakkestuen, and Odd Terje Sandlund, "Deforestation in East Timor since 1972 as indicated by LANDSAT imagery," Annexe 6 to Sandlund et al, 2001. Declines in forest cover between 1972 and 1999, as measured by remote sensing, were also confirmed in Erikstad et al. However, the vegetation cover was not broken down by type into dense forest, forest and woodland, as in the Bouma and Kobryn study.

- To a lesser extent, the clearing of forests to create new plantations;*
- Use of napalm by the military in the 1970s.

50. The loss of forest cover cramped rural communities' capacity to make decent livelihoods in many ways, including through:

- Loss of access to wood products such as firewood, vegetables, livestock forage and medicinal plants;
- Degradation of soil quality, leading to declines in fertility;
- Degradation of soil stability, with increases in erosion and likelihood of landslides on steep slopes;
- Soil compaction and loss of water retention capacity, with consequent reduction in water tables and water availability, and possible increases in flash flooding;
- Loss of opportunity to gain a livelihood from sustainable logging and harvesting wood products for commercial purposes.

51. The Commission is not aware of any steps taken by the Indonesian administration to protect forests in Timor-Leste from illegal or unsustainable exploitation.

The Timor Sea

52. The most significant economic asset at stake in Timor-Leste was the petroleum-rich oceanic trough between Timor and Australia. Not explored until the early 1970s, these resources have yet to make a major contribution to Timor-Leste's economy.† Yet the rich deposits of oil and natural gas in the Timor Sea have played a central role in the struggle over East Timorese sovereignty. The Australian and Portuguese positions on the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination and the Indonesian occupation were deeply influenced by their economic interests in the Timor Sea (see Vol. II, Part 7.1: The Right to Self-Determination). The oil and gas fields in the Timor Sea are mentioned here because they illustrate how economic interests in the exploitation of these valuable natural resources have shaped both the positions of international actors regarding the right of the people of Timor-Leste to self-determination and the economic conditions of the East Timorese and their ability to provide for themselves.

53. The 1989 treaty between Australia and Indonesia divided the Timor Sea into Indonesian and Australian exclusive zones and a Joint Petroleum Development Area. It also provided for production of the fields to be split between Australia and Indonesia on terms that were unusually favourable to Australia. Political considerations almost

* Plantation cover increased from 3% to 5% between 1989 and 1999, and forest/coffee cover increased from 6% to 7%.

† Although not explored until the early 1970s, the trough's petroleum potential was the impetus for Australia and Portugal's boundary negotiations dating from 1953. J.R.V Prescott, "The Australian-Indonesian Continental Shelf Agreements," Australia's Neighbours Vol. 82, Sept – Oct 1972, pp. 1-2, cited in Jolliffe, p. 58.

certainly influenced this outcome: Australia was thought to have reaped the rewards of having been one of the few countries to give de jure recognition to the Indonesian annexation of Timor-Leste.

The right to food

54. All people have the fundamental right to live free from hunger. In realising this right, the state has a minimum obligation to ensure that all people have access to essential food supplies. This duty includes taking steps to:

> Improve methods of production, conservation and distribution of food…[including] by developing or reforming agrarian systems in such a way as to achieve the most efficient development and utilisation of natural resources. (ICESCR, Article 11(2)(a))

55. Widespread poverty and climatic factors have meant that cultivation of food has always been difficult in Timor-Leste. Periodic El Niño droughts are a fact of life and seasonal food shortages (typically lasting 2-3 months a year) are routine condemning people to live on the edge of malnutrition. By the early 1970s, the human and livestock populations were putting severe pressure on soils in some areas. But, however precarious their existence, the local population had developed means of spreading risk and weathering these lean periods.[34] Even after the added disruption to food supplies that followed the civil war in 1975, the ICRC chief delegate to Timor-Leste steadfastly denied that there was famine in the region. He characterised the situation immediately following the civil war as one of "food stress" rather than famine, due to the embargo on shipments of supplies (of food and gasoline especially),[*] and to the pre-existing conditions of poverty and poor health.

56. As shown in Table 4 par. 24 above, only 9% of state investment went into the agricultural sector during 1984/85–1993/94, a low figure in view of the fact that the vast majority of the population relied on agriculture for its livelihood. During the same period the share of agriculture in GDP declined from 44.2% to 29.8% (see Table 5 par. 26 above). As already discussed (see par. 25 above), the declining share of agriculture in GDP can be a sign of healthy economic change. But in the context of Timor-Leste, where agriculture remained the main source of employment, productivity was extremely low, and the impact of GDP growth on employment in other sectors was minimal, this was not the case.

57. Only 10% of cultivable land was used for agriculture, mainly because of security policies restricting movement of the population as well as conflicts over land ownership (discussed in par. 62-72, 143 below). The favoured recipients of what investment there was were Indonesian transmigrants rather than the indigenous population.[35] The investment that was directed to East Timorese farmers was not efficient. Irrigation works built by Indonesia, for example, were "of a very temporary nature and are not effective".[36] Because of a dearth of extension workers technical skills were not passed on. The introduction of inputs, such as fertiliser, that might have boosted productivity was erratic.[37] As a result by far the worst levels of poverty and malnutrition were found in the countryside.[38]

* Oxfam representative Adrian Harris stated in correspondence from Community Aid Abroad Australia to Oxfam England, dated October 1975, that the Indonesians had blockaded the border as a deliberate tactic to cause disorder as a justification for intervention. Submission to CAVR from Community Aid Abroad, National Office, Melbourne.

58. Aside from Indonesia's failure in this regard, the most severe impact of the Indonesian occupation on subsistence agriculture resulted from security measures which led directly to severe famine and the death of thousands. It is worth re-emphasising the point made earlier in this Report (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine) that before the Indonesian invasion, however dire the situation of health and poverty after centuries of Portuguese neglect, there were no reports of famine on the scale that occurred under the occupation, although it is understood that the population had experienced severe food shortages as recently as 1964 and 1970. Following the Indonesian invasion, the widespread, repeated and often prolonged displacement of people and the restrictions on farming, which were both a deliberate tactic and a side-effect of the Indonesian occupation, seriously interfered with well-established strategies of agriculture and land-management.

59. One person told the Commission about conditions in Iliomar, Lautém after he and his fellow villagers had been confined to the sub-district capital (posto) after surrendering:

> Because of these orders from the TNI, people could not move at all. It was strictly forbidden to go out of the camp to look for food, so people began to experience extreme hunger at Iliomar posto. We had just come down from Matebian, so we had no food with us and had not had the chance to make rice fields. So there was no food at all at the posto. In order to survive, everyone began eating all the coconuts that were around the camp – the young fruits, but also the old dry ones, and even the very small unripe ones.
>
> After a while, because thousands of people had been eating the coconuts, the trees stopped fruiting altogether. Then we began to eat the roots and leaves of wild trees, and many people became sick. Every day 2-3 people died from hunger, sometimes 40-50 died in a single week. To survive, people ate the kind of food pigs eat. They cut down banana trees, peeled off the outer layers and cooked the inner shoots. This caused many people to become sick with cholera and beri-beri [vomiting and diarrhoea]. After eating the banana trees, about 5-10 people died every day. So I guess that more than 200 people died from hunger during that period because every day you heard people chatting to each other, saying someone over here is dead, over there someone else is dead.[39]

60. One source cites Monsignor Martinho da Costa Lopes, Apostolic Administrator of Dili (before his dismissal in 1983):

If the Indonesians were to allow the Timorese people to move around freely and live where they like, there would be no shortage of food. Of course, food production is influenced by such factors as the climate. But the problem is that people are forced to live in settlements and not allowed to move outside them…this is the main reason people cannot grow enough food.[40]

61. There is evidence that the Indonesians denied "troublesome" areas their full quota of food and medical aid, believing that the aid would end up in the hands of the Resistance.[41] There are also reports of the military diverting food, medicines and clothing intended as aid for their own use or for sale in shops.[42] The military and local government officials also reportedly used aid in a discriminatory fashion to entice refugees to convert to Islam or Protestantism, or to lure desperate women into sexual slavery.[43]

Economic and social impacts of "resettlement camps"

Everyday life under Portugal and Indonesia may have been precarious and unhealthy, but it was far worse in the camps, villages and other places where hundreds of thousands of people were made to settle by the Indonesian military at various times during the occupation. The conditions in these places were squalid: housing was primitive, and the inhabitants had no access to sanitary or health facilities. Their purpose was to isolate the Resistance from the general population. This was to be achieved either by keeping them under close military control or by moving them away from areas where the Resistance was still holding out. This often involved the forced movement of people into low-lying settlements where they could be more easily monitored. The majority of the population had traditionally clustered in the uplands because of the endemic malaria in the lowlands.[44] These camps, therefore, exposed massive numbers of already weakened civilians to severe health risks. The extreme nature of the health conditions in the resettlement areas, and the retrogressive nature of the occupation's policy of maintaining these camps without providing health services for the detainees were a clear violation of their right to health.

A different kind of settlement camp was used to hold the thousands of civilians and Falintil fighters who had fled after the invasion and then surrendered or were captured. These people were held for periods, ranging from several months to many years, for the explicit purpose of breaking the lines of support to members of the Resistance who had not yet surrendered.[45] Already in a severe state of malnutrition when they came out of hiding, as internees in the camps they received minimal, if any, rations.* They were also forbidden to venture more than a short distance outside the camps, severely limiting their freedom to farm or to search for food. These camps were tightly guarded on all sides to prevent contact with the guerrillas. Internees who left their camps for any reason, including to search for food, risked being shot by guards for attempting to contact the Resistance, or by the Resistance for alleged collaboration with the Indonesians.[46] Refugees resorted to eating leaves and poisonous tubers found in the narrow area in which they could move, and suffered fits of vomiting and diarrhea as a result. One former resident of Uma Metan camp (Alas, Manufahi) states that cholera, beri-beri and tuberculosis were rife as a result of malnutrition and poor quality drinking water, and between 10 and 20 people died each day.[47]

People moved from villages where there had been uprisings or other forms of resistance against the Indonesians could face conditions even harsher than those in the post-surrender camps. Where these detainees had not themselves been involved in resistance activity, as was often the case, their treatment had an element of retaliation and collective punishment. Thus after the uprisings of August-September 1983, whole villages, including not just the relatives of Falintil soldiers and Hansip militia who had defected to the mountains but also their neighbours, were rounded up and moved to new villages where they were kept without food or proper housing, sanitary conditions and healthcare. Detainees were prohibited from farming or leaving the site for any reason. Visiting gardens, in particular, was prohibited as these were seen as common meeting places for civilians and guerrillas.[48] For example, after the Kraras incident of 8 August 1983, survivors of the subsequent wave of executions were moved to Lalerek Mutin, in an area of Luca, Viqueque that had previously been uninhabited due to its extremely hot, dry climate and infertile soil. The village head described conditions there:

> When we arrived at the site, to which we were moved by the Nanggala [Kopassus], all of our tools, such as machetes, knives, shovels, hoes, crowbars and any other farming implements, were confiscated. The houses were built in a line along the main road to make them easy to monitor. The houses and facilities prepared for us by the Nanggala were quite filthy and uninhabitable...The houses were built as an emergency measure and not meant to be permanent. There was no food at all…Security was extremely tight and we were prohibited from farming outside the site. We were required to assemble every morning

* There are numerous reports of hundreds dying after eating salt fish given by the military (see Vol. II, Part 7.3: Forced Displacement and Famine). Although some East Timorese suspected that the victims had been intentionally poisoned, the most likely cause of these deaths was "protein rush." The body does not tolerate eating high protein foods, salt or fat after months or years of severe malnutrition.

and afternoon to make sure everyone was present. If you wanted to go 200 metres from the village to a garden you needed a travel permit, so leaving it was essentially impossible. We were prohibited from having any contact with the outside; no communication with nearby villages was allowed. There was no medical assistance whatsoever. During the time we stayed there, we lived there under deep psychological pressure and trauma, and felt very depressed.[49]

After four or five months, as the number of people dying rose, their military custodians allowed the people in Lalerek Mutin, Viqueque to go out looking for food twice a week, on the condition that they also burn, uproot or otherwise destroy food sources, and thus deny them to the Resistance.[50]

Another site chosen for its remoteness rather than for its capacity to support those sent there, was Ataúro, an island off Dili that the Portuguese had also used as a detention centre. At its peak, in late 1982, Ataúro had a camp population of just over 4,000,[51] more than doubling its existing population, which was already struggling to scratch out a living on the dry, infertile island.[52] One detainee recalled her arrival on Ataúro:

*When we got there, I was separated from my younger brother [Mateus]. He stayed in house Number 22 with 60 other people; I was in Number 24 with 70 people. [Other sources report the houses as being 14 x 10m in size]. The houses where I stayed didn't have anything inside, just a tin roof and canvas for walls. There were no beds...At first the military didn't give us any food at all. Mateus and I ate what we had brought with us from Quelicai. A month later, we got a ration of food from the military, three cans of sardines. This was the ration for a whole family, and it had to last two weeks because we got the ration only twice a month...Those who couldn't stand the hunger stole papaya and manioc roots from the local inhabitants...Every day 2-5 people died from hunger, mostly children and the elderly.*[53]

Again, as with the right to health, the extreme conditions in the "resettlement camps" to which families, even entire villages, were displaced had an impact on education that far surpassed the inadequacies of the "normal" education system (see Vol. II, Part 3: Forced Displacement and Famine). The Commission's own research and secondary sources show that for years at a time children in the camps received either no education at all or a thoroughly inadequate one. In internment camps in Lautém and Liquiçá Districts, there were no schools at all from the time of the invasion until 1982-83.[54] In another camp, at Uma Metan (Alas, Manufahi), the military set up a "school", that was ostensibly for the teaching of Indonesian but in fact became a notorious rape centre:

